By passing by, Superantius took such view as he could of the Fort, and by and began on that side to batter the same; as did also the other Gallies on the other side; and withal, landed their Men on both sides, who upon signal given, ran resolutely to the Fort, and by plain force entering the same, prevailed upon the fearful Turks, and put them to the Sword every Mothers Son; so that of all that great Garrison, was not one left alive to carry news of the slaughter. This Fort was in length five hundred Paces, but not strong towards Land, from whence no fear was doubted. In it was taken seventeen great Pieces of Ordnance, with much fair Armor, and great abundance of Victuals; and seven Gallies which lay at Anchor under the Fort. Catara thus relieved, Superantius with Victory returned again to Coryca.

Superantius the Venetian Admiral with all things in readiness, having long lien at Coryca, expecting the coming of the Confederates, as was before appointed; sent Superantius the Provinder with five and twenty Gallies to Misina, to hasten the coming of Don John, and to attend upon him by the way. But coming thither, and thinking to have found a great Fleet and a strong power in good forwardness to have set forward, he found such small preparation, as well shewed the Spaniards small care for suppressing of the Turk, and that they would not be very forward in the service intended. Which filling him with grief and indignation, caused him to complain unto himself, of their unfaithfulness, and to bewail the state of his Country, with the whole Christian Commonwealth; for Don John had before solemnly promised unto the Venetian Embassadors, that all things should be in readiness against the appointed time; but now a great part of Summer was past, when scarce some few Companies, and about fifty Gallies were met together at Misina; and when Auris would come with the rest, no Man could tell. So that the careful Provinder stood now no less in doubt of the Spaniards delay, than of the Turks fury.

Selymus, after the great overthrow he had received at the Islands Coronarias, for fear he should be driven quite out of the Sea, was above all things careful for the renewing of his Navy; and having barely new built, and newly repaired two hundred Gallies, commended them to the conduct of Uluazles; with express charge, That by how much things had fallen out worke the last year, he should with so much the more care now beware the like danger; and not to go out of the bounds of the Archipelago, nor to adventure Batel but upon advantage, or at least upon an even hand.

This Uluazles (otherwise called Cordoba) was an Italian born in Calabria, who in his youth taken at Sea by the Turks, and chained in the Gally, and afterwards renouncing his Faith, by many degrees grew unto the highest preferments among the Turks, and so became an exceeding Plague as well to his own Country as all other of the Christians bordering upon the Mediterranean. He now Admiral for the Turk, after the manner of the proud Barbarians, threatened with Fire and Sword to be revenged upon the Venetians; which known at Venice, much troubled them, as well acquainted with the fury of the old Arch-Pyrate. Beside that, Ant. Barbarus their Embassador, all the time of this War kept in safe custody at Constantinople, had by Letters certified them, what a great Fleet, and what a strong Army Selymus had provided against them; and that he himself told 250 sail of Gallies when they set forward from Constantinople, beside some other that were to meet with them at Calipso; and that therefore they should beware themselves encountered with the Turks Fleet but upon equal strength. It was also at the same time commonly reported, That King Philip chief of the Confederates, careless of the Wars against the Turk in the East, was about to turn his Forces upon the Kingdom of Tunes or Algiers, nearer unto him; as indeed he did the year following. The Venetians intangled with so many difficulties, were even at their wits end, and day by day the Senate sat from the rising of the Sun to the setting of the same, consulting how all these mischiefs were to be remedied. But for as much as the greatest danger was to be feared from the Turks Fleet, as then hovering even over their heads; they by Letters commanded Falscarinus their Admiral, That whether the Confederates came unto him or not, he should forthwith take his Course towards the East, and there according to the Enemies designs, and his own discretion and valour, to do what he should think best to be done for the common good of his Country; and not to refuse to join with the Enemy in Batel, if he saw any good hope of Victory. Neither ceased they at the same time, both by their Embassadors and Letters, earnestly to call both upon the Pope and the King, to hasten their Forces to encounter the Enemy before he should come out of his own Seas; and to shew the terror of the War home to his own doors, rather than to receive it at their own. The like Message was also done to Don John, putting him in mind what his place, what the time, and what the danger of the time required; entreating him (if it were possible) of himself to add something unto that which the necessity of so important a cause required. Who nevertheless, for all the Messengers and Letters to him sent (which were many) went still on his idle folly, delaying from day to day; telling, That he would be by and by come, and that the Spaniards would always be so good as their word. Which was so far from this thought, that afterwards finding one excuse after another, he not only staid his coming, but called back again Requisinus also, whom he had sent before with twenty Gallies to Coryca.

Now were two months (nearly for the Wars) vainly spent; when Superantius grew so to see time to no purpose slip away, and leaving left the rest of the Summer should to as small effect in like manner pass also, with great instance importuned him to hasten his journey. Then at length Don John answered, That the Venetians requested but reason, neither that he withstood for any thing more, than to satisfy their desires; but that a greater care hindered the less, which was first to be prevented: He was advertised (as he said) that the French King, depending the flourishing of Constantinople, had assembled a great Fleet at Roset, with purpose intended to invade Spain, now that the King was buied in these Wars against the Turks; and that therefore they must pardon him if he put off the regard of Spain before others, being expressly commanded from the King, not to depart from Misina until he had other commandment from him. But whether whether this excuse by France proceeded of a true fear or otherwise, the Venetians much doubted; and the rather, for that the French King understanding thereof by the Venetians, was therewith (as reason was) exceedingly offended; protesting, that he was ever so far from that purpose of hindering any the Confederate Princes in that their Religious War, that if the troubles of his own Country would have permitted, he would gladly have given them aid therein. Many there were also that thought, Envy the ancient Enemy of Virtue and Faith, to have had a great power in his delay; doubting whether the Spaniards would have the joyce of the Victory well topped off, if they should joyn with the Venetians; or grieve if the same should by the Venetians be obtained without them. Superantius weary of discourses and long expectation, and almost out of hope of any help in time from the Spaniard, how untowardly forever things went, thought better yet warily to moderate his grief than to lie in dangerous a time to give any occasion for the Spaniard to fall quite off. Yet spake he not faultingly or flatteringly of the matter, but with a certain modest gravity declared, That he had thought Heaven would sooner have fallen, than that Don John would not at the appointed time have come to Coryca. And withal besought him, and wished him to beware that he brought not the common State into some great danger; if they had to do with such an Enemy as might be delayed with, then he could easily abide delay; but now for that the War and the Enemy was such, as wherein or with whom never any General had delayed without loss, to what end did he longer defer or trifle out the time? Or what other Fleet did he expect? If they should divide their Forces, then were they all too weak, but united together, strong enough to defend the common cause. The nearer the Enemy came, the more haste were they to make to joyn with the Venetian Fleet. And what could be (as he told him) more honourable or glorious, than for him a noble young Gentleman royally descended, of whom the World had conceived a great hope, that he would in Martial Honour exceed the glory of his most famous Ancestors, again to vanquish the proud Turk, the greatest and most mighty Monarch of the World; to fight the Batel of the Highest, to assure the Christian Commonwealth against a puissant an Enemy, and to purchase unto himself immortal Glory and Renown? As for the French, there was no such thing to be feared as was pretended, who with such slender preparation, not worth the name of a Fleet, was not so unadvised as to set upon a Kingdom of such strength and power as Spain. Furthermore he said, that it concerned not the Venetians more than the King himself, to have the Turks repelled; whole Kingdoms of Naples, Sicilia, and Spain, were no less than their Territory, exposed to danger by Spain. The good success of their Affairs in the East would open the way to the Conquest of Africa; but if the Turk should prevail, then were they to despair, not of Africa, but of all Italy, Sicily, yea and of Spain it self. The time (he said) and necessity of the Wars, with the extremity of the danger of the whole Christian Commonwealth, required that he should with all his power and speed possible, take upon him the defence of the common cause, or to say more truly of the Christian Commonwealth, then so dangerously impugned. These reasons drawn from the common good and the truth it self, much moved the General; but the Kings pleasure was to be preferred before all reasons or dangers that could be alleged. But hearing afterwards, what resolute command the Venetian Senate had sent unto their Admiral, he became exceeding careful; for he feared left if the Admiral should without his help fight the Batel and gain the Victory, he would convert all the glory thereof unto himself; but if he should chance to be overthrow, he would turn to his utter reproach and perpetual infamy; that in necessary a time he had withdrawn himself from the common cause. Wherefore as a Man perplexed, and in doubt what to do, he stood for a while as one at his wits end; yet at last, he upon deliberation resolved to take a middle Course, and so neither without the command of the King (by whose presence and order all was to be done) to depart with the Fleet from Misina; neither altogether to frustrate the Confederates of the expected aid. And to that purpose sent two and twenty Gallies under the conduct of one Lilly of Andrada (a noble Gentleman, to the Venetian Admiral at Coryca; with whom went also Calumninus with the Popes Fleet. Now was Pius Quintus the late Pope dead, and Pio Boncompagni, by the name of Gregorius Decimus Tertius, Pope in his stead; who upon the same conditions with his predecessor, had entered into the League, and liking very well of Calumninus, kept him still for his Admiral.

Long had Falscarinus expected the coming of the Confederates, and albeit that the year was far spent (August being then come) and no such aid sent as he had expected; yet desiring to do something worth the remembrance, and beseeching their honour, he earnestly perswaded Calumninus and Lilly to set forward with him toward the East, and with their united Forces to give the Enemy Batel; telling them, That if they were all of like courage, they should go not only to the glory of the present Batel, but to the great honour and advancement of the whole Christian Commonwealth. After that, he extenuated the power of the Enemy; saying, That he could not but marvel, from whence such a number of Gallies was reported, could so suddenly come to the East, or whereunto so great confidence and boldness was grown upon them, so lately overthrow and put to flight; The Enemies Fleet (he said) was the year before overcome and dispersed, the Captains and Mariners slain; and that therefore it was not credible, that so many Gallies could with such celerity be built, and such a number of Mariners and Masters as was needful, in so short time provided; that the provision of the Enemy was by flying Fame made far greater than indeed it was; or possibly could be; for why, they might easily guess what the Enemy was able to do, by the Christians themselves, who could not without much ado and great labour build their Fleets, and train up their Mariners and Masters; and that therefore letting Fame file, which commonly maketh things greater and more dreadful than they are; he was verily perswaded, that the Enemy was glided to life most unskillful and ignorant as well Mariners, as unskillful Souldiers; who suddenly taken up in the inland Countries, and put into the Gallies, knew not so much as the very names of the Ropes and Tacklings, and other Equipage; and then these Gallies which they had were like enough to be but weak, as of them which were the last year rent and builed, and now again botched up; or in haste built of green Timber, could not be nimble or greatly serviceable. Wherefore he exhorted them, the valiant Men to set forward against the Enemy; and that with the greater courage, for that the last years Victory had opened unto them the way for the gaining of another. Which if it should so fall out, as good hope there was, they should thereby take from the proud Enemy both power and hope (but in long time) to be able to recover his strength at Sea; so that they in the meantime without fear, might at their pleasure take the rich Islands in the Archipelago. Now if the Turks declining Batel, should retire themselves into the Hellespont, then might they with Fire and Sword spoil all the Frontiers of their Dominion on this side the Straits, and open a way unto the Christians to do great matters.

Hardly were Columinus and Lilly perfwaded by the Admiral; neither did they thereunto give their consent, until it was decreed, That they should not in any case joyn Batel with the Enemy, but with their Gallies and Galeaffes first placed in the front of the Batel, in whom consisted the greatest hope of the Victory. So letting forward toward the Enemy, and come to Commestina, Letters were brought unto them from Don John, certifying them, That he was now by Letters from the King commanded to come towards the East, and to joyn his Forces with the Confederates; but yet that for certain days he could not come, until he were better provided of all things necessary; and that therefore they should in the mean time carefully look unto all things, promising so soon as he possibly could to come unto them. Upon these Letters, Columinus and Lilly began to doubt, whether to go on further, or to expect the coming of the General; yet so far as he had not expressly written any thing concerning their staying, and Fufcarinus urged them forwards, on they went, with their Fleet divided into three Bataels.

The number and order of the Christian Fleet.

The whole Fleet consisted of 155 Gallies, six Galeaffes, and twenty tall Ships; in the right Wing was Superantius; in the left Wing Columinus; and in the middle Batel, Columinus, Fufcarinus, and Lilly; and in the Rearward followed Quirinus. Before each Batel went two of the Galeaffes full in readiness for present Batel. In this order they came first to Zacynthus (commonly called Zante) and fo to Cerigo; the next day after to Colepharia (commonly called Dragonaria) over against Cerigo. Here Angelus Sirtius a valiant Gentleman, General before to discover the Enemy, and what strength he was of, returning unto the Fleet, declared unto the Admiral, That the Turks Fleet, consisting of 160 Gallies, sixty Gallions, and four great Ships, lay about Malvoesia, in the entrance of the Bay called Sinus Argolicus, upon the Borders of Peloponnesus, about fifty miles off from the Christian Fleet. Shortly after, the same Fleet was again discovered making for Malta; whereupon the Christians, before resolved to fight wheresoever they should meet the Enemy, forthwith put themselves in order of Batel, and to win their Galeaffes in the front, made with what speed they could toward him. These two Fleets were thought for many respects almost equal; the Enemy was in number more, but inferior in strength. The Christian Fleet by reason of the heaviness of the Galeaffes, made but small way; and the Enemy afraid of the great force of Ordnance the Galeaffes carried, durst not come near them.

rather nimble than they, but ours more firm and forward. Look wherein each exceeded the other, therewith they endeavoured to help themselves and annoy the Enemy. The Christians fearing to be circumvented by the multitude of their Enemies, opposed their Ships and Galeaffes before them as a most sure forreile; and the Turk, by how much he had had the worse success the year before, was so much the more careful, to beware how he endangered himself within the reach of the Galeaffes. The Christians desired nothing more than to fight and to come to handy Blows; but the Turk, who thought it sufficient for the present not to be overcome, sometime made away as fast as he could, and by and by stayed again, if happily he might have taken the Gallies separated from the Galeaffes; never seeming willing to adventure further than reason and discretion would. The Enemy seeing the Christian Fleet coming fill on, and ready to give Batel, first seemed as if he would have done the like, but afterwards turned his Course upon the right hand, and kept aloof along the Coast of Malta. At which time the Christians, although they were very desirous to have followed them, yet the Turks, with their nimble Fleet were quickly too far gone for the Christian Fleet to overtake them, especially with their heavy Ships. That day almost spent as it were in the chase of the Enemy, towards the going down of the Sun, the Enemy put into the current of the Sea betwixt Cerigo and the Harts Island, in breadth about ten miles, and there dividing their Fleet into three parts, lay in good order, as expediting the coming of the Christians, with the Prows of their Gallies turned, as if upon the confidence of the place, which they had filled overthwart, they had purposed nothing more than to fight. Yet both Fleets seemed resolved; the one not to fight without the Galeaffes, and the other not to come near thole not Ships, from whom they had but the year before received so great harm. And although the Enemy, as was afterwards known, purposed nothing less than to fight, but upon great advantage; yet fearing by open fight to dishonour his Lord and Majesty, and by granting as it were of Victory, to encrease the Fame of the Christians, the crafty Pyrat made a great shew of that he least indeed purposed. For pretending a great desire to fight, he indeed deluded the Christians hope; who although the Wind had failed them, yet in hope the Enemy would abide them Batel, with much labour and rowing came to near him, that the great Shot began to file too and fro on both sides; when the matter should have come to be tried by dint of Sword, then plainly appeared what the Enemy had indeed purposed; for still keeping the Prows of his Gallies upon the Christians, he by little and little shrank back; and beside that the shadow of the night began then to approach, he caused all his great Ordnance, charged only with Powder, to be shot off, and so in the thick of the smoke retired upon; colouring his subtil departure also, by certain lights left in their Cook-houses, making them think the whole Fleet had still there stayed. By this means the Turks with great celerity escaped, being also helped in this, that the Christians blinded by the heaviness of the Galeaffes, could not but fair and softly pursue them; for these Galeaffes, as they are Vessels of great service, so are they also heavy and unwieldy, and not fit for chase. The departure of the Enemy at length known, the Christians also unwilling to fight by night, returned to Cerigo. Two days after, the Turks stayed in the Bay of Tenarus (now called Metapone), and the Christians as Cerigo; contented in that, that the Enemy was the cause that the Batel was not fought, and reckoning his weary Christians desirous of nothing more than to joyn in Batel with the Enemy, in their former order set forward from Cerigo, and falling all the night, were in the break of the day detected from Land by the Turks; whereupon Ulucalies by shooting off of certain warning Pieces commanded all his Men to go aboard, and to put themselves in readiness for Batel. And now the Christians were not far off, when as the Turks (left declining of Batel might reprove them of fear) came out of the Haven, with their Fleet divided into three Bataels; whereof the left Wing was extended a great way into the Sea, the right Wing still keeping near unto the Main, and in the middle Batel was Ulucalies himself; who came all on faster than the Tide drove them, staying their Course oftentimes of purpose, to have drawn the Gallies of the Christians from the Galeaffes and Ships. Ulucalies seeing his Fleet thus in order, and fearing nothing more than the Galeaffes, commanded both the Wings of his Fleet (having in each of them fourscore Gallies) to fetch a great compass about, the one on the right hand, and the other on the left, aloof off from the Galeaffes, and so to assail the Wings of the Christians on the sides or behind; in hope so to have disordered their Batel, and without danger to have drawn the Gallies from the Galeaffes and the other heavy Ships. Which their intent the Christians perceiving, in their Wings turned about their Gallies also, in manner of the new Moon, their main Batel still facing the middle Batel of the Turks. The Wings of the Turks Fleet thus far separated from the middle Batel, seemed to present unto the Christians a great advantage; which Fufcarinus (intensive to all the offers of good Fortune) quickly perceiving, and calling unto Columinus and Lilly, and shewing them the Enemies main Batel at hand, and the Wings gone a great way off, requested and persuaded them, That not staying the heavy Gallies and Galeaffes, but with him upon the suddain assail the Enemies middle Batel, nor delirious of the Wings; not doubting but so to overthrow the Enemies greatest strength there, before the Wings could, now they were so far gone, joyn themselves to the Batel again. What could (as he said) have hapned more wisely, than to have their Batel divided?

So that they might at more advantage fight against every part thereof, now separated, and against all the parts at once. If they had thought themselves not only equal, but too strong for the whole Enemies Fleet united, should they not the better overcome them apart and dispersed? The opportunity, as he said, was but short, and therefore to be forthwith resolved upon. If they would take the present occasion of Victory then offered, and as resolute Men charge their Enemies, little fearing any such thing, they should by their celerity and valour, teach the Turks what the Christian discipline of War and power was able to do; but if they would therein use delay, they should ere long in vain with for the like occasion they had let slip, when as their Batel was again strengthened with the Wings. This the Admirals Speech was of most that heard it joyfully received, and his Counsel well liked; and that with such a general cheerfulness of the Soldiers, as shewed in them no want of courage to have given the Enemy present Batel. But Columinus and Lilly being of the same mind they had been always, said it were dangerous so to do, for fear of drawing the whole three Bataels of the Enemy at once upon them, against which they should be too weak, without the help of the Galeaffes and heavy Ships; and therefore said flatly, That without those Vessels so much feared of their Enemies, they would not in any case hazard the fortune of a Batel. But whether Columinus and Lilly were of that opinion for that they thought, or were so charged by Don John (of whom they altogether depended) not to fight in his absence, many doubted. The Wings of the Christians in turning about to confront the Wings of the Enemy, were a little disordered; which the Turks perceiving, and taking the present opportunity, with fifteen of their Gallies were about to have charged the trailing Gallies, which Superantius perceiving, to stay their Course, went out courageously against them with four Gallies, and made with them a great fight; in the heat whereof, Superantius feeling forty more of the Enemies Gallies coming towards him, and doubting to be enclosed, with all speed sent for relief, which came presently in, namely twenty Gallies, with two of the Galeaffes; which forthwith sent their thundering Shot so thick and furiously amongst their Enemies, that in a little time eighteen of their Gallies were by them all rent and torn; and the Turks therewith dismayed, were glad in such halt to return, as if they had rather fled than retired. Superantius having at that fight but one of his Gallies shot through, returned again into his place. Of this light fight many deemed what would have been the event of the whole Batel, if the opinion of Fufcarinus had prevailed. Both the Fleets falling again into their order, although the Christians could not so fall follow, as the Turks went before them; yet came they near them, that oftentimes they changed Bullers, as well with their small Shot as their great. And yet for all that, it was by many signs gathered, that neither the Turks would abide present Batel, neither the Christians longer delay, if by their Enemies they might. The Christians had agreed (as is before said) not to joyn in Batel without their Galeaffes and tall Ships; which Ulucalies well understood, both by his suggestion and his own Effays, as also by their manner of falling. And he himself, although he had no great desire to fight, yet to be the better able to frustrate the endeavors of the Christians (who with great labour drew with them the Galeaffes and other heavy Ships) sent his chargeable great Ships to Malvoesia, there to be unrigged; whereby he discharged himself of a great burthen, and made himself able at his own choice and pleasure, to leave or take, to fight or not, and to use such Soldiers and other necessities as were in the same great Ships, supplied the wants of his whole Fleet. By which policy the matter was brought to that pass, that if the Christians would needs draw the Enemy to Batel, they must of necessity forsake their Galeaffes, their most assured strength; or if they would not leave them; then they could not by any means enforce the ready Enemy to fight. The day now declining, the Enemy supposing himself to have done enough for that time, both for the abating of the heat of the Christians, and encouraging of his own People, in feemly order, as one not afraid, failed with his Fleet to Corona. The Christians in like manner retiring themselves to Cerigo.

Whilst things thus went, Don John by a Frigate sent of purpose, gave knowledge to the Fleet, that he was come to Cerigo, sharply blaming the great Commander for their departure, and that they staid not for his coming; and further commanded them as their General, all other things thence apart, forthwith to meet him at Zacynthus, there to resolve of all matters. Columinus wholly devoted to the Spaniards, and preferring the favour of Don John before the rest, hearing his Message, was in such halt to have returned, that he would have perfwaded Fufcarinus to have left the heavy Vessels and other weak Gallies at Cerigo, and with 100 of the best Gallies with all speed to have returned to the General. Of which opinion was also Lilly. But Fufcarinus more careful than the rest, as he whom the danger more concerned, would not yield to that perfwasion; for that in so doing, they should (as he said) leave the Ships and Galeaffes, the chief part of their strength, in danger to be spoiled by the Enemy; whom they now kept at a Bay without the help of their General; and should, as he well hoped,

John Don sent of purpose, gave knowledge to the Fleet, that he was come to Cerigo, sharply blaming the great Commander for their departure, and that they staid not for his coming; and further commanded them as their General, all other things thence apart, forthwith to meet him at Zacynthus, there to resolve of all matters.

by often provoking of him, at one time or other draw him to batell, and have over him a notable Victory. And therefore requested them for the love of God, and the Zeal they bare unto the Common-good of all Christendom, not to depart farther off, nor to suffer the Enemy to escape out of their hands, neither by their departure to leave the Islands of the Venetians subject to the fury of the Enemy; whereas the General might at his pleasure and without danger come unto them, they lying betwixt the Enemy and him. But Columinus and Lilly resolutely let down, hap what hap should, to do what Don John had commanded, would not listen to the reasonable persuasions of the Venetian Admiral, but told him flatly. That if he would not in that they had said yield unto them, and with their Gallies presently return to Zacynthus, as the General had commanded. Whilst they were yet thus discouraging, news was brought, that the Enemy was come with his Fleet into the Fret of Cerigo; which caused them with all one consent to resolve in such order to pass by the Enemy, as if they should have given him present Battell; whereas before, they were deterred by the persuasion of Euforinus to have gone to Cressy, and there leaving the Ships and Galeaffes in safety, to have afterwards returned to the General. In such order the Christians passed by the Enemies Fleet, which lay still in the Fret of the Sea without moving, standing as it were rather upon the guard of themselves, than resolved for Battell. In three days failing they came to Zacynthus, where they found not Don John, but two of his Gallies, and commandment, that they should leave their heavy Ships, and with their Gallies come to Cephalonia, where they should not fail to meet him. Hereupon the Venetians were exceedingly grieved, and muttered through the whole Fleet, That the Spaniards bearing themselves upon their Wealth, were too proud, and in comparison of themselves, regarded neither the conditions of the League, neither any other Mans credit, but trod all Men under foot; and would now use the Venetians, nor as their Friends and Confederates, but as their Slaves and Vassals, feeding them in the mean time but with vain hope. Yet forasmuch as the time and necessity required, they were content to be overruled; and so leaving the Ships and Galeaffes at Zacynthus, went with the rest of the Fleet to Cephalonia; whether Don John was not yet come, but had sent word thither, That if they had any desire to joyne their Forces with his, they should yet come further back unto him in Corse. This Message (which they had rather feared than expected) much troubled the Venetians; who reader to suspect every mischief, than to hope for any good, began to fret and complain, That the Spaniards could very well tell the Venetians what they had to do, and forget in the mean time, what was on their own part to be performed. A hard thing it was to say, and yet to be said, that now they had more to do with those their daily-lying Friends and Confederates, than with their Enemies; for with their Enemies they were to fight but in time of Battell, but with them they were to wrestle at all times and in all places. They were by them (as they said) drawn from the fight of their Enemies, when as they might have been overthrowen; nor to the intent that with their united Forces they might more easily fight against them, or under the conduct of Don John gain the Victory; but rather lest any thing should have been done which might be to the honour or profit of the Venetians, and that time which was to have been bestowed in the managing of the War, spent in lingring and delaying, and vain going forward and backward to no purpose. One only way there was (as they said) to have dispatched with the Turk, which was, by bringing him in another notable Battell, and so to have utterly broken his strength at Sea; which Courfe the Confederates made no less difficult by their backwardness and delays, than the Enemy by declining of Battell; That they had long ago by many secret signs probably conjectured, that the Spaniards had more care to hinder and cross other Mens doings, than to do any thing of themselves: That their endeavours were to illustrate those great hopes which promised unto the Christian Common-wealth, the greatest Felicity and Happines, together with immortal Glory; and, That the Turks of late discouraged with the fortunate proceedings of the Christians, might again rejoice at their mishaps.

The Venetians, notwithstanding all these their murmuring Speeches, loath to fall off from the Spaniard, kept still on with the rest until they came to Don John at Cerigo, who then lay with 7 Gallies, and 18 Ships at Splia, in the uttermost end of the Island. At their first meeting, Don John shewed himself not a little offended, that they had not with more duty before attended his coming; and they again not a little complained of his long lay, with many other of their grievances, which were tedious here to rehearse. The Fleet now all with much ado at length met together, which consisted of two hundred Gallies, nine Galeaffes, and thirty six tall Ships; It was by general consent agreed, That they should again let forward toward the Enemy. They were not yet under Sall, when two of their Epiahs brought them news, that the Enemies Fleet (weakly furnished both of Mariners and of Soldiers) was come to Nauparium; which filled them all with good hope, that the Turks Fleet so evil provided, might in that place upon the suddain be easily oppressed, and the rather, if they came upon them unexpected. Wherefore, because they would not be defied, they kept not their Courfe on right forth, but failing by night, kept aloof upon the right hand; and having passed Zacynthus, came with great silence unto the Strypades, where they lay at Anchor all that day. In the evening they loosed thence, so calling their Courfe, that the more to terrifie the Enemy, they might before day fall upon him; and be seen in the mouth of the Haven where he lay, before there could be any report made of their coming thither. But this Courfe so well for, the time was so evil cast, that it was fair day long before they could come to the appointed place; where the Turks out of their watch Towers discovered a far off the coming of the Christian Fleet, gave warning thereof unto their Fellows; whereupon an Alarm was presently raised in the Town, and all Men in Arms ran headlong to the Walls and to the Haven. But the Turks out of hope with their evil rigged Fleet to be able to withstand the Christians, and not daring to try that weak Harbor, and all now in a great hurly burly, ran confused hand over head, Soules and Mariners aboard; and whilst they had yet time, got them in half out of that Harbor, and as they chased by their Enemies, got them into safe Harbor at Modon, a strong Town of Peloponnesus, about six miles off. Columinus was sent before the rest of the Fleet to have purified them; but they were got so far before him, that they had recovered the Harbor before he could overtake any of them.

the Town, during the Turks Battell. But when they had so lien almost all that day, and no Man durst come out; and now towards the evening certain signs of Tempest appeared, the Christians fearing to be by force of Weather driven on ground, put farther off again to Sea. Then at length Euforinus sent out certain light Gallies to follow in the tail of the Fleet, when the Confederates suddainly laying their Courfe, and turning their Prows upon them, drove them headlong again into the Harbor; and afterwards retired themselves with the whole Fleet into the Islands Omus, now called Sapientia, right opposite against Modon. The next day wanting fresh Water, they removed unto the Bay of Adiffia, thence they were to pass to the River Pamissus, where they allere into the Sea; where in passing by Carme, they were oftentimes shot at out of the Town; and landing their Men to Horsemen, sent for that purpose by Uluzalen. There was Water daily bought with the Lives of many there slain on both sides; in the end, the Christians prevailing, watered, and so again returned unto the Omus from whence they came.

Metakhe or Modon (for it is by both Names known) standeth almost in an Island stretching far into the Sea, where towards the West runneth out a long point of the Land a great way into the Sea; in the uttermost part thereof, standeth a great round Tower. The Town it self, is on the one side enclosed with the Sea, and toward the Land so strongly fortified, as that it seemeth almost impregnable: Towards the South cometh in a fair Bay about three miles wide, safe from all Winds except the Northerly Wind only; and shut up by a little Island in the mouth of the Bay, maketh a safe and quiet Harbor, with two entrances thereunto on either side of the Island. Within this Bay lay the Turks Fleet, with the Sterns of their Gallies toward the Land, and their Prows towards the Sea. At the Southerly coming in of the Bay standeth an Hill, which the Inhabitants call Adon. On the top whereof, the Enemy had placed six great Pieces of Ordnance, wherewith to keep the Christians from entering that way. So had they also upon the point of the Main, which (as we said) runneth out from the Town, and upon St. Bernardi Rock, planted other great Pieces of Ordnance to defend that passage also. The Christians coming unto the mouth of the Bay, there lay with their Fleet divided into four parts, but yet doubtful what to do; for beside that the entrances of the Bay were but narrow, they were also far more dangerous to be entered, by reason of the great Ordnance planted upon them. Nevertheless, the Venetian Admiral in hope of good success, and loath to let the fearful Enemy so to escape out of their hands, would fain have persuaded the General with his whole Fleet to have entered the Bay; and that in the Harbor to have oppressed the Enemy; which he shewed to be no hard matter to do, for that the Enemy was too weak in strength, and could not be from Land relieved. In which doing, they should indeed overthrow but one Fleet; but in the overthrowing of that one, cut in sunder all the Sinews of the Turkish Empire by Sea; and raising a Tumult in the Bay, and filling all with a general fear, should undoubtedly be the first open step the Enemy to flight: Which these, who should be, but they carrying about with them the terror of the Victory, they should with their victorious Fleet, take from the Turk all the Islands of the Argens? That truly and wisely it was said of Thomaspollus, That whoever had the command of the Sea, must needs also prevail in the rest, and at length carry away the Victory by Land also. It was (as he said) the part of good Chieftains, not to be wanting unto themselves when occasion was offered; besides that, they were the fame Turks, whom they had but the year before vanquished; and what had that one year either taken from them, or given unto the Turks? Or what should they fear if Pieces of Ordnance mounted upon a Hill, who if they should undertake the Battell, were not to fear the great store of Ordnance in 260 of the Enemies Gallies and Gallions? I my self (said he) will be the Guide and Leader, in whatsoever shall seem most difficult and dangerous; and will in person my self be the first that shall enter the Harbor, and adventure the first danger. Great Victories (the said) were not to be gained but with great adventures; and that therefore the matter were to be halted, before more aid should be sent unto the Turks. Wherefore they should be resolute Men attempt that, the Turks thought the Christians durst not to have attempted; and with the same courage break into the Bay, wherewith they had but the year before broken the strength of the same Enemy; and by the power of God, carry away another notable triumph of the vanquished Turks; who overcome in a second Battell at Sea, must needs depart with all their maritime Territories. With evil liking of the Spaniards was the Venetian Admiral heard; and Don John the General, deeming both the time and place unfit for the attempting of so great an exploit; re-ferried on the one side, the strength of the Enemy, the disadvantage of the place, the difficulty of the Battell, with the manifold and great attempts received by the overthrow and rash attempts of their Enemies: That the Enemies strength was not to be so much deemed by the eye, or by report, as by reason; and that many in seeking to encrease their former glory, had in so doing overthrowen the fame: That the Christians in entering and adventuring the Harbor, should on the one side be beaten with the Artillery from the Hill; and on the other, with the Artillery out of the Castle of Modon; and that it was not like that Uluzalen should if need were, lack aid from Land, who but the other day had sent great Troops of Horsemen to have kept the Christians from watering; That a matter of so great importance, was (by Euforinus his leave) not rashly to be taken in hand upon an heat and haughtiness of Stomack, but upon a grave and mature deliberation; for if they should in a place of so great disadvantage, hazard the fortune of a general Battell, it should seem that either he knew not that kind of fight, and force of the Enemy, or else would make the Bay of Modon more famous by the overthrow of the Christians, than was the Curzulari by the slaughter of the Turks. Then what a shame would it be, if they which were about to oppress the Enemies Fleet, should themselves be overthrowen; and that in their own device? He had rather (as he said) preserve his own Fleet, than to take 600 of the Enemies Gallies; and to account the fame for a greater honour. Which he determined not, for that he would not have any thing done; but that unripe occasions should not be too much hastned, and as it were thrust headlong forward; whereas time would give opportunity for the overthrow of the Turks Fleet; so that they ran not blindly on headlong; and that in future time, the Venetians would be joyous that they had so moderated their desires.

The Christians (the said) had sufficiently prevailed, if those things should fall out well, which were warily and advisedly considered and resolved upon.

The matter thus on both sides debated, and nothing done, they returned with the Fleet into the Port of Nauparium. This proceeding, as it diversly moved moved the Spaniards and the Venetians, so brought it forth divers Speeches, every Man speaking in favour of his own Nation. The Spaniard openly vaunted, That he had most providently resolved, for that how dear the Council of the Venetian Admiral would have cost if it had been followed, the thing it self (as he said) shewed, by the extreme danger thereof preferred, not in the doubtful opinion of Men, but laid open before their Eyes. The Venetians on the other side more desirous of Batrel, the nearer they had seen the opportunity to have revealed, and the Enemy more impatiently they endured, so assured a Victory to have been let slip out of their hands; and thereof spake accordingly.

The Castle of Modon was besieged by the Christians.

The Christians lying at Navarinum, consulted of many things what they were best to take in hand; and resolving at last, by Sea and Land to besiege the Castle of Modon, which kept the passage into the Bay, and defended the Turkish Fleet; they returned again to their land, and landed 7000 of their best Souldiers, to besiege the Castle. And at the same time, appointed the Gallies with certain Gallies to batter it also from Sea; which the more commodiously to do, they joyned two of their greatest Gallies together side to side, which they made fast with Masts and strong Ropes, and so boarded them clean over, whereon as on a Platform, they placed their Gabions all afront, filled with Earth, and great Ordnance likewise, to have battered the Castle. But when this Engine (in manner of a floating Fort) should have performed the service for which it was devised, it proved unserviceable, after it had with much ado been brought thither, being ready to sink with the weight of the great Ordnance and other things wherewith it was overcharged. For which cause, and for that they understood a great number of Horsemen to be come into the Town, they gave over the Siege vainly begun, and put again with their Fleet to Sea. It returned at the same time, that a tall Ship of Venice departing from Zacynthus, and coming along the Coast of Peloponnesus with provision for the Fleet, was descried by the Enemy; who thinking to do the Christians a great dishonour, if they could almost in the sight of their Fleet surprishe her, they sent out certain light Gallies to have taken her; Ulucaire in the mean time with the rest of his Fleet, lying in the very mouth of the Bay, ready to come out, if the Christian Fleet should once stir to relieve her. Which the Christians perceiving, and well hoping that if the Enemy would be drawn to batel, fell out Columinus with his Gallies to rescue the Ships; and others also which lying aloft, might get in betwixt the Turks Gallies and the Bay: Don John and the Venetian Admiral, lying ready to have given Batel, if Ulucaire should have come forth; but the Christians coming on with a small Gale, the Enemy being afraid, by shooting off of certain warning Pieces within the Bay, in time called back the Gallies that were already gon out of the Bay; who all forthwith came in, excepting Mahomet the Nephew of Barbarossa, a most famous Captain amongst the Turks, who as one of great courage, and desirous of honour, staid a little without the Bay, with greater courage than discretion, expecting who should assail him. Him the Marquis St. Cruce set upon, and had with him a great and terrible fight; but in the end the Marquis prevailing, slew Mahomet with all his Turks, and with honour carried away the Gally. So the dishonour which Ulucaire would have done the Christians, fell upon himself, having in his own fight lost one of his best Captains with his Gally.

Mahomet slain.

The next day, because the year should not pass without something done, nor the hope of so great a preparation come to nothing, the Christians determined to besiege the Castle of Navarinum (which was in ancient time called Pylus) more famous for nothing, than for that it was the native place of old Negus. The City of Navarinum standeth upon a rising ground, stretching fowmeth into the Sea; whereinto it hath a large prospect, and a fair large Haven, but subject to the North-wind. It is defended with a point of the Main, running with a compass into the Sea, whereon standeth an old Castle. Some fent before to view the situation of the place, brought word back, that the Castle might in three days be won. The performance of which exploit, was committed to Alexander of Parma, Prince of Parma, whom the Venetians furnished with Munition and Victual. He landing with 2000 Italians, 1000 Spaniards, and 500 Germans, began with twelve great Pieces to batter the Castle. And albeit that the Battery was planned so far off, as that it did the Enemy no great harm; yet happily the enterprise had taken effect, if by taking the straight and troublesome passages through a rough and thick Forest, the City had been kept from relief; but forasmuch as those passages were left free, the Enemy cunningly opposed policy against force, for falling out of the City, they gave the Christians an hot skirmish; and in the mean time whilst the Christians were so busied, by a Port toward the Forest on the other side of the City, received in great number both of Horse and Foot. The report of this new come aid caused the Prince to raise his Siege, and to go again aboard. And now rested all the hope of the gaining of the Town in the strength of the Fleet; and that not small, for that the Turks not relieved with Victuals by Land, were by the Confederates kept from them also by Sea; for at that time the Turks were troubled with two great mischiefs, the Plague, and Famine. For no provision had there been made, as it is thing not to be feared; and that little being spent that was in the Town, they were enforced to seek for Victuals further off, which coming but sparingly, as in time of Dearth, was oftentimes by the way intercepted by the Souldiers that lay about in the Country Villages, wanting Victuals no less than they in the City. And the more Men the Boglerberg of Grace brought down for defence of the Sea Town, so much the more the wanes of all things daily increased: So that the Men died of want, but that in short time all would be brought to extreme penury. What a death the Mortality had made, the want of Men in their Gallies well declared; for many of the Gallies for lack of Mariners and Souldiers were sent away into Euboea, or left at Malvasia, or carried away to Constantinople. Those who staid in the Bay of Modon, were scarce 100 Gallies, and 40 Gallies; and they so slenderly manned, that the greatest Gallies had scarcely an hundred and twenty Men left in them, and they so meager and lack of victuals, that the Gallies scarcely hold up their Weapons. The Christians understanding of these things, were in good hope, that by continuing the Siege, they should without danger gain a notable Victory; for which cause Fulcarinus perswaded the Spaniards (of whose confidence he doubted) to hold it out, as Men of resolution; shewing them, that in the event of this action rested for them for ever to be feared or contemned of the Turks; who except they should be changed into Fishes or into Birds, could (as he said) without a notable overthrow escape their hands out of the Bay. But unto this his hope and counsel, the event was not correspondent; for the Spaniards, whether it were for the tediousness of the Siege, or for want of Victuals, or for the approach of Winter, or else moved with some other reason, began to think of the matter diversly; and at the first a report was raised, That the Christians giving over the Siege, would shortly return home; and the reason was, for that they wanted Bisket, and had scarcely Victuals left for fifteen days, which was to be referred for their long journey home: besides that, The approach of Winter did call them from the action; and that having done what they might, they could never draw the Enemy forth to batel; and that therefore having sufficiently and as far as was possible already discharged their duties, they were now able to regard their safety, and to foresee that their Fleet, wherein the welfare of them all was reposed, were now not too far endangered. At the first these Speeches were divulged by the common Souldiers and Mariners of small credit or reputation; but afterwards by more, and they also Men of better place and fort: Yea Don John himself, whether it were to some other purpose, or that he so spake in good earnest, began to lay the fault upon others, why that he, so lately come from Atyna, should in so short time want Victuals and all things necessary.

The Venetians marvellously grieved at the Spaniards.

With these unexpected reports, and so far different from the confederation, the Venetian Admiral with the rest of the Venetian Commanders were exceedingly troubled, and grieved above measure; for it seemed not credible, that they which but a little before were come from the most fertile and plentiful Country of Sicilia, in all Ages the most fruitful and abundant Granary and Storehouse of Italy, both in Peace and War, could so soon want Victuals. He could not therefore but be troubled, and therefore he requested the Leagu which ought by the Capitulations of the Leagu to have come loaded with Bisket, Victuals, and other warlike and necessary Provision, y become empty? Or but to have brought so much as might but suffice for a month only? If this were done without the knowledge of Don John, where was then the care of a General? If he winking therat, where was his zeal to the confederation, or to what purpose came he to Cyprus? Was it to avert the Christian Fleet, having once or twice met with the Enemy from doing any good upon him? Could it come into any Mans head (besides that in doing he was therein to extinguish the glory of a most certain Victory, like to work the Turks confusion) by the infamy of a voluntary return to encrease the glory and renown of his Enemy, and bring a perpetual ignominy and disgrace unto the honour of the Christians? Verily the Spaniards, therein to themselves not so willing to have the power of the Turks abated, as the strength of the Venetians not increased.

The Venetian Admiral perceived that the Spaniards in no wise returned from the Enemy.

These things Fulcarinus and the Venetians sometimes fretted at amongst themselves; and otherwhiles the Admiral himself expostulated the same with Don John and Columinus; and in the preference of the greatest Counsellors shewed, not only how profitable, but also how necessary performance was in all Marital Affairs; that there was an old and usual matter for Men in befieging of their Enemies, to suffer many difficulties; if they should, having perfected nothing, return with the Fleet, who would doubt but that both their labour and charge was again the next year to be renewed? And what could this delay be else, but a propagation of their further calamities? That therefore it much concerned the Christian Common-wealth, although they had not all things in abundance, yet resolutely and with patience to endure the scarcity of Victuals. If want of Bisket were feared, the General might easily remedy that matter, by speedily sending for those Ships which lay laden with Victuals and good store at Tarentum; which thing might in short time be performed. In the mean time he proposed to supply the Spaniards wants with part of his own store; and that he had rather his Men should live with Roots, than to let the Enemies Fleet come up, so to escape his hands: That the desire to protect the honour of the Christians, would overcome all difficulties. Beside that, the matter would be but short, if it were done at once, in one continued Course; if they went undoubtedly by them performed, if they gave not over the thing they had so well begun, until they had accomplished it. They (as he said) might in good safety lie with their Fleet in the Ports of Navarinum, Spartia, and Capraria; whereas the Enemy, lying flux up in the Bay of Modon, should have but a bad and dangerous Winter Harbour; and October being now begun, should in short time be in danger to perish with blustering Storms and rage of the Sea, familiar unto that time of the year; or else enforced with the extremity of the Weather, and with want, to adventure into the open Sea, and with their weak Forces to joyn Batel. What should therefore let, why they should not for 10 or 15 days continue the Siege, as best befitted the honour of themselves, the valour of their Souldiers, and worthiness of the Christian Name? What a terror it would be unto the Enemy, to see the Christians ready to endure all extremities and wants, to gain the Victory over the Turks? Again, what dishonour and discredit would it be unto themselves, if they should suffer the Enemy (shut up and not daring to fight) to escape; especially, when as they might fittingly end the War? The Senate of Venice, he said, most rested upon the valour and courage of Don John, and therefore he requested him not to deceive the great hope they had of him conceived; for how much should he himself blemish his own honour, if when he had before relieved the afflicted state of the Common-wealth, he should now, when it was most of all to be helped, forsake the same? Which should not be much unlike, as if a Man should with great labour purchase great store of precious Pearls, and upon an humorous passion cast them all into the Sea: That Men generally hold a great opinion of him the General, an honourable remembrance of his Victory, and regard of his Valour; all which, how much the more pregnant and honourable should they be, by the second vanquishing and subduing the most mighty Monarch of the World; and that if the action well begun, should be effectually prosecuted by the goodness of God, the direction of the Commanders, and the resolution of the Souldiers, in short time the Christians should carry the Victory from the Turks, and make him their General, equal not only with the great Champions of the present time, but even with the most famous Commanders of all former Ages. Whereunto Don John replied, That the action then in hand no less concerned the Spaniards than the Venetians; and that he had in his life desired nothing more, than to stand the Christian Common-wealth in stead: That he pointed at the same mark with Fulcarinus, and in zeal to do good unto the Christian Common-wealth, gave place to no Man; but indeed to perform it, was a thing much more difficult than to say it; lesser things (he said) were to be overpassed, to reserve themselves for the performance of greater; and therefore marvelled that Fulcarinus alone could not see things most manifest before his eyes, who otherwise could with his piercing wit see through the deepest matters; could he think by any other means to abate the power of the Turk, than if they kept their Fleet whole? that it were ever the manner of the greatest and most worthy Commanders, rather to flum the present dangers, than to encrease their Territories.

That nothing was so well purposed, which might not be of some wrongfully suspected; but his faithful meaning to be pure and without spot; and albeit that the opportunity served not for him to shew it; yet was his desire and endeavour nothing less: And that Fulcrinus should do well more intensively to consider, what the cause, the matter, and the time required: That the manner of War at Land and at Sea, were much different, and that although Wars of both forts were to give place unto the most unseasonable time of the year, unfit for any kind of War; yet might Men at Land, better endure the Winter Storms in their Tents and Cabins, than at Sea in their Gallies, where oftentimes, will, skill, wisdom, nor valour help not; but that (except it be so provided and foreseen, that the seasonable time of the year, and commodious for sailing, may be taken) all must together perish by Shipwreck. What, would he have them to arrive above their power with the Winter Storms, and Famine, the greatest extremities of nature? Besides that, he was verily perwaded, that the Turks enjoying the commodities of a good Harbor, and of a rich City, would therein safely Winter; the Country of Peloponnesus relieving them with all necessities; when as the Christians in the mean time, except they in time returned home, should lie exposed to the rage of the Sea, standing as it were in a continual Watch, not having away their Weapons in the depth of Winter and dead time of the year, which in reason ought to give rest to all Men. And that therefore every Man ought for the present to bear his own grievances, and not by the harms of his Friends and Confederates, to seek his own avail. And that he bearing himself upon the inward integrity of his good will toward the Venetians, would this day, howsoever Fulcrinus should undertake, that if the Kings Fleet should by long staying there, it should not be less concern the Venetians, than the King himself; and taking God to witness, would solemnly promise, Nothing to be unto him more leifer or religious, than to be preft so soon as the time of the year would give leave, and by his endeavour to make all Men to know, that he had no less care of the Venetian State, than of the Kings Affairs: neither desired any thing more, than to be accounted, and indeed to be a most constant upholder of that most Christian League; and that beyond all expectation, even in the judgment of the Venetians themselves; but for the present they must pardon him, if he gave place unto the necessity of the time. As for the offer of the communicating of their Vittuals, that would not be any help, but the destruction of both the Fleets; for so they should both sooner feel the want; wherefore it were much better to preserve the Fleet, which they might use in the next years Wars, than willfully to cast away the same by Famine, and the rage of the Sea. In brief, what an indignity should the Christians sustain, if they themselves should by the same means be overthrown, whereby they had thought to have overthrown others?

Now the Spaniards were so resolutely set down for their departure, that not only without the consent of the Venetians, but even without their pri- vacy, their departure was resolved upon, and secret commandment given unto the Masters of the Gallies, with all the haste that might be, to depart thence to Messina. Which the Venetian Admiral understanding, and therewith troubled as with an unexpected matter, came aboard the General, and greatly complained of his purpose for to fuddain a departure, requesting him a while to stay, until the two Gallies made fast together in the Harbour of Naxos (as is before said) with the Ordnance upon them, might be put in good safety, and neither they, or any thing else left for a prey unto the Enemy. With much ado, Fulcrinus perwaded him to stay that night, that those Gallies might be brought out of the Harbour, and all things put in order for their departure. The rest of the night was spent in debating of the matter too and fro; where Don John would needs have it conceived into a publick Instrument in writing, that the Fleet by the general consent of the three Admirals returned for lack of Vittuals; whereunto the Venetian Admiral hardly consented. But when the Instrument should have been made and confirmed, Don John better advised by one of his Secretaries, That the same would redound unto the great dishonour both of the King and himself, that the Fleet coming out of the fruitful Country of Sicilia, should in a months space have Vittuals, changed his mind for the writing, and only requested the Venetian Admiral to credit him and Columinus, in that they had said concerning the want of Vittuals; promising him, that if upon the way he should meet with the Vittuals that were sent for, he would forthwith return and give him aid, as the time and occurrences should require; but in the mean time to proceed by common consent, to do that which was most needful. Hereupon they returned; and coming to Coryra, they met the expected Ship laden with Vittuals. Now is not Fulcrinus unmindful of his duty, but coming to Don John, put him in remembrance of his promise; telling him, That it was not unlike, but that the Enemy so soon as he understood of their departure, would come out of the Bay, and return with his Fleet towards Constantinople; and being but weak manned, and worse furnished of Mannes, might easily be overtaken upon the way and overcome. But Don John was not by any means to be thereunto perwaded, pretending, that he was by the King commanded forthwith to return. So the expectation of great matters to have been this year done, came to nought, but vanished into smoke; and nothing performed worth to long a discourse, more than to see with what difficulty great actions are managed, wherein the hands of many great ones are required; who jealous of their own Honour, or envying at others, corrupt with delays the fairest opportunities, and by their cross dealing, no less than the Enemy, hinder the common good, whereas they would all faintest seem to aym. From Coryra Don John departed to Messina, and Columinus unto Rome. Fulcrinus with greater honour than success returned to Venice, where he was with great joy received; both of the Senate and the Citizens in general; and so (no less famous for his patience and moderation towards the other Confederates, than for his policy and valour) with the good liking of all Men gave up his charge, in few years after to receive a greater.

About this time, Amida King of Tunes (of whom Amida the much is before spoken in the Life of Sulymán) being but a little before driven out of his Kingdom by the Turks (who had of long by little and little encroached upon him) and as a private Man lived in Exile with his two Sons at Gulesta with Franciscus Towars Governor, thereupon hearing of the great overthrow of the Turks at Lepanto, and of the good success of the Christians, sent Embassadors to Don John General of the Confederate Princes, then lying in Sicilia, humbly requesting his aid for the recovery of his Kingdom promising to defray the whole charges of the War, and for ever to hold his Kingdom of the King of Spain, as his Vassal and Tributary. Which his request well considered of, and the matter of no small consequence for the safety of the Christian Countries lying over against that part of Affrick, to have so dangerous an Enemy removed; Don John the year following (the beginning of October) by the commandment of the King of Spain his Brother, departing from Drepanum in Sicilia, with an hundred and five Gallies and forty Ships, arrived the next day about noon at Gulesta, where the Gallies of Malta came unto him, and shortly after John Andreas Amira the Admiral with nineteen more, and Columinus the Popes Admiral with fourteen more, all well appointed. At his arrival at Gulesta, he understood by Amida and the Governor, the whole estate both of the City and of the Kingdom of Tunes; and that the Turks and Moors, terrified with so great a Fleet, were about to forsake the City. Wherefore having well viewed the place; he the next day after landed his Forces about four miles from the City, and sent two thousand five hundred Footmen before the rest of the Army to the City; who found it all desolate, the Turks and Moors being before for fear fled, some to Caryra, some to Bijerta; when entering without resistance, came to the Castle, wherein they found two hundred Moors, who said they kept it for Amida their King; but yet would by no means suffer the Christians to enter. All which was forthwith made known to Don John, who then because it was almost night, would not move, but early the next morning set forward with his whole Army; and entering the City, before abandoned by the Turks and Moors, and to coming to the Castle, found nothing therein but great store of Oil, Butter, and Wool.

Amida the late King, by the commandment of Don John all this while staid at Gulesta. But whilst Don John was yet at Tunes, news was brought to him the thirteenth of October, That the Turks Garrison before fled out of Tunes, with divers Moors coming to Bijerta, where they kept out by the Citizens. Amida therefore to recover for which cause they began to burn and faze the Country thereabout. Whereupon the General first Towars the Captain of Gulesta thither with part of the Army; who encountering with those Turks overthrew them, and had the City by the Citizens peaceably delivered unto him.

The Kingdom of Tunes thus easily once again recovered from the Turks, Don John thoroughly informed of the faithless and cruel dealing of Amida the late King, and that in desertion of the Christians and their Religion, he had already had intelligence with the Turks, and procured the death of some of the Christians; gave this definitive sentence upon him, being yet in the Castle of Gulesta: That forasmuch as he had of long time been the author of great discord and endless troubles in that Kingdom, and had most unaturally deprived Mulaffa his Father, the rightful Heir of the Kingdom, of his figure; and in like manner tyrannically over his natural Brethren, and the faithful Heirs of that Kingdom, whereby the Turks had taken occasion both to invade and possess the same; he should therefore by the commandment of the King of Spain be carried Prisoner with his two Sons into Sicilia, there to remain for ever. Which heavy doom he taking most grievously, and yet crying out for mercy, was forthwith thrust into a Gally; and with his Wife and Children transported into Sicilia, there to live in perpetual Exile; The just reward of his merciles and unnatural dealing with his Father and Brethren; God no doubt requiring him with the like measure he had before measured unto them.

After that (the King of Spain so commanding) Malcomus, Amida his elder Brother, and right Heir of that Kingdom, was appointed King in his place; who departing from Gulesta to Tunes, was received as King, and there by solemn Oath promised for ever to be the King of Spain his Vassal, and to do whatsoever he should command.

There was before departed out of Tunes forty thousand Moors, who now came and offered their supplication to Don John, that they might again return and live with their new King; which their request being easily granted, they in great numbers every day returned into the City. Shortly after 1500 Turks, with 3000 of those wild People which some call Arabians, some Alabares, were troubled all the passages about the City; who were at last by the Christians overthrown, and 50 Christians whom they had taken Prisoners, rescued. After that, Don John by the advice of his most expert and skilful Captains, commanded a strong Castle to be built in the middle way betwixt Gulesta and Tunes; and for the performing thereof left Gabriel Serbellio with 2000 Italians; and Calazar a Spaniard with other 2000 at Gulesta. And so having performed that he came for, and disposed of all things as he thought best, returned again into Sicilia.

A grief of griefs it is, and sorrow almost unconfable, when worthy actions most happily begun, fort not to such happy end as was in reason hoped for. The greatest and most famous Victory of all Ages gained against the Turk, seemed to have lightened the Christian Common-wealth, and great hope there was, that the Christians falling into unity amongst themselves, would by an happy exchange make the Turkish Empire the Seat of their Wars, and to turn into the Turks Dominions, the terror, slaughter, and other calamities of War, which had for many year afflicted the Christian Common-wealth. But by how much the more joy was amidst such daily calamities and tears, so much greater was the sorrow, so great an hope to be come to nought, and Men to be so blinded with the darkness of envy and disdain, that they could not so much as think, with what dishonour and danger of the Common-estate, they should shrink from to just, so honourable, and so needful a service, including in it self the general good of all Christendom. When poverty shall consider what things might then have been done, and the devices whereby the common cause was overthrown; it will worthily blame and greatly lament to notable a Victory and fit opportunity, sent as it were from Heaven for the effecting of great matters, to have been let slip and passed over so lightly regarded. This hope in Arms, had now before had reposed all the minds of those Christians in concluding of Peace. Truly the Venetians both spoke and thought honourably of King Philip, as of a most faithful, just, devout, and honourable Prince; yet greatly blaming his Officers and others of great authority about him, as Men more regarding their own private, than the good of the Christian Common-wealth. In these perplexities of the Venetians, King Philip promised them to set forth a greater and stronger Fleet against the next year, and to be sooner in readiness with all his Forces and warlike Provision, and so to help them in all he might. Who for all that gave small credit unto those promises, for that with the like they had been oftentimes before deceived. And therefore as trusting most unto their own strength, they with all carelessness and expedition entertained more Souldiers; of whom some they put into their Fleet, the rest they placed in their Garrisons in Crete, in Dalmatia, and their frontier Towns in Epirus. Neither were the Turks then idle, as the report went; yet were they thought to manage that War with greater fame than strength; for they had of purpose given it out, That they would the next Spring with divers Armies invade the

Venetian Territories in Crete, in Dalmatia, in Epirus, yea and in Italy it self; and with their incredible multitude both of Horse and Foot overwhelmed the Venetians, that they should not be able possibly to hold out. This and more too they bravely vaunted of; but indeed Ulcasses coming to Constantinople, had brought his Fleet to shaken and so weak, as that it seemed not possible but in long time to be again repaired, and furnished with Souldiers and Mariners, in stead of them that had been lost, some in fight, but more by the contagiousness of the Infection. But howsoever the matter stood, the Venetians careful with the expectation of great matters, and in all hope of good success, comparing their own strength with the strength of the Enemy; yet were they no less discouraged with the delays and cross dealing of the Confederates, than with all the provision of the Enemy. It stuck in their minds, how that the Spaniards at such time as Cyprus might have been defended, delayed their coming so long, that Nicopia being lost, it was time to return; neither could they forget that lingering delay to have been the cause of the great mortality amongst their Men, dying in the Fleet at Jadera; They remembered also, that the commodities which of so notable a Victory were most plentifully to have been reaped, were by the slender prosecuting of the same, so sparingly taken, that the former dangers still remained. And that Don John, who ought by appointment to have been at Cyprus in the beginning of Summer, was scarcely come thither in the later end of August; And that he in the third year of this War, at such time as their Fleet was with great labour and charge again repaired, would not, or lifted not to adventure to have again overthrown the Enemies Fleet, but in the very action to have always trifled away the greatest part of Summer, before his Spaniards could be sent forward; and when he might safely have come to Cerigo, to have called back Pulcarinus and the rest, then facing of the Enemy, and even ready to have given him Battle: It was then secretly suspected, the Spaniards to have staid of purpose, and to have dallied on the time, that the Venetians having spent their Forces, might be the more exposed and subject to their injuries: It stuck fast not in their minds also, but even almost in their eyes, what things had happened of former time, when their Confederations with that Nation; that were grieved in the space of three years an hundred times, twenty hundred thousand Ducats to have been to little or small purpose spent in that War: Besides that, they doubted lest the Flemings with their Confederates should foment the King of Spain in defending of his own Territories, as that he should not be at leisure to send any aid into the East; in which case, what hope or help were they to look for? How should they then defend the rest of their Signiory in the East? How should their empty Coffers suffice to maintain so great Armies both by Sea and Land, as might withstand so puissant an Enemy? Long were the discourses, and effectual the persuasions, that the Venetians had amongst themselves, to induce one another, and all in general, more circumspectly to consider, not only what had already passed, or was presently in hand; but also more warily to foresee what would be the course and what the event of a matter so important; and besides to break off the Confederation, which they had always found to have stood them in small stead. In revolving of these things, only one remedy seemed most effectual for the curing of their afflicted State; which was, by desisting from War, to conclude a Peace with the Turk, howsoever: which they were the rather in good hope to obtain, for that divers Speeches concerning the same had passed at Constantinople, and were from thence again reported at Venice. All Men thus inclining to peace, the Senate referred the proceeding therein unto Abd Antimus Barbassu their Embassador, (who all the time of these Wars had lien in safe custody at Constantinople) willing him therein to use the help of the French Embassador, who had always been a perfwader of Peace.

Selymus having got the Island of Cyprus and divers other places from the Venetians, and yet well wearied with the harms and losses he had himself received both by Sea and Land, was also desirous enough of Peace. So that the French Embassador might as it was thought, have got a reasonable and indifferent Peace, if he had but expected the opportunity of the time: But he (whereby moved with the common harms, or some other secret causes to him best known) in making too much haste, and seeming too desirous of Peace, much hurt the common cause of the Venetians, which he most desired to have furthered. Selymus having found him, resolved with Admahmet the great Bassa, what he would have done; who at such time as the same Embassador came unto him about the matter, told him, That he had himself many times moved, yea and so far forth as he might, importuned his great Lord and Master for Peace, but could never find him willing to hear thereof, until that now at length overcome and wearied with the continual solicitation of such as might do him with him, he had yielded therunto. So the thing that Selymus himself undoubtedly desired, that the crafty Bassa seemed him with most difficulty to grant, rather upon the influence and contemplation of them that laboured for the same, than for any desire he had therunto of himself. For certain days at the first the French Embassador was most courteously heard, and the Bassa with fair and cunning Speech promised, that the matter of pacification should easily and in short time be compassed; and so at their first conferences things passed rather in general terms, than that any conditions of Peace were particularly agreed upon; only this was on both parties consented unto, That the Venetians should send their Embassador of purpose, for the full concluding and confirming of the desired Peace. Which charge was by the Senate committed to Jacobus Spermusius in whole wisdom and valour they had supposed great hope and confidence. He was no sooner come to Constantinople, and the Turks delivered of the fear of the Christian Sword, by the dissolution of the confederation, but that all things were changed, and the Venetians glad to endure the proud looks of the Turks, their disdainful cars, their despightful speeches, their long and insolent attendance, with many other shameful indignities: Yea the Bassa was so shameless, as proudly to ask them, How they durst be so bold as to impugn the great Emperor Selymus his Fleet at Sea. Whereunto the Embassador answered, That the Venetians had always honoured the Majesty of the Turkish Emperor, neither had at any time taken up Arms against him, but in their own reasonable defence, when force was by force to be repulsed, a thing lawful even for the wild Beast in the wild Wilderness to do. At the first entreaty of the Peace, the Bassa seemed to put the Venetian Embassador in good hope, that the Venetians according to his request should enjoy their Territories in Dalmatia in as ample manner as in former times, and bounded with the same bounds, whereof they had in these Wars lost some part about Jadera. But when the matter should have come to the discussing, the Turk began to shrink from that he had before promised, refusing not only the restitution of the Territory they had indeed by Treason got; but by cautious expostitions of his meaning, framing the conclusion of the prelate Peace unto the form of their former League, required, That as the Turks had now yielded unto them Malvasia and Nauplia, so now they should redeliver unto them two other places of like worth and importance: As for not restoring the Territory they had taken about Jadera, to colour their deceit, they pretended that they might not by their Law restore unto the Christians any Town or place wherein were any Church or Temple dedicated or converted unto the Mahometan Religion; as was there; and further, That the same Territory was already given by Selymus in reward unto his Souldiers, Men of desert, from whom without great injury it might not be again taken. Hereupon the French Embassador complained, That promises were not performed; and the Venetians so fretted, that they were even about to have returned as Men shamefully deluded, without concluding of any thing. Yet when no better could be obtained (the Turks still standing upon such hard terms) the Embassadors by the appointment of the Senate concluded a Peace with the Turk; whereof these were the chief Capitulations; first, That the Venetians should give unto Selymus three hundred thousand Ducats, one hundred to be presently payed, and the other two hundred by equal portions in two years next following; then, That the Merchants Goods should be indifferently on both sides restored; and lastly, That such place of the Venetians as the Turk was already possessed of, should still remain unto the Turks; but that such Towns or places as the Venetians had taken in the Turks Dominion, should be again forthwith restored. For the first payment of the Money the Turk was earnest, thereby as by a fine for an offence committed, to make this League unto him more honourable.

This Peace at Constantinople concluded the eleventh day of February in the year 1574, was by the Decree of the Senate confirmed; and afterwards the 13 of April following solemnly proclaimed in Venice, to the great wonder of the other Confederates. For the better satisfying of whom, the Popes Nuncio, with the Embassador of Spain, were sent first into the Senate House. And although there were many things that grieved the Venetians, yet did they forbear all hard speeches, and with that their moderation received much more honour, as it is more difficult for an angry Man to overcome himself, than others. The Duke with calm and temperate Speech, framed to the purpose, declared unto them, That Anger and Hope, two evil Counsellors, being set apart, he had concluded a Peace with the Turk; not for that he was desirous of the Turks friendship, which what account it was to be made of, he right well knew; but for the love he bare to the State, which was not only in danger, but even with death it self to be maintained. How he had been spoiled of the Kingdom of Cyprus, he further declared; and that the Venetian State grew every day weaker and weaker by the continual War; and that therefore, before it were by loss upon loss come to the uttermost of extremity, they not able to maintain so heavy a War, were to take some better course for the preservation of that which was left of their Signiory; for that the safety of the Venetian State should all times be a sure fortress against the defence of the Christian Commonwealth against all the furious attempts of the Enemy, and uncertain events of time.

The Fame of this sudden and unexpected Peace was for the just and common hatred of the Christians against the Turks, generally evil taken; and the Venetians for the concluding thereof hardly spoken of, as if they had betrayed the whole Christian Commonwealth, or at leastwise their Confederates. For Men were for the most part of opinion, that the Turks Peace would be but feigned and deceitful; and that having gained time to do things in order, according to his desire, he would for the natural grudge he bare unto the Christians, come to his old course, and as he had always done, break the League and take up Arms. Some said, That the Venetians forsaken of their Friends and Confederates, would in their own devices perish; yet so, as that their destruction would turn to the general harm of all Christendom; and these Men were of opinion, That in that case, and against that Enemy, a dangerous War was to be preferred before an uncertain and dishonourable Peace. Nevertheless the Venetians, besides that they for the present eased themselves of many by respiring an heavy burthen, so have they thereby enjoyed the fruits of a long and happy Peace, and found the same unto their State both wholesome and profitable until this day. It was already thought of matters, That Selymus was the more willing to have Peace with the Venetians, that he might the better recover the Kingdom of Tunes and the strong Castle of Gazeta from the Spaniards; who with the Knights of Malta now gaped more after Tripolis and the other Port-towns holden by the Turks upon the Coast of Barbary, than how to defend the Venetians their Confederates. Thus with the loss of Cyprus and some part of the Venetian Territory in Dalmatia ended this mortal and bloody War betwixt Selymus and the Venetians. In the Course whereof it well to be seen, what great matters the united Forces of the Christian Princes were able to do against this most mighty Enemy, if all discord and contention fell apart, they would in the quarrel of the Christian Religion join with heart and hand against him, and fight the Battle of Christ Jesus.

Selymus now at Peace with them who before most troubled him; to keep his Men of War busied, shortly after converted his Forces against John Vayvod of Valachia, and so at length joyned all that Province to his Empire. This Country of Valachia was in ancient time called Dacia; it hath on the East the Euxine (now called the Black Sea) on the South the famous River Danubius, on the West Transylvania, and on the North Russia. It is divided into two parts, the one called Transilvania, and the other Moldavia (of the River Pruthia), and runs running through the midst thereof, but passing the other both in greatness and abundance of Pasture. That part called Transilvania, Mahomet the Great (who won Constantinople) made subject to the Turkish Empire; but upon Moldavia, the other part, he only imposed a yearly Tribute of two thousand Ducats. After which time the Vayvods of that Country, aided sometimes by the Hungarians, and sometimes by the Poles, rose up oftentimes against the Turks, and refused to do their homage. It chanced, that John Vayvod of that Country, favouring the Poles, and joyning in League with them, lived much in Russia, as purposing from thence also to have taken his Wife. Which Selymus suspecting, with a great power chased him into Exile, and placed in his stead one John (called of his Country-men Iwan, and of some Iovanna) the supposed son of Stephanus formerly Vayvod of that Country; who with Franciscus Comnenianus a Moldavian, who afterward notably betrayed him, having of long time lived amongst the Turks, to be the more gracious amongst them, renounced his Faith, and being circumcised, turned Turk; and and following the trade of Merchandise, became among them a Merchant of such Fame, that he became very familiar and well acquainted with the great Baffees of the Court, and at length with Selymus himself. He understanding by his Friends near himself the Turkish Emperor, of his purpose for the removing of Bogdanus, corrupted with rewards the great Baffees, to be mediators for him to Selymus, that commanded by them, he might be preferred to be Vayvod of Moldavia; still increasing the suspicion Selymus had conceived of Bogdanus, and telling him, That he supported by the Polonians, was like enough in short time to reject his obedience to his Imperial Majesty. Selymus at the instance of the Baffees nominated this John to be Vayvod, who with a great power of the Turkish Horsemen entering into Moldavia, easily possessed himself of the Country, Bogdanus being then absent in Russia, and as then suspecting no such matter; who yet afterwards attempted in vain by the help of the Polonians to have again recovered his Country, but finding no possibility to do so, fled afterwards into Muscovia, where he long time after lived.

John the Vayvod fell into suspicion with Selymus and the Baffees of the Court.

John now quietly possessed of Moldavia, for some few years held the fame with the good liking of the Turk, paying him his wonted Tribute; but afterwards repenting himself of his wicked revolt from the Christian Faith, and now elisions again embracing the same, and (ignorant of his own Fortune) persecuting with too much severity those which withstood his coming into the Country, especially such great Men as took part with Bogdanus; and now after his return unto the Christian Faith, not favouring the Turks as he was wont, but crossing therein many matters, became suspicious both unto Selymus and the Baffees his old Friends. Which the Vayvod of the lesser Valachia (commonly called Valachia Transilvania) understanding, he became a suter unto the great Baffees of the Court for his Brother Peter, and earnestly travelled with them, that as John supported by Selymus, had driven Bogdanus out of Moldavia, so Peter his Brother might in like manner by his help drive John out also.

In which his Sute he spared for no cost, neither ceased by malicious suggestions to increase the suspicion already conceived of John the Vayvod; who having rejected the Mahometan Religion, and again embraced the Christian Faith, would (as he said) in short time, as had Bogdanus, joyne hands with the Polonians, and call off his obedience towards the great Sultan, by whom he had been so highly promoted. Besides that, this malicious Man offered, That his Brother Peter for such his protestation should pay yearly unto Selymus twice so much more as did John, namely an hundred and twenty thousand Ducats by the name of a Tribute.

The Baffees before corrupted, and moved with the greatness of the Tribute, perswaded Selymus, by an Embassador to send for John the Vayvod, to come unto him himself in person, and to command him to give place to such a Man as he should send thither in his stead; which if he should refuse to do, then to denounce unto him open War. Hereunto Selymus, who had even then much emptied his Coffers with the loss of his Fleet in the Battel of Lepanto, and the chargeable Wars against the Venetians, was easily induced; and to that purpose sent his Embassador to the Vayvod; who having audience the one and twentieth of February, at the same time that Henry Valoy (afterwards the French King) was crowned at Cracovia, delivered his Message as followeth:

Selymus the Great Emperor of the Turks sendeth me unto thee, John, Vayvod of Valachia, his Tributary;

with this Command, (whereunto his pleasure is; that thou shouldst without delay send him answer.) First, He chargeth thee to send him not such a Tribute as of was wont, but twice so much more; to wit, an hundred and twenty thousand Ducats. If thou shalt refuse to do so, there is another ready to give it for himself John the Turk and his posterity. But Selymus mindful of thy Constancy, Fidelity, and Valour, will not be troublesome unto thee in thy Government; if thou forthwith send the aforesaid Tribute. Which if thou shalt refuse to do, then his will is that thou shouldst give place to another, and thy self return with me into Constantinople, there to answer the matter; otherwise, I am in his Name to denounce all hostility and the calamities of War both unto thee and thy Country.

The commanding Speech of the Turkish Embassador.

This proud Message of the Embassador struck farther into the mind of the Vayvod than any would have thought; yet diffembling his grief, he commanded him to be brought to the Lodging appointed for him; telling him, That in a matter of so great importance, and so much concerning the whole State of his Country, he could not give him to present Answer as he required; but that upon mature deliberation had with his Nobility and Council, he would in short time answer him accordingly. The Embassador being gone to his Lodging, the Vayvod forthwith began deeply to consider of Selymus his demands; and that in the Turks Faith was no assurance, which he kept or brake with the Christian Princes as best fitted his own turn; and besides that, That if he should grant to pay that great and heavy a Tribute in so great poverty of his Kingdom, forewaisted with civil War, Selymus would not be therewith long contented, so long as any Man would give him more, but happily would the next year exact a greater, and in the end such an one as he with all his Subjects should not be able to pay; which it should not be safe for him at any time to refuse, so long as any Man would give it. Wherefore calling together the Nobility and States of his Country, he brake with them in this sort:

If ever you were to consult and deliberate of a most important and difficult matter, this verily is that time; for Selymus the Turkish Emperor, enslaved with insatiable Avarice, and I know not by what perfidious contented with his wonted Tribute, exacteth of us twice so much more. If you shall grant it, it shall not much concern me, as not to be paid by me your Sovereign, but by your selves and your posterity; if we deny it, forthwith he denounceth unto us Fire and Sword, with all the calamities of War. And in this behalf of our Kingdom, almost spoiled by Civil Wars, how shall you be able to pay it him? Wherefore declare unto your minds. Verily I forgive, if you will in this yield unto Selymus, and grant him so great a Tribute; he will not therewith long hold himself contented, but every year extort a greater, until he have altogether eaten us up. Wherefore it were better for us (in mine opinion) to lose our lives together with our Wives and Children, than to suffer so great an indignity; neither is it mine own Estate that troubleth me, for why, it is you that are to pay it, and not I. Wherefore if you list not to endure the so dishonourable and base a tribute, let me forthwith go underhand and from you; and I will for my part so provide, as that I will not only not pay unto the barbarous Tyrant the new and heavy Tribute he demandeth, but not so much as any Tribute at all; so that you be not wanting both to your selves and me. I know right well (beloved and Fellows in Arms) what I owe both unto you and the Common-weal, for whose good and welfare I am always ready to lay down my Life.

He had no sooner thus said, but that a secret sorrow and unwanted silence had as it were oppressed the

the whole Assembly. At length, as Men awaked out of an heavy and dead Sleep, they murmured among themselves, that the Turkish Emperor should so without reason oppress them, with doubling and redoubling of his Tribute; and were generally of opinion, That the Vayvod had not so plainly as truly spoken of the intollerableness thereof; and that therefore they had rather die, than to endure so great dishonour joyned with so foul a slavery. And thereupon offered unto the Vayvod to serve upon their own charge, and with him upon the Bank of Danubius to meet the proud Enemy, and therein defence of their Lives and Liberty, to fight it out unto the last Man. The Vayvod in few words commending their fidelity, and taking of them an Oath for the faithful performance of that they had so resolutely promised, sent for the Turks Embassador, and gave him this short answer:

The answer of the Vayvod unto the Turkish Embassador.

I, for the ancient Fidelity and Allegiance which I owe unto my Lord and dread Sovereign, the mighty Emperor Selymus, would willingly yield unto him the Tribute he requirereth, were it not that I know the minds of my People to abhor the same; wishing rather to endure all calamities, hap whatsoever hap may, than to yield unto so dishonourable and shameful slavery. Wherefore silence I cannot by any means extort the same from my Subjects, tell me Lord Selymus, That I most humbly request, you to take the same in consideration; which I wish to be unto me, rather an ornament and refuge, than disgrace or hindrance. And that upon that good hope I both asked, and for my singular Fidelity obtained of him the Vayvodship of Moldavia; which my good hope I most heartily beseech him may not deceive me.

With this answer he dismissed the Embassador unwounded, and with a safe convoy brought him to the Bank of Danubius; which his homely usage of the Embassador, caused him not a little to be suspected, to be in mind changed from Selymus. The Embassador sent away, the Vayvod not ignorant of the suddain invasions of the Turks, forthwith began to raise his Army; and at the same time, sent Embassadors unto Henry King of Poland his nearest Neighbor, certifying him of the dangerous state of Moldavia, the surest Bulwark of the Polonian Kingdom, which once overthrown, opened a fair and easy way for the common Enemy into Polonia; and therefore requested him, that as the Kings of Polonia had of ancient time, even for the safety of their own State, protected that Country; so it would please him now in like manner in so dangerous a time, to give him aid; or at leastwise to give leave unto such of his Subjects as were willing to serve for entertainment, to come unto him, whom he would with all honour and bounty receive according to their place and quality. Whereunto the King answered, That forasmuch as he and his predecessors the Kings of Polonia, had for the space of more than an hundred years been in League with the Turkish Kings and Emperors, he could not either send him aid, or yet give leave unto any of his Subjects to serve against the Turk, as he desired.

With this answer the Vayvod was much troubled, as there decreed where he most hoped for relief, yet hearing of certain Companies of the Polonian Camps, which having long lien in hope of prey upon the side of the great River Borjshkeme, were returning empty home, he by fit Messengers sent of purpose, offered them great entertainment to serve him in his Wars against the Turks of which his offer, they (as Men living for most part by service) gladly accepted; and so without his knowledge of the King went unto him, to the number of twelve hundred, with their Captains Men of great Courage and Valour, of whom Sujerevius was chief; who were by the Vayvod honourably entertained, and did him in these Wars right worthy service. These Cockfakes are light Horsemen, lying most commonly upon the Borders of the Polonian Kingdom towards the Tartars; an hardy and valiant kind of Men, whose best living, is the spoil they take from the Enemy; and their best Lands, their Horse and Launch. For albeit that the Turks and Tartars are most commonly in League with the Polonians, and seem never so desirous of Peace, yet do they oftentimes in great numbers, upon the suddain break into the Countries of Podolia, and Russia, part of the Polonian Kingdom, and there do great harm, if they be not in time repressed or cut off by the aforesaid light Horsemen; who for that purpose lie always in wait for them, as doth the Hawk for the prey.

Selymus findeth his Forces to do gainst the Vayvod.

Selymus understanding the answer of John the Vayvod, was therewith exceedingly enraged, and the more by the bitter complaint of the Embassador, who angry with the Vayvod, that he was of him no better regarded nor rewarded, spared not to the uttermost of his power, to incense the angry Emperor against him, as if his Honour had been in the person of himself contemned and violated. Wherefore without delay, he sent thirty thousand Turks, and two thousand Hungarians unto the Palatine of Valachia Transilvania, that joyning those Forces to his own, he might take John the Vayvod, and sending him in Bonds to Constantinople, to place Peter his Brother, Vayvod in his place. The Palatine glad of this command, and having raised his own power, together with the Turks and the Hungarians, swam over the River Moldavia, having in his Army about an hundred and two thousand fighting Men; a power, not only sufficient to have driven the Vayvod out of Moldavia, but also to have thrust a right puissant King in his Kingdom. The Palatine in the midst of so great a strength, little fearing, and less regarding the suddain coming of the Vayvod, suffered his Men with their Horses to lie disordered here and there, dispersed in the large Meadows and Pastures all along the fair River side; so the better to refresh themselves, weary of their long travel. In the mean time certain Scouts came to the Vayvod then at Digne Armer, certifying him, that the Enemy with an huge Army (the certain number whereof they could not well declare) was come over the River; and now resting themselves, had turned off their Horses into the rich Meadows thereabout, in such disordered and careless manner, as that they might with a final power be easily overthrowen. The Vayvod glad of this news, forthwith fell before Sujerevius with his Cockfakes, and soon other light Horsemen, more certainly to decry what the Enemy did, with the manner of his lying; and he himself with the rest of his Army followed fair and softly after. Sujerevius with great silence approaching the Enemies Camp, suddainly light upon the Enemies Scouts, in number about 500; who enclosed before they were aware; were taken every Man by the Cockfakes, and by them frantically examined of the state of their Army and Camp. Who for safeguard of their Lives now in the Enemies power, frankly confessed, how that the Palatine lay securely there by resting his Army, not so much for the refreshing thereof after his Travel, as with greater strength to set upon the Vayvod with his fresh Souldiers; and that in the Army were about seventy thousand Valachians, thirty thousand Turks, and three thousand Hungarians; who now dispersed, and sleeping in security, might easily be overthrowen. Of all these things Sujerevius advertised the Vayvod vod; requesting him with all possible speed to hasten his coming, for the obtaining of a most notable and assured Victory; he in the mean time lying close with his Men not far from the Enemy. The Vayvod certified of all these things, came without delay, and forthwith commanded Superevius with his Men to give the onset upon the Enemy; purposing himself with the rest of his Army on the other side, to charge the disordered Camp in three places. Superevius according as he had in charge, with a great and terrible outcry, suddenly fell upon the secure Enemies; who dismayed with the suddenness of the unexpected danger, stood as Men astonied, not knowing which way to flee, or how to make resistance. But whilst Superevius with his light Horsemen thus on the one side filled the Camp with tumult, terror, laughter, and fear; behold, even as a sudden Tempest, cometh the Vayvod, bearing all the disordered Camp before him; neither did the Enemies any means to flee, having put their Horses a great way off from them into the rich Pastures; but there taken unarmed, were miserably slain. In all the Camp was lamentation and mourning. Death raging in every place with such fury, that of so great an Army as of late passed the River, few or none escaped, more than the Palatine with Peter his Brother, who by great chance with much ado getting Horses, swam over the River, and came to the Castle of Brailiova in Valachia; all the rest were slain, and left to be of the Beasts of the Field, and Birds of the Air devoured. It was a most horrible spectacle to see the ground covered with the Bodies of the dead, all stained with gore Blood, and their Weapons of all sorts lying by them. In the Camp were found great Riches, all which the Vayvod gave unto his Soldiers, and there staid four days to refresh his wearied Men. After that, he with his victorious Army entered into Valachia, the Palatines Country, where he took many Castles and Towns, and put to the Sword all that came in his way, Men, Women, and Children, without respect of Age or Sex; and burnt all the Country Towns and Villages before him as he went; so that all that part of the Country of Valachia Transilvania, was covered with Smoke and Fire, to the terror of the Beholders. The aged Fathers were in every place drawn forth to slaughter, and the young Babes were cut in pieces, the Matrons and Virgins defiled, and afterwards slain; and in brief all the Cruelty that could be devised, performed; in the bloody execution whereof, the Vayvod commended his Men, perfwading them in like manner fill to prosecute the Victory, and that the rest of their labours was all but for prey and booty, for the enriching of themselves. In this havoc of all things, it was told him, that the Palatine with his Brother Peter the Men whom he had taken, were in the Castle of Brailiova not far off; whereupon he forthwith marched thither with his Army. The City of Brailiova standeth upon the River Danubius, and had in it a Castle of some good strength, defended both by the nature of the place, and a strong Garrison of the Turks, which Selymus had appointed for the keeping thereof, as the Key of the Country; not far from this City the Vayvod encamping his Army, wrote unto the Captain of the Castle, with threat to deliver unto him the Palatine, with Peter his Brother, his mortal Enemies; who never wronged by him, had invaded his Country, and fought after his life, and being overthrown in Battle, were fled unto him; which if he should refuse to do, he threatened never to depart thence, until he had to his further harm, constrained him by force to yield them. These Letters he sent by two Valachian Captives, to be delivered unto the

Captain of the Castle; whereunto he returned answer by four Turks, two of the City, and two of his own Servants, by whom he also sent ten great Shot, and as many small, with two Turkish Arrows, and this Messlage.

For that I know thee to be the Servant of my dread Sovereign Selymus, I regard thee, and will not deny the same Men to be with me, whom thou sayest to be thyself. But forasmuch as I understand, that thou of late hast slain a great number of the Servants of the great Emperor, who by his commandment were bringing Peter the Brother of the Palatine into Moldavia: I therefore tell thee, that except thou betime raisest thy Siege, I will feed thee and thy Followers, with such Dishes as these; whereupon thou and thine Army gored to the full, shall all afterwards dangerously surfeit and cast. Farewell.

This rough answer so much moved the Vayvod, that he commanded hands to be laid upon the afore said four Messengers; and their Noses, Lips, and Ears, being cut off, both their Feet to be with great Nails fast nailed unto a long piece of Timber, and so with their Heads hanging downward, to be set up before the City, and so left for the Captain and the Citizens to gaze upon. Signifying withal unto the Captain that sent them, that he himself with the other Fugitives his Guests, should in like manner be served, if they fell into his hands. Immediately after he assaulted the City, and using the cheerfulness of his Soldiers, by plain force took the same, the Defendants being not able to hold them out. There was made great slaughter of the Turks, whereas no Man was taken to mercy; the very Babes were slain, together with their Mothers, and like Rivers of Blood ran to the Danubius. For the space of four days this bloody execution indured; no place served for refuge, even the most secret and obscure places were searched, and the poor Creatures there found, drawn forth and slain. The fury was so great, that no living thing, no not so much as the very Dogs were spared. Much Gold, Silver, Plate, Jewels, and other rich Spoil was there found, all which became a prey unto the greedy Soldiers; for that City was of all others in those Quarters the richest, as a place much frequented, and enjoying long Peace, as after such time the Turks were fully possessed of Gracia, not being troubled with any Wars; until now, that it was by the Vayvod first ranfack, and afterwards rased down to the ground, and nothing thereof left standing, more than the bare Castle it self; which the Vayvod durst not adventure upon, for that it was well fortified, and furnished with so strong a Garrison, as that it could not without great loss be taken.

Whiles the Vayvod was thus buied in the spoil of Brailiova, news was brought unto him of the coming of fifteen thousand Turks to the relief of the Castle; against whom he forthwith sent Superevius with his Cossacks, and other eight thousand Moldavian Horsemen; who suddenly coming upon the Turks, disordered and fearing no such matter, flew almost 40000 of them, and chased the rest unto the Castle of Trina. Of this Victory Superevius in all haste certified the Vayvod; and withal, that there was another great power of the Turks coming, which might easily be also overthrown, if he leaving the Siege of the Castle of Brailiova, would without delay come and join his Forces with him. He glad of that news, and well perceiving how difficult and dangerous that Siege would be unto him, rose forthwith with his Army, and went to Superevius; and afterwards upon conference had with him, laid Siege to Trina; which City taken without much labour, he put to sword ward all the People found therein, not leaving one alive; and by the service of Superevius overthrew the Turks coming towards Brailiova.

Selymus in the mean time much troubled with the proceedings of the Vayvod, and doubting to be quite thrust out of Valachia Transilvania (which he was like enough to have been, had not the Treason of Czarnievice hindered the matter) prepared new Forces for that service; and after the manner of the Turks in time of their greatest distress, appointed general Supplications and Prayers to be made unto his Prophet Mahomet, for the better success of his Wars; the undoubted sign of his Fear.

The Vayvod after so many Victories against the Turks, purposing for a while to break up his great Army, called unto him his old Friend Tristan Czarnievice, unto whom, as unto the Man he of all others most trusted, he had resolved to commit the charge, with part of his Army, to keep the Turks from passing again over the River Danubius into his Country; and in delivering to him his Charge, spake unto him as follows:

Thy Fortune hath hitherto answered our desires (whereof I am glad) against the Turks, our most cruel Enemies, who are thankfully to take the same, and to render most humble and hearty thanks unto Almighty God, that it hath pleased him, the Author of all Victory, so to have prospered our endeavours, against their force and devouring Enemies. Now what remains for the present, but to disband mine Army, wearied with labour and travel, and to give my Soldiers leave to depart home to rest themselves, that so I may at occasion shall require again use their fresh Forces for our better service; you in the mean time with thirteen thousand of my (dear) Soldiers, shall lie upon the side of Danubius, to keep the Turks from passing the River. Have good regard I pray you, unto your charge, which I upon an especial trust, grounded upon your ancient love and fidelity, have at this time imposed upon you. And let me from time to time with all expedition understand from you of every motion of the Enemy, that so we may in due time provide for him accordingly.

And foin token of his greater favour, taking his leave of him with a Kiss (as the manner of those People is) gave leave unto the greatest part of his Soldiers to depart home, yet with this charge, to be always in readiness whenever they should be called upon.

Czarnievice having received his Charge, and promising unto the Vayvod the uttermost of his faithful devoir, went towards Danubius, and there most carefully kept the passages with continual watch and ward. It was not long but that great numbers of the Turks were come down to the other side of the River, and more were still coming, yet none of them was so hardy as to adventure the great River; Czarnievice with his Horsemen lying in the faces of them, ready to receive them on the other side. Which the Basha whom Danubius had sent with his Army, perceiving, sent certain Men picket out for the purpose, to Czarnievice, to sound him, if he might by any means be drawn to come over, in secret to talk with him; and the more to move him, beside his conduct for his safety, sent him by the same Messengers thirty thousand Hungarian Ducats for a Present. With which to take a Bait Czarnievice allured, and so forthwith, secretly passing over the River, had conference with Peter the Palatine's Brother, who then lay on the further side of Danubius, with a great power of the Turks. In this conference, Peter declared unto him in how great danger the Vayvod stood, and how highly Selymus was offended with him, That he his Tributary and Vassal should work the destruction of his so great Armies; which his heavy displeasure he could no otherwise satisfy but with his head; and that therefore he should no longer rule in Moldavia, given unto him. Wherefore (said he) if thou be will of Selymus is yet in thy power, gain the good matter it is to begin any War, but an hard matter the same. Forasmuch as it is not always in the same Mans power to begin Wars, and at his pleasure to make an end. Every Fool may when he list enter into Arms, but must lay the same down when it pleaseeth the Conqueror. Now you have a fair opportunity, and it is in your own power to procure his friendship for ever, better standing with your Affairs than War. And albeit you may hope well of the power of the Vayvod, yet wisdom would not, that you should prefer uncertainties before things certain; you have now received 30000 Ducats, the earnest of your further service; which shall hereafter have also their due reward in most full and bountiful measure. Wherefore if you will do your self good, and provide both for your safety and preferment, confound not your own good Fortune, with the broken and desperate fate of the Vayvod, but suffer the Turks to pass as Friends over the River of Danubius; for I am come (said he) with a great and puissant Army from the mighty Selymus, to take upon me the Government of Moldavia, and to bind the Vayvod in Bonds to Constantinople; and of me, being once Vayvod, what is it that for so great desert thou and thine may not ask and obtain? Wherefore I pray thee conceal the coming of the Turks, and withdraw away thy Men from the River; so shall we passing over the River with our populous Army, easily oppress the Vayvod with all his power, and at once revenge all the former injuries and disgraces done both unto Selymus and us.

With greedy Men what will not the foul desire of Gold work? Czarnievice overcome with the golden Promises of Peter a and forgetful of his Faith before given unto the Vayvod, yielded unto all he requested; and drawing his Forces further off from the River, as if it had been for his more safety, gave the Turks free passage. There was then in the Turks Army two hundred thousand Men, well appointed, and furnished with great Ordnance and all other things necessary, both for the Field and for Siege, who by the sufferance of the false Traitor passed quietly over the River. Czarnievice forthwith posting to the Vayvod, certified him, how that the Turks rushing to his multitude, had passed the River of Danubius, against whom he was not able (as he said) to make head; and that therefore he should do well, without delay to go against them with such Forces as he had then in a readiness; which joyed unto his, might easily overthrow them. Glad was the Vayvod of this news, and filled with the hope of good success, demanded of him what strength the Enemy might be of? They are (said he) not not much above twelve thousand that be already come over, but are still coming more and more, and will before your coming thither be above fifteen thousand.

The Vayvod lay then at the Siege of the Castle of Trina (having before taken the City) but hearing this news, raised his Siege, and in four days came and encamped within six miles of the Enemy; and forthwith sent forth Superevius with his Cossacks, and Jeremias General of the Horsemen, with six thousand Horse, to take view of the Enemies Camp, and to understand what might be of their designs. These two Captains marching together, chanced to fall upon the Turks Scouts in number about six thousand Horsemen, with whom they had a light skirmish, and in short time put them to flight. Of these Scouts they took one, and him grievously wounded; who being examined of the strength of the Enemy, and feeling himself wounded to death, told them dissemblingly, that the Turks were not in number many. But the Cockfolds doubting of the truth of that report, and probably conjecturing by no greater number of Scouts, that the Enemy was of far greater strength than was supposed or reported; quickly retired the Vayvod thereof, withholding him in time to provide for the safety of himself and his Army, and not too much to trust Czarnievice, whom they had a good while before suspected. But the Vayvod nothing doubting of the Faith of him whom he had a long time found most faithful in the time of his hardest distress, and used as a most trusty Companion in all his Travels, answered nothing, but that he knew whom he trusted; and that it was not now time to stand in doubt, or to be afraid, and that he would ere long come and take view of the Enemies Camp himself; for that he was not come so far to flie, but to fight in defence of his Country and Subjects, even to the last gasp. And so fortifying his Camp near unto a Lake that runneth out of Dambius (for the more convenient watering of his Army) he set forward with all his power against the Enemy.

Near unto the Enemies Camp was an high Hill, from whence the Vayvod had thought to have descended the number of them, with the manner of their lying; but coming thither, he could descry nothing but four Companies of Scouts a far off, one Company from another; who also upon the sight of the Moldavians withdrew themselves of purpose out of sight unto the Army, which then lay in a low Valley behind an Hill, not so high as that until a Man was almost upon it. The Vayvod suspecting the Enemy to be at hand, divided his Horsemen, in number 30000, into 30 Companies, and placing before every Company certain Field-Pieces, so marched ready to give Batel. His Footmen, in number many, a rude and homely kind of People, but unto him of all others most faithful, and armed with such Country Weapons as they had, he placed by themselves. So marching on, he came to another Hill, from whence he might not far off fully descry the huge Army of the Enemy, and how he had been by the Treason of Czarnievice deceived; whereupon he presently sent for him; who sent him word back again, That he could not now come, the Enemy being so nigh at hand, but that he should forthwith see him in the Field as forward as the forwardest against the Enemy. Czarnievice had then under his command 13000 of the most choice Soldiers in the Army; who upon the signal of Batel on both sides given for the Turks were now all ready; first according to his promise first forward, as if it had been to have given the onset; but being come near unto the Enemy, forthwith (as he had before agreed) caused his Ensign to be let fall, and his Men with their Caps upon the points of their Spears and Swords, in token of their voluntary yielding and submission, to bow down their Heads and Bodies; whom the Turks with their Spears and Lances held upon high, joyfully received as their Friends, or rather as Men taken to mercy. The rest of the Army almost discouraged with this so sudden a revolt of so great a Man, retired in haste to the Vayvod, crying out unto him, That all was lost. But he nothing discouraged therewith (as a most resolute Man in the most sudden dangers) with comfortable words cheered them up, willing them as courageous Men to follow him against the Enemy, whom they in all things exceeded, excepting number, which always gave not the Victory. The Turks perceiving the Moldavians lately revolted, upon the joyning of the Batel (as Men in Confidence wounded) to shrink back, thrust them perforce into the head of their Batel, making of them no more account, but to blunt the Enemies Swords; and such as hung back, they themselves flew upon whom as false Traitors the Vayvod caused his Field-Pieces to be most furiously discharged; so that most part of these treacherous Men there slain, some by the Turks, some by their own Friends, received the just reward of their Infidelity and Treason, accompanied with perpetual Infamy. Over the dead Bodies of these Traitors the Turks coming on, were at the first notably encountered by the Moldavians; and after a most cruel Fight, as if they had been discouraged, began to give ground; but indeed of purpose to have drawn the Christians before they were aware, within the danger of their great Ordnance, and Ambushes, which they had before appointed and covertly placed for that purpose. Which Suycerevis well acquainted with the Turks fineness, perceiving, with much ado staid their further pursuit, and so avoided the danger prepared for them. The Turks deceived of their expectation, came on again afresh, with no less fury than at the first; whom the Christians right valiantly received, and made with them a mixed and mortal Batel; wherein many both of the Turks and Christians fell, and never rose again. But what was so small a power against such a world of Men? After long Fight, the Moldavians oppressed with the multitude of their Enemies, began to give ground; and seeing no other remedy, to either to flie or to die, betook themselves to flight, wherein most part of them were slain, the furious Enemy still hardly pursuing them at the Heels; of the Cockfolds who left only 2000 Horsemen (the chiefest strength of the Vayvod) thus by the Treason of Czarnievice overthrowen, the Vayvod with 20000 Footmen, and six hundred Men as had now after the Batel joyned themselves unto the Footmen, retired unto a Town not far off, which he but a little before had razed; but was now glad in the ruins thereof to fortify himself against the sudden and furious Assaults of the Turks, while the same night he beset the Vayvod's Camp with such a huge Army of Men, as no Man could go in or out of the Camp; or the uttermost part of that huge Army be from any place descried.

The next day (which was the 11 of June) the Turks shot divers great Shot into the Vayvod's Camp, but to small purpose; for the Christians had (for so forth a time) notably fortified themselves within the ruins of the old Town. Which the Turks well perceiving, and whilst considering how hard and dangerous a matter it would be to assault the Vayvod in his strength, they sent Messengers unto him, to persuade him without delay to yield himself, and to repose more trust in the mercy of the Turks, than in his own broken Forces; especially in his so hard distress, being so beset, as that he could not possibly escape; and out of hope of all relief; and therefore should by such voluntary yielding, seek for grace of his Enemies, rather than by a desperate obstinacy to cast himself into a most certain destruction, where no mercy was to be expected. Whereunto the Vayvod answered, That he was not ignorant unto what danger he was brought, rather by the Treason of Czarnievice and his Followers, than by the Valour of the Enemy; yet had left with him a strong strong power of most valiant and resolute Men, who would in his quarrel and defence of them selves, sell their lives very dear unto the Turks; nevertheless, that to avoid the farther effusion of blood, he could for his part be content to yield unto his hard fortune, so that the great Commanders of the Turks Army would condescend unto such reasonable conditions as he should propound, and for the performance thereof give him their Faith, not once or twice, but several times by solemn Oath to be taken. Of this his offer the Turks accepted, willing him to set down the conditions; which were, First, that the Polonian Cockfolds might in safety depart into their Country, with their Horses and Armour; then, that they should without any violence offered to his person, send him alive and in good safety unto the great Emperor Selymus, before him to answer his own cause; as for the Moldavians, he said he needed not to covenant any thing, for the injury they had done to them, he would leave to the hurt of the Emperor himself, and of him whom he should appoint Vayvod, whose Subjects they were. These conditions (as reasonable) were well liked of the Turks, and so according to his desire, confirmed seven times by the solemn Oath of every Captain and Commander in the Army, both for themselves and their followers. Upon this agreement, the Vayvod brought all his Army out of their Trenches where they had then fronsely encamped, and there with a heavy hook took his last leave of his Soldiers, to the general grief of them all; amongst whom he divided much Money and Jewels as he had, as a remembrance of his kindness. And there in the sight of them all disarming himself, accompanied only with Omolius a Polonian, went in manner of a suppliant to the Turks Camp, where he had full four hours Talk with the great Commanders of the Army; until that the last Captain Bassa (either voluntary or unwilling) of himself was offended with his speech, or unkindly of his Faith, before given) with his Scimitar upon the sudden struck him a great blow overthwart his Face, and another cross the Belly; whom so wounded, and as yet but half dead, the Janizaries took and cut off his Head, which was forthwith set upon a Lance, for all Men to behold. His dead Body they bound by the Feet unto two Camels, and so shamefully tore it in pieces; and happy was he that could get any little piece thereof, or embrace his Sword with the least drop of his Blood. This was the lamentable and woful end of John the Vayvod of Moldavia, a right valiant and worthy Man, shamefully murdered by the perfidious Turks; who had been more constant in the Christian Faith, had not happily fallen into so great misery. Whole woful fall may serve as a most notable example of the uncertainty of these worldly things; for as no Man for a time had of the Turks more or more glorious Victories, so in the end, and as it were in demonstration of their fragility, no Man perished more miserably. The Vayvod thus perfidiously murdered, the Turks with like Treachery forthwith fell upon the Moldavians, and flew them down right as Beasts appointed for the slaughter. Which the Cockfolds beholding, and hoping for no better measure, thrust themselves into the thicket of their Enemies, and there valiantly fighting were all slain, except some few of the better sort referred for ransom, among whom was Suycerevis with some other Captains, who were afterwards for great sums redeemed, when as they could by no means be persuaded to forsake their Religion and turn Turk.

After this Victorious Murder of the Vayvod, the Turks overran all Moldavia, and put to the Sword all the Nobility of that Country, with many of the Country people; of whom they also as their manner is in Countries now conquered, sent great numbers in Colonies into the farther parts of the Turkish Empire; and for the more assured possession thereof, placed strong Garrisons in every Town and Castle, as they thought it most convenient. Thus all Valachia (both the higher and the lower) fell into the Turks hands in the year 1574, and was by Selymus joyning unto the Turkish Empire, none of the least things by him done; for beside the gaining of so great a Country (the most assured Bulwark of Polonia) he hath thereby opened a fair and easy way for his Successors, at their pleasure to enter into Polonia, or Russia, parts of the Polonian Kingdom, yea and into Polonia it self; which they will undoubtedly in time do, if God in mercy bridle not their immoderate desires, and with his mighty hand protect the dangerous state of that Kingdom.

Selymus at the same time, not a little grieved with the loss of the Kingdom of Tunes, and that Don John had there done the year before; began forthwith to cast in his mind how he might again recover the same, and withal, thrust the Spaniards out of the strong Castle of Guleta; which they had now almost forty years kept, ever since that it was by Charles the Fifth, taken from Barbarossa in the year 1535; for he well saw it to be a matter of no small moment, to whom that strong Fortress (standing so commodiously in the Frontiers of Africa) belonged. There was (and still is) upon that Coast divers of the Turks Adventurers, which living altogether upon pillage, and if they could recourse, as to a most assured refuge; and if not Booty were to be met with thereabout, then would they run out towards Malta, Sardinia, Sicilia, and the other Islands thereabouts; yea oftentimes into Italy and Spain, and from thence carried away with them great booties both of Men and Cattel, and whatsoever thing else came in their way; for which cause many of the Turks Men of War resorted thither in hope of purchase. But after that Guleta was possessed by the Spaniards, they were not only deprived of that so commodious Harbour, but many times intercepted even by that place, and by the Gallies of Malta; which two places served as two most free Bulwarks against the Turks and Moors Adventurers, by whose means they many times came short home. For which cause the Turks, especially these Pyrats (of whom the Turk maketh great account, as not his least strength at Sea) wonderfully desired to have both those strong ports gotten out of the hands of the Christians. In the Castle of Guleta was continually a strong Garrison of a thousand Spaniards, who kept them of Tunes in great subjection, and oftentimes cut short these Pyrats and Rovers, who much troubled those Seas. Wherefore the Turkish Emperor Selymus, having made great preparation both for Sea and Land Service, commanded Sinan, Piali, and Usculachi, his chief Balleas, and Men of great experience, with all Speed to pass over with his Fleet into Africa, to besiege Tunes and Guleta. Who when they had put all things in readiness according as they had in charge, set forward, and with 300 Gallies came before Guleta the 13 day of July; whether also referred unto them other the Turks Men of War from Alexandria, Algiers, and other places, in such number, as that all that Coast seemed to be covered with shipping. The Turks at their first arrival laid Siege to the Water Town, wherein were 800 Soldiers well provided of all things needful for defence, who most valiantly maintained the place, until such time as that most of them being by the often Assaults of the Enemy slain; the rest by the commandment of the Captain retired to him into the Castle. In taking of this Tower the Turks lost 3000 of their Men. After

After that, they began to besiege the Castle of Guletta, against which they cast up divers Mounts, and from thence most terribly battered the Castle; from whence the deadly shot was sent again among them not sparingly; so that in one day 300 great Shot were reckoned to have been shot out of the Castle amongst the thickest of the Enemies. But after many furious Assaults, too tedious to report, and much harm done on both sides, the Turks to their great advantage took the Channel of the Lake of Tunis; and fearing lest some relief should be sent to the besieged, maintained their Assault day and night without intermission. Nevertheless, certain Companies of Spaniards sent from the new Castle by Serbello, got into Guletta; after which, they in the besieged Castle sallied out, and the 20 of August repulsed the Turks, with an exceeding great slaughter. But the Bassaes fully resolved upon the winning of the place to engage their whole Forces, and without ceasing still bringing on fresh Soldiers, after they had all the day continued a most terrible Assault, at length about two hours after Sun set, they took the Castle the 23 day of August, when there was now scarcely 200 Souldiers left alive to defend the same; who altogether with the other weak People in the Castle were without mercy cut in pieces. What wealth the Turks found in this Castle, is hard to say; but certain it is, that they had therein great store of Victuals, Armor, Shot, and Powder, and four hundred great Pieces of Artillery.

Guletta thus taken, the Turks forthwith laid Siege to the new Castle, appointed by Don John the year before to have been built betwixt Guletta and Tunes, which was not yet altogether finished; wherein the two ancient and valiant Captains Serbello and Salazar (left there of purpose for the building thereof by Don John) lay with a Garrison of 4000 good Souldiers. The Bassaes when they gave the first summons to the Castle, the 24 of August, required to have it forthwith delivered unto them; to whom Serbello stoutly answered, That he had promised the King his Master, to give him a better account of the place; and being now also very old, could not endure the Turks heavy Yoke, but would therefore hold it out unto the last Man; which both he and Salazar truly performed, not omitting any thing that was by Men to be done for defence of the place; and falling out, sometime the one, and sometimes the other made great slaughter of the Turks, giving them also repulse upon repulse when they came to the Assault. But the great Bassaes, little feeling, and less regarding the loss of Men, so that thereby they might gain the place, after many most terrible and desperate Assaults, at length (namely the 13 day of September) when they had with all their force for the space of six hours furiously assaulted the Castle, and slain most of the Defendants, at last took it. Serbello shot in with two Bullets, and wishing rather to die than to fall into the hand of the Enemy, thrust himself into the midst of the Turks, there to have perished; but by the hasty coming in of Pial Bassa, both he and Salazar were taken alive; as for all the rest that followed them, they were put to the Sword. The Bassa in his rage struck Serbello, and the more to grieve him, caused his Son to be cruelly murdered before his Face. Neither was this Victory by the Turks obtained without Blood, having in less than three months space that the Siege endured, lost above thirty thousand Men.

These strong Holds (the greatest strength of Tunes that Kingdom) thus taken, the Turks marched to Tunes, which they easily took, and afterwards overthrew the Fortifications thereof, because it should no more Rebel. Mahomet the young King, but the year before placed in that Kingdom by Don John, was there taken, and in bonds sent aboard to be carried with Carrera Captain of Guletta, Prisoners to Constantinople; and thus the Kingdom of Tunes, with the strong Castle of Guletta, fell again into the possession of the Turks, to the further trouble of the Christian Countries lying over against it. The proud Bassaes having (as they thought) best disposed of all things at Tunes and Guletta, departed thence, and with their Fleet of 400 Sail, came the fourth of October within sight of Malta. But understanding that they of Malta were provided for their coming, and remembering what dishonour their most magnificent Emperor Selyman had not many years before there sustained (whereof divers of them had been eye-witnesses) they turned thence, and sailed directly to Constantinople.

Shortly after, this great Emperor Selymus spent with Wine and Women, unto whom he had given his great strength, died the ninth of December in the year of our Lord 1574; when he had lived one and fifty years, and thereof reigned eight, and lieth buried at Hedrianople. He was but of a mean Stature, and of an heavy Disposition, his Face rather Swollen, than Fat, much resembling a Drunkard. Of the Othoman Kings and Emperors he was of least Valour, and therefore least regarded, altogether given to Sensuality and Pleasure; and so dying, left his Empire unto Amurath his eldest Son, a Man of more Temperance, but not much greater Courage; who nevertheless by his valiant Bassaes and Men of War, did great matters, especially against the Persians, the mortal and dangerous Enemies of the Turks, as shall be hereafter in this History declared.

THE LIFE OF AMURATH,

The Third of that Name, Sixth Emperour of the Turks.

*Non ego fortis eram: quis tanto nomine dignus!
Fortem faciat mens generosa virum.
Me tumidum fortuna tumens exivit in altum,
Et par fortuna mens mea semper erat.
Sic quamvis tenero mihi nil nisi molle placeret:
Nominis augendi raptus amore fui.
Unicuique ad fortia facta ministro:
Te puer militatum est, nomen in asprum.*

*Was it I was not, none deserve that name
But those, whose generous minds bespeak their fame.
Fortune advanc'd me high, and sickle thee
Still found a Soul, bravely prepar'd to me, Soft in my tender years tho' I became,
Yet still I priz'd the glory of my name:
I sent abroad my Ministers of State,
To see the slavish drudgery of my fate.
pag. 651.*

*Nouitaphi Ferhatu; Senah et ter maximus Osman, Terroris Orbis, succubore mihi,
Armenios demui fortis, Medosque feroces;
Et mihi paruerat Regia Taurisij.
Sed mihi quid prodest tantorum parva laboris
Gloria, subito maxima quaeque ruina?
Et nihil aut tanti, quod non brevis auferat hora
Sic mea cum multis gloria victa perit.*

*Osman, Ferhatu; Sinan, Nouitaphi
The terrors of the World, did me obey
I broke the Medes, and, the Armenians, Terrors
And batter'd down the proud Taurisian Towers.
See what's all this to my ill got renowne,
Since greatest things are soonest tumbled downe,
We're rob'd of all we have, in one short hour,
And quickly we, and ours shall be no more.*

Amurath takes upon him the Turkish Empire the 5th day of December, in the year 1574. The description of Amurath.

THE death of the late Emperour Seh-mus, was, for fear of the insolent Janizaries, notably concealed by the great Bassa's, until such time as Amurath, his eldest Son, then in Asia, by speedy Messengers advertis'd thereof, about twelve days after arrived at Constantinople, and there received into the Seraglio, took possession of the Empire the five and twentieth day of December, solemn amongst us Christians, for the Nativity of our Saviour Christ Jesus. He was about thirty, or as some write, seven and twenty years old, when he began to reign; of a manly stature, but pale and corpulent, wearing his Beard thin and long; in his Countenance appeared not the fierce nature of the Othoman Princes, being indeed himself of a peaceable disposition, a lover of Justice, and, in the manner of his Superstition, very zealous. The riot and excess grown amongst the Turks by his Fathers evil Example, he reformed by his own Temperance, and the severe punishment of notorious Drunkards; yet it is reported, that he would oftentimes himself drink plentifully of Wormwood-wine; he was much subject to the Falling-sickness, and sore troubled with the Stone; more spare-handed than was for the greatness of his State; and yielding more to the counsel of his Mother, his Wife, and Sister, than of his great Bassa's, which was of many imputed to him for simplicity. At his first coming to Constantinople, to appease the murmuring of the Janizaries, he griev'd to see themselves so disappointed of the spoil of the Christians and Jews, which they were to take in the vacancy of the Empire; he bent the usual larges which the Turkish Emperours at their first entrance into the Empire, bestow upon them, augmented also their daily wages, and granted them this Privilege, That their Sons, as soon as they came to be twenty years old, should be intoll'd amongst the number of the younger Janizaries, and be paragon'd also of their immunities; whereby he won their favours exceedingly. And immediately, to rid himself of all competitors, he, after the unnatural manner of the Turkish Policy, caused his five Brethren, Mustapha, Solyman, Abdulla, Osman, and Teibanger, to be all strangled in his own presence. The Mother of Solyman, pierced through with the cruel death of her young Son, as a Woman overcome with sorrow, desperately struck her self to the heart with a dagger, and so died. At which so tragical a sight, it is reported that Amurath let some tears fall, as not delighting in such barbarous cruelty, but that the state and manner of his Government so required.

Russia invaded by the Turks. Louis, Grand Duke of Belgia.

In the beginning of his Reign he established five wholesome Laws, altered the Coin, and bountifully relieved the Poor. And albeit that he was of a mild and peaceable nature, yet because he would not seem to degenerate from the Othoman Princes his Progenitors, he prosecuted his Fathers Wars, and by the Tartars called Pracopenes, in the month of October in the year 1575 entered into Russia, part of the Polonian Kingdom, where he burnt and destroyed two hundred Noble-mens houses, besides an infinite number of Towns and Villages, made great slaughter of the poor Country people, and carried away great numbers of Cattel and Prisoners bound in thongs made of raw Hides. But whilst they were dividing the spoil with Peter the new Vayvod of Valachia, who had before solemnly promised to give the Tartars no passage that way, the Polonian Cossacks, who had lien waiting for their return upon the River Berisibenes, broke into the Tartars Country, and there requited them with like harm, and brought back with them a number of old Captives, who little expected that their so sudden deliverance.

The Polonians at this time were at variance among themselves about the Election of their new King; Henry Palmy, their late King, being the last year, after the death of Charles his Brother the French King, secretly stolen from them into France, to take upon him that Kingdom: after whose departure some of the Polonian Nobility made choice of Maximilian the Emperour; other some, no less inclining unto the choice of the great Duke of Muscovy, and some unto others also. Whereof Amurath understanding, and loth that either of those two great Princes, his Enemies, should be invetted or strengthened with that so great a Kingdom, and so near unto him; to hinder that their Election, and to bring in another of less power, and so less dangerous unto himself, even in the beginning of his Reign wrote unto the Polonians to that purpose, commending unto them Stephen Battor, the Vayvod of Transilvania, for their King, in manner following:

Amurath, God of the Earth, Governour of the whole World; the Messenger of God; and faithful Servant of the great Prophet; unto the most honourable Nobility and Counsellors of the Kingdom of Polonia, greeting.

It is not unto the World unknown (most honourable Amurath's Letters unto the Nobility of Polonia) and mighty Senators) our Noble Progenitors to have of long time and for many Years holden good Friendship and Religious League with the Kingdom of Polonia: For which cause it hath pleased God and reasonable unto us, to put you in remembrance of this so ancient a League and Bond of Friendship; for that we understanding your Kingdom to be of late become destitute of a King, by the departure of the Noble King Henry your Crowned King (defended of the Royal Race of the French Kings) our friend: Who, for the small regard you had of him (so Great and Worthy a Prince) and for your Disloyalty, is departed

1575 out of your Kingdom, without purpose of returning any more into Polonia. Whereupon, as it is reported unto us (but how truly we know not) you falling upon your said Crowned King Henry, are about to make choice of a new King, and especially of Maximilian the Emperor, or of the Duke of Mulcovie, both men of running wits, and of us greatly hated: For why, you may well know they will be troublesome and grievous, not unto every one of you only, but even unto us also. Wherefore be you aware that you be not deceived; and take heed lest your Considerations and Leagues cannot long by their solemn and proud be established; and without consider will the great danger of us, and how you may thereby fall into: Whereof we have thought good to give you a taste: Wherefore beware that heavier things befall not your State. We know there are right Noble and Wise men amongst you, which know better than they how to Rule and Govern: And if so be it please you to make choice of any of your own Nation, there is not far from you one Stephen Bactor Prince of Transylvania, a Man of great Honour and Valour, by whose Labour and Devotion, you may easily procure the peace and quiet of your Kingdom. Whereas if you shall do otherwise, we take to witness your God, and his Servant our Great Prophet, to destroy all your Wealth and Goods, which together with your selves, your Wives and Children shall be given for a prey unto our Soldiers, with the chief men of your Cities of Cracovia and Legnica: Which for all that that we say you as anything to the doubting of your Fidelity and Constancy toward us. As for the rest, which is pleased us by word of Mouth to have told unto you, we have given charge unto this our Ambassador and Counsellor, unto whom our desire is, that you should give full credence. From Constantinople the last of September, in the Year of our Prophet Mahomet 983, and fifth of our Reign.

This great Sultan's commendations so much prevailed with the Polonians, that notwithstanding that Maximilian the Emperor was by the Archbishop of Gnesna and some others chosen King, yet was that his Election by the greater part of the Nobility revoked, and both he and the great Duke of Muscovy being passed over, the noble Prince Anne (of the most honourable Jagellonian House) chosen Queen of Polonia; yet with this condition, That the should marry Serphen the Vayvod of Transylvania, to them by Amurath commended. Who, afterward elected King, all the time of his Life right worthily governed that noble Kingdom, not only defending the same in such state as he found it, but also notably extending the bounds thereof, enlarging it with such Territories as he by force of Arms got from his Neighbours, especially the Muscovites. Of this Election Amurath would oftentimes afterwards boast, and say, That he had given the Polonians a new King. But of him, and of the League made by him with Amurath, more shall be said hereafter.

1576 The year following, great troubles arose in Perfia, whereby the flourishing state of that most mighty Kingdom was sore shaken, and opportunity given for the Turkish Emperor to invade the same; which he laying hold upon, entered into that bloody War, which, to the great quiet of the Christian Commonwealth, for long time after, exercised the Forces of those most puissant Princes one upon another. For the better understanding whereof, it shall not be amiss compendiously to set down the same troubles of the Perfian Kingdom, the very ground of the long and mortal War between those two most mighty Monarchs.

Old Tamas, the Perfian King, Son to the noble Hismet, who with great glory had more than fifty years worthily governed that large Kingdom, and mightily withstood the often invasions of the Turkish Emperours, now spent with years, died the eleventh of May in the year 1576, leaving behind him eleven Sons; namely, Mahamet, the eldest, of an infirmity in his eyes framed Codabanda, a man of a peaceable and quiet disposition, more delighted with the sweet pleasure of a contented Life, than the careful Honours of so great a Kingdom: Ismael the second Son, of a more fierce and troublesome nature, so much abhorring quietness, that, not regarding the League hardly concluded between his aged Father and the Turkish Emperours, Solymán and Selmys, he would now and then, without his Fathers knowledge, upon a youthful heat, break out into the Frontiers of the Turks Dominions, and there make great spoil; for which doing, although he was both of his Father and the People the more regarded, yet was he by his Fathers commandment (who in outward shew seemed to mislike of those his youthful pranks, tending to the breach of the League) restrained of his liberty, and sent to the Castle of Cabacha, betwixt Tauris and Cashin, where he remained at the time of his Fathers death: Aidere the third Son, no less ambitious than was his Brother Ismael, but not of like valour, kept by Zalkan, Pyri Mahamet, and other his Kinsfolks, all men of great Power and Authority. The other eight were, Mamas, Solymán, Mahmud, Emangali, Alibach, Amet, Alid, and Ismael the youngest.

The old King before his death had by his last Will and Testament solemnly appointed Ismael his second Son to succeed him in the Kingdom; as of all his Sons most fit to take upon him to great a charge. Which thing Mahamet his elder Brother seem'd not much to dislike, contenting himself with such Honours as his Father had before bestowed upon him.

Tamas thus dead, Ismael was by the Sultans sent for to Cabacha, to take upon him his Fathers Kingdom at Cashin, when in the mean time there arose a great tumult in the City, yea even in the Kings Palace; for Aidere, the third Brother, who in the time of his Fathers greatest sickness had entered the Chamber where he lay drawing towards his end, and in his sight most presumptuously set the Royal Crown upon his head, to the manifesting of his ambitious desires, for which he was then worthily reprov'd: now after the death of his aged Father, carried headlong with the same aspiring humour, and supported by Zalkan, and other his mighty Favourites, had so effectually dealt with the great Lady Periaconema, his eldest Sister, and the other Sultans, Counsellors of Estate, put in trust to see the Will of the dead King put in execution, as that the Succession could not be any longer kept from him, and preserved for Ismael, but by the help of some time and secret device. This Lady Periaconema, (elder than all the young Princes, the Sons of Tamas, her Brethren, a Woman of great spirit and deep conceit) left in great trust by her Father, seeing the proceedings of her Brother Aidere, durst neither openly to move any thing unto the Sultans prejudicial to his designs, neither could she in her heart endure to great an injury to be done to her Brother Ismael, as appointed by his Father to succeed him. Wherefore in this perplexity the cast in her wily head how to satisfy her ambitious Brother present, how to save the right of Ismael absent, the honour of her dead Fathers Will and Testament, and the safety of the Kingdom. For having thoroughly debated the matter with the Sultans, the resolved that Aidere, invested in Royal Apparel, and seated in the great Gallery, should attend the acclamation of the people, and be there open intreated as the very elected King: With which vain shew the youth youth (blinded with Ambition) suffered himself to be led: and being set in his Majesty, verily persuaded himself that he should now be honoured, both of his Friends and Foes, as King. But unto these his too happy and prosperous dreams, Succession (issuing from the frailty of those Counsellors, and his dissembling Sister, were nothing conformable; for that she, by their advice, took order for the gates of the Palace to be presently lock'd, leaving at every passage a sure Guard, and only one wicked open, safely warded with a company of most faithful and valorous Captains and Souldiers, wholly devoted to Tamas and Ismael, with straight charge, to suffer every man to enter in, favouring only the known friends of Aidere. In this fort did the think to have entertained the young man, until such time as Ismael should arrive at Cabacha, and so put in execution what he thought best for the honour of himself, and the general quiet of the Kingdom.

Who rejoiced now but Aidere? In conceit a King, replenished with unwonted joys, receiving honour from all men but his best Friends. By means whereof, perceiving now the prohibition of them, and moved also with the great stir of Zalkan, his greatest Favourite (who discovering the deceit, and crying upon King Aidere, threatened the Lady, the Sultans, and the rest that waited upon the feigned Succession, indeed ordained but for the scorn and delight of the ambitious man) stricken with an exceeding fear, and full of sorrow, he withdrew himself closely amongst certain Women in the Court, hoping so to find some way to escape with life.

In the mean time, so greatly increased the cries and threatenings of the Friends and Favourites of Aidere, (who now had all of them prepared themselves for some dangerous and pernicious attempt) that the Counsellors, with consent of the Lady his Sister, were enforced to take order, That to bethieve this tumultuous and seditious People of all their hope and courage, Aidere should be deprived of his Life. Whereupon, Sabahal the Georgian, Uncle to Aidere by the Mothers side, by the appointment of the Lady Periaconema and the Sultans, after long search made for him, at last found him hidden amongst the Women, and without further delay, taking him by the locks, struck his head from his shoulders, and in the place where Zalkan and the rest of his unfortunate Favourites stood crying and threatening, amongst the thickets of the pretence of the proud Conspirators, flung the Head all bloody, and as it were yet breathing for heat; trying aloud to them, Behold there your King, enjoy him at your pleasure. At which sudden and horrible Spectacle, every man burned in rage and anger; neither for the present wanted there many a rash head, that vainly threatened most cruel revenge; but in the end, when they perceived the next Succession of Ismael inevitable, and the death of Aidere irrevocable, every man betook himself to his own private Affairs, and so at last divided themselves one from another; and so departing from the Palace, scattered themselves some one way some another, every man as he thought best for his own safety.

Shortly after, Ismael, the desired King, arrived at Cashin, where he was of his Sister and the Sultans joyfully received as their lawful and undoubted Succession, and with the great acclamation of the People lauded King; who, as soon as he saw himself possessed of his Royal Seat, and his power now irresistible to his desires, he, after the manner of the Turkish Policy, most unannually caused the Heads of his eight younger Brethren to be stricken off; and withall used such farthest diligence, that not only all those which were near unto them in Blood or Affinity were bereaved of their Lives, but also all the Favourites of his late slain Brother Aidere were destroyed in that public slaughter; so that all the Streets of Cashin were defiled with blood, and all the City resounded with mourning and complaints. Which unexpected Cruelty, altogether unworthy to worthy a thought King, so altered the minds of his Subjects in general, that all their former hopes were now converted into new fears, and their joy into mourning. But much greater, and far more lamentable did the miseries grow, as soon as it was given out, That he would change the Religion of the Perfians (who with great devotion honour their Prophet Ab) into the Superstition of the Turks, (who with no less impiety observe and maintain the wicked Rites of Ebbekir, Hammer, Osman, and others, by them supposed to be the most true Successors of their great Prophet Mahomet.) For by means of this uncouth novelty and unexpected change, and by force of an Edict concerning that matter, published by this new King, many of his aposthane Priests, many of the Governors of his friendly and subject Cities (too much devoted to their former Superstition) were driven, some into exile, some clapt into prison, some had their Eyes pluck'd out, (among whom was the Caliph of Cashin) and not a few others, in sundry sorts deprived of their Lives. Yea, many Ladies, joyed in blood with Ismael himself, and divers others of his Kinsfolks (to whom neither Sex, nor Age, nor Innocency, could be a sufficient defence) endured sundry torments and strange calamities; so that in Perfia was never felt greater troubles, or a more dangerous change.

In this so great an Innovation, and among these Tumults, there went abroad without a general rumour, not in the Cities of Perfia only, but in the Regions of the Turks also, even as far as Constantinople, That Ismael with a puissant Army of such favoured this new proclaimed vanity, was determined in person to go to Babylon, now called Bagdat, there to receive the Crown of the Empire, at the hands of him that he should find to be the Successor of their great Caliph, and in the chief place amongst their unclean Priests; as had sometime Solymán, the great Emperour of the Turks, and the Perfian Kings of ancient times. In this world of troubles, when as the fear of farther miseries increased, rather than any hope of ancient quietness; he was, when he least feared, by the help of the afore-named Lady Periaconema, suddenly bereft of his Life: but what overtook in some of his own amorous practices, or poisoned by his laid Sister, or that she (as some before affirm) having secretly conspired with Calil Chan, Emir Chan, Pyri Mahamet, Curchi Boffi, (being all at that time men of great account, and, as it were, Presidents of the Kingdom) who, disguised in Womens apparel, and brought in by her, strangled him, at such time as he had privately withdrawn himself amongst his Paramours, is uncertain. However it was, sufficient it, that he by the help of the said Lady Periaconema, was by unnatural Death taken out of this World the four and twentieth day of November, in the year of Grace 1577, to the exceeding joy of all those Nations, who by his death thought themselves now freed of many great and dangerous troubles; when he had reigned one year, seven months, and six days.

Ismael thus taken out of the way, the Lady being forthwith to persuade with the great Sultans (the Ministers of Ismael death) that as they had for the general good of Perfia contrived the death of the late King, so now that they would take upon them the Protection of that great Kingdom, with the preservation of the Majesty and Liberty thereof, untill such time as it were known who should worthily succeed in that Crown, which now remained in their Hands. There was at that time many of the greatest Princes and Governours of that Kingdom assembled at Cashin, there gaping after such Mutations of those troublesome times, as might best serve their private designs. Emir Chan, burning in ambitious Desires, was in hope, by means of a match to be made with a Sister of Periaconca (who was already greatly inclining unto him) to be exalted to the Government of all Perfia. Mirza Salmas, the chief Sultan, hoped on the other side to advance into the Estate, either Mahmet Coda-banda, the eldest Brother of the dead King, or elic Hamze, the eldest Son of the said Mahmet; and by bestowing upon him his Daughter in Marriage (as afterwards he did) to increase the glory of his House. Others there were that thought they should be able to draw Abas Mirize (the middlemost Son of Mahmet) out of Heri, and to make him King. Neither wanted the Imam Tamas his aspiring Friends, whose Tutor waited likewise for some Opportunity to settle him in the Kingdom, and by means of his Greatness, to make himself greatest amongst his Fellows. A number of others there were, that secretly waited upon every Occasion that time should present for their Preference. Howbeit in this so great variety of Thoughts, the Sultans answered the Lady with one consent, and promised her in most liberal Terms, all the Protections that their ears could afford, or their Weapons procure: and yet did every one of them, both in Action and Word, Clerk-like, dissemble their several Imaginations, whereunto their Minds were as prone and ready, as their Hearts were cunning closely to conceal them.

Amurath

Amurath the Turkish Emperor now wakened, first at the Death of the old renowned Tamas, and then at the Rumour of the desire Ysmahel had to pass with an Army to Babylon, as also at the fresh Report of the Turkish Superstition newly published in Perfia; and withall, thirsting to know what harm this late King had done in Perfia, what Diffentions he had raised, and how hardly the Provinces of that Empire had endured those Calamities; began forthwith to think hereby a fair Occasion to be ministered unto him to take up Arms against the Perfians, and Matter sufficient suggested for him to put in Execution the great desire he had of some new Conquest. For it is an ancient Custom, which is grown to be as it were a Law among the Othoman Kings, that they may not challenge their due Honours in their Life-time, nor their proud Monuments after their Death, unless they attempt some great and ambitious Actions and Enterprises, and perform some Exploit conformable to their Majesty. Amurath therefore bent upon these great fits in Perfia, would not direct his Mind any other way, or take any other War in hand, until he might first see what issue these marvellous Innovations in Perfia would bring forth; which in the Person of Mahmet, the succeeding King, seemed to be more pregnant than ever before, and ministered unto Amurath new Occasions of victorious and strange Hopes. For as soon as Ysmahel was dead, the afore-named Mirza Salmas (in Dignity chief man among the Sultans, though in Blood and Nobility, inferior to them all) after many Letters dispatched to and fro, at last assured Mahmet Coda-banda, how, with all quietness of Mind, and security of Person, he might come and possess himself of the Kingdom. He was also advertised by the said Salmas, of the whole Conspiracy plotted against his Brother, to bring him to his end; and likewise made acquainted how the fraudulent Lady, with the Sultans, had capitally conspired against himself: and how they, faavouring Emir Chan, and Abas Mirize of Heri, her Nephew, and his Son, more than became her, did little regard the due and rightful Succession of him, being the eldest Brother. So Mahmet, bearing himself upon the Faith and Diligence of Mirza Salmas, and desiring withall, to see his eldest Son Hamze Mirize advanced to some such sovereign Dignity as he law was due to the lively hope every man perceived to be in him, in regard of his Virtue and Prudence for managing the Commonwealth, and Matters of War, (wherein also he shewed himself unto his Father jealous and suspicious, lest some other men should usurp upon him that Honour and Authority which so properly appertained unto him) resolved in the end, not to leave the Kingdom in the hands of private Persons, nor the lightness of an unconstant Woman of suspected Modesty, and a rebellious Conspirator against her own Blood; wherewith he had, without any pity or remorse of Conscience, now twice deceived her self. And therefore he wrote back again, that he was minded to take the rightful Succession upon him, and that for the same purpose he was putting himself upon his Journey; with straight charge notwithstanding, that Mirza Salmas should before his entrance within the Gates of Cashin, present him with the mischievous Head of Periaconca, a Woman (in respect of the foem exercised against his Brother Aldere, and of the treacherous Death of her other Brother Ysmahel, and of the perverse Imaginations which he had conceived to cause the Succession to fall into other mens hands, and of the prodigal familiarity which he had with some of the Sultans) well worthy of a thousand Deaths. Secretly did Mirza Salmas put in Execution whatsoever Mahmet had privately enjoyed him, so that by his means he was presently and solemnly proclaimed King of Perfia. And afterwards, having gathered together many squadrons of men, wholly devoted to the Blood and Name of Mahmet, the same Mirza Salmas set him on the way, to follow the Head of that manlike Tirago Periaconca upon the point of a Lance, with her Hair dishevelled, and some other uncouth fights to the Terror of the Beholders. From which Novelty (one mischief as it were) he was huddling upon the neck of another) there sprung up divers inward Hatreds, sundry tumultuous Seditions, and much Civil Wars; this new King, by the instigation of Mirza Salmas, seeking on the one side to be revenged on the Sultans for his Brothers' deaths, and they on the other side opposing themselves with all their Power against him, the State of Perfia began to fall into great Inconveniences, and of these Novelty to reap new Losses. Sahamel the Georgian fled into his Mountain of Brus, fearing the Wrath of his new Lord: Levent Ogli, likewise another of the Lords of Georgia, understanding of the flight of Sahamel his Neighbour, entranced himself so far from his old Love and ancient Devotion towards the Perfian Kings, that he seemed now to desire some new Innovation. The Nations also that were Neighbours to the Turks, and the People of Media Annapatia (now called Sirvan) disliked of this new King; and in the end it appeared, that Perfia, under this King, through many Mutations, was in short time fallen into most notable Misery, and the state thereof more weakened than it had been of long time before.

Of all these things had Amurath from divers places intelligence; but more particularly from Yusef of Van, (a City of Armenia the greatest situate upon the Lake of Atlanar) who lent him most perfect information of all the fits in Perfia; discouraging unto him of the death of Ysmahel; the consultations of the Sultans, the treacheries and death of Periaconca, the broils between the King and the Sultans, the nature of the new King, (being diseased in his eyes, little esteemed of his Subjects, belov'd in affection towards his Sons) the facility to over-rule the chief Governours of the Georgians, and the People of Sirvan, evil affected towards the new King; and to be brief, whatsoever had in truth succeeded in Perfia, and might inflame the mind of the ambitious Sultan, to convert his Forces against an Enemy of small counsel, and much confusion; adding thereunto, that never was there greater opportunity to overcome that King than was now offered, and therefore witheld him, not in any case to let slip so fair an occasion, as the Othoman King had never before, for the obtaining of so certain and glorious Victories.

Amurath, of long time wholly bent to mark the event of the troubles in Perfia, now flurried up with these Advertisements from Yusef, fetted himself more deeply in his former conceits to prove his Forces in subduing the Perfian King, the ancient Enemy of the Othoman Emperours, and the only Corridor and odious Competitor in the East. But no one thing did more inflame him thereunto, than to think, how he should have to his Enemy a King not acquainted with deeds of Arms, doting upon his Children, and weakened with the distention of his Subjects; and on the other side, entering into the consideration of his own Forces, of the infinite number of his men, both Horse and Foot, of the means he had to find money, of his Artillery and Engines of War, wherein he far surpassed the Perfians; he did more and more resolve with himself, to take the occasion that now was offered him to begin the War. For the compassing of which his purpose, he was greatly favoured by the present State of Christendom, at that time being wholly in league and amity with him. So not finding any thing contrary to his designments, he resolved at last to confer with the chief Bassas, which had the government of his Empire. Whether it were better upon this occasion to begin the intended War; or if they thought not so expedient War; or if they thought not so opportunity to be to fit, then to lay it aside, and to convert his Forces and Council against the Commonwealth of Christendom. For such is the barbarous Policy whereby this Empire is managed, That it is lawful for them to break any League, be it by never so many promises or solemn Oaths confirmed, whenever any Enterprize is to be attempted for the advancing thereof. So that although this War could not be removed either against the Perfians or Georgians, without breach of their promised Faith; yet among the manifold Confutations that passed among the great Bassas, there was not any man found that made any account of that defect, but all with one accord, without farther respect, sought to set forward the ambitious desire of their proud Lord and Master. At last, after long consultation and large discourses, it was agreed upon by the great Bassas, Mahmet, Sinan, and Musapha. That it would be better, and less dangerous to attempt War against the Perfians, than to break the Faith of the Georgians. Musapha amongst the rest, preferring the Valour of the Laines (whereof he had made good tryal, especially at Famagusta) before the Armies and Forces of the Georgians and Perfians. Whereby it is apparent to the World, that neither the zeal of their Religion, nor any injury receiv'd from the Perfian King, but only the ambitious desire of Amurath (to subdue a Kingdom, both in his own conceit and other mens relations, evil governed, by an effeminate and foolish King, and through civil dissension brought unto great danger) was the first provocation of making this War.

* Upon this resolution there arose new consultations touching the manner thereof, and upon what

coast they should begin their journey, for the more honourably success thereof. Which point Amurath greatly urged, protesting before his chief Counsellors, that he would not enter into that War, except he were in great hope to bear away the Victory. Some thought it most convenient to send the Army to Babylon, and from thence to Syrus, called in old time Persepolis, the chief City of the Country of Perfia: others there were that gave advice, that the Army should be directly sent to Taurus, there to erect strong Fortresses, and to take possession of all the Country round about it; and there wanted not fewer (as it is reported) that thought it better to send two several Armies for both the fore-named Places; and so by bringing the Enemy into a straight, to enforce him to yield to whatever should be of him required. But Amurath durst not repose such Confidence in his Forces, as to think, that with his Battels divided and so weakened, he should be able to conquer that Enemy, who had always most valiantly fought against the monstrous and puissant Armies of his Ancestors: and therefore firmly resolved with himself to send one only Army, and to go with his united Forces to seek the overthrow of the Enemy. And yet preferring the strong hope he had conceived to conquer the Country of Sirvan, and the chief Cities of Media the great, before the difficulty of making War upon the Coast of Seyras, repelling also great hope in the notable help that was promised him by the Tartars, called Precoepenses, he confirmed the great Bassas his Counsellors in the same Opinion; and withall, discovered unto them a matter, which to all of them, but especially to Sinan, seemed most strange; namely, that he was determined not to go himself in Person with his Army; but to send one of his worthiest Captains in his stead. The Causes why he did so were many, but especially, for that he was troubled with the falling Sicknes, and feared greatly (and that not without good cause) lest his Son Mahmet (being much favoured of the People) might peradventure in his absence be untimely advanced to the Empire; beside the Dangers that he suspected at the hands of the Christian Potentates: and withall, perfwaded that to be unto himself a great Honour, perfwaded those things by his Servants, which had in those Countries been unfortunately attempted by his most noble Predecessors in their own Persons.

While they were thus consulting about the Expedition, and the great Bassas, Sinan, Musapha, and others, made means to be sent as the Sovereign Ministers of their Lords Delegation, he dispatched away sundry Posts and light Horse-men, with order to the Bassas and Governours of Van, Babylon, and Erzerum, in the Frontiers of his Dominions, that they should by often intreats spoil the Towns and Castles of the Perfians, and by all means to do them what harm they could. Which they were not slack to put in Execution, and especially Yusef (or rather Musreze) Bassa of Van; who with often incursions did much mischief, as well in the Countries Tributary, as subject to the Perfian King. A fottible preparative for greater Troubles to ensue.

Now in these great Preparations for the Perfian War, (which for many years after notably exercised the greatest part of the Turks Forces, to the great quiet of the Christian Commonwealth) Stephen Babor the late Vayvod of Transylvania, but now by the Commendation of Amurath, become King of Polonia; in the beginning of his Reign, by his Ambassadors the great Lord Joh of Syenna, entered into a strong League and Confederation with the great Turkish Sultan Amurath, Constantinople. Which, for that it thwarted in what Terms that famous Kingdom then and yet standeth eth with the Turks great Empire, and which, containeth Matter well worth the Christian Consideration, it shall not be impertinent to our purpose (omitting the long and glorious Title of that barbarous Monarch, serving to no other end but to shew the greatness of his Power) plainly to set it down as it was on his part at the same time by him confirmed.

The League betwixt the most puissant and mighty Princes, Sultan Amurath the Turkish Emperour, and Stephen King of Polonia, agreed upon and concluded at Constantinople, in the Year of our Saviour Christ Jahr 1577, and of the Prophet Mahomet, 985.

The League betwixt Amurath the Turkish Sultan, and Stephen, King of Polonia.

I Sultan Amurath, the Son of Selym Chan, the Son of Solyman Chan, the Son of Selym Chan, the Son of Balazet Chan, the Son of the Great Emperour Mahomet Chan, &c. Prince of these present times, the only Monarch of this age, of power able to confirm the power of the whole World, the shadow of Divine Clemency and Grace, Great Emperour of many Kingdoms, Countreys, Provinces, Cities and Towns; Lord of Mecha, that is to say, of the house of the glory of God, of the resplendent City of Medina, and of the most blessed City of Hierusalem, Prince of the most fruitful Country of Egypt, Imen, Zenan, Aden, and many other such like: In most loving manner desire, That the most Glorious and Renowned Stephen King of Polonia, Great Duke of Lithuania, Russia, Prussia, Masovia, Samogitia, Kiovia, Livonia, and many other Countreys; moe; Prince of the courageous followers of Jesus, Governour of all the affairs of the people and family of the Nazarets, the welcome cloud of Rain, and most sweet fountain of Glory and Virtue, eternal Lord and Heir of the felicity and honour of the aforesaid noble Kingdom of Polonia, unto whom all the distressed require for refuge, wishing a most happy success, and blessed end to all his actions: offering unto us many Religious vows; and Eternal prayer, worthy our perpetual Love and most Holy League, and with great Devotion, performing both and other like Honours, as for the dispatch of his Letters to our most Glorious Court, for the new confirming of the most sacred League and Confederation with us, sending the Honourable Lord John of Sycena (his most faithful Counsellour) his Embassador to our Imperial Court; declaring his Love and Integrity, and purging himself of all the suspicion of Hypocrisy, hath requested the League and Confederation to be renewed. At whose instance we have given these our Letters confirming the said League of Peace and Confederation: Wherein we command, That none of our Counsellours, Beleeagers, Secretaries, Generals of our Armies, Captains or Squieries shall do, or on any behalf promise to do any hurt unto the Kingdom, Countreys, Cities, Castles, Towns, or whatsoever else to the Kingdom of Polonia belonging. And in like manner, that none of the Nobility, Generals, Captains, or others whatsoever belonging unto the King of Polonia, shall dare to do any harm unto any Kingdoms, Cities, Castles, or Towns confining unto the Kingdom of Polonia. In brief, my will is, that being a mortal Enemy unto my Enemies, and a fast friend unto my Friends, I shall do no grievance or harm unto any my Subjects, or things whatsoever unto my jurisdiction belonging. So in like manner, commanding also, that no hurt by any means, or for any occasion be done by our people unto the Subjects or whatsoever else, unto the jurisdiction of the King of Polonia appertaining.

The Creatives, Embassadors, Messengers, and men of whatsoever condition else, shall on both sides freely without let or trouble, come and go without any harm receiving, either in their persons or goods.

It shall be lawful also for the King of Polonia his Subjects, to seek throughout our Empire, for any the Polonian Captives taken before the time of this League; and the same so found (if they have not received the Turkish Religion, but still remain Christians) to redeem without the contradiction of any man.

And that whatsoever shall be taken and carried away after the confirmation of this League, shall be all again freely and without any thing paying, delivered and restored.

That the Merchants on both parts may freely Traffick with all kind of Merchandise in the Black and White Sea, as also upon the main; and so paying their usual and lawful custom, to be in nothing wronged or molested.

If any of the Polonian Merchants shall die in our dominion, the goods of him so dead, shall not be embazelled, but kept in safety until his brethren or other his friends, shall come with the King of Polonia his Letters: Upon the showing whereof, having also our Letters mandatory, the goods shall be forthwith restored unto the dead mans heirs. In which for also my Merchants shall be dealt withal, if any of them shall chance to die in the Kingdom of Polonia.

If any wrong be done within the limits of mine Empire, unto any belonging unto the Kingdom of Polonia, after the date of these Letters: confirming the League; the doer of the wrong shall be punished, and the wrong done, without any delay or contradiction, forthwith recompensed. And the like Justice to be also on the behalf of the King of Polonia administered.

If any doer shall depart out of mine Empire into the Polonian Territory, wherefore he shall chance to be found by his creditor, he shall be brought to the Judge of that place to be examined, and whatsoever it shall be proved him of right to owe, the Judge of that place shall according to the equity of the cause make the creditor to be satisfied.

But if the debtor come himself personally he shall, no other man shall by reason of another mans debt be taken, detained or molested: Neither shall the innocent be troubled for the guilty, in either or both our Kingdoms.

In brief, upon whatsoever conditions and capitulations the League of Peace and Confederation was in the time of my Father, my Grandfather, or great Grandfather of famous memory, made with the King of Polonia, upon the like conditions and capitulations be it now made also.

Wherefore hurt-bait hatherto been done to either part by reason of the disagreement of the Governours and Captains, shall all be on both parties neglected and forgotten.

Also after the time of these Letters confirming the League and Confederation, Whereas the King of Polonia shall in time pay a certain summe of money as it be paid unto the Tartars; the Tartar Chan, and his Son Mirzeley their Princes, shall restore the same again, and not to dare to suffer his Armies by any means to hurt the Polonian Territories. So that on the part of the Tartars and their Armies, no harm shall be done unto the Kingdom of Polonia, neither on the part of the Polonians, to the Territories of the Tartars. And if any harm shall by the Tartars be done in the Kingdom of Polonia his Territories, it shall by my Commandment be again restored. And so likewise on the part of the Palatine of Moldavia, or the inhabitants of the Kingdom of Moldavia; no harm shall be done unto the Countreys subject unto the King of Polonia; but, if any be done, and certainly known to be by my Commandment again recompensed.

On the part also of the King of Polonia and his Subjects, whatsoever harm shall be done unto the Territory or Subjects of the Moldavian Palatine, or Tartars, the harm so done to be recompensed, and the doers thereof punished.

Also that all such Fugitives as having done any notorious Felonies, or other Villanies in Moldavia, and so are fled into Polonia, shall at my request, or at the request of the Palatine of Moldavia, be restored, and in no case denied.

That all the Polonian Captives within my dominions, yet professing the Christian Religion, may by the King of Polonia his Subjects be redeemed, not paying any more for them than their Lords and Masters payed: every such Master of the slave taking his oath that he will him so much. But such Captives as have received the Turkish Faith, to be forthwith set at liberty: And so the Turks slaves in the Kingdom of Polonia, to be likewise manumitted.

That our Embassadors on both sides (so long as we are in League and Amity) may freely come and go, and not be stayed in any place; and being willing to meet together, may at their pleasure so do. And being entered into the confines of either part, to be forthwith by some good and faithful guide, appointed unto them, conducted unto the place they are to go unto. And this to be on both sides kept.

No man to dare to hurt or say any Merchant, having paid the thirtieth part, in lawful traffick.

If any of our Subjects shall have any suit with any of the King of Polonia his Subjects, the Judges shall without delay, be bound to administer Justice. All Thieves and Robbers shall be diligently sought out; and being found, to be severely punished, and the goods taken away, without impeachment, to be restored unto the right owners, their Heirs, or to the King.

The Samarkans of Silistria and Bologravage, the Customers and Watermen, shall not suffer any man but Merchants and such as are first in license, to pass over the River Nyseker: who passing over, if they shall bring with them any Slave or Bondman out of Polonia, he shall be sent back again. The Shepherds, if they will transport their Sheep into the jurisdiction of the King of Polonia, shall not do so without the leave of the Polonian Governours; before whom they shall also number their Sheep: of whom if any shall be left, the Governours shall cause them to be sought for, and to be restored unto the Shepherds, as also to pay for their Hay.

The Lauzi, Janizaries, or Posts, shall not dare in time of Peace or War, to take any Horse from the Polonian Merchants, or other the Kings Subjects coming into our Kingdom.

The Palatines of Moldavia, in whatsoever condition they have been towards the former Kings of Polonia, they shall now forthwith be better. The Christians and customs of both parts, shall continue in their old manner, and not be increased. The Polonian Kings Subjects and Merchants, as well Armenians as of any other Nation, whenever they shall enter into Moldavia, or any other part of our Empire, shall not travel by uncertain and unknown, but by the common and high ways; wherein if they shall suffer any loss or harm, either in their goods or persons, the doers of such wrongs shall be sought for, and severely punished. Which Merchants shall be suffered without any molestation quietly to come and go, having payed their thirtieth; and no Merchant to be troubled for another's debt.

If any the Polonian Kings Merchants or Subjects, be willing for ready money to redeem and carry away any slave taken out of the Polonian Kingdom, and yet professing the Christian Religion, the Judges shall in no case withhold them, neither promise to take them from them, until they have again been redeemed. But if any of such slaves have received the Turkish Religion, they shall not be again demanded by the King of Polonia.

Such slaves as have not received the Turkish Religion, if after a certain space they shall be set at Liberty by their Masters, and in the Letters Testimonial of their Liberty, it shall be declared that they have received the Turkish Religion; yet shall they not by the Judges be therefore detained.

In the City of Burusa, the Polonian Merchants having paid their usual thirtieths, shall not be farther pressed with any other unusual payment.

My will is also, that the Territories at this present in the possession of the King of Polonia, as hereafter to be by him taken from the Muscovite, or any other the Christian Princes, to be comprised within this League, and so to be Royally by him possessed.

And for the confirmation of the articles and conditions in these our Letters of Confederation contained, I have by the power of the most Mighty God, and of his most Holy Prophet, and by the most clean and pure Spirit of all the Prophets; That for all the days of the life, and so long as nothing shall on the behalf of the King of Polonia be done contrary to the Peace and League, nothing shall also on my part be done contrary unto the same. Witness the Almighty, the upright Judge and discerner of mens actions. From Constantinople the year of the Holy Prophet Mahomet 985, the 14th. of the Month Cziemialli Eumel, and of Christ, 1577.

This League betwixt these two mighty Princes, Amurath and King Stephen, thus concluded, and after the death of Stephen, by Sigismund the Third (which now reigneth) renewed, as it hath been ever since to the Polonian Kingdom for the time commodious, to hath it as with an Adamantine band bound that most famous Kingdom, as that in the hardest distresses of the Christian Common-wealth, and most needful concerning it self, it hath afforded no more help than hath the Members farther off, which is, (I must to say it) none at all; as in the late and present Wars betwixt the Christian Emperour and the two last Turkish Sultans, it is too plainly to be seen: wherein, had it in due time given but such reasonable helps as might well have spared, much, no doubt might have been done for the repressing of the common Enemy, and the recovery of the greatness of that is lost of Hungary: but thus bound handeth as a dead Member, serving to no use more than to the more speedy destruction of it self, together with the rest of the sick Body. For what assurance it can have in this long, (I must needs say) but evil afflicted Peace, is well to be seen in the great Consultation of this great Sultan Amurath, with his Baffa's after the Persian War, for the invading of the Brittendom; the Princes, for all this League is solemnly constrained, were nothing the more regarded, but laid in the same balance with the least, and preferred only by the Providence that all governeth: which leading the Turk against the Christian Emperour their Neighbour, hath given them that Peace they were otherwise hardly to have looked for. Unto whom for all that, having to his endless praise maintained a long and most chargeable War, they have not lent any great help or friendly hand; yet lying themselves still in the Lyons mouth, and like enough to be the next (God grant I be there in deceived) that is to be of him devoured.

But leaving these the heavy conceits of a melancholy Mind, and ominous forebodings of that I will not, to return again toward Persia, Amurath his greatest care. Amongst many the ambitious Competitors for the managing of these Turkish so great designs, was the great Baffa Medaphes Cerven, who in the reign of the late Emperour Seyhan conquered Cyprus, perceiving thence, together with his Victory, carrying Infamy, for his faithless and cruel dealing with Bragadine, the worthy and renowned Governour of Famagusta) appointed General of the Turks Army into Persia; and authority given him, to provide whatsoever he should think needful for so great a War. And Commandment ment given unto the Bassas, and other Commanders of the greatest part of the Turkish Empire Eastward, that they should themselves with their Soldiers of all sorts, before their perpetual Appearances to go to the War in the beginning of the Spring this Year 1578, repair to Erzurum, a City of Cappadocia, bordering upon Armenia, there to attend the command of their new General. Who having his dispatch from Constantinople, and for fashion sake conducted by most of the Court over the Straight to Scutari, and from thence passing thorough the Countries of Amasia and Sivas, in the very beginning of Summer arrived at Erzurum, and there stayed until such time as his People, Victuals, Artillery, and other his necessary Provision was come thither. From whence he departed for Sirvan, having first taken a diligent survey of his whole Army, mustering the Soldiers of every Nation by themselves; namely, of the Mesopotamians twelve thousand, of the Assyrians and Babylonians fourteen thousand, of the Syrians two thousand, of them of the lesser Asia (now comprehended under the name of Naxos) ten thousand, of the Jews and Philistines one thousand, and of the Cilicians four thousand. After whom followed the Soldiers of Greece, the Glory and Hope of all the Camp, valiant Men, to the number of ten thousand; and after them the familiar and faithful Guard of the General, ten thousand Janissaries of Constantinople, with Harquebuzers on their shoulders, and Scimitars by their sides: of the City also of Erzurum, and the Jurisdiction thereof, appeared four thousand, under the Ensigns of Bayan Bassa their General. All these were Stipendiaries to the Turkish Emperor, unto whom other voluntary Adventurers joined themselves, in number not inferior to the rest, but better furnished, and of greater Courage: so that in this general survey of the Army were found about an hundred and ten thousand Men, most part Horsemen: yet was there not any fluted out of Arabia, Egypt, Africa, or Hungary, or thence along the Sea Coasts; neither were the Provinces from whence these Soldiers were drawn, left destitute or unfurnished of their ordinary Garrisons. Besides this multitude of Men, Mustapha brought with him five hundred small pieces of Artillery, with many loads of Money for his Soldiers pay, with further order for the taking up of more at Albepo, and other Places, if his Occasions should require. He caused also great quantity of Corn to be transported by the great Sea, called in ancient time Pontus Euxinus, to Trapesund, to be conveyed to Erzurum, being but four days Journey distant thence. To be short, having taken order for all things he thought necessary for the War, he in seemly array departed from Erzurum, and in eight days arrived at the Ruines of Chars, and in the fruitful Country thereabout rested himself; but was there surprised with such a violent Tempest of Wind and Rain, as rent in sunder his Tents, and did great harm, by means whereof many fell sick, and were constrained to forsake the Army.

Having stayed three days at Chars, the Bounder of the Turkish and Persian Empires, he departed thence with his Army, and that evening lodged under the Mountains of Chielder, supposed to be part of the Hills Pariado; where, hearing the Persians to be in Arms, he thought it best for the security of his Army, to pitch his Tents as that he might well discover the coming of the Enemy, and not to be assaulted unawares. And therefore, planting himself in the Plain, he gave order to Bayan Bassa of Erzurum, should take Possession of a certain Hill on the right-Hand, and Derwis, the Bassa of Caramit, should keep another Hill that stood on the left hand; and with them Oman

Bassa, Mahomet Bassa, Mustafade Bassa, adventurers, with many others, as well stipendiary as voluntary men, should likewise pitch their tents upon the same Hills, in such sort, as that they making as it were two Wings to the Camp, might discover the coming of every man, and yet he himself, being shadowed with the two Hills, might lie unperceived of any.

Mahamet, the new King of Persia, as yet scarcely settled in his Kingdom, stirred up by the fame of these motions, resolved in himself to stand upon the defence of his State, and for a time to dissemble the conceived hatred which he bare to some of the Sultans of Persia, and Princes of Georgia, and to make some apparent shew that he was reconciled to them; for that without them he could not promise unto himself any form of an Army, or Defence; wherein, (notwithstanding all the troubled State of his Kingdom) he wrought so cunningly, that almost all the great men of account, took upon them the Protection of his State and Kingdom.

And so Tocmac a Sultan, the Chan and Governour of Reisan, a famous man, well known unto the Turks, and of great Reputation amongst the Persians, was chosen General of this Expedition; with charge, That the gathering together the greatest number of Men he could out of Atropatia, out of Media the greater, and other Places near unto the Turks, he should by all means possible stop their passage into Georgia and Media Atropatia. And thereupon Precepts were sent out into all parts of the Kingdom, that all the Chans, Sultans, and Soldiers whatsoever, should come ready prest to attend upon their new General's Matry obedient to the Kings Proclamation, came, but many there were that would not stir a foot, for their Obstinacy in the Broils begun, and for the Suspicion they had of unlooked for Michiefs; at whose Disobedience the King much grieved, but now there was no Remedy but to make the best of the matter, and for the safeguard of his Honour to make the best of his Assistance they could. So with those few, which for the love of their Prince and Country were met together in those parts, being in number not above twenty thousand, Tocmac was dispatched about his Business, if happily he might with these small Forces oppress the Enemy in some straight and troublesome Passage, where the great multitude should rather serve to the confusion of themselves, than to the help of one another. These twenty thousand were all Horse-men, armed with Scimitar and Bow, with some Harquebuzers among, and furnished with very fine and well tempered Armour; but above all, courageous they were and resolute, and well the more, for the Valour and Prowess of their General. So provided of all things necessary, they set forward, and keeping the way of Tauris and Genge, they came to the turning of Chars, where they were advertised, that the Enemies Army was already passed.

They were now come within a days Journey of Chielder, when they sent quick and faithful Scouts to bring them certain News of the Condition and number of the Turks Army, who came thither even at the very time that Mustapha was incamping his Army between the two Hills, whereupon the two Bassas, Bayan and Derwis, with their People, had already pitched their Tents. These Scouts discovering the Turkish host aloft, persuaded themselves that there was not any other Batel than those which they saw upon the Hills; whereof, with all speed they could, they returned News to Tocmac, who at a safe and well tempered of his Scouts a far off. Tocmac thus informed by his Scouts of the number of his Enemies, held on his way boldly, with purpose to assault them; and having discovered their Tents upon the Hills, was thoroughly confirmed in the Opinion he had before conceived of the number of his Enemies, and the Scouts relation, and with so much the more confidence set forward to assail them. But Bayan and Derwis, who quickly from the Hills perceived the Persians coming in the Plain, although they knew them to be men of great Courage, yet reposing an assured Confidence in their Generals Batel, with all speed mounted upon their Horses, and ran to meet them. So in the afore said Plains under Chielder, within one hour after noon was joynt a most bloody Batel, wherein at last were slain seven of the Turks Sazacks, with a very great number of Soldiers, without any apparent loss at all among the Persians, who fighting close together in a great heat, and all be-bloodied, urged their happy and fortunate Victory.

But Mustapha, who perceived all that had passed, and staid waiting till the fight was at its hottest, and the meely at its thickest, that so the flight of the Enemies might breed their greater disorder; and now seeing that his People could no longer endure the fury of the Enemies Rage (even as if it had lightened and thundered, and as though the Earth had shaken) with such Cries and Acclamations as the Turks use in their Assaults for the more Terror of the Enemies, exciting his Army, ran as it were headlong upon his Adversaries, and so renewed and more terrible Batel. The Persians wonderful Courage endured this unexpected and dreadful Assault, and with incredible signs of Valour, in that little time of day-light that was left (for the Night began now to approach) continued their manifold slaughters, and at last, being favoured by the darkness of the Night, withdrew themselves with as little loss as possibly they might. Neither durst Mustapha any longer pursue them, but was glad by Night to return to his Camp. Of the success of this Batel the Persians certified their King; as also of the greatness of the Turkish Army, with their further purpose for the annoying thereof. And by the Turks also were presented to Mustapha (who had already sent away Posts with News to Amurath) 5000 Heads, which by their Colour, Countenance, and Beards, bewrayed themselves to be Persians, and 3000 Persians alive. Of this Victory Mustapha greatly rejoiced, and to make it the greater (seeking by all means to conceal his own Losses and to raise a greater Terror by the Fame thereof, amongst his Enemies,) caused the Heads of those three thousand that were brought before him alive, to be presently cut from their Shoulders, and gave order, that of those Heads there should be framed a Bulwark in those Fields, for a most horrible and uncouth Spectacle.

The same day that Mustapha employed himself about this barbarous and cruel work, there came unto him certain Messengers from Mamuchiar, the younger Son of the Georgian King Dowledin (a great Prince in that Country) who told him, That with his good favour and leave, Mamuchiar their Lord and Master was coming to salute him, and to offer himself unto him as his obedient and devoted servant. At which news Mustapha redoubling his Joy, gave commandment, That all the Bassas and Captains of the Army, with all solemn Pomp, with drums, Drums, and seals of Ordinance, and all other signs of munificent and joyfull Entertainment, should go forth to meet the said Mamuchiar, and to accompany him to his Presence. Which they did accordingly, and so encountering him with all signs of Honour, conducted him to the great Pavilion of Mustapha, who there caused him again to be saluted with like Triumph. Mamuchiar dismounted from his Horse, and against his Will beholding the strange and uncouth pile of Heads, all pale and filthy to behold, and indeed imagining what the matter meant; yet notwithstanding, before all other things, having done his due Reverence to the great Bassa, and according to his degree placed himself next to his side, after he had presented him with such Gifts as his Country yielded, he gave him to understand, That for the Honour and Estimation which he bare to the Turkish Valour, he was always devoted to the House of the Othomans; and as he had oftentimes desired to spend his Goods and Life in their Service, so at this present time, moved by his ancient desire, alured by the strange Fame of this victorious and wonderful Army, and stirred up by a particular fantasy to learn the painful and hard Precepts of the Art Military, under such a General, Commander of other Commanders; he offered him all Devotion and Service, more than ever he had done to any heretofore, and himself having nothing in the World more dear unto him, consecrated his own Life to his Commandments; desiring that the fame might be employed in the conflicts of War under his Banners, among Warriors and Soldiers of Fame and Renown; and therefore besought him to accept of him in the name of Amurath, whose obedient Vassal he vowed himself to remain for ever.

Graciously did Mustapha receive all this Discourse from Mamuchiar, and having thenceforth again the pile of Heads, together with his Battels, Armour, and Provision of War, told him, That as all these Forces are the Gift of God, who ever favoured the righteous Councils of the Othoman Emperours, in such sort that they lord it over all the World, even to the astonishment of all that live in the World at this day; so had he, for his particular, chosen the better part, in coming now to yield himself, and to submit his Obedience to his Lord, although it had been better if he had done it before. And as concerning the desire he had to be his Companion and Fellow in their warlike Affairs, he did very friendly accept of his coming, and promised him all good Entertainment and assured Safety. And so in exchange of the Presents which he brought with him, he apparelled him in Cloath of Gold, honoured him with a Battel-axe and Targuet wrought with Gold and Ammel, and never permitted him to go from his Pavilion without a train of his Slaves following him.

This Georgian Prince thus solemnly entertained, the General gave order thorough the Camp, That they should the next Morning remove from those Mountains; and now every man was putting himself in readiness, when as there rose a most terrible Tempest of Wind and Rain, mixt with Thunder and Lightning; which continued with such Violence by the space of four days together, as if the Heavens had been dissolved into Waters. Whereby it came to pass, that out of the dead Carcasses and Heads before mentioned, issued a most horrible stink; so that thereby, and by the foulness of the Weather, with the other Annoyances always attending upon so great a Camp, the whole Army was exceedingly troubled, and divers Diseases arose among the Turks. But at the last the Weather breaking up, Muſtapha riſe with his Camp, and ſet forward toward Tefis; and being not able by reaſon of the foulneſs of the way to paſs any further, that day layed in the Plains, where the Lake Chielder Grol handeth, and there reſreſhed his ſick and wounded Souldiers; removing thence, the next day about Noon he came to the Caſtle of Archchibeleck, ſometime a Caſtle of the Georgians, but taken from them by Solyman in his Wars againſt Tamas, and ever ſince holden by the Turks. Here Muſtapha ſurveyed his Army, and by diligent account taken, found himſelf to want 40000 of his Souldiers; whereof ſome were ſlain in the Battle, ſome were dead of Sickneſs, and many, weary of ſo long and perilous a Journey, were by Night ſolne out of the Camp, and returned to take their eaſe at home. From thence the Army removed, and lodged at Night near the marſh called of the Turks Peruſans Grol, or Lake of Slaves; and the next day came to Triada, where at this day are to be ſeen the Ruins of a great City, and of many Churches; whereof ſome are yet repaired and maintained by devout Chriſtians, the Reliques of thoſe happy and religious Forces, that with ſo great and faithful zeale paſſed the Seas and Mountains through thoſe barbarous Nations into the Holy Land; Men worthy of eternal Praise. The next day the Turks aſcended the high and craggy Mountain that ſtandeth upon Tefis; from the top whereof defending the day following, they ſeized upon a Caſtle of the Georgians, called by the Turks Giurgi Chala. Departing thence, and lodging in certain Plains, the next day they came near to the River that runneth by Tefis. But in theſe four days march from Archchibeleck, where Muſtapha took view of his Army, he made ſuch a number of the Turks, who in ſeeking for Victuals for themſelves and their Horſes, had ſtraggled from the Army, were cut off by the Georgian Captains, who with a number of their own Country Souldiers ſecrely followed the Turks Army, and well acquainted with all the ways of the Country, lay in ambuſh upon ſuch Places as the Viſualiers were to paſs through, and ſo ſuddenly ſetting upon them, ſpoiled them at once both of their Goods and Lives.

Muſtapha coming to Tefis, found that Caſtle empty, for that Dani Chan Lord thereof, hearing of the coming of the Turks, forſook the ſame, and betook himſelf to the Fields, providing better for himſelf in ſo doing, than by ſtaying ſil in the Caſtle, to have been there taken Priſoner. This Caſtle, for the convenient Situation thereof, Muſtapha cauſed to be repaired and fortified, and planted therein an hundred pieces of Artillery, and appointed Mahamet Baſſa General Governour of that Place, with a Garriſon of fix thouſand Souldiers; which done, he departed for Siruan. At which very time thoſe of Soria, which had brought a thouſand loads of Rent-Corn to the Camp from Aleppo, being themſelves in number a thouſand Perſons, with five hundred others of Onps (in ancient time called Hus, the City of the patient Job) and other places of Soria, men neither of Duty bound, nor of themſelves willing to follow the Camp, returned homewards towards their own Country; but upon the way they were ſet upon by Aleſandro, Giuſſif, and David, (three of the Georgian Lords) and all ſlain, except ſome few, who by the ſwiftnes of their Horſes eſcaped with Nuſſerdin their Captain.

Now after that Muſtapha had paſſed the defcent of the ſteep Mountains of Tefis, the next day he incamped in certain low Plains; where the Ambaſſadors of Aleſandro, ſurnamed the Great, Son of Leuent, a Georgian Prince, came unto him, and told him, That their Lord was ready, if it ſo pleaſed him, to come unto him to do him Reverence, and by word of mouth to promiſe him that Devotion he had always in mind borne to the Obſoman Emperours. With glad Heart and cheerful Countenance did Muſtapha receive theſe Ambaſſadors, and preſently ſent them back to will their Lord to come, and to tell him, That his friendſhip ſhould be unto him moſt dear and acceptable. And after their departure, took order with all the Commanders of his Army, to receive him with all the ſignes of Joy that might be; which at his coming was accordingly by them performed. Who, after he had preſented unto the General the rich Gifts he had brought with him, he offered his Obedience to the Baſſa, with the moſt lively Speeches he could poſſibly deviſe, calling Amurath his Lord; ſeeming to take it in evil part, that he paſſed not through his Territory, where he ſhould (as he ſaid) have had plenty of all things for the relief of his Army; yet hoping that in his return from Siruan he would take it in his way; whereas he ſhould find him moſt ready to beſtow all that he had in the Service of his Lord, ſelling him moreover, That although he could not, for many urgent reſpects, go with him into Siruan, yet he would always accompany him in Mind, and continually pray unto the Creator of all things, for his Proſperity and moſt happy Succeſs. Courteouſly did Muſtapha receive both his Preſents and Submiſſion, and in exchange thereof beſtowed upon him certain Gifts after the Turkiſh manner, and in maſſiveſt Terms gave him anſwer; promiſing him in his return to paſs through his Country, and ſo diſmiſſed the Perſian Duke with like Honour, wherewith he was entertained at his coming.

Muſtapha, holding on his Journey toward Siruan, through moorſh and troubleſome ways; in twelve days after he departed from Tefis, came into the Confinnes of Siruan, near to the River Canac, and there rafted on this ſide the River one day. At which time they of the City of Sechi, bordering upon the Siruanians and Georgians, four days Journey from Sumachia, came to offer themſelves to Muſtapha Subjects to the Turks: Of whole Submiſſion the General graciouſly accepted, promiſing to them his aſſured Protection.

The Turks Army over-wearied with the continual travel of twelve days march, but yet far more afflicted with hunger, not finding in thoſe Parts ſo much as one wild beaſt to aſſuage their greedy deſire of Meat, ſought by all means, every man for himſelf, to get ſomething, eſpecially when they underſtood their General would paſs the River into a Country unto them all unknown, where they were altogether uncertain what to find for their relief. So wiſh they were inquiring among themſelves, who were able to conduct them to ſome ſuch place as where they might ſupply their wants, behold, certain Perſians were taken, who being ſtraitly examined on that point, after much reſiſtance, at laſt told them, that not far off after they had paſſed certain Marſhes, where Canac diſcharged it ſelf into Araxis, they ſhould find many Fields full of Rice and Corn in the blade, and a little farther certain far herds of Cattel, ſufficient to relieve the whole Army. Of this News was the General certified, who, although he greatly doubted the ſubtilty of his Enemies, yet to gratifie his Souldiers, and to make them more willing to follow him him into Siruan, he licenſed every man that had a deſire thereto, to go and provide himſelf of Viſuals, and ſo ſuffered all that would to go freely. Whereupon there went of themſelves, and were ſent by their Captains, about ten thouſand ſervile Perſons, with Camels, Horſes and Mules, to fetch away this proviſion of Corn and Cattel: But the Event anſwered not to their deſires. For Toocma, with the other Perſian Captains, and the reſt of the Souldiers that were eſcaped from the overthrow given them in the Plains of Chielder, having gathered together the remainder of the Army, and recovered ſuch places as they thought ſafe and friendly for them, carefully attended the marching and paſſing of the Turkiſh Army. And being certainly informed by them of Reſvan and Georgia what way they kept, and that of neceſſity they muſt arrive at the Banks of Canac, they began to deviſe how they might in ſome meaſure be revenged for their former loſs, and impeach their Enemies entrance into Siruan. But wanting rather ſtrength than courage to aſſaile the whole Army, they thought it beſt to ſtay in ambuſh in ſome fit place, until ſome part of the Turkiſh Army (allured with the prey of the Corn and Cattel) ſhould for the relief of their common Neceſſities deſcend into thoſe fields. And the rather to draw them on, ſent out divers men, who, as if they had gone about their own buſineſs, and by chance at unawares had lighted upon the Turks Camp, revealed unto them as a great Secret, what a good Prey was hard by them; and ſo withdrawing themſelves out of fight, privily awaited the coming of the Turks: when as within the ſpace of three days it ſo fell out, that the aſſailed ten thouſand Foragers arrived at the ſpecified place, where they had no ſooner begun to chaſe themſelves with the Prey, but they were ſurprized by the Perſians and all ſlain, ſaving a few who by haſty flight ſaved themſelves. The noiſe of this hot Skirmiſh being heard into the Turkiſh Hoſt, cauſed Muſtapha to imagine that the matter was fallen out even as indeed it was; and therefore riſing with his whole Army, haſted with all poſſible ſpeed to have ſuccoured the poor People, who were now all ſlain. And albeit he came not in ſo good time as to yield them relief, yet came he very ſilky to revenge their Death upon the Perſians, ſlaying too long to load themſelves with the Spoil of their Enemies.

The place from whence the Turks were to have had the aforeſaid Booty, was almoſt in manner of an Iſland, incloſed with the Rivers of Araxis and Canac; whereto Muſtapha entred with his whole Power; Derwis Baſſa leading the one Wing, as did Boyan Baſſa the other, and he incloſed with the multitude of their Perſian Allies. The Perſians, ſeeing Muſtapha with all his Forces haſting towards them, and withal, remembering the late overthrow by them received in the Plains of Chielder; began to beſink themſelves how much better it had been for them to have contented themſelves with the late ſlaughter of the Foragers, and with ſpeed to have got them away out of that Straight, than by ſtaying longer, to be incloſed with the multitude of their Perſians, as that they could now no way eſcape without moſt manifold Peril. In this perplexity diſcourſing among themſelves, whether it were better to fly, or with ſo great diſadvantage to joyn battel, and ſo rather to dye honourably, than to live with reproach; at laſt they reſolved to relieve themſelves to the further ſervice of their Prince and Country, deeming it rather a point of Wiſdom, to ſacrifice themſelves to adventure upon moſt deſperate and aſſured death, ſo many worthy men as might in future time ſtand their Country in good ſtead; yet did they not ſee how, by flight, they would eſcape, for that they were in ſuch ſhort ſtrain-

ed within the Rivers, as that there was no ground left for them to eſcape by, than that which contrary to their Expectation was by the Turks alſo readily poſſeſſed. In theſe Difficulties every man began to betake himſelf to his own private Conceit and Fortune. Toocma with Amir Chan, and other the great Commanders of the Army, were the firſt that turned their Backs, and by the help of their Courageous Horſes got over the River of Canac: whole Example moved many others to attempt the like, though not with like Fortune; for that their Horſes being not of ſuch Courage, and out of Breath, lay many of them drowned in the River. Wherewith others being amazed, as perceiving inevitable death in flying preſent before their Eyes, and reſolving alſo their hope even in deſpair, ran as if they were heading in a Rage and Fury upon their Enemies, and in fighting ſhewed unpeakable Valour: but what was one againſt an hundred? For there they were alſo all ſlain, though worthy of immortal Fame. Thus was the Perſian Army quite diſcomfited in this demy Iſland, being firſt ſlain with the Blood of the Enemy, and afterwards with the ſlaughter of the Neighbour and proper Inhabitant, and ſo became the perpetual ſpectacle of a moſt courageous and warlike People. The Turks in this laſt Conſliſt loſt not above 3000 men, beſide the ſlaughter of the 10000 Foragers; although Toocma, to make his loſs to ſeem the more tolerable, made report to the King of a great ſlaughter made. The Perſian Captains, full of ſorrow for this unexpected overthrow, with the licence of their General departed every man to his ſeveral Government: as Emangul Chan to Genge, Seraph Chan to Nuſſerdin, Toocma himſelf to Reſvan, and all the reſt to other Cities, to which Government whither they were before by the King appointed, and ſo remained, excepting his further Pleaſure from Casbin.

Muſtapha was now come to the River of Canac, which he was to paſs over into Siruan; and therefore made ſtraight Proclamation through his whole Army: That every man ſhould be in readineſs to aſſault the next day to paſs the River. At which Proclamation all his People ſuddenly aroſe in a tumult, and with injurious Terms, even to his Face, reproved his Folly and Inhumanity, propounding utter danger unto himſelf, and an univerſal Conſuſion unto the whole Army: and therefore prayed him to ſurceale from proceeding any further, unleſs he were minded to caſt them all away. But his reſolute Mind waſt not by their Threats or Intreaties to be removed, neither gave he them other Answer than this, That ſuch Amurath commanded, and that if all the reſt followed himſelves unwilling to obey their Sovereign, he himſelf would not, nor could not, but would be the firſt man to attempt and perform that which they all ſo abhorred and reproved. Valiant Souldiers (he ſaid) were diſcovered and known not in Idleneſs and Eaſe, but in great pains taking, and difficult Enterprises: who never ought to be afraid to change this momentary Life for everlaſting Honour, or to ſhun Death, if the Service of their Prince ſo required. And for mine own part, ſaid he, I muſt earneſtly preſent you, that after I have attempted the paſſage, if any thing happens unto me otherwiſe than well, yet carry my dead Body to the other ſide of the River, to the end that if I cannot ſhall I yet live execute the Commandment of my Sovereign, I may yet at laſt perform the ſame when I am but a ſpeechleſs and liveleſs Carcaſs: for ſo much as the deſire of my Lord is not in any ſort to be fruſtrated, for making too great account of mine own Life.

Divers andundry murmuring and whiſperings followed upon this ſpeech of cadmonour, ſo that ſome without ſtanding the next morning did firſt of all waſte over the deep and ſwift River himſelf: after whom preſently followed the Baſſa, with all their Slaves, by whole Example the reſt alſo were induced at laſt to do the like, and so continued untill the darkness of the Night interrupted their Passage; by which Occasion more than half the Army could not then get over. In this Passage, being with great Tumult and Disorder attempted, it came to pass that about 8000 Persons, carried away with the violence of the River, were miserably drowned, with the great outcry of all the Host. The like hapned also to many Mules, Camels, and Sumpter Horses, upon whose Backs divers Persons being mounted, in hope to have passed dry over the River, were likewise headlong overwhelmed therein. With great Complaints and blasphemous Curlings was the whole Night spent by those that were yet on this side the River, whose fears were not a little increased by the Example of their unfortunate Fellows before drowned. And like enough it was some pestilent Sedition to have ensued thereupon, had there not a shallow Ford by great chance been discovered, which gave safe Passage to those that were left; for in the Passage which the People made that followed Mulapha, the Gravel of the bottom of the River being raised and removed by the heavy Host, the Cattel was driven down the River to a place where by great good hap there was also a Ford, and there gathered together in a heap, had in such sort raised the depth of the Channel, that it made as it were a shelf for their commodious Passage, so that the remnant of the Army, Carriages, and Artillery passing over the same, there was not so much as one man that perished. So having with much difficulty at last got over the River of Ganah, they called themselves that day and the next, and there stayed untill the whole Army was mustered, and again put in Order. Removing thence, the day following they encamped in certain barren Champains, where was neither Corn nor Cattel; neither could they perceive or learn, that in those quarters were any Villages at all. By means whereof, the hunger of their Beasts increasing, they were enforced to give their Horses and Mules Leaves and Stalks of very dry and withered Reeds, and such like things of little or no sustenance at all: and the men themselves were fain to satisfy their hunger with their uttermost reliques which they were fain to pick out of such poor Victuals as now by Corruption were become loathsome to mans Nature; and that which worse was, they saw no end of their Miseries they were to enter into. Notwithstanding there was now no looking back, but needs on they must follow the fortune of their Leaders; among whom Mulapha bore all the rest far forward on his determined Journey. He had not long marched, but there was discovered good store of sundry Plants, and shortly after a very large plain Country all green and flourishing, and garnished with many Trees; by the only sight whereof every man was refreshed with the hope of Relief, and with more than ordinary paces hastened untill they were entered into those Champains, abounding with all kind of Corn and Fruits that could be of an hungry man desired. In this place did every man find his Appetite, and found in part the fore-passed Calamities. Through this fruitful and pleasant Country Mulapha leading his Army, at last arrived at Eres, the chief City in that Coast of Sirvan, as you travel from Georgia.

This City of Eres was forsaken of a number of her Inhabitants, as soon as it was known that the Turks were come to Cataca, who all followed their Governour Samir Chan, who with Ares Chan, Governour of Sumachia, and other the Governours of Sebis, and other Places of Sirvan, forsook the Cities, and all together withdrew themselves into the Mountains, as places of more surety, attending the event of these great Motions: so that as the Turks entered the City undisturbed, so were they with the prey they found therein nothing enriched, for that in this common danger every man had carried away with him the best things he had. Here stayed Mulapha two and twenty days, during which time he erected a Fortres in the said City; whereupon he placed two hundred small pieces of Artillery, and for the keeping thereof appointed Caitas Bassa with a Garrison of five thousand Soldiers. In the mean time also he commanded Ofman Bassa (one of the voluntary Captains) with ten thousand men to possess Sumachia, sometime the metropolitane City of that Province, with the Title of Viceroy and Governour-general of Sirvan. Giving him further in charge, that in any case he should clear the passage to Dorhent, and give present Advancements to the Tartarians of his arrival there, whom he supplied by that time to be come into those quarters, for that they had before so faithfully promised to Amurath. Ofman comming to Sumachia, presently seized upon the City, and was friendly entertained of those that remained there; whom he likewise courteously increased, without doing or suffering any outrage to be done upon them. Of which his courteous usage they of Dorhent understanding, sent presently to offer their City unto him, beseeching him to receive them into his Protection, and to defend them from the Persians; under whom, although they had long lived in subjection, yet differed they from them in the Ceremonies of their Mahometan Superstition, wherein they better agreed with the Turks.

Mulapha having thus brought the Country of Sirvan into the Turkish subjection, and finished his Fortres at Eres, and put all things in such order as he thought best; impudenced by the Jamzaries and the People of Grecia, and somewhat increased by the season of the year, which was now far spent, departed from Eres, and turned his course homeward toward the Country of Alexander, fitnamed the Great, as he had promised in his late Passage into Sirvan. And having travelled a long Journey, he sent before him certain English and Pioneers to make a Bridge over Canah, so without danger to pass over his Army. Having passed the River, he gave notice to Sahamal (one of the Lords of Georgia) of his arrival, who presently came and yielded himself as Vassal to the Turks; and being entertained of the Bassa with great Pomp, and rewarded after the Turkish manner, took his leave, and so returned into his Mountain of Bres.

Mulapha setting again forward, and travelling by Night, because he would not lose the opportunity of the fair weather, by the error of his Guides lost his way, and so fell into rough and difficult Passages, whereby he was enforced to stay and wait for day light; which arising, did manifest unto them, that they were now entered into the Countries of his Friend Alexander: and therefore he gave forthwith Proclamation through all the Army, That no man upon pain of Death should be so foolish as to molest or disquiet any of the Subjects of Alexander, but to have good respect unto them, and to treat them with all Courtesy. The day following, he still travelled on in the same Country, when there arrived from Zaghen certain Ambassadors of Alexander, with great abundance of Cattel, Corn, Fruits, and other relief sent for a Present to the General, with a solemn excuse that he came not himself, because the Infirmary of his Body would not suffer him. Wherewithall Mulapha rested satisfied, and leaving the City of Zaghen on the right hand, caused the Messengers of Alexander to guide him the way to Teflis, which they so directly did, that within the space space of three days they conducted him thither with his Army, without the feeling of any annoyance; from whence they returned, being well rewarded for their pains by the General. Who now come to Teflis, found the Garrison he had there left for the keeping thereof, so hardly pinched with Famine, that they were glad to eat Cats, Dogs, Sheep-skins, and such like unwonted food, for neither durst they for fear of the Enemy go out of the Cattle to provide for themselves, neither if they had so done, had it any thing availed, such was the carefulness of the Enemy in keeping of his things: but now, by the coming of the General, they were relieved with Meat, Money, and plenty of all things. Having stayed there two days, he put himself again upon his way, and with Fire and Sword destroyed whatsoever came in his way in the Champains subject to the said City, only the Sepulchres of Simons Progenitors (Lord of that Country) were left untouched by the Turks Fury. The next day they travelled over rough and ragged Mountains, full of a thousand difficulties, which were the more increased by wonderful great Snows that were fallen, by reason whereof, many Soldiers, Horses, Camels, and Mules perished. In which distress the Army continued two days, during which time the Soldiers were fallen into such disorder, that forgetting the fear of the Enemies Country wherein they were, every man without regard took up his several lodging apart, some here, some there, where they might find either some thick Bush or some small Cottage, or some quiet Valley to shelter themselves in from the Wind, the Snow, and the Storm. Of which disorder certain Georgian Lords understanding by the Scouts, which from time to time waited upon the Turks Army, joyined themselves together, and in the Night secretly approached unto it, expecting the Opportunity of performing some notable Exploit; and having observed, that Hosaine Bey had withdrawn himself with his Regiment from the rest of the Army under certain Mountains, to lay claim himself from the Storm and Wind; they took the Occasion presented, and so assailing him, slew his Slaves and all his Squadrons, took a great booty of many loads of Money and Apparel, laid away with them all his Horses, and whatsoever else they could find, and scarce gave him leisure to save himself, by flying into the Tents of Byran Bassa. The next morning the Turks removed, and in the Evening came to a Castle called Churuchala, where they stayed a whole day to make provision of Victual, which was attempted by sending abroad many of their Slaves into the Fields, conducted by them of the Castle, who were all miserably cut in pieces by the Georgians. From this Place the Turks Army departed in great hunger, over divers rough places of the Georgians, where they were oftentimes fain to rest themselves; and at last came to the Confines of Dedeinit, of her called the Widows Country. In the entrance whereof, they must needs pass thorough a narrow Strait, between certain Mountains, where the Lord of Widul, which was attempted by the low Vallies, a dangerous place, and so narrow that no more but one man alone could at once pass through it. Between this Strait and a very thick and hilly Wood, they lodged upon the Bank of the said River, and from thence they removed the next morning and travelled over very steep Mountains and rough Fjords, over Ice and Snow, more hard than Marble, and over other hanging Rocks, in such miserable sort, that many Camels, Mules, and Horses, and the murthering Lord himself, were miserably perished. Through these ruinous Crags, and divers other Miseries, they marched all the next day, and after that another day also, as miserable to the Army as the former; and so at last being sore afflicted with hunger, spoiled of the Enemy, tormented with the hard labour of the Car and situation of the Place, they arrived in the Territories that lay under Almchala, or golden Castle, the princely Widows Palace, where they had all manner of Relief for all the Miseries they had endured since their departure from Churuchala, by the space of six days; which if it had been a fair common travelled way, might have been performed in one only days Journey.

The Widow, with Alexander her eldest Son, came down from her Castle, and went unto the Pavilion of Mulapha, offering him divers Presents, and promising unto him all faithful Obedience; whom Mulapha courteously received, declaring unto her what honourable entertainment he had given to Manuchiar her younger Son there present, who had been with him in all the Expedition into Sirvan. And for the present, dismissing the privy displeasure he bare against Alexander (whom he thought to have been one of them that spoiled the Servants in their return from the Camp) he embraced him courteously, and prayed her to be content to leave him also there with him, giving her farther to understand, that he would fend both her Sons to Constantinople to Amurath, with Letters of Credence for their yielded Obedience, for their Favour shewed to his Army, in giving it to secure Passage, and to many Helps; and lastly, that for their good Deserts, they might be of the said great Sultan both honourably entertained and rewarded. The aged Lady, who before this time had been with ill will to him, yet outwardly in her Countenance showed her self pleased; and seemed contentedly to yield that he was of necessity constrained to grant; as well for that he was already possessed of one of her Sons, as also for that both herself and her whole state were now in his Power; and as it were at his Devotion: and therefore, leaving both her Sons behind her, she returned her self heavy to her Castle.

In this Place Mulapha having refreshed his Army two days, departed thence toward Chars, and after many days travel, at last arrived at Ersirum, to the great rejoicing of the whole Army, which was there presently discharged by the General, without any murthering at all, and leave given for every man to return into his Country.

Mulapha settling himself in Ersirum, dispatched Poets with Letters of plentiful Advancements to his great Lord and Master, of all things that had passed; not forgetting to magnify his own Exploits above Measure. He certified him of the Batels he had had with the Persians, the Obedience he had received of the Georgians and Sirvanians, the mutiny of his own Soldiers, the Fortres he had built at Eres, the Garrisons left in that City with Caitas Bassa, and in Sumachia with Ofman Bassa; and in brief, whatsoever else had passed, and whatsoever he had taken from the Enemy. Neither did he fail to propound unto Amurath what he thought convenient to be attempted the next year, for the strengthening of those places he had already conquered, and for preparing the way for new Enterprises. And principally he put him in Mind of a Fortification to be made at Chars, a place very fit for any Passage into Georgia or Armenia, by situation fruitful and commodious both for Men and Cattel. And withall he sent unto him the Widows two Sons Alexander and Manuchiar, the Georgian Princes, certifying him of their great Love and Affection, and that they desired their Country till good entertainment and friendly welcome: and withall declaring his Opinion, That Manuchiar was the fitter man for Government than his his Brother Alexander, and the reader to do him Service. Greatly did Amurath commend the Valour and Diligence of Muphtah, and highly pleased himself with this conceit. That of these beginnings might grow mighty Conquests, to the enlargement of his Empire, and that by this means he should be able to surpass the Glory of his Predecessors. And the more his ambitious thoughts were occupied about these Wars, the less he troubled himself with thinking how to annoy Europe with his Forces.

It was not long after the departure of Muphtah from Eres, but that the Tartarians, having left the Fens of Meotis, and the unmountable fiores of the black Sea, and having passed over the Rocks upon Chokchia, and surveyed the frozen Gorge of the Mountain Caucasus, were now arrived upon the Confines of Sirvan, and there attended the Commandment of the Turks. These Tartarians, being of them that are called Præcopenes, to the number of thirty thousand, conducted by their Lord and Captain Abdicheirai, a young man of great Valour and Fame, and of a comely Personage, were come, according to the faithful Promise of Tartar Chan, with full Resolution to attempt whatsoever should be commanded them by the Name of Amurath. Now Ofman Bassa understanding of their approach, according to the charge before given him by Muphtah the General, invited them to enter into Sirvan, and by increasing of the Turks Forces, to further these beginnings of Amurath's Glory, and these his Conquests, (or more truly to say, these magnificent and famous Terms of Victory) all which was most diligently put in Execution by Abdicheirai; who, having entered the Iron Gates where Derben standeth, (which by the Turks at this day is called Denir Capi, and signifieth the Gates of Iron) and so from thence passing into the Country of Sirvan, there stayed, and thereof gave Advertisement to Ofman, as was by him appointed. Ares Chan, late Governour of Sumachia, who for fear of the great Army of the Turks had abandoned the City, the chief place of his charge, and beaken himself to the safeguard of the Mountains, hearing of the departure of the Turkish General, rejoyced with the other Governours of Eres and Sechi (who following his Example, had in like manner fled) now to return again to their forsaken Country, and to make proof if he could by any means take revenge of the Injury done unto him by the Turks. So passing under Sumachia, and having put to the Sword certain of Ofman's straggling Victuallers that were gone out of the City, he incamped with all his People a little from Sumachia, and by good Fortune surprised certain Messengers sent from Abdicheirai the Tartar, to certify Ofman Bassa of his arrival, and to know his Pleasure what he should put in Execution. These Tartarians, brought before Ares, after much Torture disclosed the Letters they carried, which the Perfian Captain read, and considering the great number of the Tartarians that were come, (for the Letters made mention of thirty thousand) he resolved not to stay any longer in those quarters, but presently raised his Camp, and retired towards Canac, meaning from thence to certify the King of those Novelties, and upon the banks of the said River to attend the Kings answer. The Tartarian Captain coming to Sumachia, was appointed by the Bassa to pass over the River of Canac into Genge, the Country of Emanguli Chan, with the spoil thereof to enrich himself, and by all means to make his arrival unfeigned, and by all means to make his arrival unfeigned, and by all means to make his arrival unfeigned.

Chan was yet incamped; whom he upon the sudden most furiously assaulted, and like a devouring flame discomfited all his Host: and taking him alive, sent him to Sumachia to Ofman, who forthwith caused him to be hanged by the Neck out of a Lodging in the same State-house where he had not long before sat as Governour. The Tartarian after that, swimming over the River, and crossing a little above Genge, found Emanguli Chan with his Wife, and all his Family, and a great part of the Nobility of Genge in a Valley hunting the wild Boar; and assailing him, put him to flight, took from him his Wife, all the Ladies, and many Slaves, and flew many of the rest that were come thither to flee the spot: and after that rode on to Genge, which he took, and yielded it wholly to the Fury and Lust of his barbarous Soldiers, who left no manner of inhumane Cruelty unattempted, in satisfying their immoderate and barbarous Affections. And so being loaded with the Spoils, and weary with the slaughter of their Enemies, they returned merrily toward Sirvan: and passing again over Canac, came to the higher side of Eres into certain low Champaigns, environed about with Hills, and there having pitched their Tents, without any fear feared themselves to sleep, and to rest their weary Bodies.

In the mean time, and long before these Actions, was News brought to the Perfian Court of all the Turks proceedings: whereupon the Perfian King having gathered new Forces, had dispatched Emir Hamse Mirise, his eldest Son, with 120000 Soldiers to pass into Sirvan, to see what hurt the Enemy had done, and to attempt the revenge of the forepassed Injuries; but above all things to punish the Villany of them of Sechi, and then the City of Sirvan, that not induced with any Necessity, had so voluntarily yielded themselves to follow the Obedience and Religion of the Turks. The Perfian Prince departing from Cashin, accompanied with his Mother Begum, who would needs follow her beloved Son, was on his way towards Sirvan, under the guiding and Government of Mirise Salmas, chief of the Sultans; and had now left behind them the Countries of Ardozil and Caracach, when he was certified by the advertisements come from Ares Chan, of the arrival of Abdicheirai, with his great number of Tartarians; and was thereby at the first stricken into a great quandary, and almost out of comfort: yet, prick'd forward with an honourable desire of Glory and Revenge, he prosecuted his intended enterprise for Sirvan, and halting his Journey, came to Eres long before the King's Father thought he could have to done.

His noble Celesty ferved him to great purpose, for that Caitas Bassa was lately gone out of the Fortres, and went spoyling the Country, carrying away with him whatsoever he met withal, and committing such Infolencies as hungry Soldiers beyond all honesty use to do in frange and fruitful Countries. But when he was in the midst of their spoils, and least feared the Enemy, he was suddenly assailed by the Prince; and having no means to escape his Fury in this Extremity, after a fierce and bloody Battle (wherein the Turks although in number few, yet shewed many effects of Valour) he was there slain with all his Soldiers, leaving the Fortres, the Spoils, and the Country committed to his Custody, free to the Pleasure of the Victor: which the Perfian Prince having once again gotten into his Possession, took away the two hundred pieces of Artillery that were left in the Fortres of Muphtah, and presently sent them to Cashin to his Father.

ing the Hills, he discovered where the Tartarians lay encamped. Whereupon he stood in great doubt, whether to adventure upon so mighty an Enemy, or to content himself with the Victory he had already gotten, and so to return into Perfia: to return he thought it too great a shame, and chose rather to adventure himself to most manifest Peril. And therefore defending the Hill, and drawing nigh the Enemy, he perceived that the Army was all laid down to rest, and that their Horses were some couched, some standing, but all unfaded; whereupon, without any stay setting spurs to his Horses, he picked forward with all his host, and most terribly assailed the Tartarians, now buried in their pools and sleep, and having slain their first and second Watch, although with some loss, among the tumultuary Soldiers he made an universal confusion and slaughter, putting force to flight, killing others, and taking divers of them Captives: Among whom was their General Abdicheirai, who was taken alive, and sent to the King.

After these Victories the Perfian Prince scoured to Sumachia, and compassed the City round about, wherein the Turkish Bassa Ofman sat as Governour, to the reproach of Perfia; and there encamping himself, sent word to Ofman, That if he would yield himself, he would let him depart with Life and Goods, otherwise, if he would obstinately hold it out, and not yield the City, which he so unjustly possessed, he should be constrained to surrender it by force, and his Life withal. Ofman, who as then knew nothing of the Tartarians overture, but still hoped of their return, and as he best entertain the Prince with fair words until their coming; and therefore gave him courteous answer, that he was very ready to yield up the City: but withall intreated him, that he would stay but for three days, and grant him time to put all things in readiness, that so he might freely depart, as it had pleased him in courtesy to offer. The Prince, glad of such an answer, supposing it to have proceeded of a sincere meaning, expected of the Turks the performance thereof: But Ofman meaning nothing less, than to commit himself to the faith of his Enemy, and seeing that the Tartarians, whom he looked for, appeared not, he resolved to save himself by secret flight; doubting, as he had good reason, that if he should longer stay, to be betrayed by the Inhabitants of the City themselves; and therefore somewhat before the assigned term of the three days appointed for the surrendering of the City, he by the help of a dark Night, and the cover of the high and rough Crags, with great silence withdrew himself out of Sumachia, carrying away with him all his Substance, and so in safety arrived at Derben. The next Morning the Inhabitants of Sumachia opened the Gates of the City to the Prince: who seeing their Infidelity, first by giving of entertainment to Ofman, and now by helping him to escape, without giving him any knowledge thereof, did put in execution the effect of his Wrath and Indignation, which even at Cashin he had conceived in his Mind against them; and with great Cruelty did punish the miserable and unfortunate Citizens, laying their Houses even with the Ground, rasing both the old and new Walls of that City, of late so desired a Receipt for the Turks. But when he was to depart thence, he stood in doubt, Whether to go on to Derben, or to return to Perfia: the strength of that City, the approach of Winter, and the long Journey he wrote to take homeward, persuaded him to lay aside the enterprise for Derben: whereupon he resolved to return to Cashin, yet first to make his return by them of Eres and Sechi, and upon them, as upon Rebels, to inflict well deserved Punishment. So making his present repair thither, spared neither Sex nor Age, nor any Condition of Persons, but upon them all poured forth his furious Indignation without exception. Which done, he with his aforeaid Mother Begum, and his Army, though somewhat diminished, yet victorious and triumphant, returned to Cashin.

Young Abdicheirai the Tartarian was kept safe in the Kings Palace at Cashin, but with such ease Imprisonment was agreeable to his calling; as which was day by day so enlarged, as that he seemed not to live as a Prisoner, but rather as a Companion of those of the Court, and as it were in apparent Liberty. By which occasion, having inflamed himself into the love of Begum the Persian's Wife, he spent his time in courting her, and the again in entertaining of him in all secret and covert manner. Yet their mutual Affections and interchangeable Favours passed not so secretly, but that in the Court and all over the City it was a ripe Report, That the shameless Lady, prodigal of her Honour, had participated both her bed and herself with the Tartarian Prisoner. Howbeit, neither the King nor the Prince knew any thing of it. But the Kings perceiving the young Generation to be generally commended, valiant, courteous, and of a comely Feature, and withal nobly born (for he gave it out that he was the Brother of Tartar Chan) perfwaded himself, that it would stand with the great good of his state, of a Captive to make him his Son-in-law, by giving him his Daughter in Marriage; whereby he was in good hope these might grow future an amity and union between the Tartarian Præcopenes and himself, as that they would from thenceforth not only be to favour Amurath in those Wars, but also become Enemies unto him, and in the favour of Perfia, turn their Arms and Affections against him. Which his deep and confederate purpose so displeased the Sultans of Cashin, that they fought by all means they could possibly devise to avert the King from that so strange a Policy; but all in vain, for the King being fully resolved, and now upon the point to make a conclusion of the Marriage, the Sultans entering into the Palace with their Followers, and finding there the unfortunate Tartarian, ran him through the Body, and cutting off his privy Members, flapped them upon his Mouth after a most barbarous and filthy manner. It is reported, that the Queen was then also murdered by them; certain it is, that the poor Lady never after that day saw the light of the Sun: but whether it was put in execution by the appointment of the King her Husband, or that the Sultans did it for the publick Interest, is not certainly known. Upon these Murders sprung up many Troubles, and much civil Diffention, threatening the utter Confusion of the Perfian Kingdom, to the singular benefit of Amurath. All which tumultuous Disorders the King, by bridling his own Affections, and the Motions of his Son Emir Hamse Mirise, well appeased, procuring at last a perfect Unity, as then most Necessary for the defence of his Kingdom.

Ofman Bassa being in Derben (the only place of refuge now left for the Turks in Sirvan) ceased not with all carefulness to devise what he possibly could, for the assuring of that Country (of late won, and now again almost lost) under the Government of Amurath. For the better establishing whereof, together with his own safety, he thought it good to enter into Friendship with old Schahmal the Georgian, Lord of the Mountain of Armenia. With this man did Ofman practice many tokens of good will, and he again interchangeably towards Ofman; whereupon there arose great Friendship between them, at leastwise in outward appearance; wherewith in short time there was added

1578 a trait knot of Alliance: for that Ofman took to Wife a Daughter of the said Sabamali, the greatest sign of his sincere love towards him. Nevertheless, shortly after, Ofman, upon some reasonable Conjectures, began to suspect (as indeed the truth was) that Sabamali, for all the fair show of Friendship he made towards him, might for all that receive some secret order from the Perkan King to betray him, and to free the City from the Turks, and to reduce all that Province unto the ancient confusion by the Speeches of his Wife, the Daughter of Sabamali, who, ravished with the Honour, Valour, and Riches of her Husband, could not conceal any thing that the knew devised against him, but frankly told him, That her Father, being secretly reconciled to the Perkan King, held Friendship with him, and that Letters went between them of great matters, and particularly of the Affairs of Sirvan. Hereupon the Bassa persuaded himself, that all the Friendship of Sabamali was but deep Dilimulation, and the Marriage of his Daughter nothing but a mean to procure his Death. Nevertheless he made them unto his Wife, as if he had made no such reckoning of it as indeed he did, but kept it in store to his own safety, and the Destruction of Sabamali; whom, for all that he still entertained with all Honour and Kindness due unto a most loving Father-in-law. But to prevent the malicious purpose of Sabamali, having invited him, according to the custom, to a certain solemn Feast, he acquainted certain Companies of his most trusty and valiant Soldiers with his Determination, enjoining them, that as soon as Sabamali was entered into his Court, even in the very dismounting from his Horse, they should all fall upon him, cut off his Head, and put all his retinue to the Sword. Which his cruel command was when accordingly at Sabamali commencing put in execution, he in lighting from his Horse being slain, and all his Followers murdered, when forthwith were sent forth by Ofman two thousand Horsemen to spoil and sack all the Country of the said Georgian Lord, to the great marvel and astonishment both of far and near. The Perkan King hearing of these News, took the matter grievously, as forcing that the recovery of that Country and Province of Sirvan would prove a matter of great Difficulty, and fearing greatly that it would fill the main (as indeed it doth) in the Possession of the Turks. This was the end of the Turks Attempts against the Perkan in Sirvan this year 1578, wherein they lost above seventy thousand men, devoured partly with the Sword, and partly with Famine, and the other Millions of War. And so Winter coming on very sharply, every man withdrew himself from the Field, wholly attending the keeping of that they had already gotten, until the coming on of the next Spring.

Amurath, advertised by Letters from Mustapha, of all that had happened in the late Expedition against the Perkan, upon these prosperous Successes (which the Bassa had for the advancing of his own Credit described to be far greater than indeed they were) began to cast many Devices in his Head, touching such matters as were to be attempted the next Year. And first, he thought it necessary to find his Forces again into Sirvan, to recover such Places as were first conquered by Mustapha, but afterward again subdued by the Perkan; so to establish his Government in that Country. But upon better consideration, he ceased further to think of that matter, for the great hope he had conceived of the aid that was promised him by Tartar Chan, who had faithfully assured both him and Ofman, that he would over-run that Province anew, and do great matters in furtherance of the Turks Designs; all which for all that fell out to be but windy words; yet in respect of this hope he laid Sirvan aside, and committed the defence thereof to the false Promises of the Tartarian, and the Valour of Ofman. And pleading his ambitious Desires with more haughty Thoughts, he began to devise with himself for sending his Army directly to Tauris, there to erect a Fortrels; which being strongly fortified, and furnished with a great Garrison of most valiant Soldiers, should never be again subdued by all the power of Persia; and by this means to keep in Subjection all those great Countries between Tauris and Erzerum. Which his conceit, being of great weight and importance, was much increased by the persuasion of others, very inward with him; every man being almost of Opinion, That it was an easie matter for so great an Host in few days to perform that Service, and to pierce, not only into Tauris, but further, to pass whithersoever he would desire. Yet after he had more deeply considered of an Enterprize of so great importance, and with more indifferent Judgment compared his own Forces with his Enemies, he began to find many difficulties and Dangers, which in the heat of his ambitious desires he at the first saw not; for beside the length and tediousness of the Journey, he doubted that in sending his Army for Tauris, it might be on the other side assisted by the Georgians (of whose obedience he had as yet no great assurance) and on the other side by the Perkan, and so brought into great danger; which he was always to fear, whenever he should have occasion to send new supplies unto the Fortrels by him intended at Tauris. Whereupon, laying aside all his former Conceits, as too eager and perilous, he resolutely concluded with himself, first to make sure his own Borders, and afterwards by little and little to enter into the Enemies Country, still fortifying in convenient Places as he went; and so slowly, although but slowly, to triumph over his Enemies, rather than by thrusting his Army headlong upon uncertainties into places strongly fenced both by Nature and the Power of most mighty Enemies, to be enforced with shame to abandon the enterprize so hastily begun.

Of this his Resolution he advertised Mustapha by Writing, giving him in charge, against the next Spring to provide all such things as should be necessary for the building of certain Forts upon the way that leadeth from Erzerum into Georgia; that having made those ways safe, and brought the People under his obedience, he might afterwards attempt greater matters. Whereupon Mustapha, presently directed forth Precepts to the Cities of Aleppo, of Damasco, Caraceni, and other Places of Soria and Mesopotamia, for the taking up of cunning Workmen, of Pioneers, and such like, to the number of twenty thousand; and Georgians wrote to all the Countries, out of which he had raised his Army the last Year. That all their Soldiers (yea and in greater number also) should be in readiness against the next Spring, to return to the Wars. The rumor whereof he caused to be spread even as far as Egypt. He commanded also the Taxes and Tenths of those Countries to be collected, and further, used the Chambers of Aleppo, and other Places, for such masses of Money as he thought necessary for these purposes. In this while, the two Georgian Brethren, Alexander and Manuchiar, sent (as we have before said) by Mustapha to Amurath at Constantinople, in doubtful hope, expecting the end for which they were both sent unto the Court; were both examined, and exhorted to embrace the Mahometan Religion, whereunto Manuchiar easily yielded. Whereas on the other side Alexander his elder Brother could by no Allurements or means be induced to consent to so infamous and damnable a change of his Religion, although he knew he should therefore be deprived of his state; but protesting his Obedience at all times to Amurath, and his love to his Brother, requested only, that he might but as a private Man go and live in his Country, there to be buried amongst his Ancestors. Which his request the Turkish Emperor referred to the Direction of Manuchiar, to do therein as he law good; who consented therunto. Hereupon Manuchiar was circumcised, and the name of Mulaffa given him, with the Title of the Bassa and Governour of Athens, and of all his Mothers and Brothers Countries: and being thus created a Turk, had his Brother Alexander, a Christian, committed unto him, and both returned in to their own Countries.

Now in the Perkan Court at Casbin, were many Consultations had for the rescinding of the Invasions of the Turks. And among others careful of those matters, Emangli Chan, Governour of Genge, doubting to lose his honourable Government, by reason of the late sack of his City, and spoil of his Country by the Tartarians; by those Plots that were daily in contriving for the sending of men into Sirvan to impeach the Designments of Ofman Bassa, and if it were possible, to drive him out of Perkan, took occasion to offer unto the King, upon pain of his Head, to defend Sirvan, and not to suffer Ofman the Turk to attempt any new Fortifications, or further Conquests in that Province. Of which his offer the King accepted, and thereupon the Government of Genge, and guarding of the Country of Sirvan against the Forces of Ofman, was frankly committed unto him; and commandment given to the Governours of Tauris, Revan, and Najafan, and to divers other Captains that were to be ready at all times with their Power to assist Emangli Chan, if it should fortune either the Tartarians or Turks, with any great Power to enter into Sirvan: which order so taken, was thought sufficient for the Security of that Province.

But how to protect the Georgian Country, was thought to be a matter of great importance, every man being almost of Opinion, That some great Power of the Turks should be sent thither, for the more assurance of the Conquest thereof already begun, and for the Succour of the Fortrels at Teflis, which must needs otherwise fall again into the hand of the Georgians. This matter so troubled the Perkan King, as that he seemed to have bent his whole Counsels and Thoughts thereupon: When Simon, a Georgian, a famous Captain, (sometime Prisoner with Ismael the late King at Casbin, and by the familiarity he had with him, induced from the Christian Faith) for defence whereof he had in the time of King Tamar, chosen to live deprived of his Liberty and State) thinking it now a fit time to obtain at the Kings Hand such help as he had long desired, for the recovery of his Dominion usurped by Danid, otherwise called Dan Chan, his younger Brother (who for the obtaining thereof of King Tamar, had voluntarily renounced his Christian Religion) offered now unto the King his faithful Service, for the defence of that part of the Georgian Country wherein Teflis stood (being in right, part of his own Inheritance) against the Turks; repaying by way of Dilgrance for the Defence of that evil defended Country, and further annoying of the Enemy. With great content did the Perkan King consent to the request of Simon, and named him Chan of all that Georgians, which he possessed before whilst he was a Christian: and sent with him Aliouli Chan into Georgia, with five thousand Horsemen, and certain pieces of Artillery taken at Erzer, when Caleas Bassa was slain. Simon afterwards coming to Georgia, was joyfully received of his Country-men, and there mustered about three thousand Soldiers of his own and of his Neighbours; excusing himself that he was become a Perkan, not because he preferred the Mahometan superstition before the Christian Religion, but only so to be delivered from his long Imprisonment, and by that means to maintain his Estate. And in this order were the Affairs of Georgia assured and strengthened in the best manner that might then be.

Now began the Spring to approach, and every man prepared himself to the discontinued Travels of the Wars begun; and now were met together at Erzerum, out of all the wanted Provinces, all the Turks Forces, with all things necessary for the intended War. With this Army, in all things equal with the first, Mustapha led forward, and in twelve days came to Chars, not perceiving in his Soldiers any sign of discontent at all. And forasmuch as here they were to stay, and to fortify both with Walls and Ditches that ruined City, and that with as great speed as was possible; there was no Remedy, but that beside the Pioneers and Engineers that were brought for that purpose, many of the Spagolians, yea, and of the Janizaries also, must be let to work. Whereupon they all suddenly in a tumult, began with bitter Protestations to tell the General, That their stipends wherewith it pleased the Sultan to favour them, were not bestowed upon them to employ their Forces and virtues in such servile Works; but only with their Swords and other Weapons, to exercise that force and hardiness for which they were esteemed worthy of that Honour. Whereunto the General answered in most haughty Terms, and not yielding one jot to their Incivility, but using all means of Authority and Terror, brought them to work to much as he desired: So that within the space of twenty three days the Towers and Walls were erected, the Ditches digged, the Artillery ordered planted upon the Walls, and the Water brought round about it. Many Inconveniences happened in the Army while they were busy in this work; and namely upon the twenty fifth day of August, when they had almost even finished the whole Building, the Soldiers endured a most sudden cold by reason of the Snow that then fell in great abundance.

Chars thus fortified, the General resolved to send Succours into Georgia to Teflis; without which it was most certain that the Fortrels would be yielded to the Georgians, but in what sort to relieve it he remained doubtful. To send part of his Army with some valiant Captain seemed dangerous, and to go himself with all his Forces, would found (as he thought) to his discredit with his great Lord and Master, whom he had already made believe that he had subdued the Georgians; and brought all that Province to his Obedience and Devotion. In this Ambiguity, the desire he had to preserve his Credit with Amurath prevailed; and so he made choice of Hajjan Bassa, Son to Mubamet, principal Vicer of the Court, a gallant Gentleman, and of great Valour, to whom he delivered between eighteen and twenty thousand Soldiers; joining unto him one Refuan, Captain of certain Adventurers that voluntarily offered themselves to follow the Forces of Hajjan; assigning unto him likewise forty thousand Ducks, and many loads of Rice, Meat, and Barley, with other things necessary both for Diet and War; and so sent him away for Teflis. Hajjan with this charge far forward, fully resolved to put these succours into Teflis, or to lose all; and at length came to the famous Stright of Tomani;

nis, where the over-grown Woods on the one side, and the deep Valleys and craggy Rocks on the other, would afford a right constant Beholder. When upon the sudden, the Perfians and the Georgians, under the Conduct of Aluculi Chan and Simon, at unawares let upon the Turks, and joined Battle with them. For these two valiant Captains, remaining for the most part in the Borders of Teflis and Tomanis with 8000 Soldiers, waiting for some Opportunity to annoy either them of the Fort of Teflis, or else such as should come to their Succours; understanding by their espials, of the coming of Hassan with this aid, had scattered themselves all along the said Streight, in hope there to assail the Turks, and holpen by the advantage of the Place, to drive them headlong into the deep Valley, and at once to bereave them both of their Goods and Life. But Hassan, careful of nothing more than how to avoid that danger, chose rather to make his Journey through the thick Woods, and so as he might to escape the ambush that the Enemy might lay for him upon that straight Passage. And so entering with his Army into the Wood, which he was to have left upon his left hand, to discover what might be plotted against him, he was hardly charged by the Enemy, and constrained to fight with a thousand windings and turnings in and out, through a thousand crooked Paths and doubtful Cranks, in a most confused muddle, with great laughter of his Men; who were accustomed to this kind of Fights, not acquainted with the situation of the place, were in the skirmish driven far, that down they fell, and being not able to recover themselves, were presently slain. And thus with much ado he at length passed the Streight of Tomanis. Hassan, deeming himself much disgraced by suffering his Enemies, in number so far inferior, to have done him so much harm, and so to have elevated his hands, and so farther, considering that in such Places, sleights and stratagems more avail than open Forces; burning with desire of revenge, would needs stay near unto those Streights, as if it had been to refresh his wearied Army, but indeed to try if the Perfians would adventure again to trouble him, or no: and appointed Refshan Bassa with certain Bands of the Soldiers of Grece, and of his own Adventurers, to lie in ambush within the covert of the Streight, attentive to every sign of the Enemy. Two days the Turks Army thus divided, and were now resolved the third day to remove thence towards Teflis; when as the Perfian Captains, Aluculi Chan and Simon, vainly imagining that this stay of the Turks was for fear of the Perfians, foolishly returned, and gave a fresh onset upon the flank of Hassan's Squadrons. Who forthwith raising all his Soldiers, and giving a sign to Refshan, with all speed compassed in his Enemies, and frightening them on both sides, took them all the alive, cut in pieces other some, and put all the rest to flight. Among others that were taken alive, was Aluculi Chan, the Perfian Captain, who over-rashly charging upon the face of Hassan, fell into his Hand. The next day following (being the eleventh day after Hassan's departure from Chari) he joyfully arrived at Teflis, where he found among the poor besieged Turks many Miseries; whereof some were already dead, and some yet sick, for they were so plagued with Famine, that they not only devoured their Horses, but even the very Skins of the same Horses, of Sheep, and of Dogs, and in such most miserable wants had passed the time; whom Hassan at his arrival comforted with Gifts and good Words, exhorting them to persist constant in the service of their King, whose Honour (as he said) was never more than there to be respected. And for as much as the Soldiers of the Fort did with one Voice request Hassan to appoint them a new Governour, because they did not like Mahamet Bassa, who the last year was left by the General in that Fort; Hassan removed the said Mahamet, and put Amet Bassa in his place: and so after he had filled up the places of the dead Soldiers with a new supply, and set all things in order, he took his leave, recommending the charge and custody of that Fort to their Trust and Valour. Hassan returning from Teflis, and being without any trouble come to the Streight of Tomanis, was advertised by his Scouts, That it was so strongly possessed by the Enemy, and so shut up with Artillery, as that it was not to be passed through: for Simon thinking (as indeed it fell out) that Hassan would return that way, had so belayed that Streight, as that the Turks could not without most assured loss pass the same: which thing much troubled the Bassa, and filled his head with many Concoits, how he might make his Journey some other way, and decline the danger prepared for him. Thus perplexed, and altogether doubtful what to do, which way to turn himself, Aluculi Chan the Perfian (who to purchase his Liberty could have been content to have done any thing) offered Hassan to fetch him a short and safe cut, whereby he might without danger pass with his Army out of that troublesome Country; yet covenanting before, that he should promise him to set him at Liberty for his good Service. Which his request the Bassa did not stick in large manner to promise, although he afterwards to his great dishonour performed not the same. So bending his Journey on the right hand, he was guided by Aluculi through strange and uncouth ways, out of those Woods and Dangers, not meeting with much as with one of his Enemies. But when the Perfian Duke well hoping for his Liberty, put the Turk in mind of his promise; he with deep and feigned sighs protested, That he was right sorry that he could not perform what he had promised to do for him, forasmuch as he lay not in his Power to let any man at Liberty, that was taken in Battle by the Soldiers of his great Lord and Sovereign: yet gave him his faith, that so far as his Intreaties and Favours with the General Mulapha could prevail, he would use all the most earnest means he could to procure his Liberty and return to his own Country.

Simon desirous the Georgian, perceiving that the Turks were removed, imagined forthwith that they had taken this new way: but being afterward certified by his faithful Spies, that it was so indeed, he ran all headlong, and as it were desperate, to meet with this so happy an Army. And all inflamed with rage for this great Fortune of the Turks, he fell upon the tail of the Turkish Host, which with unmeasurable Fury he wholly destroyed, leading away with him all the People, all the Horses, and all the Treasure of Mahamet Bassa which he brought from Teflis. And all the Treasure of Hassan Bassa likewise. As for Aluculi Chan, whom Simon most greedily sought for, he was sent way in the front of the Army, so that he was not to be rescued. Hassan holding on his way, came to Chari in the space of eight days after his departure from Teflis, and there presented unto Mulapha the General, the Perfian Captain Aluculi, recounting unto him the dangers he had endured, and whatsoever else had happened in that Expedition. Aluculi, the unfortunate Perfian, was by the commandment of Mulapha carried to Erzerum, and there in a castle committed to Prison. Not long after, Mulapha returned himself also to the said City of Erzerum, with his Army sore weakened and discontented; which was there presently by him discharged.

passage for his Forces into Georgia, sent Ulmahet his Admiral with a great Fleet into the Euxine Sea to Mengreba, called in ancient time Cholchis; who entering the famous River of Phasis (now Raffa) there fortified, and laid such a beginning, that it was now one of the Turks proud Begleitings, although those Cities were utterly destroyed, and the depaure of the Admiral, were for the present again by the Mengrelians demolished. And this was the end of the first of this year 1579.

Of all these Successes Mulapha afterwards sent Advancements to the Court to Amurath, recounting unto him the fortifying of Chari, the Defects of Hassan, as well for the favouring of Teflis, as for the taking of Aluculi the Perfian. And because the said General had the year before perished at Amurath, That the Country of Georgia, and the People thereof, were brought under his Obedience, to the end that he should not marvel at so many Losses and so many Barrels, and thereby doubt of some false Informations; he declared unto him, that all these Troubles were not raised by the natural and home-bred Georgians, but by two certain Captains, Aluculi and Simon, one of Perfia, who had made all these fits; of which one of them now remained with him in Prison, for him to determine of his Pleasure. With great Delight did the Turkish Emperour read all that Mulapha had written, and by two of his Gentlemen-Ulcers sent to Hassan a Battle-axe all gilt and set full of Stones, a Targuer of Gold and Pearl, and a rich Garment of Cloth of Gold, in reward of his good Service, for which he greatly commended him; and withall gave order, That Aluculi should be kept where he was in the Castle of Erzerum, in diligent and safe Custody. These Informations of the Turks much delighted the Perfian King in his Court at Cashin, considering, that now they had both thoroughly acquainted themselves with all the Passages into Georgia, (in the difficulty and roughness whereof consisted the chief defence of that Province) as also that divers of the Georgian Princes were more than inclining unto the Turks Service; so that he could not but justly fear, that his Enemies would in time begin to pierce into the noble Cities of Medea the greater, yes, and peradventure even unto Tauris before any of the rest. Which his care of foreign Invasion was doubled with domestic Feats; Marize Salmas, his chief Vicer, and upon whom he most relied, still filling his Head with a jealous Suspicion, That Abas Marize the Son (made Governour of Heri, by Tamas his Grandfather), was about in these Troubles with the Turk, to proclaim himself King of Perfia, to the great Ignominy of his Father, and Prejudice of Emir Hamze, his eldest Brother, and worthy and undoubted Heir of that Kingdom. This Marize Salmas (according to his longing desire) had married a Daughter of his to the said Emir Hamze, with the Consent of the King his Father; but yet not content with that Honour, ceased not continually with ambitious Devices, to seek out means how to bring to pass, that the Perfian Estate might wholly remain to his Son-in-law, undivided and intire from the Participation of his Brethren; and therefore little regarding the Perils that might happen from the Turks; and blinded with the desire of his own greatness, he went about to turn the King (being a man very credulous and inconsiderate) against Abas Marize; either to take him and commit him to Prison, or at least to deprive him of all Authority and Command. And the better to persuade the King thereto, he discovered unto him, how little Abas Marize the Son had respected him in divers Occasions; and that in these late Wars he had not so much as sent forth one man against the Turk, but had forbidden such as were of his Jurisdiction of Heri, to come to

Cashin, at such time as they were summoned both by Letters and Commandment, to have passed with Emir Hamze into Sirwan; by reason whereof not one of them would fit a foot, answering, That they were joyfully to do so by Abas Marize, their Lord; who had not only caused himself to be called King of Heri, but had given it out, that he meant to claim the Succession in the whole Kingdom. Their complaints much prevailed with the King, both in respect of the love he bare to Emir Hamze, his eldest Son, and also of the credit he gave to his Vicer; especially being accompanied with the crafty packing of the said Vicer; who as he was very cunning in such Practices of himself, so did he make them more effectual with the effeminate King, by the means of divers great Ladies, and other Devices that were to him very familiar and usual: Inomuch that the King, carried away with light belief, did continually bethink himself how to find Opportunity to repress the boldness of his disobedient Son; not forgetting for all that, to make such preparation against the Turks, as should be sufficient to stay their Passage to Tauris, if they had any purpose to do so. But leaving the Perfian King to his troublesome Cogitations for a while, let us again return unto the Turks General, the great Bassa Mulapha.

He now lying at Erzerum, after many troubles abroad, was surprized, and almost overwhelmed with unexpected Quarrels at home, many grievous Complaints being made of him to Amurath, whereby he was induced afterwards to take from him his Generalship, and to call him to the Court to give account of his Actions. Which seemed not to be done without cause, he having before raised the great Discontentment in the Mind of Amurath, by sending such a strong power to the Succours of Teflis; whereby he conjectured, that the Affairs of Georgia were not in such Security as Mulapha had already informed him they were, and also generally offended the Minds of the Soldiers of his Army, who all in an uproar, accused him of Impudence and Prodigality, for that now this second year he had with so much ado gathered together such a number of Soldiers, charge of their Lord, and yet performed nothing worthy the Glory of Amurath, or answerable to so great a charge. Which Complaints, although they were of some moment, yet would the Turkish Emperour, for the great Favours he bare unto him his antient Tutor, never have construed them so hardly against him, as for the same to have been induced to have deprived him of his place, if the inveterate envy of Simon Bassa had not mislaid strength and force to these hard Accusations, and set (as it were) an edge upon Amurath to do what he afterwards did.

This Simon was a most antient Enemy to Mulapha, and in all things thought himself his match. For if Mulapha had subdued Cyprus, he had conquered Tripolis, Gazetta, with the Kingdom of Tunes in Affricke; and if Mulapha were a man of great Courage, and reverend for his years, Simon would be his equal both in the one and the other; yes, and did much more to raise himself his better too; for that in the enterprize of Giannen in Arabia, he performed such an Exploit as Mulapha neither durst, nor yet knew how to put in Execution; so carrying away the Glory of that famous Conquest; for which ever after there was between them a continual heart-burning, one of them envying at the others Glory, and both in Word and Deed, as Occasions fell out, in all things opposing themselves against the other. At length happens this Opportunity, when taking the occasion of the Complaints of so many against Mulapha, caused a great number of them to frame their Supplications to Amurath, which he for his part did in most malignant manner enforce and exaggerate against his old Adversary, accusing him, that this second year he had most manifestly shewed himself to have gone unto the Wars, not as a worthy General, detestous of noble and honourable Enterprises, but as a man that would make merchandise of Blood, and of his Soldiers pay; employing the most liberal Provision of Corn and Money, not to the Rewards of well-deserving men, nor to the erecting of such Fabricks as were needful, and might have been built therewithall, but only to his own private gain, to so enrich himself with his Peoples losses, to the great hate of his Lord, and confounding of the publick Treasure; adding hereto, that if the things done by Mustapha were well searched, it would be found, that he had neglected many good Opportunities, attempted many things in vain, and not done any good either to the Emperour or his Soldiers, but only to himself; whom rather than they would follow again as their General, all his People in an uproar shewed themselves ready and willing to adventure themselves in any other far greater Labour than by their Lord and Sovereign should be commanded them.

These and such like Complaints, with the hard Opinion already conceived against him by Amurath, were the occasion why he resolved to put him from his place. Beside that, he thought it a thing dangerous to his fate, to suffer one and the self same General any long time to command over so great Armies; deeming it not so much for his Honour, still to employ one man, as to show that he had variety and choice of Subjects, worthy of so great a charge. And therefore, being desirous to find out the truth of that was reported to him concerning Mustapha, he sent the chief of his Gentlemen Porters, with fifteen others, to bring him to the Court, with his Chanceller and Treasurer, to shew the accounts of such Monies as he had received, and to give up an account of their whole Office. Unto this Messenger had Amurath delivered three divers Letters, which he should warily shew, as occasion served; one of them was to written of purpose, that Mustapha in the receiving thereof might by the same Messengers be strangled; in the second was the Emperours warrant for the doing of that was to them commanded; and in the third was contained, that Mustapha should forthwith send his Chanceller and Treasurer to the Court by those Messengers. Mustapha in the mean time by divers means, but especially by the guilt of his own Conscience, venting the Displeasure of the Emperour towards him, and suspecting (as the truth was) his Life to be by those Messengers sought after, at such time as the Captain-Porter came to his Camp, found many delays to put him off, and would not in any case be spoken withal. But when the Messenger would induce no longer deny, he was at length admitted to his presence, having a circle appointed for him, out of which he and his Companions might not stir or approach nearer unto him, the Bassa's Guard standing in Arms round about him. The Messenger perceiving the Bassa's wariness, willy pluck'd forth the three Letters, concerning the sending of his Chanceller and Treasurer to the Court. Then began the crafty old Bassa to find many excuses to have delayed the matter; but being hardly pressed by the Messenger and seeing no other Remedy, he with much difficulty delivered them both, covenerating before with the Messenger, to have both their Lives spared; who coming to the Constantinople, were forthwith clapt fast into the Tower called Yadenla, as there to have been severally examined of all the doings of the Bassa. But Mustapha, after long delay, coming at length to Constantinople, the ninth of April in the Spring following, and using the mighty and potent mediation of divers great Ladies, and other his gracious Friends in Court, prevailed so much in that corrupt Government, as that he was again at length received into the Favour of Amurath, without any further proceeding against him, his Chanceller, or Treasurer, who by his means were afterwards also enlarged and set at liberty; yet was he never after admitted to those Honours, which he perswaded himself were of right due unto him; for his good and faithful service of long time done to the Ottoman Emperours.

In this time that Mustapha was General at Erzerum, Mahomet the Vifier Bassa was victoriously slain at Constantinople; after whom, shortly died also Achmet Bassa, who succeeded in his place; so that the said sovereign Dignity, in Honour next unto the Turkish Emperour, was by rightful Succession due to Mustapha, the next Bassa; but that he was not thought worthy of it by him that might, and of right ought to have gratified him therewith, as shall be a little hereafter declared, when we have briefly set down the sudden and strange death of the said Mahomet the Vifier, worthy in all Histories to be registered, as a mirror for all such as administer Justice in so great place, to look upon.

This Bassa, a man of as great Fame as ever was any that had Government in the Ottoman Empire, in the time that he all commanded, had for some light causes deprived a certain Souldier of Constantinople of his yearly Pension, which, with many Labours and Dangers he had gotten to maintain himself; which Pension the said Souldier upon another Souldier, so that the other poor Soul remained in Misery, altogether unprovided for. Unto which miserable estate seeing himself now brought, and not guilty so himself of any Fault worthy to great Punishment, he determined with himself, to revenge the Injury with the Blood of that great Bassa, and to bereave him of Life, that had bereft him of Living; which, because he could not by any fit means put in Execution (by reason of the Guard of Slaves that kept the Person of the Vifier, so that no man can come near him that holdeth that high place) except he could by some means acquaint himself in the Vifiers Houle, and so insinuate himself into his acquaintance; he resolved to take upon him the rude habit of those religious, which the Turks call Derwishes, and after their manner to present himself every Morning before the Vifier, to ask his Alms, and so to hide, counterfeiting withall, a certain kind of folly and lightness of Mind, as do those Derwishes, to make the People believe, that they concern all worldly things, as men ravished only with heavenly Cogitations; which yet was by some that knew him, thought to have happened in him, through the Grief he had conceived for the loss of his Pension. Mahomet not only the first time, but also at all other times that this counterfeited Hypocrite came before him, caused him to be sported with by his Alms, and as it were with a kind of private threat, saying him every Morning to come unto him into the Divans, and there, together with others appointed for the same purpose, to say his devout Prayers, and in singing Praises to their wicked Prophet, to intreat God for his Salvation; for it is a custom of all the Noble-men; that at ordinary hours of Prayers, all their Priests assemble themselves in the Divan, which is made ready for them; and there all together the infidel Wretches do with their unclean Mouths mumble up their blasphemous Prayers, or rather most abominable Blasphemies. By this means did this dissembling Companion so insinuate himself into the Vifiers Acquaintance, that that the counterfeited fool went in and out of the Divans at his Pleasure, no man gain-saying either his going in or coming out, but daily sat in the Presence of the Vifier, and so having laid his Prayers, and taken his Alms, with all Reverence quickly departed. At last, when the crafty Hypocrite thought that the time was come wherein he might most fully execute his purpose, having utterly resolved with himself to die, so that he might satisfie the Desire he had of Revenge, he long covertly fostered in his Heart; having conveyed a very sharp Dagger secretly into one of his Sleeves, he went according to his Custom, to require his Alms, with an assured Resolution (when he had laid his Prayers, and reached out his hands to receive his wonted Alms) speedily to charge upon the Vifier, and with the Dagger to strike him to the Heart. According to the accustomed manner was the counterfeited Hypocrite (for who would ever have suspected so long and so traitorous a designment) admitted into the Divans, where Mahomet the Vifier sat in his Houle, to give publick audience, and after the usual manner, before any of the ficers that attended for answers and dispatch of their business suspected any such deceit, he was admitted near to the Vifier, and sitting right against him, according to his old wont, poured out those vain Devotions which those hypocritical Barbarians use to mumble up in their Prayers; which being finished, whilst the Vifier simply reacheth unto him his wonted Alms, the traitorous Villain in receiving it, suddenly drew out his Dagger, and once or twice stabbed it into the Vifiers Breast, out of which so deadly Wounds gushed out his Blood and Life together. Whereupon the flanders by astonishment with the strangeness of the Act, ran in, but to the old hoary Vifier lay all soiled in his own Blood, deadly pale, and breathing forth his last gasp. The malicious murderer they presently laid hands upon, and bound him fast; but the Rumor of the strange fact did by and by sic unto the Emperours Ears, who, suspecting that some of the other great Bassas, desiring to mount into that high Dignity, had provoked the Traitor to do this detestable Act, would needs understand of the traitorous Murderer, what occasion had moved him so traitorously to kill his Vifier. Who resolutely answered him, That he did it to deliver the City of Constantinople from the Tyranny of him, by whom he was undervaluedly deprived of his Pension. But when he could get no other answer of him, he delivered him into the hands of the Slaves of the dead Vifier, who with most exquisite Torments put him to death.

Mustapha thus dead, after him succeeded Achmet the next Bassa, who (as is before said) shortly after died also, so that it was now Mustapha's coultie to succeed in that chief room, for that he was the third in the order of the Bassas. But when he had used all the means that he possibly could, to have obtained that so honourable a place by order due unto him; yet could he not find so much grace in the sight of Amurath, his great Lord, as to have it granted him under Seal, although in effect he made him fit as Vifier, and all matters of State were brought unto him at chief Vifier; but in his stead the Seal was sent to Sinan Bassa, who was now made General for the Persian Wars. Which disgrace not a little discontented Mustapha, fearing lest some other fatal accident should in short time light upon him.

After that Mustapha was thus displaced from his Generallship, Amurath nominated Sinan Bassa to be General in his stead, for this Expedition against the Persians; and for the Preservation of Chahar and Tebis; giving him sovereign Authority to command, and to set in order all such Preparations as he should think necessary for such Enterprises as he should think good to attempt in his first year; who although by reason of his great favour, he grew haughty and Glorious, yet did he not forego to discourse thoroughly with himself upon all his Delinquencies; and namely, beside the uncovering of Tebis, he determined to build a Fort at Manatis, to assure the Passage thither from Chars; and withall to attempt all the means he could to induce the Persian King to send Ambassadors for Peace, with such Conditions as should be acceptable to Amurath. With these and such like Discourses did he busie himself whilst he was yet making preparation to set forwards towards Erzerum.

Of all these changes and alterations was the Persian King advertised, as also that this new Turkish General Sinan was careful how this long War might by some means be appeased, and a good Peace concluded. Upon which occasion, and by the Persuasion of Louent Ogh, the Georgian, and of Mirza Salmas the Vifier, he was induced to send Ambassadors to Constantinople, to demand Peace of Amurath. Upon which Relation he dispatched Masni Chan (of some called Masdes) his Ambassador, with direction that he should go to Sindus, and of him to receive Guides to conduct him to Constantinople with Letters to Amurath, and as much as lay in him to labour for the pacifying of these troubles; and in any case to conclude upon it, so that he would be content with Chars and Tebis. With these Instructions the Ambassador departed, and at length arrived at Chars, and so came to Erzerum, and was from thence conducted towards Amasia. But when he came to Sivas, he found Sinan the General there encamped, gathering together his Army for the Execution of his Delinquencies: for Sinan upon the arrival of Mustapha, departing from Constantinople the five and twentieth day of April, was not content with his own. Of the coming of this Ambassador, the Turks received great Joy, and News thereof was in post sent by Cicala Bassa to the Court. The Persian Ambassador informed Sinan of all that he had to treat with Amurath on the behalf of King Mahomet; and laboured earnestly to perswade him of the Equity of the Cause, and of his Request; declaring unto him, That so far as both the Nations were conjoynd under the Law of Mahomet their common Prophet (though there seemed some small difference not worth those troubles) it were a very inconvenient thing for them to contend among themselves, and to seek the overthrow or utter destruction of one another; and that therefore he was in good hope to obtain of Amurath this desired Peace, if he had no other cause where-with he found himself aggrieved, as in truth he had not. Wherefore he besought the General, that he would with safe Convey conduct him to Amurath, to the end that, if it were possible, these bloody Wars might take end; as at the very report whereof, the rest of the World rejoiced, and stood attentively waiting to see what would be the issue thereof.

This Ambassador Sinan entertained after the best manner the rudeness of his Nature would afford; and thinking that the very fame of his Valour had wrought in the Minds of his Enemies this Resolution, to come to demand Peace, granted unto the Ambassador a safe Convey to conduct him to Constantinople; and wrote to Amurath in his Letters, all that he thought was fit to be demanded, representing unto him what great and important matters (he hoped) might now be obtained. But before he dismissed the said Ambassador, he advised him not to go to Amurath, without Resolution to offer unto him some great good Conditions, and to yield unto him all that Country which he by force force of Arms had before conquered: for he knew the mind of Amurath very well, that he was resolved in himself, not to yield so much as one hands breadth of the Ground which he had won with the Sword. Which motion of the proud Baffa so troubled the Ambassador, that fearing he should not be able to conclude any thing, he stood in doubt, whether to proceed on his Journey to Constantinople, or to return back again into Perfia; but considering better what belonged to his Duty in so weighty a business, and hoping to receive more reasonable Conditions from the mouth of Amurath himself, he gave large words to Sinan, and so with a safe Convey departed from Sivas: and by long Journeys came to Senari, and to passing over that little fair, the fourth of August arrived at Constantinople.

The Persian King in the mean time, stirred up with the report of the Turks Preparations, to cause it to be noised, that he likewise intended some important matters, commanded all the Chans and Governours of his Kingdom, to meet together with all their Forces at Tauris, where he himself, with the Prince Emir Hamse his Son, met them. And after many Consultations there had for the repelling of the Turkish Invasion (for as yet it was not certainly known what Sinan meant to attempt) he resolved to send Souldiers into Georgia towards Teflis, whether of necessity Succours must be sent by the Turks to them of the Fort; and withal, determined also to go himself with all his Army from Tauris to Caracach, a place very commodious and near, to guard both Tauris and Sivas, being situate even in the middle between the one and the other; and there to expect the removing of Sinan, whose ambitious Nature the King knowing, doubted that he, to surmount Mutapha, would attempt some great Enterprize; yea peradventure, to run even upon Tauris. But when it came to the point that he should send some of his Captains into Georgia, he made choice of such as had best experience of those Countries, and were nearest unto him; with whom he sent Tacmas also, and the rest, whose Service he had before used against the Turks: commanding them to join their Forces with Sinan the Georgian, and by all means possible to annoy the Enemy; whom if they should perceive to bend for Tauris, they should not fail to follow him; to the end they might join together with him, and to encounter the Enemies Army. All those Captains were resolute men, and led with ten thousand Souldiers, which being joyned with them of Georgia, amounted to the number of thirteen thousand: who, arriving at Genge, gave knowledge to Sinan of their coming, and that in his behalf they were ready to do great Matters.

Now was the Persian Ambassador with all due honour received at Constantinople, where he was honourably entertained by the great Baffas of the Court, but especially by Mutapha, who within two days after, suddenly died; of a fatal taken of eating too much of Meats and Mummings, and immoderate drinking of Zerbet, (a kind of pleasant drink which the Turks use, made of Water and Sugar;) but most men thought him to have poisoned himself, as fearing the former indignation of Amurath to be again inflamed by the new complaints of the Persian Ambassador against him, for that he in the time of his Generalship, had dishonourably suppressed certain Ambassadors sent from the Persian King; which he now fearing to be called in question, for the former storms as yet scarce well appeared, made himself now away. After his death it was commonly reported, that if he had longer lived, he should have been undoubtedly strangled; which to prevent, he became the worthy Executioner of himself, that had most unjustly caused others to be most shamefully murdered. Which was the more like to be true, and the rather believed, for that the infinite Wealth he had of long time, (craped together, was immediately after his Death taken into the Kings Treasuries, some small portion thereof being left unto his Nephews; a most certain token of Amurath's Indignation against him. The Persian Ambassador having audience the twentieth of August, with many lively Reactions and much Eloquence, perswaded the Turkish Emperor to desist from the War begun, as contrary to the Will and Pleasure of their common Prophet Mahomet; as also to the Peace, which was so royally, and with so many Capitulations, not long before concluded between Tamas and Solyman his Grandfather; and was not to have been broken, and Wars raised, but upon some great Quarrel or Injury done; which the Persians had not at any time offered, but had always wished unto him all Happiness, as they had manifestly declared, by sending unto him an Embassy to that purpose by Sultan Tacmas; whereby he might plainly perceive the good mind and zeal the Persian King had for the maintenance of the Peace. And although in the short reign of Imabel, there was some Rumor raised, that he meant to go unto Babylonia, and some such like News; yet that was but a youthful part, and an effect of that heat which is commonly proper to such as being kept long in Strait Prison, cannot use their Liberty with Moderation, and had therefore received due Punishment for it, by sudden and unexpected death. But as for the King that now is, he did above all others, embrace amity with his Majesty, and therefore did most earnestly desire, that it would please him to temper his Anger conceived, which had incensed him to take up Arms against a King so much his Friend; being of the same Religion and better affected towards him than all the rest of the Nations in the World.

This Ambassador the Turkish Emperor distinctly without any Resolution at all, but only gave order, that whatsoever he had to say touching this Peace, he should communicate it with his Viceroy. Many were the Discourses which happened, for that the Turk required all those Cities and Countries, which till that time he had conquered with the Sword, or (as their proud manner of Phrase is) whereon his Generals Hoofs had trod, to be yielded again unto him; and the Ambassador on the other side, had no warrant from his King to yield any more than that part of Georgia, which is on this side the River of Araxis. Whereupon the said Ambassador began to fear, lest he should be suspected for a Spy, and so be evil intreated: whereupon he did find himself too manifestly charged by the hard speech that the Viceroy used towards him. Being thus doubtful whereupon to resolve, perceiving himself straitened to the grant of these demands, and receiving also some threatening withal, he determined with himself to enlarge his Speeches with the Viceroy in divers and sundry particularities, and to give him good hope that he should be able to perswade with his King, the yielding up of so much as Amurath had and did demand. Hereupon was Masut Chan the Ambassador in friendly manner and without any outrage sent from Constantinople to Chars, and Communion given to Sinan (then at Chars) that without delay, and with all speed he should cause the Ambassador to be conducted to Van, and from thence into Perfia, wherefore he did desire, all which was faithfully performed.

But to return again to Sinan the General, who from Sivas had sent the said Ambassador to Constantinople (as is before declared;) and being departed parted thence, arrived at Erzerum, where he took a Survey of his Army, and called a Provision necessary for this Expedition; and so from thence was now come to Chars, from whence he dispatched the Persian Ambassador, much discontented that no other Conclusion for Peace could be wrought.

Masut Chan at last arriving at the Persian Court, reported unto the King all that had happened in this Ambassage; the sum whereof was, That Amurath would not condescend to any condition of Peace, unless the whole Country of Siran might be yielded unto him, for that he had once (as he said) conquered the same. Neither did the same Ambassador forbear to tell the King the Suspicion Amurath had conceived of him, to have been a Spy rather than an Ambassador; and of the large Promises he was fain to make to the Turk, to avoid the manifest danger of Imprisonment, or Death: all which for all that, now lay in his Majesties Power to perform or not. The King for the present remained well satisfied with that Masut had done, and in reward of his great travel and expenses, gave him the charge of the Chamber at Tauris, naming him the Chamberlain of that rich and great City. Of which new Office (though very honourable, and of great importance) he took small Pleasure, for that one Emir Chan, his ancient Enemy, was chief Governour of that City, from whom he feared some dangerous treachery; wherefore he appointed his Deputy for the Execution of the Office, and withdrew himself from Tauris to Cassagatch, a place of his own, there to pass away the time, for that he thought the King otherwise to dispose of him. But Emir Chan, who still nourished in his mind the ancient hatred he had conceived against him, took this as a most fit occasion to bring him into disgrace with the King; certifying him, That Masut, not contented with the great preferment it had pleased him to bestow upon him, had in contempt of his rewards abandoned Tauris, and substituted in his place a most base Person to represent the King's Majesty, and to manage his Treasures: and that he absented himself far from that City and the Court there, having withdrawn himself into the Confinnes of Turkie, no doubt for some mischievous intent, either to yield himself unto them, or else to have Intelligence with them, and was like enough to be guilty to himself of the great Error he had already committed, by offering Siran unto the Turkish King; and making promise of so large Conditions, whereby he had obtained such a sure and safe Convey to conduct him; when as he had before discovered himself to be a Favourite of the Turks, and a Traitor to his own King: and that therefore it were good to make trial of his Inclination, and to peradventure to decline some great Mischief, tending to the danger of the Persian State. This malicious Accusation slyly contrived, wrought in the mind of the suspicious King, that he commanded Emir Chan secretly to apprehend Masut, and to bring him to the Court, and if he could not by other means; then by torture to wrest from him the truth of all those matters. Glad was Emir to have his Enemy thus put into his hands; and thought it long until he had brought this shame upon Masut: who having already heard some indrawing thereof, resolved with himself to do any thing, rather than to fall into the Power of his hateful Enemy. And therefore at such time as fifteen tall fellows were for that purpose sent unto him from Amurath, who in the King's name summoned him to the Court; he, without making any new that he took the matter otherwise than well, entertained them courteously, and made them great cheer; but when he perceived them to be overcome with sleep, which crept upon them by reason of the excess wherewith they had overcharged themselves; he caused them to be straitly bound, and with long Cords hanged them down into a deep Well, and there but them up secretly covered. Then gathering together the most precious things he had in his House, and leaving his Wives, his Children, his Brethren, and Nephews on Horse-back, fled with all his Family in the Evening, and the next day arrived at Salmas, and was there friendly entertained by the Turkish Baffa, and from thence conveyed to Van, where he was courteously welcomed by Cleali Baffa, and honourably accompanied, sent to Sinan the General, who very glad of his coming, sent him with all diligence to Constantinople, to Amurath. And this was in effect the end of the first enterprize of Peace betwixt the Persians and the Turks.

Sinan remained at Chars eight days, and there again surveyed his Army and Provision; and afterwards set forward towards Tomani, with Resolution there to build a Fort. But being come thither, he could by no means put that his Designment in Execution, by reason of the immoderate Rain, which continually, as the space of eight days fell in such abundance, as that neither of the Sun appear, or the Sky clear. Befide that, Sinan greatly feared lest the Enemy, taking the Opportunity of this Rain, of the Strait, and of the Building, should assault his Army, and finding it in evil plight, and out of order, greatly endanger it; wherefore, calling off his former Determination for fortifying at Tomani, he removed thence to carry Succours to Teflis. But as soon as he was risen with his Army, and sent the Straght, Tal-Ogli, Captain of the Janizaries of Damascus, and Homar, Samsack of Saffet, having received secret intelligence, that hard by, a little out of the way, was good store both of Corn and Cattel; resolved with themselves to go thither to fetch in that booty; and so with two thousand Souldiers, greedy of Prey, they set forward. Now Sinan the Georgian, and the Persians, following the Turks Army a far off, had divided his Souldiers into all such places as where there was either Corn or Water, or any such thing as might allure the Turks to fetch themselves from the Camp; and perceiving these hungry Turks carefully to run head-long to lay hold on this desired booty, he suddenly fell upon them, and cut them in pieces, being disordered; so that of those two thousand elapsed but Tal-Ogli the Captain of the Janizaries only, Homar the Samsack, and all the rest being left dead upon the Ground.

Sinan holding on his way, in two days came to Teflis; where presently he called a Council of all the chief men of his Army; taking order, That every man upon his Oath, should depose the truth touching the greatness of Teflis; which he did, only in reproach of Mutapha the great Baffa; who most untruly had informed Amurath, That it was as great and populous as Damascus, whereas in truth it was not in any respect to be compared unto that so famous a City. After that, he divided the Treasure and Succours he had brought, among the Souldiers of the Forts, cheering them up with good Words, and promises of great Matters. And because the Souldiers there in Garrison complained greatly against the Baffa their Captain, he caused a Bill of complaint to be framed against him, and finding him guilty, that he had converted the Souldiers pay to his own use, he condemned him to the Restoration thereof; and so immediately discharging him of his Office, placed in his room Gusli Bey, a Lord of Georgia, who for the ancient Enmity betwixt him and Sinan, had yielded that himself to the Turks, and was of them so welcomed, that Sinan trusted him with the Custody of that Fort, which with so many dangers had been maintained and defended till that day.

All things thus set in order at Teffis, Sinan with his Army departed thence, and having again passed the Streight of Tomanis, there came unto him
Mustaffa Bassa (afterward Governour of Aleppo) declaring unto him, That not far off was great store of Corn and Cattel, and no body but only a few Georgians to keep the same; and therefore willed him to fend forth some to fetch it in, whereof, though it had been much more, his Army then stood in great need. Sinan was well affected unto this Mustaffa, and therefore the easier induced by him to fend for the aforesaid booty;
but moved with the fresh remembrance of that which had happened to Tal-Ogli and Honar, he gave order, That to fetch in this Corn and Cattel there should go 10000 Horse-men and their Servants, among whom was also the same Mus-taffa as their General. Now flood Tococmae, Sinan, and the other Persian Captains in secret ambush, waiting when any of the Turks should come to fetch in this booty. Whereupon the aforesaid Soldiers being now come, as they desired, and having almost charged all their Mules and Horses with that which best pleased them to make choice of; the hidden Persians all on a sudden issued out of their lurking places among them, and with great slaughter put them to flight, and with such fury pursued the Victory, that they flew of them 7000, carried away many Prisoners alive, and the Mules and Horses laden with the stolne booty.
Mustaffa was the first that fled, and the first that brought the unhappy News of that overthrow to Sinan; which was forthwith confirmed by the report of such as had by speedy flight escaped the Fury of the Enemy. Wherewith Sinan was moved to the Battle of Caramania with a great Power, charging him whosoever he should find the Enemy, to let upon him; and presently rising himself with his whole Camp, followed the said Bas-sa: but all too late, for the Persians, after the aforesaid Victory, without slaying, had withdrawn themselves into their strong Places, known only to such as were well acquainted with the difficult Passages of Georgia: and having there disposed of their Prey, were now returning to wait some convenient occasion of new war, when they defeated the whole Army of the Turks upon the rising of a certain Hill, they were afraid to meet them, yea and stood in some doubt also, lest Sinan should descend from the Hill, and so assault them; for which cause they retired themselves again into the strength of the Mountains; yet not with such speed but that the Turks overtook some few of them, and slew about fifty or threecore of them, whose Heads, in sign of Triumph, they carried a good part of the way upon the points of their Spears; and took Prisoners about threecore and ten more.

At last Sinan with all his Army having passed these dangerous Places of Georgia, arrived at Trisla, where it was told him, That the Persian King in Person, himself being already departed from Tauris, with an exceeding great Army was coming to bid him Battle. At which News he caused Proclamation to be presently made thorough all his Army, That every man should put himself in readiness for the Voyage to Tauris, whither he himself meant to go to meet with the King his Enemy. In the mean time (as is reported) he dispatched certain Posts to the Persian King, then at Caracabach, to intreat him to fend another Ambassador to Amurath for Peace, thinking by that means (as some do conjecture) to remove the King from the Resolution of committing to assail him, if he had any such meaning. After this Proclamation made, he defended into the open and large Plain of Chielder; where presently he mustered his whole Army, and gave it out, That before he would set forth toward Tauris, he would make trial of the readines and nimbleness of his Soldiers, in such sort as if they should presently joyn battel with the Enemy; which, without further delay, he put in Execution the next Morning, formally ranging his whole Army in order of Battel, and then sending out some few others to shew themselves upon the top of certain Hills, as if they had been Enemies that came to seize upon his Army; he caused all his Artillery to be discharged, and commanded every man to skit-mish and bestir himself altogether after the same manner as if the Enemy had been there present before them: where the thundring of the great and small shot, the thick storms of Arrows, with the brightness of the Armor and Weapons, yielding forth lightnings as if it had been fiery beams, and the noise of Drums and Trumpets, and other Instruments of War, with the Ensignes of blue and yellow flying in the Wind, made such a medley of all things, as if it had been the turmoil of a very battel indeed. In the end he caused the retreat to be sounded, and then setting all his Army in order again, made the like shew the second time, and so the third time also; which was indeed performed with the great force and defension of his Soldiers, who deemed it rather Childrens play, than any commendation to the proud Basa. These counterfeit shews of War thus finished, yet did he not set forth toward Tauris, as he had given it out, but loitered eight days in those Plains of Chielder. At which time there arrived out of Persia one Alder the Aga, as an Ambassador from the King, who was by Sinan with great Joy entertained. Wherewith were the things by this Ambassador proposed, such as had Messia Chah offered; but the conclusion of all was, that the Persian King would be content voluntarily to relinquish Chars and Tef-fis, and so remain as he did before, in Amity with Amurath; and so desired Sinan to conclude a peace with his Master, if it might be; as for himself, this Message done, he was precisely to return into Persia. For this Peace Sinan promised to deal with Amurath, so that the Persian King would fend another Ambassador to Constantinople. Upon which Conclusion the said Alder retired into his Land, at Tauris declared to the King what he had seen, what Promises he had received of Sinan, and with-all, exhorted him to fend a new Ambassador unto the Turkish Court. After this, when the publick Rumor of the coming of the Persian King was found to be false, Sinan, instead of going to Tauris, returned to Chars, where he idly stayed a whole Month, to the general marvelling and murmuring of all his Army, accustomed to see themselves (to the great charge of their King) and the disturbance of his whole Kingdom) brought forth not for any honourable Conquest, but as it was only of purpose to make a vain show of War.

At last he departed from Chars, for that now Winter was come on, and the Frosts and Snows did his Army great harm; and so coming to Erzerum, there presently dismissed every man to go and winter in his own Country; but remained still himself in the same City. From whence he by speedy Posts diligently advertised Amurath of the Succours he had left at Teffis, of the losses he had received from the Enemy, of all that which was by Musapha misreported, of the coming of the Persian Ambassador to him, of the Promises made unto him touching a new Ambassador, and to be short, of all his whole Actions. Besides all this, he advertised Amurath, That the Enterprize of Persia

was a very hard, long, and difficult matter, and such a one as needed another manner of Preparation than had been as yet appointed for it; and that if he desired to subdue Persia, it was then very necessary that he should speak with him at large, and discourse upon many particulars, which could not so well without exceeding tediousness be declared by writing. After that, he sent other Messengers also, to follicite Amurath for his return to Constantinople; continually telling him, That it was not possible to signify by Writing, what he purposed to report to him by word of mouth, for the better accomplishing of the enterprize begun.
Nothing in the World did Sinan abhor more than this War, having his mind altogether bent against the Affairs of the Christians in Europe, and therefore fought by all means possible for the diverting of those Wars from the East, into some other quarters. At last he wrought so much, he intreated so much, he writ so many Letters, and follicited the matter so earnestly, that Amurath was persuaded to fend for him to Constantinople, as soon as ever he was certified of the arrival of the new Ambassador from Persia, of whom Sinan had before advertised him. For he was resolved either to grow to a peace with the said Ambassador, if he came with honourable Conditions; or if he came not, or, that after his coming they could not agree upon the Peace, then to put in Execution those his Conceits, wherof he must needs be particular talk with Sinan by word of Mouth. At length the promised Ambassador, called Ebram Chah, a Man of great eloquence, and highly honoured in Persia, came to Sinan; wherof Sinan gave present Intelligence to Amurath, beseeching him again to permit him to come to Constantinople.
Which his request Amurath then granted. Whereupon Sinan forthwith returned to the Court, where he attended the universal Government of the whole Empire. At his first coming to the presence of Amurath, wherein he discoursed with him of any thing, but of the coming of the Persian Ambassador) the conditions were set down which they were to require for the reducing of the Captulations of this Peace to a good end. After which agreement, the Ambassador being now come, and most magnificently received in Constantinople, had audience. At which time he with much glorious Speech laboured to persuade Amu-rath, That his King had a most ardent desire to be reconciled unto him, as to joyn his Forces with his, against the Enemies of the Mahometan Religion; and that for that purpose he was now especially come thither: which his good purpose, if it were answered with like zeal on his part, there would thereof ensue the greatest Unity and Friendship that ever was between any Mahometan Princes. Whereunto Amurath gave him no other answer, but that he should thereof talk with his Vizier, and with him intreat of all matters concerning the Peace; and so he went by Amurath entertained and dismissed both at one time.

Amurath,
circumsisteth his
Mahomet.

Now had Amurath called to Constantinople his eldest Son Mahomet, (who afterward succeeded him in the Empire) being then about sixteen years old, to circumsise him, according to the Custom of the Turks; following therein the invete-rated Law of the Hebrews. Unto which Solemnity many Christian Princes were solemnly invited; who accordingly sent thither their Ambassadors with great Gifts and Presents, in token of Peace and Confederacy; namely, Rodolphus the Emperour, Henry the III. the French King, Stephen King of Polonia, the State of Venice, the King of Persia, the Moor Kings of Morocco and Fex, the Princes of Moldavia, Valachia, and others. With all Triumph and Joy was the Circumcision of this young Prince solemnized by the space of forty days and forty nights, in the great market Place of Constantinople; where all the Ambassadors aforesaid with their Staffs prepared and furnished according to their Degrees and States, and received rich entertainment as might be shewed at such a kind of barbarous Spectacle: only the Persian Ambassador, who had all his Scaffold ferial to himself, but not regarded as the rest, rejoiced not at their Feasts and Triumphs: for among sundry other wrongs and scorn done by the Commandment of Amu-rath unto the Persian Nation, (as by hanging up certain counterfeit Pictures of Persians made of laths and sticks, and then burning them, and in many the scornful forts shewing them) the Turk, for the great displeasure he had conceived for the harm done to Osman Bassa and the Turks in Sinan much about that time, and for the disdain he had taken against Ebram Chah (as one not condescending to the conditions of Peace which he expected, nor yielding to any more than the other Ambassador had done before, seemed to have come as a Spie to mock the Turkish Affairs, or to mock Amurath, rather than to put in execution any good matter to pacify the Minds of the two mighty Princes) commanded the standing, before appointed for him, in disgrace of him to be flung down, and himself and all his followers to be clad up as clove Prisoners in the house of Mahamet Bassa at Constantinople; where he was so faithfully kept, that though an hundred of his followers there died of the Plague, which shortly after began to wax hot in the City, yet could he not obtain so much favour as to be removed into some other place, but there was inforced to tarry it out, until that afterward order was taken, he should be carried thence as Prisoner to Erzerum. To end these Solemnities, Mahomet

the young Prince was circumcised, not publicly, but in his Fathers Chamber, by Mechmet one of the inferior Bassas, sometime the Emperour Solymans Barber.

Now whilst Sinan as great Vizier, sat commanding in Constantinople the Garrisons of Chars and Tef-fis (kept in by the Enemy, and having received none other relief than a little which Sinan before his departure from Erzerum had by good hap caused to be secretly conveyed unto them) were thought to be driven to great wants. Which thing Sinan right well knew, and fearing lest those two places, which had with so much ado been both gained and maintained, should for want of new Succours fall again into the hand of the Enemy; he both boldly and freely counselled Amurath to send a new Garrison to Van, for the safety of the Country thereabouts, and then, under the Conduct of some valiant Captain, to fend Succours to Teffis: upon which point Amurath asked Sinan his Opinion, and willed him to bethink himself of some fit man. Hereupon, Sinan propounded divers unto him, but none of them pleased him for why, he was before resolved, in the sight of Sinan, and of his Council, to bestow this charge upon Maha-met Bassa, Nephew to Musapha the late Basa, and for his sake lately to Sinan. This Basa Mahomet he sent to Erzerum, with the Title of the Basa of that Province; honouring him withall with the name of General of the Army for Teffis. And presently gave commandment to Hassan the Basa of Caracem, to Musapha, sometime called Mannuchiar the Georgian, to all the Saravacks, the Curd, and the Souldiers of Erzerum, that they should resort to the standard of Mahomet their General, and so to follow him to Teffis. Whereupon there assembled together out of all the said places about five and twenty thousand Soldiery, with all things necessary for the relief of the distressed Garrison which was in Teffis. Commandment was also given to the Bassas of Aleppo and Maras, to repair to Van with all their Soldiers, and there to abide till Winter; which they accordingly did, not molested nor troubled by any Enemy.

In the end of August, Mahamet Bassa departed from Erzerum, with the Bassa of Caracem, and all his Army, carrying with him Money, Corn, and all other things needfull for the relief of Teflis, and in eight days came to Chars, and from thence to Archelae, not troubled by any. At Archelae he found Mustapha (otherwise called Manuchian) the Georgian, with all his Soldiers, whom the General most joyfully entertained, and honoured him with Gifts, and withall admonished him to continue in his Obedience to Amurath, and to conduct him with his Army the shortest and safest way to Teflis; for that some were of Opinion, that it were best to go by Tomanis; and some other, by the way of Mustapha his Country: wherein Mustapha did readily resolve him, that the easiest and shortest way lay through his own Country, being also in his Opinion the safest. This counsel of Mustapha pleased Mahamet greatly, so that he made choice of him to be the guide of his Army, reposing himself wholly upon his good direction; and so departed thence toward Teflis, passing through Alunchala and Carachala, both belonging to the said Georgian, abounding with all things necessary for the sustenance of man, neither were they ever disturbed by any Enemy. Having passed Mustapha's Country, they came to a friendly Castle called Gori, from whence they discovered in certain fields a great Army of the Georgians mingled with Persians, but appareled after the manner of Georgia; these were those Captains of Persia, sent from the Persian King (as in other years before) to aid the Georgian King; who secretly conjointed with Simon Chan the Georgian, had changed their Apparel, because the treaty of Peace should not be disturbed, and their King accounted unjust of his Word; who under a colour of a treaty of Peace, whilst Amurath attended nothing else but to secure and defend his conquered Countries, without purpose to annoy any other places, went about to procure the destruction of the Turks. These then, as soon as they saw the Turkish Army, and perceived that they also themselves were by them defied, sent Heraulds unto them with haughty words of defiance, and to offer them battle. With great Grief of Mind did the Bassa receive this proud defiance; but having no other purpose but only to bring his Successors safe to Teflis, he dismissed the Heraulds, and studied by all means he could to turn Back. That Evening he was favoured in his purpose by the great and continual Rain which then fell, and served for a reasonable excuse of his delay: but the next day proving fair, and the Sun shining bright, both the Armies marched in fight the one of the other all day, until about four hours and an half before night, at which time the Turks arrived near to a River that separated the one Army from the other. There the Bassa fell in Consultation with Mustapha, whether they should pass over the River before Night, or stay on that side they were until the next Morning: In which case Mustapha advised him to stay, as fearing lest the Enemy should set upon the Army, disordered in passing the River, and to annoy them. Notwithstanding the General disliked this Advice of Mustapha, having taken a strong conceit, even upon the first discovery of the Enemy, that there was some intelligence and compact between Mustapha and the Persians, and that to that end he had maliciously persuaded him to come that way, and not by the way of Tomanis; and therefore the Bassa thought, that if there were any such Plot laid between Mustapha and the Enemy, to let it in some confusion, would not in any case follow the Council of the misguided Georgian, to stay that Night; but commanded, that with the greatest speed that might be, all his Soldiers with their Treasure and Corn should pass over the River, to the end, that before Night, he might on the other side of the River incamp his Army in some good place, to the scorn and derision of his Enemies. Mahamet his Lieutenant, a bold young man, and an hardy, was the first that ventured over, and after him the Carriages of Money, and of Corn, and then the whole Multitude were drowned in the passage, being rather trodden down with the Horses and Camels, than brought to their deaths either by the depth of the Channel, or swiftness of the River.

As soon as the Georgians perceived that the Turks had passed the River, without staying until they might settle themselves in any good order, they in great haste and fury ran upon them, and presently assailed them, whilst they were yet all in confusion and out of order; by reason whereof the Turks, although they turned their faces upon their Enemy, and made some good resistance, yet in short time you might have seen the Banks of the River in many places stained with the Turkish Blood, and many Carcasses of the Turks here and there scattered, without any apparent loss among the Georgians and Persians. Amongst them that fell in this slaughter, were a number of Sanzacks, of the Curdi, and Mesopotamians; which the rest perceiving, and by the overthrow of their own, conjecturing the loss of others, turned their backs and fled; the like did the remnant of the Mesopotamians, and after them the whole Army: whom the Georgians pressed so close by their flight, that many of the Turks, seeing no other way to escape, cast themselves into the River, and so (though hardly) escaped with their Lives. Great was the flame, great was the confusion, but greatest was the loss they received, for that in the heat of the Battle, the Kings Money and Corn was taken by the Georgians and Persians, every man taking only so much for himself as he could secretly hide upon his own Body, or convey by the means of some trusty slave, which by the help of their swift Horses, was preserved rather by Fortune than by Valour.

The Turks, thus discomfited and spoiled of their relief, the next Morning gathered themselves together again one with another, cursing the Heavens, the King, and their adverse Fortune: some of them also threatening the Georgian Renegade Mustapha, as though all this mischief had hapned through his treachery and secret Intelligence with the Enemy. Notwithstanding, when they found that they had still remaining so much Money and other calamities as might suffice to comfort the afflicted Minds of the Soldiers besieged in the Fort, they resolved to hold on their way towards Teflis; and in their Journey used such speed, that the day following they arrived there in the Evening. But when they of the Fort saw their Friends whom they had so long expected, arrived in such bad fortune, and so evil furnished, they were astonished and wonderfully grieved at this common loss, and all in a confusion protested to Mahamet, That they would abandon the place, if they had not forth with necessary Provision made for them. But the General, after he had with large Promises mitigated their first Furies and Insolencies, presently in the Morning caused a Divano, or Council to be called in the Castle, where, having gathered together all the chief Men in his Army, he spake unto them in this manner;

The Turks discomfited, and the Treasure and Corn taken by the Georgians and Persians.

Mahamet with his discomfited Army cometh to Teflis.

For

The Opinion of Mahamet Bassa in the Castle of Teflis.

FOR as much as it hath pleased God, that so great and important an occasion of Victory, which was offered unto us for the Honour and Glory of every one of us, is now fallen out so unfortunately, that it hath not only not injured us in any matter of triumphing over our Enemies, as we should have done, but rather hath made them (I know not how) to carry away from us both the Triumph, and also our Armour, our Horses, our Slaves, and our Spoils; yea, and the remembrance whereof doth most grievously trouble and afflict me) our Sultans Money, and our publick munition and forces solemnly delivered to our Conduits, is now become a booty and a prey unto them; that the Honour which might have made every one of us famous among valiant Soldiers, is now fallen from our foreheads, and to our great detriment, doth adorn the heads of Strangers, or rather of our Enemies; and that notwithstanding all this, we are now come to those courageous Soldiers, which with their great Valour have defended this Fort even in the midst of their Enemies Weapons and Treacheries; and to whom we should yield that aid and relief which the virtue of every one of their Minds doth deserve, and which King Amurath had put into our hands to bring hither unto them; there is now no remedy, but to resolve upon some good means, that we fall not wholly into the utter disgrace of our Lord and King; and that is, To maintain these Soldiers in the custody and defence of this Fort: and though it be with all our wants, and all our own dishonours, to comfort these that have so long time looked for us, and so well deserved all manner of relief. We cannot excuse our selves, that our Enemies were better than we, either in number, or Injuries of War; for both in the one and the other we were far better than they: neither yet can we say, that they set upon us by Night, or as unprovoked; for when we saw their number, their Weapons, their Horses, and finally their approach, and their manner of assault, yet we would needs pass over the River, and join battle with them: which we now know hath fallen out very lamentable unto us, because we were more ready to take our fight, than to endure the fight; and to life our feet, than to occupy our hands. And therefore it is very requisite, as to perform the Duty of Soldiers, that we suffer not our Lord and King to lose his Money, which he trusted into our hands, and which we have lost, not by strength, nor by any treacherous stratagem of our Enemies, but by our own too too important fear, and too base a regard of our Lives, before which, it was the Duty of every one of us to have preferred the care of Honour. For, if by fighting and courageous sustaining the assaults of our Enemies, though they had been stronger, and better armed than we, this misfortune had hapned unto us, and that we could in any fort have repented to the King and the World an honourable and bloody Battle, we should not now have had any need to seek means how to repay this loss, and to restore the thing that violently was taken from us: by such as were more mighty than our selves, and these honourable Soldiers should more easily have digested with us this lamentable Calamity. But we have lost that Money, and in very deed having as it were willingly bestowed it upon the Georgians and Persians, to redeem our Lives, and to save us from their fiery Fire-brand to repay us, or else for ever hereafter to be challenged as lawless debtors to the King for it. And therefore, my good Friends and Companions, if you will take a good course, let every one of us, without further Consultation, put his hand into his private Purse. (If he have not so fully cast that also into the hands of the ravenous Enemy) and with our own Money let us succour the Necessity of these men, and have regard to the Honour of our King. So shall we make our Right to blame worthy, and our Justice more honest, and that which is of greatest importance, we shall better pacify

the wrath of Amurath, which he might most justly conceive against us. I myself before you all am most ready to discharge four thousand ducats towards it, if it shall please you all to follow me accordingly; we shall deliver these Soldiers from their great Necessity, and acquit our selves from the intricate bonds of most troublesome displeasures.

There might a man have seen a thousand Countenances changed a thousand manner of ways; for one softly whispered many a curse and shame upon the King, upon Mahamet, yea, and upon God himself; another denied to do anything, another determined privily to steal away, and some said one thing, and some another: but in the end every man was induced to follow the Example of Mahamet, and thereupon having made a Purse according to every mans ability, there was collected thirty thousand Ducats among them. And presently after, word was sent to Lucent Oglu at Zagher, to send thither Grain, Muttons, and other necessary Provisions, that they might the better continue the defence of the Fort.

Two days only were spent in Teflis, and having changed such Soldiers as desired to be dismissed, and also appointed Hamur Bassa Governor of Teflis, instead of Giusuf that there governed before, he departed. But before his departure Consultation was had, Whether they should keep the way of Tomanis, or the way they came through the Country of Mustapha the Georgian; and in the end they resolved to keep the way of Tomanis, and thereupon order was taken that they should all pass the River. The Curdi were the first that went over, and had already passed the same when the General began to revoke his former order, and sent them word, That they should return, because he was now determined to go back the same way he came. At which message the Sanzacks were in a Rage, and in plain terms sent him answer, That these mutabilities befel them not, being men accustomed to War, but to be rather Childrens play, than manly Resolution; and that for their parts they were minded not to change their Journey, but would go on the same way they had begun, and so forwards they went (say the General what he could) and by the way of Tomanis arrived at Chars long before Mahamet, who was much grieved at this their so great disobedience: but seeing no other remedy, he with the Bassa of Caracem and Mustapha the Georgian, put themselves on their Journey, even by the same way they came to Teflis. At last Mahamet arrived at Alunchala, the chief Castle of the Georians, and burning with the desire of revenge of those losses, (which he thought himself to have received by the Treachery of Mustapha) or, as some thought, seeking by this means to make Amurath believe, that in truth all the forepassed mischiefs had happened not thorough their cowardice, but through the treacherous and malicious devices of the Georgian, and so to make their received losses seem more pardonable, he devised with himself how to find out such a plot, as that Mustapha might upon the sudden be taken away, as guilty of so foul a Treason. And that he had devised, was in this sort: To call a Council in his own Pavilion, as if he had received some commandment from the Court; and having called Mustapha to come into that room, whilst the said counterfeit commandment should be in reading, to cause his Lieutenant, with those chief of his band that stood about him, to fall upon him, and presently to cut off his head. This pretended Council was accordingly called, wherein sat the Bassa himself, and with him the Bassa of Caracem, certain Sanzacks, subject to the Jurisdiction thought in him, but also that he had always defied and laboured the contrary: and would moreover open unto them such matter, as in respect of other men, and not of himself, might cause their coming to prove profitable and commodious to all the Kingdom of Persia. Which his request they both solemnly promised faithfully to perform, being very desirous to understand what those strange Novelties should be. Whereupon Abas Mirise went unto them two of his chief Counsellors, men of great account and reverence both for Years and Wisdom, with full instructions; who after many Speeches, in the end (swearing (according to their custom) by the Creator that Deeds out the Air, that founded the Earth upon the Deep, that adorned the Heaven with Stars, that poured abroad the Water, that made the Water; and briefly, of nothing, brought forth all things, (swearing by the head of Ad, and by the Religion of their Prophet Mahomet, that such perverie thoughts never entered into the head of Abas Mirise: they alleged many Testimonies and manifest Proofs, that most joyally, in all due time, as well when he was advanced to the Kingdom of Persia, as also in his Battels against the Turks, his Son had always caused devout Prayers and Supplications to be made to God for his Prosperity; neither ever desired to hear any other, but happy and fortunate success of him. They brought with them a thousand and a thousand Precepts and loyal Letters, which the young man had caused to be written, as occasions required, to the Governors that were his Subjects, for the Government of the State, wherein he never named himself King of Persia, but only, Your King and Governour of Heri. They prayed the King also, to cause a diligent Process to be framed against his Son; and if there should be found in him any sign or shadow of so wicked a suspicion, then to take from him his Estate and Liberty; offering themselves to remain as Hostages for him. But when all this should be done, and Abas found altogether free from their unjust Accusations, then (falling even to the Earth and kissing it) they besought him, and as it were conjured him, not to leave the matter thus imperfect, to the Prejudice of his Blood; but returning to his Counsellor, to take information likewise, upon what mind and consideration he had advised the King, to take upon him this unorderly and dangerous Voyage; where no doubt he should find nothing in him, but malignant, ambitious, and wicked Affections; and such as even deserved, that with his Blood there should be revenged all the Blood of the Turks, which till that hour had been brought to their unworthy and undeserved Deaths. And for as much as nothing remained, whereof the Vicer had informed the King against his Son, but the commandment that was given by Abas Mirise to the Governors under him, That they should not go to the Wars against the Turks: they confessed in Truth, that such an order was taken, but not to that wicked and traitorous end and purpose, as was reported to the King by his great Counsellor, but only in respect of an Invasion justly feared in those quarters by the Tartarian Jeshelbas; who by divers irrides had already done great harm in the Country about Heri; and put young Abas and his Counsellors in such a fear, that they durst not disannul their Cities of their Guards and Forces; and therefore had commanded the said Governors, not to go to the Wars against the Turks, but to stay and expect further direction. And that all this was by writing signified unto the Vicer himself, which he of a malicious mind had concealed, only to try, if in these common troubles he could bring to pass, that Abas Mirise and the King might be taken away, and Emir Hamze succeed in his place; and so he himself remain the Superintendent of his Son-in-Law, and Moderator of that most famous Kingdom. Of which to treacherous a purpose, they for all that, thought Emir Hamze the young Prince altogether ignorant, knowing his own kindred Disposition and Love towards his own kindred; but imputed it only to the immoderate and ambitious desire of the wicked Traitor Mirise Salmas.

Of these grave Speeches of the Ambassadors, Mahomet the Father (by nature credulous) began to make great Constructions; and deeply to consider of his earnest and important requests; which seemed unto him so upright and equal, as that he could not chafe but hearken unto the same; and therefore, calling unto him the Governors, the Captains, the Judges, and Treasurers of all the Cities that were subject to Heri: he demanded of them, how and in what sort they esteemed of Abas Mirise, and in what degree of Honour he desired to be esteemed of them; and of them all received one answer, That they held him for their Lord and Lieutenant to the King of Cashin, and that he himself had always desired to be so looked and thought of: for proof whereof, every one of them brought in divers Letters, Precepts, and Orders: wherein he never caused himself to be honoured with any other Title, but only, Your King of Heri. He demanded further, Whether any such Wars were attempted by the Tartarian Jeshelbas, or not; whereof he received a large and full Information, that so it was, to the great detriment of all those Territories. And thus the King was thoroughly persuaded of the Innocency of him, who before was noted unto him by his Vicer, to be an obstinate Rebel. Upon which Occasion only, although he might justly have put him to Death, as Author of so great troubles and bloodshed; yet, because he would be better informed of the truth of the Accusations laid against him by the Ambassadors, he resolved to make a curious and diligent enquiry thereof: and therefore, first of all, in great secrecy he examined Emir Hamze, his eldest Son, wherefore he had advised the Journey against his Brother Abas, whom he had found guilty of all those Crimes that were objected against him: Whereunto the Prince answered, That he had no other certainty of the pretended evil behaviour of his Brother, but only that which proceeded from the great credit that he always gave to his Father-in-law Mirise Salmas, to whom as to a chief Counsellor, his Father-in-law, and Protector of the Kingdom, he had always yielded absolute credence; and so discharged the whole Trenchels of all those Mischiefs upon the Vicer. Touching whom, the King made diligent Inquisition, as well among those of the Court, as of the Army; and thereby found of him guilty of all that the Ambassadors of Heri had accused him: and that being always acquainted with the true Occasions which restrained the Governors of Heri (subject to Abas Mirise) from going to the War against the Turks, he had most maliciously concealed the same, of purpose to hatch such a strange and dangerous contentment, as had wrought the unworthy Death of many brave men, and almost defiled the hands of the Father with the innocent blood of his guileless Son. For which so foul a Treachery, the false Vicer was worthily condemned to die; and his wily head by the commandment of the King, struck from his Carcass. Justly rewarded, with the same Punishment which he unjustly fought to have converted upon others; and with his own destruction pacified the Difficulties and Brawls that were arisen between the two Princes. And so the two Brothers being reconciled together, and the Son to the Father, that Abas had again promised his wished Obedience (which he afterwards most dutifully performed) King Mahomet returned with the Prince towards Cashin, where, by reason of new and unexpected Motions of the Turks, he had now been long looked for and desired. Amurath, through the rough Speeches of Sinan, was more and more fed in his purpose for the continuing of the Porte War; accounting it so much the more to his own Glory, as it should in happy success fall out contrary to the Opinion of many: and thereupon began to bethink himself, whom he might chuse for his General, to whom he might commit so great a charge. Among the Balleas of the Court there was one Ferat, a man of ripe years, but yet full of courage, though in opinion, in counsel as hardy as might become his age, ready for all sudden and strange adventures, but above all, a Vassal most devoted to the King; of this man, at last he was resolved to make choice, to have the leading of his Army: and therefore calling him apart, declared unto him what he had in himself purposed; encouraging him to take the charge upon him, with a firm resolution to perform all things answerable to so worthy an enterprise, with the opinion he had conceived of his Valour. Very willingly did Ferat accept of this new Office, and thought himself (as indeed he was) highly favoured by the King; and thereupon made him a large promise, to employ his strength, his wit, and uttermost devotoir, to put in execution whatever should be offered unto him, either by occasion, or by his Royal Commandment.

At first Amurath had no other purpose to employ him any further, but only to assure the Passage to Tefis, and so into all Georgia; and to have destroyed the Country of Misapha the Georgian, who had so audaciously injured the Lieutenant of Amurath, and put his whole Army in Confusion; but being certainly advertised of the troubles in Persia between the King and his Son, he changed his purpose, and commanded Ferat to employ all his forces to erect a Fortrel at Reivan, a place belonging unto Tocmac, and to assure the Passage from Chors to Reivan; for so they should be revenged of many harms they had received by him, and lay open the way to the City of Tauris, to the great glory of Amurath. As for Misapha the Georgian, although he had well deserved to be chastised for his rash attempt against Mahomet Baffa, being then his General, yet he would Ferat to dispense his evil Opinion of him; and (if it were possible) so to work, as to tie him as an Instrument to convey Treasure and Succours to Tefis: for by this means the Passage being made safe, all Georgia would without any more Fortresses be subdued, and then the next year they might attempt the enterprize for Tauris.

Highly did Ferat commend the Devices of Amurath his Lord, and shewed himself ready for any attempt. And so the time being come wherein it behaved them to let on foot their important Designments, in the beginning of the year 1583, Commandments were sent out to all the Cities of the Empire, which were wont to make their appearance at the Wars. That upon such summons, they should be ready to return against the Persians, and to put in Execution that should be enjoined them by their new General. The Fame whereof flew as far as Soria, Jurie, Pahstine, Mesopotamia, Babylonia, to Balsara, to Sivas, to Maras, to all Bythina, Capadocia, Cilicia, Armenia, yea, and beyond Constantinople, to the Borders of Hungary and Greece, and in brief, to all the Regions that were wont to come to this War: all which sent their Captains and Souldiers accordingly. And so at last General Ferat departing from Constantinople, and passing over to Scutari by the way of Amasia and of Sivas, came to Erzurum, where he took a view of all his Army and Provision: and from thence in eight days arrived at Chors, conducted by the Persian fugitive Mirise Chan; and from Chors, let himself on his way towards Reivan. Three days before he came to Reivan, of certain Ruins of an old Castle which the Turks call Aggia Chatsi (or the Castle of Strangers) he erected a new Fortrel, and left in it a Garrison of four hundred Souldiers, with a Sanzack, and certain pieces of Ordnance, and then went to Reivan. This Country is distant from Tauris eight or nine days Journey; between which two places are situate Naffwan, Chinoff, Maras, and Sinapan, all crissed with goodly Gardens and pleasant Greens: but in the way are many craggy Mountains to be climbed, andundry hard Passages either for Army or Traveller.

Here then did Ferat encamp himself with his Army; and taking advice of his chief Captains, where he should build the Fort; they all with one consent advised him to settle upon the Houses and Ruins of Tocmac, and there to fortifie. Which he accordingly did, enclosing the Gardens with strong Walls and deep Ditches round about, whereinto he conveyed Water from a certain River, that coming down from the Mountains, ran into Araxis. Which Work was performed with such Expedition, that within the space of fifteen days the Fortrel was finished, being in circuit seven hundred and fifty yards. It grieved Tocmac exceedingly thus to lose his Country and Dwelling, and so much the more, as it happened so suddenly, and as it were unlooked for. He himself, as soon as he understood that the Turkish Army was coming to that Coast, having withdrawn himself and his Men of War out of the City he could not keep, fought by all means to be revenged, if not altogether, yet in some part, of this so great an Injury. And therefore he wrote unto the King at Corasanz, to Emir Chan at Tauris, to Simon in Georgia; he gathered Souldiers out of the Villages, and used all his possible endeavour to enable himself to annoy the Enemies Army: but from none of these places could he receive any help, the King being so far off in Wars against his Son, the Georgian being butted by hindering any Relief to be brought to the beleagued in Tefis; as for Emir Chan (who by solemn promise unto the King before his departure to Heri, had undertaken the defence of that side of the Kingdom against the Turks) he either would not, or could not fit; neither felt to much as one Souldier, having, as some supposed, secret Intelligence with General Ferat, not to disturb him in this his Work. So Tocmac, destitute of all other help, was not able of himself to do much against so mighty an Enemy; yet ceased not to lay such privy Ambushes for the Turks as he could, killing of them sometimes 100, sometime an 150, and sometimes more, as they fell into his danger. And to ease his Stomach against Emir Chan, (who sitting still at Tauris, as it were to behold his Misery, would not so much as shake a Sword against their spoiling Turks) he spared not to dispatch certain Horsemen in haste to the King at Corasanz, and by eloquent Letters to amplify the cowardice of Emir Chan; intermeddling withall some causes of Suspicion, that he had some intelligence with the Turkish General.

Ferat having thus built this new Fort at Reivan: as Amurath had commanded, and furnished it with Artillery, and all other things needful for the defence thereof; appointed Sinan Baffa (the Son of Cicada, a Renegade of Genoa, and by Selymus the late Emperour, in the flower of his Youth created Alge, or Captain of the Teniteries) with a Garrison of eight thousand Souldiers to keep the fame. And to departing thence, by the way of Aggia Chalefi, in ten days arrived with his Army at Chars.

Ferat had not long stayed at Chars, but strange News were brought thither, That Mustapha the Georgian (to whom Amurath had sent thirty thousand Ducks, by two of his Capigi and two of his Chiaus, to have by him been conveyed to Teflis for the Relief of them in the Fort.) was revolted from the Turkish Obedience, and being now become a Rebel, had left that Fortrefs in manifest danger to yield, if by some other means it were not relieved. Which strange Novelties exceedingly troubled the General, who to know the certainty thereof, called before him all such as were the Messengers of this Mistrust: by whom he was certainly informed, That Mustapha, the two Capigi, and the Chiaus, having put themselves upon their way towards Teflis with the Treasure, guarded with a Convoy of five hundred of his Souldiers, in the mid way had met with his Cousin Simon the Georgian; by whom he was perswaded to return again to his antient Faith and Religion, which he had to the great Peril of his Soul forprophantly abandoned, and to those of the Service of Amurath, which would yield him no other recompence than an hard and infamous Captivity, and in the end some fraudulent and treacherous Death: and that his Perswasion had so prevailed with Mustapha, that he caused the two Capigi and the Chiaus to be apprehended and presently beheaded; and dividing the Treasure with his said Cousin, had with him and his other Kinsmen vowed a solemn and perpetual Conjurment, and to having withdrawn themselves to their wonted Passages, lay there in wait for such Succours as should by the Turks be brought to Teflis.

When Ferat understood these and such other Particularities, he all in a Fury swore that he would not return to Erzurum until he had put all the Country of Mustapha to Fire and Sword: yet first he thought it needful to relieve Teflis, which would otherwise be in danger to be yielded to the Enemy: and for that purpose made choice of Hassan Bassa, who in the last year of the Generalship of Mustapha, had most courageously conveyed the like Succours, and taken Aliti Chah. Unto him therefore did the General assign forty thousand Ducks, with other Provision necessary for that Service; and for the more Security, appointed him fifteen thousand of the most choice and valiant Souldiers in all the Army, to conduct the same. In ten days space Hassan Bassa went and came from Teflis, having in his Journey to and fro had many Skirmishes with the Georgians, wherein he lost some few men, without any other loss worth the remembrance.

After this, the General sent one Refshan Bassa with six thousand Souldiers to spoil the Country of Mustapha the Georgian, the late Renegade, but now become a Rebel to the Turk; which Refshan, without any long stay over-ran all his Territory, burnt his Towns, and committed most uncouth outrages, which extended even unto the poor infensible Trees, and carried away with him many captive Souls, with much Corn and Cattel, like a raging Tempest destroying whatsoever came in his way. Now was the General also retired to Arda-chah, whither came Refshan to meet him with his forlaid Booty. But because they had now performed what they had before intended, and in ten days space Hassan Bassa went and came from Teflis, having in his Journey to and fro had many Skirmishes with the Georgians, wherein he lost some few men, without any other loss worth the remembrance.

the good service done by Hassan Bassa; who for the fame was now once again honoured by the King, with Cloth of Gold, a Battle-axe and Targuet all gilt.

About this time, one Podolovius, a Gentleman of Polonia, sent by Stephen King of Polonia, to Constantinople, by the leave of Amurath to buy certain Horfes in Anatolia; returned afterwards with four and twenty goodly Horfes which he had bought, was notwithstanding the Great Turks Pique, by his Commandment slayed upon the way, all his men (in number four and thirty) slain, excepting one Boy, who getting into a Wood, escaped, and Podolovius his Head struck off. The Horfes brought back to Constantinople, were by the appointment of Amurath, some bestowed into his own Stable, and the rest given among the Baffaes, Turks, in derision of the Polonian King. This Amurath commanded to be done, in revenge of an outrage done by the Polonian Cossacks against the Turks; whereof News was but even then brought to the Court.

The nine and twentieth day of November of this present year 1583, died Hama Cadum, the Widow of the late Emperor Selimus the second, and Mother of this Amurath, and lieth buried by her Husband Selimus, and his five Sons, strangled by their Brother Amurath.

All the rest of this year 1583, Ferat spent at Erzurum, and afterwards sent out his ordinary Commandments to all the accustomed Cities, to summon the Souldiers against the next Spring in the year 1584, gathering together a greater number of Pioners and Engineers than ever had been gathered in these Wars heretofore; and withall gave it out, That he would go to Erzurum, and there do great Matters. At which report the Georgians were much moved, and began to cast many things in their Heads about it; but above all others, the King, who understanding at Cashin of all that had before happened at Reivan, and of the new Preparations of the Turks, began to fear that they would this year pass to Tauris, or at least (as was reported) to Nassivan, and in those places build new Fortresses, to the great danger of the Persian Empire: and therefore, retaining still such Forces as he brought with him from Heri, and commanding as many more as he could out of all the Cities that were subject unto him, to follow him to Tauris, he arrived there with his Army, not long after the arrival of Ferat Bassa at Erzurum. This unexpected coming of the Persian King with so great an Army to Tauris, filled the World with Expectation of great Matters to have been done by him against the Turks; inasmuch that Ferat the General, before he would proceed any further, thought it good to advertise Amurath of the matter: declaring unto him, That his desire was to go to Nassivan, and there to build a Fortrefs, according to his Commandment, so to lay open a Passage to Tauris: but having received certain Intelligence, that the Persian King was come to Tauris with an huge Army, and full Resolution to encounter him; he thought it his Duty not to put in Execution his aforelaid Determination, without his express Commandment. Unto whom Amurath presently wrote back, that the matter so standing, he should not go to Nassivan, but only employ his Forces to assure the Passage to Tomanis and Lori, that so the Fort of Teflis might the year following be relieved by some small Band, without sending of any great Army for the conveying of Succours thither; so that he might, by this way, Ferat kept secret to himself, causing the Rumour of his going to Nassivan to be more and more increased; and purpose to feed the Opinion that the Persians had before fore conceived of his coming thither; and so excluding them, with less danger to build the Forts he had intended, for the quieting of those most dangerous Passages of Lori and Tomanis.

Upon this Resolution Ferat having gathered together his People, with all things necessary for his purpose, removed with his Army from Erzurum towards Chars, where he stayed ten days to take a new survey both of his Souldiers and Provision. And to departing thence, left forward toward Lori, sending before him Hassan Bassa with five thousand light Horsemen to scout the Country even to Tomanis, and to learn what he possibly could of the Enemies purposes, and the State of Georgia. Which thing Hassan justly performed, speedily scouring over all the Woods, and disclosing all the Passages from thence to Lori, and so to Tomanis, without meeting with any upon whom to assay his Valour, more than certain Robbers upon the high-way, whom he caused to be slain, (as men altogether ignorant of the Georgian and Persian Affairs) and their Heads to be let on the tops of their Laurels, and so returned again to Lori: where having stayed one day, he met with the General, to whom he recounted all that had happened in that his Expedition. Ferat being come to Lori, there camped his Army. This place did sometime belong to Simon the Georgian, well strengthened with an high Castle, compassed about with very deep Ditches, and a thick Wall almost a mile in circuit, but was then somewhat weakened with time; it is distant from Teflis about two days Journey of a Carriers pace. Upon this Castle Ferat seized; and having repaired the Walls, and strengthened the breaches, he placed therein all his force of Georgians, with seven thousand Souldiers for the defence thereof, and planted upon the Walls two hundred small pieces of Ordnance: And so when he had seen all things there in good order, departed thence with his Army towards Tomanis, having before commanded Ali Bassa, at some convenient time to forsake Saitan Chahsai a Castle about ten miles distant from Lori, and therein to place a convenient Garrison of Souldiers and Artillery.

Four days were they going from Lori to Tomanis, being ordinarily but one days work from the one place to the other: but now the General would needs to make it, to take the spoil of those rich Fields, abounding with Corn, Cattel, and Fruit, and to leave unto the Country-people a lamentable remembrance of his being there. At last being come to Tomanis (in times past a Castle of Simons, but by reason of the Wars, by him then abandoned) he began to consult with the other Captains, how and where the Fort should be erected, for the assurance of that Country. But after many Discourses, it was at last concluded not to fortify in that Castle, as being too far from the Straight, to make that dangerous Passage safe and secure; but to go a little further, and to build a Fortrefs upon the very Mouth of the Straight. So the Army marching forward a few miles, at the very entrance of the narrow Passage found the Ruins of another Castle, and near therunto stayed themselves. This steep headlong Castle was to compass round about with a thick Wood, which hindered all discovery afar off, that it was not convenient to found such a Castle there, from whence their Ordnance could neither avail them to whom the defence thereof should be committed, neither damage those that should come to offend them. And therefore the General commanded, that every man with all his Endeavours should lay to his hand for the cutting down of that thick Wood, and making way through thick and thin, to lay it for an open Campaign, that was before the Reception of a thousand dangerous Treacheries. In very short space were the Trees laid along on the Ground, the place made high and open, and a very commodious Situation prepared for the Foundation of a Castle. The plot of the old ruined Castle was compassed about with a Wall of a thousand and seven hundred yards, and in the midst thereof was erected a strong Keep, stately Lodgings and Chambers builded, and two pieces of Ordnance distributed upon the new Walls. After that, the General sent Refshan Bassa, and the Baffa of Caracem, with 20000 of his most choice Souldiers, to convey Succours to Teflis: who marching closely together in the direct way, in one day arrived at the said Fort; wherein they bestowed their Supplies; and changing the Governour thereof, substituted one only called a Baffa. Whilst Refshan yet lay thus camped under Teflis, Daur Chah, the Brother of Simon, who in the beginning of these Wars, at the coming of Mustapha the Turks General into Georgia, had fled out of Teflis, came now with all his Family, and offered himself as a subject and devoted Vassal to the Turkish Emperor: whom Refshan entertained with great Promises and large assurances of all good Success, according to his desire.

In the mean while News was brought to Simon, That General Ferat staying at the Straights of Tomanis with his Army, had sent Refshan Bassa with a far less number than indeed he had, to succour Teflis: Upon which report he took Courage to encounter Refshan, and to give him Battle. Upon which Resolution without further delay, being accompanied but with 4000 Georgians, partly Subjects of his own, and partly of Manuchians, he with all speed possible went against Refshan. But whilst Simon was going thitherwards, General Refshan fearing the worst, had already by chance dispatched away the two Baffaes of Caracem and Maras, with 10000 Souldiers, to the end that joining themselves with the Souldiers of Refshan, they should at all adventures be so much the stronger. Now Simon going resolutely on, found Refshan incamped with 6000 Souldiers only; at the foot of an Hill, on the back-side whereof lay all the rest of the Army, and presently gave a charge upon him; when the Souldiers behind the Hill being aware of his coming, were ready all at once with their Weapons to receive him. Who now perceiving his Error, repented himself to have rashly assaulted his Enemies, seeing now no other Remedy but to be utterly undone. But seeing that he had now so far engaged himself, as that he could not by flight but increase his Grief, and make the issue more lamentable; with these few Souldiers which he had, he incurred the Fury of the great Army of Refshan, so that on both sides there was joyued almost cruel Battle: wherein the strange and unusual Valour of those few Christians was much to be wondered at. Yet in the end the huge number of the Turkish Swords and Spears prevailed upon that small number of the Georgians, as that they were brought to great Extremity; yea Simon himself having his Horse slain under him, fell down headlong to the ground, and in his fall was very near to have been taken Prisoner, as was his Lieutenant, and many other his Followers, had he not been relieved by an unexpected and marvellous chance: for whilst the Battle was even at the greatest heat between them, Refshan discovered the two Baffaes of Caracem and Maras, who (as is before said) were newly sent by the said Refshan, and also the rest of his Army, were indeed thought to be Persians; whereupon they were incontinently surprised with a sudden fear, inasmuch that they now became very doubt ful of the Victory, whereof they thought themselves before assured. In this suspense and doubtfulness of Mind the Batel was also intermitted, and the Victory by the fight of those their Friends disturbed; whereby the Georgians, and especially Simon, whose estate was almost desperate, took the Opportunity to escape and save themselves; leaving behind them most sure signs of their Valour among the Turks, of whom many remained there slain, many wounded, and many filled with great marvel and unexpected fear. Thus escaped poor Simon with the remainder of his followers into his known places of Refuge, there to bewail the Death and Captivity of his Subjects. But Reshan after he had discovered the Baffles approaching towards him, to be his known Friends and well Willers, retired in himself exceedingly, that Simon had so escaped his hands; yet holding on his way to Tomanis, he arrived there in great Triumph, drawing the Standards of Simon all along the Ground, and causing many of the heads of the Georgians to be carried upon his Soldiers Lances, to the great joy of General Ferat, to whom he delivered all the Prisoners taken in the Batel, and wicked Daw Chan, who having in times past renounced his first Faith, was become a Persian; and now again despising the vain superstition of the Persians, had yielded himself to the vanity of the Turks, and made himself a voluntary Slave to Amurath.

Now was the year so far spent, that every man began to fear the Winters approach; and therefore the General determined to remove thence, and to withdraw himself into places of more safety. And so having first all things in order in the new Fort, he appointed Hajan to be the Baffa of Tomanis, and left with him eight thousand select Soldiers chosen out of all the Army, for the defence of that Fort and the Country thereabout. Deeply had Ferat laid up the outrage committed by Manuchiar the Georgian (being now returned to his old place of Manuchiar) in taking away the Kings treasure, and killing the two Capiti and the Chian; and therefore he resolved with himself, not to return to Chars or Erzurum, unless he had first passed into the Country of the said Georgian, and in most cruel manner revenged those notable injuries before received. In three days he arrived at Trimala, and there incamped. But lying there, such an unwonted Dearth and Scarcity of all things rise in the Army, but especially of Victuals, that every five bullets and a half of Wheat was sold for five hundred Ducks, to the universal calamity of the whole Army.

From this place, the General was minded to go on forwards towards the Country of Manuchiar; but whilst he was upon the raising of his Tents, one Vei Baffa of Aleppo came unto him, and told him, That it was not good now to spend the time in wandering about those Countries, for that there were three very great Enemies confederate together, to make this enterprise very difficult, and almost impossible and desperate: one was the season of the year, being now full of Snows, Frost, and Tempest; another was, the want and scarcity of all things necessary, especially of Victual; the third was, the People of Georgia, who by a common uniting of themselves together, and adventure aided by the Persians, might work some notable mischief against the Army. This Speech of Vei so much offended the General, that he most sharply rebuked him, and with bitter terms reproved him, telling him flatly, That he well perceived that he was brought up among Mountains and Villages, and of a Villain (as he was) upon some superfluity of grace, or foolish importunity, advanced to the honour of a Baffa, and that therefore he should not have presumed so much as to think it lawful for him, so impudently and malapertly to come and give him such advice; whereas it had been his duty rather to have held his peace, and to have hearkened to the commandments of his betters and superiors, yielding himself obedient and devoted with all his power to perform the same. With this rebuke the General passed on to Archeloch, burning, and in a manner destroying the Country before him, though indeed it was in amity and confederacy with the Turks. But the Inhabitants of Archeloch upon the coming of the Turks had abandoned the City, and for fear withdrawn themselves into the Mountains. In Archeloch Ferat incamped, and flayed the face of four days among the rocky crags; and in a barren foil, yielding necessary sustenance neither for man nor beast; so that every man there endured unpeakable miseries: yet for the space of four days the Soldiers with patience endured this great Calamity. But in the end, the fall of a huge Snow being added to these extremities, did so greatly increase their grinds, that all the Janizaries and Spagolans of Constantinople arose in a Tumult, and coming before Ferat, in delightful and contemptuous manner, with very haughty and resolute terms laid unto him:

AND how long shall we endure this thy tedious and insolent Government? Where is the due Commiseration that thou oughtest to bear towards the Vassals of thy Sovereign, thou rhetorical and unreasonable Captain? dost thou think happily, that we keep our Harlots at thou dost, under thy impious Possions, all fat and in good plight, with delicate Viands, whilst others live in Misery? Dost thou believe that we have as thou hast, our dainty Sugars, Spices, and Confevers, whereby to restore us, in the common Calamity of others? And that we have at command, Meat and precious Wines, which thou minglest with thy clear and pleasant Water, partly provided for thee by the Art of the cunning Doctors, and partly brought to thee from far Places? From this day forward it will be no longer endured, that so much People should continue in this Famine, afflicted with Nakedness, and many other Inconveniences: and therefore get thyself up and return toward Erzurum; otherwise we shall be forced to do that which will breed more displeasure unto thee, than to any man living.

The General in a great Agony presently called a Council, wherein it was concluded, That they should all send their strong trumpet Hoxies to Ardachan, and the rest to follow him into Persians Country, whether he had appointed to go on, to make an inroad, and with the spoil and booty of that Country to refresh the Minds of his Soldiers, afflicted with the Miseries both past and present. This Commandment of the Generals they all readily obeyed, as well because he promised them a speedy Voyage, as also for that every man desired the lack of Alunchah and other the Territories of Manuchiar. So Ferat holding on his Journey through certain low Vallies between the high and craggy Mountains, continually accompanied with great Famine and Scarcity, at length brought his Army to Clissa, a place belonging to Manuchiar, but as then for fear of the Turks quite abandoned and forsaken by the Inhabitants; who with their Wives and Children, and all the best stuff they had, were fled into remote and safe places until the Fury of the Enemy was overpassed. In the Fields near unto this place (bounding with Corn and Carrel, and plenty of Fire) the General refreshed his whole Army, and hoping that all the Soldiers would like it well to stay a while in that safe place, determined with himself to erect a Fort in that Place. And with this Resolution gave commandment to Reshan Baffa to go up to the Tower, and in the top thereof to let up an Ensign, with a Proclamation and public Report, That he would in the Name of Amurath there erect a Fort, and fortify it as he had done the other Forts before. Reshan accompanied with Amurath the Baffa of Carmania, according to the commandment of the General, in the top of the Tower set up an Ensign or two; which as soon as the Soldiers had espied, the forenamed Janizaries and Spagolans, thinking themselves too much abused by the General, arising all in an uprore, replenished with Fury and Indignation, ran up in a rage to take down the Ensigns that were set upon the Tower, and taking them in their hands, rapt the said Reshan once or twice about the pate, discharging withall a thousand injurious and spiteful Words upon him, and sharply rebuked him. And then returning to the General (who was now come thither himself to countenance the Action of Reshan) with Gestures full of despight, contempt and disdain, reviling him with many shameful and scornful Terms, they protested unto him;

That they were not come to the Wars to exercise the Occupation of Mafons and Dabblers, and to be employed in such vile and dishonourable Offices; but only to manage their Weapons, and thereby to demonstrate their ordinary Wages, and to purchase to themselves Glory and Renown at the Kings hand. And therefore if he loved his Head, and would not see those Armes turned against himself, which hitherto had been the Revengers of the Enemies Injuries, he should resolve with himself, to leave these new Buildings, and these unseafable Defilements, and giving place to the contrary season of the year, to have due care of their common Defences and Necessity.

Whilst they were yet thus expostulating the matter with him, one more bold than the rest, and more forgetful of his Duty, did not stick to assault the General, and to threaten him to wreak his Fury upon him; which in that Tumult had happily been done, had not the Baffa of Carmania lent the General his own Horse, and so conducted him to his Pavilion. Yet was he nevertheless still pursued by the tumultuous Soldiers, and again sharply accused for the say that he made there, and for not resolving presently to remove thence; and at length after many reproachful Speeches, told expressly, That if he did not the next morning remove out of those quarters, without all fail he should lose his Life for it. For that, Ferat disdainful to yield to them, that should of Duty have been ready and obedient at every beck of his; and seeking by all means (notwithstanding all this fury) to stay there so long time as should be sufficient to build a Fort, that would so much offend Manuchiar; answered them again:

That he made no account of their threatening him with his Life, which he had always offered to lay down for any service of his King. But if they had in care to serve their Sovereign in this new Building, they might go their ways; as for himself he was resolutely minded to obey his Lord in whatsoever he had commanded him; for the honour of whom every one of them ought to think their Lives very well beloved.

Upon this answer there followed divers railings and curfings against the King, against the General, and against them all; and in this confused tumult every man betook himself to his Weapons; in every corner was heard grumbings and whisperings full of Wrath and Indignation; so that there was a great fear of some dangerous event, but greater was the Suspicion of the Generals Life. And now every man had withdrawn himself to the guarding of such things as he esteemed most; when suddenly and in a trice you might have seen the Pavilions of all the Baffles and Captains fall down flat to the Ground, all the Cooks thereof being cut in sunder by the wrathful Soldiers; and as there in a moment, all the Muttons and other Carrel the General and Baffles led with them for their ordinary use, were seized upon by the same Soldiers, and guarded with all diligence possible. And so far was it off that any man durst challenge or revenge this their Insolency, that they themselves turning afield upon their General, being now in a maze and deadly fear, began now the third time to threaten him. That if he did not forthwith remove from those Countries, and turn his Journey towards Erzurum, those Vallies and Fields should without all fail become the Sepulchres of the Baffles, and those Hills retain the eternal Memory of so bloody a day.

With a little Liberality might the General have done with this People whatsoever he had lifted, but being loth to gratify them in any thing, he was enforced to perform their proud and arrogant demands, and to his great shame, to obey them, whom with right ought he might have made obedient to himself; and therefore to avoid their despightful Threats, to his exceeding great reproach, he was glad even as they had commanded, to remove out of those quarters. The fifth day he arrived at Ardachan, with the great trouble of all his Soldiers; for whereas the Journey was wont to be two days work ordinarily as well in respect of the length of the way, as the difficulty of the Passage; the General would now needs have it done in one, the rather thereby to grieve his Soldiers. But of this his wilfulness he received even the same day the just reward; for that the Chariots wherein his Women rid were conveyed away, together with the Eunuchs that were their Keepers: some say by the Georgians that lay in wait for such a Prey; others say by the Janizaries, who the more to dishonour their General, wrought him this Injury.

Great was the reproach of Ferat received in the Army, but far greater at Constantinople, when these News were there known; but there was no remedy, he must now perforce endure it, and discontented as he was, keep on his way towards Erzurum. In Ardachan he took a survey of his Army, and there gave his Soldiers leave to depart: himself afterwards arriving at Erzurum, hated of all his Soldiers, envied by his Captains, derided for the loss of his Women, and fallen into the disgrace of every man. No less than the rest was the Turkish Emperor discontented with him also; first for that he had done nothing worth speaking of, in revenge of the shameful Injury done by Manuchiar the Georgian, and yet so mightily discontented his Soldiers; and secondly, for that without any care he had suffered Aliculi Chan the Persian Prisoner to escape away, about whose flight it was thought he could not chide but have some Intelligence. For Ferat, after he was by new order from the Court, to direct his Journey from Najafan to the Straights and narrow Passages of Georgia, being desirous to be thoroughly informed of those dangerous ways; in this second year when he removed from Erzurum, took Aliculi Chan out of Prison, of purpose to use him as his guide in those dangerous Straights, and therefore carried him under a Guard (whatsoever it was afterwards) of his most faithful Vassals, still treating him well, and asking such order as that he wanted; and at length coming to the Straights of Tomanis in Georgia, where the Castle (as it was before said) was erected, he from thence secretly escaped unto Persia. The manner of his escape is diversely reported; some say, post halt sent for to Constantinople, and put into the Gallies bound for Caffa, with Letters to Ofman of the tenour aforesaid. Now in the mean time Ofman had by cunning means got into his hands this Tartar King, being, as is reported, betrayed by his own Constables, corrupted by the Turks Gold; whom with his two Sons Ofman upon the receipt of the aforesaid Letters from Amurath, caused to be presently strangled with a Bow-string, and Ihan his younger Brother to be faluted King in his Place, yet as Vassal to Amurath. This shameful death, the usual reward of the Turkish Friendship, was thought justly to have happened unto his Tartar King, for that he long before, supported by Amurath, had most unaturally deplored his aged Father from that Kingdom, just revenge now protecting his to great Dignity.

Ofman embarked himself at the forenamed Caffa at the Port of Caffa, passing over the Euxine Sea, and entering into the Thracian Bosphorus, arrived at Constantinople; where he was received with great Pomp and singular significations of good Love. But with most evident and expresse kinds of Joy was he saluted by Amurath himself, when by his own Speech and Presence he declared unto him every particular of the matters that had hapned in his long and important Voyage, and in lively manner represented unto him the Perils and Travels that he had passed, and the Conquests that he had made in Sirhan. After all which Discourses, Amurath who longed after nothing more, than to see the Perfian King somewhat bridled, and the famous City of Tauris brought under his own Subjection, began to enter into Conference with Ofman about that Enterprize, and in the end needed know thoroughly of him, what issue he could promise him of this his desire; and in what sort by his Advice and Counsel the Forces should be employed, and the Armies disposed for the subduing of that City, which over all the Nations of the World was so famous and so great an honour to the Perfian Kingdom. To all which demands his Answer and Resolution was, That forasmuch as the matters of Georgia were now well settled, the treacherous Passages by the new built Forts assured, and the Province of Sirhan under his Obedience established, there was now no cause why he should any longer forego so famous an Enterprize, but by the Conquest of Tauris, and erecting of a Fort in that proud City, to bring a Terror upon all Perfia, and to raise a glorious renown of it to mighty a Conquest among the Nations of Europe; for the accomplishment whereof, he thought that either the same Army, or at the most a very little greater would suffice, so that it were raised of the best and choicest Souldiers.

By reason of one of the Letters which Scianus Bassa had written to the late Tartar King, and by the instigation of the young Sultan Mahomet's Mother (jealous of the near alliance of the great Bassa with her Husband, as prejudicial and dangerous to her Son) Amurath had in the open Divano deprived the said Scianus from the Office of the chief Visier, and hardly pardoning him his Life, at the Intercession of his Wife, being his Sister had banished him the Court, so that he lived afterwards about Cabedon, upon the Borders of Afia, not far from Constantinople, in a close Palace he had there built for his own Pleasure; in whose room he appointed Ofman to be chief Visier; and to honour him more, nominated him the General of his Army against the Perfians. Such Power hath Virtue, that even from the very crum of the rascal sort, and out of the filthiest rout of Mountain Peasants (which notwithstanding cannot be truly justified of this Ofman, his Father being Beglerbeg of Damasco, and his Mother, the Daughter of the Beglerbeg of Babylon) it doth oftentimes in the course of this variable World draw divers men into Princes Courts, and advance them to the highest Dignities. Truth it is, that from a private Souldier, though well born, he by sundry degrees grew up to the highest Honour of that so great an Empire, and was at one instant created the chief Councillor, and General of the Ottoman Forces. Great was the Joy that Ofman conceived heret; and great was the desire he had to make himself worthy of so honourable Favours; and the greater Confidence he perceived that Amurath had reposed in him, the more eagerly was he spurred on to any thing possible whereby he might raise himself to have deserved the same. And therefore advising with himself, that forasmuch as the greatness of the Enterprize required a greater Army than was levied in former years, so it was necessary also for him the sooner to send out his Advertisements unto all his subject Provinces, and by his own example to stir up the other Captains and Souldiers even in the Winter (though it were as yet somewhat troublesome) to pass over to Sentari, and from thence to Angori, to Amasia, to Sivas; and there in those Territories to drive out the time, untill his Souldiers which were summoned, were all gathered together. And because upon this his great speed it might peradventure fall out, that the Enemy might doubting his purpose for Tauris, might provide a greater Army than they would otherwise, he caused it to be given out, That he must go for Nassau; to the end, that the Perfians so beguiled, should not regard the gathering of so mighty an Army as they could have done if they should have heard of the Turks coming to Tauris; and so the General countenancing Rumour flew not only through all the Cities subject to the Turks, but into the Countries of the Perfians also; who notwithstanding being very jealous of the City of Tauris, and fearing that the matter would fall out, as indeed afterward it did, ceased not make most curious and diligent inquiry about it. And although the disguise offered to his Ambassadors at Constantinople, dissuaded him from sending any other for treaty of Peace: yet to spy out the Secrets of the Turks, and to understand the certainty of their purpose for Nassau or Tauris, he sent divers Messengers to Ofman, as if he had meant to feel his mind touching a Peace; but in very deed for nothing else but to found his Designments: which for all that, he could not with all the cunning he could use possibly discover, but still remained doubtful as at the first, the Fame fill running for Nassau.

In the beginning of this year, now growing towards an end, Amurath sent one Molapho, one of the meanest of his Chians, unto Stephen King of Polonia, to excuse the Death of Podolovius (so shamefully murdered as is before declared) as if the same had hapned by the Infolency of certain Souldiers, and not by his Commandment; who the better to colour the matter, had brought with him two base Fellows, as Authors of that outrage, for the King to take revenge upon; but were indeed no such men as they were pretended to be, but rather (as it was thought) men before condemned for some other Fact worthy of Death, and now sent thither to serve that purpose: for whom the Chians (in proud and threatening manner in the name of his Master) required to have present Retitution made of all such goods as the Polonian Coffacks had not long before taken from the Turks, and the Captain of the said Coffacks to be delivered also unto him, to be carried to Amurath; and so hardly urged the matter, that notwithstanding the unworthy Death of Podolovius and his Followers, and the taking away of his Forts (all the goods taken by the Coffacks, were forthwith restored red; which the Chians almost in triumphant manner pretended unto Amurath at Constantinople. This Summer also, Amurath disposing himself with his Mutes, was almost dead. These Mutes are lusty young Fellows, deprived of their Speech; who nevertheless certain by signs can both aptly expresse their own Conceits; and understand the meaning of others: these men for their Secretive are the cruel Ministers of the Turkish Tyrants most horrible Commands; and therefore of them had in great regard. With these Mutes mounted upon fair and fat, but heavy and unwieldy Horses, was Amurath, upon a light and ready Horse, (sporting himself (as the manner of the Turkish Emperours is) riding sometime about one, sometime about another; and striking now the Horse, now the Man, at his Pleasure, when suddenly he was taken with a fit of the falling Sickness, his old Dilease; and so falling from his Horse, was taken up for dead: insomuch, that the Janizaries supposing him to have been indeed dead, after their wonted manner fell to the spoyling of the Christians and Jews, and were proceeding to further outrages, had not their Aga or Captain to restrain their Infolency, to the Terror of the rest, hanged up one of them taken in the manner, and certain others in the habit of Janizaries. Nevertheless, Amurath shortly after recovered again, and to appease that Rumor of his Death (openly upon their Sabbath, which is the Friday) rid from his Palace to the Temple of Sophia; where I with many others law him (saith Leunclavius) his Countenance yet all pale and discoloured.

This year also hapned such a chance as had like to have raised new Wars betwixt the Turks and the Venetians; which, forasmuch as it is worth the reporting, I thought it not good in silence to pass over. The Widow of Ramadan Bassa, late Governor of Tripolis in Barbarie, with her Son, her Family, and a great number of Slaves of both sorts, being about to depart from Tripolis to Constantinople, had rigged up a fair Gally for the transporting of her self and her Substance, reported to be worth eight hundred thousand Duckas; upon which Gally for her more safety, she had joynted two others, as Consorts. Thus embarked, she came to the Mouth of the Adriatick; where failing by Corfu, she was by force of Tempest driven into the Gulf of the Adriatick. At which time one Petrus Emus, one of the Venetian Senators, with certain Gallyes had the charge for the keeping of that Sea against Pirates, and all other Enemies whatsoever. Hearing of the Turks coming into the Gulf, without delay set upon them; and being too strong for them, took them all; and having them now in his Power, exercised most barbarous Cruelty, as well upon the Women as the Men: for having slain the Men, in number two hundred and fifty, and the Son of Ramadan in his Mothers lap, he caused the Women, being before ravished, to have their Breasts cut off; and afterwards to be cast overboard into the Sea, being in number about forty. The Brother of Emus chancing upon a beautiful Virgin, was by her most earnestly intreated to have spared her Honour; and the rather, for that (as the said) was a Christian, taken Prisoner about twelve years before in Cyprus; since which time she had lived in most miserable Captivity among the Turks; and being now fallen by good hap into the hands of a noble Venetian, was in good hope to be set at Liberty inviolated; which the most humbly besought him for the love of God to do, and not to imbrue his hands with her guiltless Blood, or to dishonour himself by forcing of her. But all the could say prevailed nothing with the cruel and unbridled Youth, who after he had at his Pleasure abused her, cast her with the rest into the Sea. It is thought that Emus suffered this so great an outrage (and so far unbefitting the Honour of the Venetians) to be done, to the intent that none should be left alive to bewray the greatness of the Booty, or of the Villany there committed; which was nevertheless (God so appointing it) revealed by one of the Turks, who loved by a Surgeon of Crete which knew him, and afterwards coming to Constantinople, openly declared the same. With the odious report whereof, the Turks were so enraged, that in every corner of the City a man might have heard them threatening unto the Venetians most cruel Revenge; yea they had much ado to hold their hands from the Bilo or Governor of the Venetian Merchants in Constantinople, and to forbear to spit in his Face, as he went in the Streets. At that time was one Johan Francisus Mauricemus (or as they commonly call him, Morefin) Bilo at Constantinople; who understanding that Amurath in his Rage was about to send one of the great Gentlemen of his Court, whom the Turks call Zasfi, (the great Turks use to call him Zasfi) to Venice about that matter, found means to have him stayed at Constantinople, and another of less Authority sent to expostulate the matter with the Senate, and in the Name of Amurath, to require to have the Offender punished; and the Gallies with the Slaves and Goods restored; so should the League betwixt him and them continue firm; whereas otherwise he should be constrained by force of Arms to revenge the Wrongs done to his Subjects. This Message being by the said Messenger delivered at Venice, the Senators after diligent Examination of the matter, returned this answer: That the Widow of Ramadan with her Family coming to Zagynbus, an Island of theirs, was there honourably entertained, and presented with certain courteous Presents; but departing thence, and coming to Cephalonia, another of their Islands, her People running on Land, contrary to the Conditions of the League, made spoil of whatsoever they could light upon, sparing neither Man nor Beast; of which their Infolency their Provider understanding, and making after them, found them in Arms within the Gulf; and coming near unto them, was neither by them saluted, as the manner at Sea is, neither was any topfall struck, in token that the command of that Sea belonged unto the Venetians, all which they ought by the League to have done; for which their outrages and proud Contempt, their Provider had taken so sharp a Revenge; nevertheless, they promised in that case to do what befitted them in Reason and Justice to do, for the satisfying of his desire. With which so reasonable an answer, Amurath seemed to be well contented; but being indeed loth to intangle himself with Wars against that mighty State at Sea, his Wars against the Perfians being not yet finished; yet shortly after, Emus was for his dishonourable and cruel dealing with the Lady and her Family, worthily condemned and beheaded, and the Gallies with all the Goods and Slaves restored. This great Woman had in those Gallies four hundred Christian Slaves, which upon the taking of the Gallies were (as the manner is) set at Liberty, for whom the Venetians made Restitution of as many others of the Turks.

that they became Lords of the Pavilions, the Wealth and Armour of the Turks; and leading away with them their Horses and their Carriages, put to the Sword five hundred Persons, and (scarce gave any leisure of escape either to the Bassa the Father, or the Sannack his Son, who fled thither to Jerusalem, and never returned again to Ebrain; but Pels his Father still followed the Army with those few men which he had left, and was thought worthy of all men to be tried.

fondly for Harquebuzes
Ogli.

Upon the Hill aforesaid, Ebrain continued twenty four days together, with abundance of all things necessary for Victual; during which time he attended nothing else, but to try all Devices how he might draw Money and Presents from Man-Ogli, or how he might train him into his Hands. For the compelling whereof, he dispatched one Gomeda (Ebne-Manfur Agent) to Man-Ogli, being in Andrea; to tell him, That forasmuch as he would not give credit to the promise which he made him, not to adventure himself into the hand of his Friend, he should send unto him all the Harquebuzes he had; for that the Sultans Pleasure was, that his People that went not to the Wars in his Service, should not be furnished with so great store of Weapons, to the danger of their Neighbours, and of the Subjects themselves. With great Grief of Mind did Man-Ogli behold the Messenger, as the Man whom he well knew to be the Agent of his deadly Enemy; yet in regard of him that sent him, he forbore to do him Injury, or to give him any Reproach; telling him, That all his People and Weapons were dispersed abroad over his Territory, so that he could not tell what Harquebuzes to send him; with which cold Answer Gomeda returned. Which thing when Ali Bassa of Aleppo understood, he offered himself to the General, that he would go unto him, and that to some better purpose. Many Reasons did Ali Bassa use to twade the wary Drufian to come and yield his Obedience to Ebrain, (swearing that no harm should be done unto him; and withal promising him great and honourable Favours. But never could he remove the resolute and provident Mind of Man-Ogli, or win him to yield himself into the hands of a Man, whom he thought to be so murderous; yet at last with much ado, he prevailed so much with the Drufian Lord, that in sign of the Reverence he did bear towards the General, and of his Obedience towards Amurath, he was content to send a Present to Ebrain. And thereupon gave him 320 Harquebuzes, 20 packs of Andarine Silks, and fifty thousand Ducks to carry to the Bassa for a Gift, and to reconcile him unto him. For the better effecting whereof, he sent his own Mother to the great Bassa, who in the behalf of her Son performed a very worthy Message, excusing him as well in respect of his Enemies that late there so near unto him, as also in regard of his Oath which he had solemnly sworn. That for the Treachery of Mutapha he would never commit himself into the hands of a Turk; and therefore besought him to accept of the Gifts that were sent him; and withal a Mind and Heart most ready to serve and obey the King in all Occasions; and that he would hold him excused, for that his Excuses were both just and reasonable. Whereunto the Turk replied, That although he had found so foul a Fault in Mutapha, who under the assurance of his Promise and Fidelity had betrayed her Husband; yet for all that he ought not to fear any such wicked or infamous Act at his hands, who stood upon his Honour and the Word of a Soldier; and so by Oath protesting all faithful and constant Friendship towards him, in token of his sincere meaning, he cast a white veil about her Neck, and put another upon himself, and the third he gave her in her hands; willing her to report to her Son the Oaths he had made, and to carry him that Veil, and bring him with her, proceeding no otherwise to treat him, but as a friend and a Brother; the peaceable old Woman went her way accordingly; but the neither could not would go about to alter the purpose of her Son, but returned to Ebrain such answer as did not greatly please him. After which time, he fought more than ever he did before, to get the wary Drufian into his hands, or at least, without regard of shame to draw from him more Presents and Weapons. And therefore once again he sent the crafty Gomeda, to exhort him upon Faith and Promise, to come unto him; but for all the craft and lying Speeches that the treacherous Messenger could cunningly evolve, he could obtain nothing of the Drufian Lord, but good words only. Yet at last after much fineness he prevailed so much, as that Man-Ogli was contented by him to send another Present to Ebrain, with an express Condition notwithstanding, that he should cause Ebrain to depart out of those quarters, and that he should not himself return any more to request any thing farther of him. Which he very largely promised, only desiring him to send a good number of Harquebuzes, thereby to content the Bassa fully; so he gave him fifty thousand Ducks more, and four hundred and four score Harquebuzes, with a thousand Goats, an hundred and fifty Camels, an hundred and fifty Buffs, a thousand Oxen, and two hundred Weathers. With this rich Present came Gomeda to Ebrain, declaring unto him that this he had got from him, upon promise that he should not molest the Drufian any more. For which promise he made, Ebrain sharply reproved Gomeda, and threatened to make him know what it was to take upon him so dangerous a Liberty; and for the greatest desire both to himself and to the other Ebrain would needs have Gomeda himself to return again with like Message to trouble the Drufian. Whereunto although he went in great fear of some mischief by the hands of Man-Ogli, yet was there no remedy but needs he must follow the command of him, in whose Power it was to take from him both his Honour and Life; and therefore on he went. But as soon as Man-Ogli saw Gomeda (thinking as truth was, that he came again about his wonted Request) he was with the very sight of him so far moved, as that he was even at the point to have thrown a dart at him, and so to have dispatched him, had not the regard of more dangerous effects staid his fury; yet spared he not to utter in ignominious words and deadly Threats to disburden his Choler. Notwithstanding Gomeda could do no less but accomplish the effect of his fraudulent Requests; and so wrought with him, that he drew from him four hundred more of Harquebuzes, ten Swords, and ten Daggers, certain finer Belts, ten packs of Silks, and some few pence; causing him withal to protest unto him, never to suffer himself to be persecuted to come again unto him; for if he did, he threatened to kill him, happen after what might of it. With exceeding Joy and Triumph did Ebrain receive this Present, and thinking now with himself that he had gotten a sufficient booty from him, he determined to rife with his Army, and to sack all the rest of Man-Oglis Country. Which he performed accordingly, and being conducted by Emir Ebne-free, burnt Andrea, the place of Man-Oglis Residence, and in two days burned and destroyed nineteen other of his Towns, with unpeakeable Cruelty committing all things to Fire and Sword. After all this sacking and raving, Ebrain sent divers Messengers to Man-Ogli, to try whether he would yet be persuaded to come unto him; but nothing could move the resolute Drufian to com-

himself into his hands, but rather increased his Contancy to avoid a most certain Death. Now the great Bassa still thirsting after Blood and Revenge, understanding by a Spy, that the Captain of Andria (being one of the Followers of Man-Ogli) with three hundred and fifty Soldiers was got up to a certain Hill, unto a Place of great Security, he sent Emir Ebne-free to entice him, and to tell him, That seeing his Lord Man-Ogli would not come and yield himself, he should come unto him; which if he would do, he would assuredly in despite of Man-Ogli make him a Sannack of some of those Places which he most desired. The ambitious and unheedy Macademio suffered himself to be easily persuaded, and being accompanied with his three hundred and fifty Followers, went with the said Ebne-free, and came at last to the Pavilion of Ebrain, having first caused his aforesaid men to fly, being in a Valley two or three Miles off. But Ebrain would not so much as see the Macademio, although both in respect of the nimbleness of his Person, and also the fierceness of his Looks, he was worthy to be looked upon; but commanded him to keep in a several place from Serafidin, and in the mean time devised how he might with least loss of his own men, put to death those three hundred and fifty the Macademio Followers; which was by straining them, by means of the said Ebne-free, into a certain Vine-yard, and so having brought them unto a Straight, suddenly to set upon them and kill them. Which was accordingly performed; for being by the treacherous Emir brought into the place appointed for their slaughter, fearing nothing lest they were suddenly indolent by the Turks Sannacks or Barbarians and daunt every Mothers Son. This Malice thus fulfilled, Ebrain commanded the Macademio to be brought before him, and without delay to be stripped and flogged quick; who being come, stoutly upbraided Ebrain with his Promise and his Oath; and amongst other Speeches which he uttered whilst they stripped him; said, Cut me off my Members, and first putting them into the Privities of that infamous Ebrains Wife, put them afterwards into the Mouth of himself; for so I tremble he will be contented and satisfied with my Flagg. And to them that were the Executioners of his painful Death, he said, It is your great good Fortune indeed, that with such Violence and needless deformity, you are now able to fill my Blood, and to take my Life from me; whereas none of you all had been able, or once dust, man to man, to have drawn one drop of it from me, no nor to have injured my Countenance. But go too, proceed in your wicked and unsatisfiable desire of my Blood, and fulfil the cruel command of your Viper, for in the end there will alleighten you the just reward of this so villainous a Feat. With these and other such like Speeches the miserable wretch was stripped, and three great slashes made on his Back, where they began to flea him; he in the mean time not ceasing to blaspheme their Religion, and to curse their King, and their false Prophet also. But the barbarous Soldiers proceeding in their cruel Action, made other like gashes upon his Breast and Stomach; and so drawing the Skin downward, could not bring it to his Navel before he was with the Extremity of the Pain, dead. After this, Ebrain caused the Followers of Serafidin (in number about a hundred and fifty) to be cruelly slain, and all his Country to be most miserably wasted, he himself left remaining in Chains.

The Maca-demio by his Commandment
flung quick.

Whilst the Fire and Sword thus raged in the Drufian Country, Ebrain by speedy Posts sent to Sidon, where his Gallies lay at rode, commanded, That disarming four thousand Soldiers, they should sack all the Countreys along the Sea-coast, even as far as Casius in Palatine, leaving neither Age nor Sex, nor any Person of Condition whatsoever. Which his cruel command was presently put in Execution; and three thousand Souls brought away Captives, great Booties made of much rich Merchandise, many Towns burnt, sundry Gallies rased and laid even with the Ground; and to be short, all the whole Countrey of Serafidin and Man-Ogli laid utterly waste and desolate.

Ebrain was now in readiness to depart for Constantinople, where he was by Amurath expected; as well for his Gold, as the accomplishment of the Marriage. But bethinking himself, that whatsoever hitherto he had done, would be accounted either little or nothing, unless he provided in some sort for the quieting of those People under the Turkish Obedience, he determined to nominate one of the three Drufian Emirs that came to him to Jerusalem, to be Bassa of those Regions. And because Emir Aly Ebne-Carfus was the richest and most obedient of them all, he thought good to commit that charge unto him, and honoured him with that Dignity; yet not without a Bribe, but for the price of an hundred thousand Ducks. Wherefore he apparelled him in Cloth of Gold, gave him a Horsemans Mafle, and a Sword all gilt, and delivered unto him the Kings Commiſſion, causing him withal, to swear Faith and Obedience to Amurath. And so having (at least shew) set in order the Affairs of those Mountains, which an hundred of the Turks great Captains had in former time vainly attempted, he returned to Damafco, where he staid 12 days, by shameful shifts extorting Money from divers Persons. At last having no more to do in those parts, he turned himself towards Gazir and Baruto, Places under the Government of Ebne-Manfur, where he arrived with all his Army, and found the Gallies which he had left in the Port of Sidon, now in the Haven of Baruto, as he above before commanded. Now upon a certain Hill above Baruto near unto the Sea, Ebrain had pitched his own Tent only, and none other; and having sent all the rest of his best and goodly things which he meant to carry with him to Constantinople aboard the Gallies, strowed himself only under that narrow and bare Tent. Thither he called Ebne-Manfur; and in a pleasant manner told him, That now it was time for him to make payment of the Debt of an hundred and threescore thousand Ducks which he owed the Kings Lord for the Custom of Trippoli and Baruto; for that he could not longer stay in those quarters, but was to return to Constantinople, which he knew how to do, unless he carried with him the discharge of that Debt. Whereunto Ebne-Manfur made Answer, That it would not be long before his Macademio would come with his Monies, and that then he would without further delay make Payment. Which thing Ebrain well knew to be an excuse, and therefore determined with himself to thrust him into the Gallies; and because he could not carry the Money unto the King, yet at the least to bring him his Debtor. But forasmuch as he doubted to put this his Determination openly in Execution, for fear of some Insurrection amongst the People, as well for that he was within the Territories of the said Ebne-Manfur, as for that he saw him greatly beloved and favoured of the other two Drufian Lords, Ebne-free and Ebne-carfus, he therefore thought it better Policy by concealing his purpose, to shew him in his outward Actions all good Countenance, and by secret and subtil means to take him Prisoner. Whereupon he deceitfully told him, That forasmuch as he was to stay there for his Business that Night, and was relieved the next day to make a road into the Country of Man-Ogli, he therefore prayed him to do him the Favour to be his Guide, and for that purpose, when he should send for him at Midnight, that he would come unto him very secretly, because he was minded to depart without any, only with five hundred men in his Company. The Drusian Lord verily believed the matter that it was, and withal was in good hope by that means to find some way to escape his hands. Whereupon being called up at Midnight, he readily went to the Tent of Ebrain, who presently charging him (whom all men thought he had especially affected) with many abominable and foul terms, caused a Chain to be cast about his Neck, and his Arms; and so to fall bound to be carried into the Gallies. And yet not contented, took the spoil of all his Country, whereby there was levied such a Prey as was marvellous to behold; for besides Money (whereof there was a very huge sum) the store of Cloths of Silk and Gold, was such, and so great, as might better become some great Prince, than such a mountain ruffical Lord as he was. When the Baffa had conveyed all this into his Gallies, he failed to Tripoli, where he found Seraphadin in the Custody of Veis Baffa and Aby Baffa; and having stayed there some few days, wherein he committed sundry villainous and abominable Robberies, he caused the said Seraphadin to be put into the Gallies, with all his Silks and other Wealth, and so departed for Constantinople; where at such time as he entered into the Channel of the City, accompanied with four and twenty Gallies, he was encountered and received by a wonderful number of his Friends and Favourites, and saluted with an honourable Peal of Artillery out of the Seraglio. John Thomas Minadie the best Reporter of this History, as also of the late Wars betwixt the Turks and the Perfians, being then at Constantinople, and having (as he reported of himself) good means to see the bountiful and beautiful Presents which the spoiling and ravenous Baffa gave the Turkish King; reporteth the sum thereof to have been a million of Gold, besides the yearly Revenue of Catir, amounting to five hundred thousand Ducats, with threefold Horses most richly garnished, of singular beauty, but especially of the Arabian Race, a live Elephant, and a live Giraffe (which is a beast like a Camel and a Panther) two great Crocodiles dead, a Chair of massie Gold richly set with precious Stones; a Casket also beset with precious Stones and Gold, many Packs of most fine Cloaths, Wollen, and Silks, certain other Cloaths with Fringes of Gold and Silver, and the Burariar cut-work, most fine Linnen of Alexandria, and all the Harquebuzes taken from the Drusians; besides sundry rich Presents given by the proud Baffa to the great Ladies of the Court, reported by Leuncadivus to have been worth two hundred thousand Sulmanes.

But now forasmuch as we have before made mention of the Sannack of Jerusalem, and his flight, it shall not be altogether impertinent to our History (though somewhat of some) in few words to declare what passed between him and the Arabians of Palatine, a little before the coming of Ebrain the great Baffa into those quarters; by which little, the desirous Reader may easily perceive the woful and troublesome state of that some time most blessed and fruitful, but now most miserable and barren Land of Jury, and of those Places in Holy Writ so much renowned.

The Land of Tauris

Arabian Thieves and Robbers.

In the Confines of Sodom, and in the Places that lie not only between the Lake Abraham and Danabos, but also in the Plains and in the Vallies of Jericho and of Samaria, and in other Places about Bethlehem, Leuzus, Bethanie, Bethage, Caparnaum, Nazareth, Levir, Bethsaida, Naples, and other Towns of Name thereof, there do haunt and live certain Arabian Pirates, who spreading themselves even as far as Buma and Joppa, over-run at their Pleasure all the Countries there round about, and continually commit grievous outrages, as well against the laid Cities, as also upon the Goods and Wealth, not only of the Inhabitants there, but also of the Strangers; yea and their Infolence oftentimes groweth so great, that they dare to assault the fenced Cities, beside the spoiling of Travellers, that by reason of their business have occasion to pass from one City to another. They are good Horse-men, but use no Armour; their Horses are very swift to run, and spare of Diet, and are themselves bold and adventurous Thieves. These Arabians, having had Intelligence, that the famous ambitious Youth, appointed Sannack of Jerusalem, was in mind to raise all the Sannacks thereabout; and joining himself with them, and his Father the Baffa of Damasco, to refrain their insolent Liberty, and to work their Destruction, resolved with themselves not to stay, until he and his Confederates were ready; but rather by sundry Invasions by him, even unto the Gates of Jerusalem, to provoke him to come out into the Field. And the rather to induce him so to do, they compacted with a certain Subbaffi of Bethlehem, their Friend, to encourage and animate the Sannack thereunto, by promising unto him good Success and prosperous Events. The ambitious young man, seduced with the glorious Performances of the false Subbaffi, of whom he made good reckoning, and provoked by their Infolences, resolved (as they had wished) to issue out of the City into the open Field; and thereupon having armed an hundred of his Vassals, and raised all the Horsemen that were under his Government, to the number of six hundred, he made a road towards Jericho, sending before defiance unto them; against whom the Arabians came accordingly, and with their Arrows and Indian Cans overwhelming his Harquebuzes, as if it had been a raging Flood, wrought him great woe; when in the very nick, the Battel yet being at the hottest, the traitorous Subbaffi fled towards Bethlehem, and left the Souldiers of Jerusalem in the hands of the Arabians, who put most part of them to the edge of the Sword, and scarcely gave Liberty to the Sannack to save himself by flight. The Sannack certainly informed of this Fraud of the dissembling Subbaffi, to be revenged upon him, began also in like manner to dissemble with him, feigning that he would come more try his Forces against the same Arabians; and so used the matter, that the Subbaffi, arriving Jerusalem, came unto him, without any Suspicion of the Michief intended against him. But as soon as he was come, the Sannack took him alive, and presently caused him in most cruel manner to be slain quick.

Thus having passed over the Troubles that stayed the People of Egypt and Damasco, and the Countries thereabout, from relating to Osman the Turks great General at Erzurum, as yet again return thither where we left him, taking a view of the Preparations against the Perfians, and the state of those Affairs, which of all others most exercised the Forces of the two mightiest Mahometan Monarchs; and with the Expectation thereof, filled the World from the East to the West.

The straight Commandment from Amarrath, together with the Fame and Reputation of Osman the General, had drawn together such a world of People of all sorts to Erzurum, as that it seemed not the Power of one King alone, but rather the united Forces of many Kings. Wherefore Osman, perceiving that he had gathered together too great a number of People, and too huge an Army, and that it might so fall out that he might want Victual for so great a Multitude (neither so greatly fearing his Enemies Forces, as that he needed to lead so populous an Army against them) determined to discharge a great number of such as he thought most weak, and least able to endure travel; so that out of this great Multitude he drew out about forty thousand Persons, who liberally, according to every mans Ability, redeeming the ordinary Perils of Wars, returned home to their own dwellings. And so in Osman's Army remained the number of an hundred and fourscore thousand Persons, or thereabouts. With this Multitude the General departed from Erzurum (about the eleventh of August this year 1585) towards Tauris, continuing for all that, the Speech for Naffian. But he had scarce marched two days, when divers Souldiers of Greece and Constantinople presented themselves before him, upbraiding him with great Impudence, and telling him, that they began already to feel the want of Victual, by wanting the same day their ordinary allowance of Corn for their Horses; so that if in the beginning, and as it were in the entrance of so long a Journey, they felt such want, they could not tell with what Judgment or so far as Naffian, nor by what cunning conceit he had presumed to sustain to great an Army in the Service of their Lord. Osman quickly heard their Complaints, and presently provided for them, by causing such store of Barley to be distributed among them, as they desired; and severely punished the Officers that had the charge for the allowance of Corn, who most covetously began to make Merchandise of the common Provision, by converting it to their own private Ends. And having on his Journey, and by the way of Hellen, Calist and of Chars, arrived upon the Calderan Plains, famous for the memorable Battels there fought between Selymus and Hymenae. In these Plains he took a general review of his Army, wherein there wanted a number, that by reason of Sickness being not able to continue the Journey, were informed to stay behind, some in one Place, some in another. Removing thence, he took the way. Naffian, as he had till hitherto given it out he would, but now directly to Tauris. Which so sudden an alteration of the Journey, as soon as the Souldiers of Greece and Constantinople heard, they fell into a great Rage, and coming again before the General, reviled with him in this sort to his Face.

And what are we, thou Villain, thou Turk, thou Dolt, whom thou hanst in this sort? We are neither Oxen nor Sheep of the Mountains, for the leading of whom thou thinkest thou art come out; neither are we brook fishes, thy Lies and Deceits. If thou hast publicly professed to lead us to Naffian, and by that Speech hast trained us from the farthest bounds of Gracia, to what end now, after thou hast wearied us so much, dost thou deceive us with such Fancies, and bring us on Journey, and set before us such strange and important dangers as our Minds never once thought on? But if this we thy first purpose and intent, and that now, not foolishly or by chance, but upon Precon- dition and good Advice thou changest thine Opinion, why dost thou dismiss so many Souldiers, as might have made the Army more terrible and stronger for the enterprise of Tauris? Dost thou think that by suffering Riches to redeem their Liberties, and so to increase thy Riches, thou shalt set our Lives in sale, and to make us slaves to the Perfians?

At these arrogant Speeches, the General was exceedingly troubled; (seeing his good meaning, and the earnest desire he had to advance the Mighty and Glory of his King, taken in so evil part, and those his best Souldiers so highly offended. And although he could indeed have readily used the sharpest and hardest Provisions and Remedies for it, that in such Occasions are ordinarily applied; yet upon good Advice he forbore for to do, and instead of Rigour and Punishment, resolved to work by more easie means. Whereupon, causing many of the Captains and chief men among those tedious Souldiers to come before him, he first persuaded them, That the former speech for Naffian was not raised at all by him, nor that he was minded at that time to go for Tauris; but all that was done, he had done to fulfill the Commandment to defend the Pertian Preparations; which they would undoubtedly have made far greater, if the speech had been given out at the first for Tauris. Which his princely Care of their Safety, they for their parts ought willingly to further, for that in so doing they should still preserve that great Opinion which both the King and the World had conceived of their Valour and Fidelity. Neither needed they to fear that the Souldiers, which were dismissed might weaken the Army, for that they themselves were not only sufficient to pierce into Tauris, and to open the way upon the Enemies, but to damn them even with their Looks; and that those which were discharged, had but purged the host of all Cowardice, and left nothing in but Virtue and Courage. By this mild answer of the General, the tumultuous Souldiers were sufficiently pacified, but much better apaid and contented they were, as soon as he put his hand to the common Purse, and bestowed among them all a small quantity of Money; for by this kind usage, all their Stomachs were overcome, and they themselves became so willing and so courageous, that now they durst venture not to Tauris only, but to Cashin, yea even to the farthest parts of all the Perfian Kingdom.

These important outrages thus appeased, the General turned himself such as his Army towards Coy, a City situate beyond Vain, in the midst between Tauris and the Marian River; where he refreshed his Army with all things he could desire. From Coy he passed to Marant, a City subject to the Perfians; plentiful also of all things needful for Man or Beast. From thence he leaned down towards Suffian; a fruitful Place, subject also to the Perfians; from whence he began to discover Tauris. Great was the Joy of the whole Camp, and now the mutinous Souldiers of Greece and Constantinople could highly commend the Advice of the General, or rather of Amarrath himself, in giving out the Rumour of Naffian for Tauris; as the only means whereby they were in quiet come so far, the Perfians being wholly occupied (as they supposed) about Naffian; inasmuch that every man being waxen courageous, and replenished with Joy, without any fear as he began proudly to plot unto themselves nothing but Sackings, Pillings, taking of Prisoners, Ravishments, Robberies, and all those insolent and outrageous Actions that use rarely to proceed from the greedy Adfections of those barbarous Villains; especially they of the Vainward, who being detours of Booty, and to discover the Enemy's Country, defended down towards certain pleasant Gardens full of all sorts of Trees, Springs, and Fruits; where having satisfied their Appetites, they withdrew themselves to a certain little River near to a Bridge called The Bridge of Sub-metter, and there staid at pleasure attending the coming of the Army. But even whilst they were thus enjoying the Water, the Fruits, the Shade, the green Grass, and other Delights of the Place, the Perfian Prince Enir Hamze, King Mahamets eldest Son, who with himself, washing full when some of the Enemies Bands should come down to those resting Places, Tauris, suddenly set upon them with such Speed, Courage and Fury, that as if it had been a lightning, and 1585 in a manner without any resistance he over-ran all the Turks, and dispersed them, putting to the Sword about seven thousand of them. And so leading away with him many Prisoners, Horses, Slaves, with sundry Ensigns and Turkish Drums, he withdrew himself back towards his blind Father, who lay then encamped about twelve miles from Tauris, with fifty thousand Souldiers or thereabouts; Alichi Chan Governour of Tauris being left in the City with 4000 Souldiers only. A greater Army than this, not exceeding the number of threecore and four thousand Men, was not the Persian King able to levie; the principal occasion whereof was the death of Emir Chan, for which the Turcoman Nation being waxen rebellious and disobedient, would not by any means be brought to defend that City, whereof Alichi Chan their Capital City was now Governour; and from Cheilan and Heri there came not so much as one Souldier to relieve the Necessities of Persia. So that with these small Forces in comparison of the Enemies, the Persian King had no stomach to meet the Turkish Army in plain Battel, but sought how he might with as little loss to himself as possibly he could, make trial of his Forces, and by all politick means to weaken and annoy his strong Enemy.

Ofman understanding of this discomforture of his Vanguard, forthwith dispatched Sinan Basha the Son of Cicada, and Mahamet the Basha of Caramit, with fourteen thousand Souldiers to pursue the victorious Prince: who in their pursuit used such Expedition, that at length they overtook him in the way towards his Fathers Camp. But as soon as the Prince saw the Turks to near him, that without a dangerous and shameful flight he could not avoid the Battel, courageously he turned his Face, and joyed with them a most bloody conflict; which began two hours before Night, was most fiercely maintained until that the Darkness of the Night bereaving them of the use of their Weapons, enforced both the one side and the other to retire. Which was done with the notable loss of the Turks, who in this second conflict (as it was commonly reported) lost six thousand men; and had (as it was thought) suffered a general slaughter, had not the Night interrupted to uncouth an Addition, well worthy of a thousand Day-lights. So that hitherto the Turks sustained the loss of more than ten thousand Souldiers, and yet had scarce discovered or seen the City which they so greedily longed after.

The next Morning the Turks Camp removed and came within two Miles of Tauris, where they incamped. But whilst they were setting up their Tents, Alichi Chan issuing out of the City with all his Garrison and such of the Citizens as were fit to bear Arms, set upon the Face of the Vanguard, being now renewed, and with many cunning turnings and windings fo charged them, that with great loss he forced them to retire even unto the main Battel; where after he had espied the great Artillery, he without hurt withdrew himself again to the City. The Confusion of the Turks in this Skirmish was notable, for in a very small time the Vanguard was disordered, and almost three thousand slain. But Alichi not so contented, in the shutting in of the Evening sallied out of the City the second time, and swiftly running along that side of the Army that lay towards Tauris, slew the Basha of Maras, and did great harm in that quarter; which done, without any paying he fled to the Kings Camp, and forsook the Defence of that formidable City which he could not hold. Nevertheless the Taurians, as many of them as remained in the City, gathered themselves together to the Gates of the City, well armed, prepared to make a bloody entrance for the Turks whenever they should come. All the Night was spent in watching without rest on either side, and yet nothing attempted; but upon the break of the day, a great multitude of the fervile foot of the Turks, and of the common rascal rout, without any order from their Captains, armed with Corselets, Spears, and Swords, went to the City with Resolution to have sacked it, and to have enriched themselves with the Spoil and Pillage of that wealthy City. But when they came to the guarded Gates of the City, they found there contrary to their Expectation, a terrible Refuge, and were enforced there to join an hard and mortal Battel; so that the Walls, the Entrance, yea and all the Ground thereabout was bathed with Blood, and as it were, covered with Weapons and dead Carcasses. And yet for all that, though the Persians stood fast and firm at the arrival of this fervile rout, at last they were constrained to yield the entrance, being overcome by the Multitude of them that out of the Camp flowed in upon them like a Flood; and retiring into the City, now astonished and amazed on every side, they fortified themselves in their Houses under the Ground, and in the corners and winding turnings of the Streets; from whence with their Arrows and some few Harquebuzes, they did the Turks that entered, great harm. Yet were they not able to kill and destroy so many of their Enemies, but that at the last they were too mighty for them, and wrought many grievous Mischiefes in that woful City. And so a great number of the rascal People that remained alive, returned to the Turkish Camp, carrying away with them too manifest Tokens of the poor oppressed City; wherein the miserable Woman and impotent Souls flood embracing and straining the Doors and Posts of their Houses, and kissing their native Soil, with Prayers, Mourning, and Complaints, bewailing their present Miseries, and yet fearing worse to come. Ofman the General now made acquaintance with these Calamities, caused Proclamation to be published, That no man should be so hardy as to molest the Taurians, and in the mean time went himself about the City, viewing thoroughly the Situation of it, and surveying the Place wherein he might both incamp himself safely, and with better Foundation and greater Security erect a Castle or Fort, for the more assurance of that conquered Country.

The City of Tauris seated at the foot of the Hill Orantes, about eight days Journey from the Caspian Sea, and is subject to Winds, Cold, and Snow, yea of a very wholesome Air, abounding with all things necessary for mans Life; and wonderful rich, with perpetual concourse of Merchandise brought thither out of the East, to be conveyed unto the West; and also of others brought out of these Western Parts, to be dispersed into the East. It is very populous, so that it feedeth almost two hundred thousand Persons; but yet open to the Fury of every Army, without Walls, and unfortified. The Buildings (after the manner of those of the East) are of burnt Clay, rather low than high. For all things it carrieth the Name, and was the Place of the Persian Kings Residence, until such time as that the late King Tamas removed his seat from thence further into his Kingdom to Cashin; nevertheless both before and since, although it had been sundry times molested by the Inroads and Fury of the Turkish Emperours, yet was it still in great Estimation and Repute.

Of this City Ofman Basha having taken diligent view, caused his Tents to be pitched on the South side thereof, where was a spacious Garden all flourishing and beautiful, replenished with sundry kind of Trees and sweet smelling Plants, and a thousand Fountains and Brooks derived from a pretty River, which with his pleasant Stream divided the Garden from the City of Tauris; and was of so great Beauty, that for the delicacy thereof it was by the Country Inhabitants called Sechis Genet (that is to say) the eight Paradises; and was in times past the standing House of their Kings, while they kept their Residence in the City; and after they had withdrawn their Seat from thence to Cashin, became the Habitation and Place of abode for the Governours of Tauris. Of these Gardens and Places Ofman made choice to build his Castle in; whereof he gave the model himself, and commanded that all the whole Circuit of those pleasant Greens should be invironed with Walls, and Trenches digged round about them to convey the Water from the aforesaid River. Which was accordingly begun with the greatest care that possibly might be; the Foundation of the imbatteled Walls laid, the Ditches digged sixteen foot broad, and a mans height in depth; and in the space of six and thirty days the whole work finished and brought to an end; great force of Artillery mounted upon the Walls, and divers Baths, Lodgings, and such other Houses necessary for the Turkish uses, built within the Castle. The first day of this building Ofman fell sick of a Fever, with a bloody Flux; which haply was the cause both of his illness of the Building, and of many other losses that afterwards happened in it, shall be hereafter declared.

Five days after the building of the Castle was begun, News was brought into the Turkish Camp, That eight Janizaries and divers Spanglans were seen strangled in a Bath within the City of Tauris. Whereupon the Zaini, Spahini, and Janizaries came presently unto the General, declaring unto him, That although he had with too much Clemency given order, That no man should hurt or molest the Taurians, and according to his Pleasure every man had used Modesty towards them, and Obedience to him; yet the Taurians themselves had most audaciously strangled in one of their Baths eight Janizaries, and certain Spanglans, which Injury and Insolency (they said) in their Judgment was not to be suffered. This outrage lo moved the General, that without any further delay he commanded the City to be sacked, leaving it wholly to the Pleasure of his Souldiers; who forthwith to used the matter, not as if they would have revenged an Injury, but rather as they have brought an utter Destruction upon the whole City. Every place was filled with Slaughter, Ravishment, Rapine, and Murder; Virgins were defouled, Men-children defiled with horrible and unpeakeable Sins; Younglings snatched out of their Parents Arms, Houses layed even with the Ground and burnt, Riches and Money carried away, and in brief, all things minated and wasted. Neither were these Mischiefes committed once only, but the second followed worse than the first, and the third upon that worse than the second; so that it was a misery almost inexplicable, to behold that City so populous, so rich, sometimes the Court and Palace of the Persian Kings, and honour of that Empire, now subject to the Fury of the Turks, plunged in Calamity and utter Destruction.

The woful Advertisement hereof sore troubled the Persian King, but the young Prince his Son much more; who, moved with the Passions of most inward Grief, Didder, and Despair, and desiring nothing more than Revenge, resolved to attempt any thing whereby to requite so great a Wrong. In which Resolution having confirmed his Army, he commanded 500 of his Horsemen to present themselves even to the very sight of the Enemies Tents, and as it were to dare them to Battel. Which thing they performed accordingly, and made a gallant shew of themselves. At the discovery whereof, the Turks imagining that the Persians were come in great number to assail the Army, order was given by the fickle General, That Cicada Basha and Mahamet the Basha of Caramit, with the People of Gracia, and all their own Forces, should go to encounter the Enemy; who presently, with their Ensigns displayed, under which there stood about four and thirty thousand strong, besides a number of fervile People, yet men exercised in Labours and Perils, in all, well near forty thousand, let forward. Now the five hundred Persians, with a marvellous cunning kind of skirmishing, dallied with the Turkish Souldiers, and drew them forward for the space of eight Miles and more; and being brought so far on, and now forewarned with the skirmish, were lustily assailed by the Persian Prince, who with part of his Army (to the number of about twenty thousand Persons) courageously let upon the two Bashes, and joyed with them the deadliest and cruellest Battel that ever was written of. Wherein the Persians, having given a most perilous Onset, and done great harm, it was thought that they would have contented themselves with so lucky an Encounter, and so retired; which the Turks minding to prevent, and not to return without a notable Victory, hardly pressed upon him, hoping in the end to put them to flight, and to give them the cause of many other losses that afterwards happened in it, shall be hereafter declared. But the Persians, having quietly and with great assurance for a reasonable space endured their charge, at last as if they had been fresh men, made head upon them afresh, and began a most terrible Battel anew, wherein the Basha of Caramit (above named) was put to flight, and being wholly dismayed and discomfited, fled back again to the Camp, carrying with him the most manifest tokens of the unhappiness of the Battel. Cicada, the other Basha, notwithstanding valiantly and with great cunning still sustained the Fury of the Persians, labouring by all means to encourage his Souldiers, and to have restored the Battel; but when he had done what he could, overcome at last by greater Valour, he was enforced to betake himself to flight also; and so altogether discomfited, came to the Camp without any Ensign, having left behind him eight thousand of his Souldiers dead upon the Ground.

The Persian Prince, encouraged with this so fortunate Victory, by speedily Heralds sent to the sick Visier (whom he thought notwithstanding to have been in Health) and gave him to understand, that if he were willing to fight, he was ready for him, and in what sort soever it pleased him to accept of Battel, to make him good account of his Valour; and to cause him to know, not only that Amurath his Master had most unjustly raised this War, but also that it had been good for himself not to have taken the same in hand. Of this offer Ofman accepted; but being not able himself to go and answer the Prince in Person hand to hand, by reason of his Sickness, which every hour mortally increased, he sent out all his Captains with his Army to dare him Battel.

The Prince lay ten miles or thereabouts distant from the Camp of Ofman, towards whom the Turks let forward in this manner: The main Battel was guided by the Basha of Caramit and Sinan Basha, with all the Souldiers of Assiria and Babylon; the left Wing was led by the Basha of Natalia, with the Band of Gracia; and the right wing was conducted by Amurath Basha of Caramania, with the People of Soria; to the number of threecore thousand, besides such as were left behind at Tauris, with the trusty guard of the Janizaries, and the Artillery, for the safeguard of the Sick Visier. In this order they confronted the Persian Prince, who was himself in the midst of his Army, with all his

People in very good order having on the one side the Souldiers of Perfia and Armenia, and on the other that of Tauris and Amurath, in all, the number of forty thousand. The Turks fought nothing more, than that the Perfians feared a great compals about, should with all Celery and Fury set upon their Tents, and the Riches they had laid up together in their Pavilions; and therefore at every motion of theirs they continually feared this sudden out-road; whereof they had such especial care, that retiring themselves as much as they might, and feigning as if they had given Place to the Perfians, it wanted not much but that they had brought them even within the just level and mark of their Artillery. Which the Perfians perceiving, without any further dallying hardly began to assail the main Body of the Batel. The Prince himself being entered amongst the Souldiers of the Baffa of Caracem (who as General sustained the Place of Ofman) and pressing into the midst of the Batel, dispatched every man that came in his way; and having singled out the Baffa from the rest, more off his Head, and gave it to one of his Followers to carry upon the top of his Lance. Which being openly defied, brought a great Terror upon the Turks, and exceedingly encouraged the Perfians, who embued with the Blood of their Enemies, and intermingling themselves more and more among them, made of them a most confused and general laughter; wherein beside the Baffa before-named, there died also the Baffa of Tripolis, the Sanczak of Brusia, with five other Sanczaks, and as it was commonly reported, twenty thousand Turks more. It fell also to the Lot of Amurath Baffa of Caracem to be there taken Prisoner, with divers other common Souldiers. But Night coming now on, and the Perfians being come somewhat too nigh the Turkish Artillery, they gave over the fight, and withdrew themselves back to the Place where the King lay incamped with the rest of his Army.

But now were divers days spent, wherein the new Fortrefs at Tauris (as we have before said) was fully finished, when the Souldiers of Græcia and Constantinople, wearied to see their Friends and Fellows thus slain before their Faces, and having also safely laid up in their own Custody such Preys and Booties as they had gotten in the sack of the City, resolved with themselves to procure their own departure, and so much the rather, for that the Winter was now fast coming on. And forasmuch as the General was through the immediate flux of blood brought weak, and in despair of Life, and quite abandoned of all hope by his Physicians, and therefore not to be spoken withal, they were fain by the Mouth of such as were their trusty Friends about him, to represent unto him the Necessity of their return, and withal after many reverend Intreaties, caused it also to be signified unto him. That if he stood obdurate, and would needs lay dallying out the time in those dangerous Places where no such need was, they should be informed to withdraw themselves, and to forsake him. Ofman, who had now nothing else to do in those Countries, but only to leave some convenient Garrison in the new Fortrefs at Tauris, liberally promised to satisfy their Requests, by departing the next Morning. So calling unto him Giffier the Eunuch Baffa of Tripolis, a man of a crafty and cruel Nature, made him Governour and Keeper of the new built Fortrefs at Tauris. And the more to encourage him to take the charge upon him, he gave him treely for the space of three whole years, not only the Office and Authority, but also the Rents and Revenues of the Baffa of Caracem, lately slain by the Perfian Prince, and withal honoured him with the Title of a Baf-

la of the Court; so that having finished his three years Office of Caracem, he was then to go and sit among the lowermost Seats of the Baffas of the Forta. The Baffa seeing fo fair and fo high a way for him to mount to those high honours (greater than which there is none in the Turkish Empire) readily accepted the offer, and dispatching his Lieutenant to Caracem, to the Government of those Countries in his Absence, with an hundred of his own Followers, setled himself in the said Fort with a Garrison of twelve thousand Souldiers, furnished with all necessary Provision until the next Spring. The General having thus set all things in order, and carefully provided for the safety of the Fortrefs, departed according to his Promise, and the same Morning (which was the fourteenths and fiftenth day which his departure from Erebrum) came to a Place called Sancacan, seven Miles distant from Tauris.

The Turks were now upon the point of their incamping, in a confused disorder and hubbubly, when those that were hindermost in the Army heard the neighing of Horses, and the noise of Drums and Trumpets, as if it had been the coming of an Army. Which when the whole Camp understood, they ran headlong and disordered as they were, to the rescue, on that side where the noise of the Horses and warlike Instruments was heard. But whilst the Turks were thus intent upon going on that side to expect the coming of the Enemy, the Perfian Prince without any sign or token of Batel, with 28000 Horsemen was ready upon them on the other side; who having discovered the Camels and other Carriages, whereupon their Booty, their Spoils and their Riches were laden, which they had taken in Tauris, beside much of their Provision of Viduals for the Maintenance of the Army, he turned upon them, and with a pident and safe Convoy had taken for a Prey eighteen thousand of the Camels and Mules well laden with the same Booties and Viduals; which the Prince felt presently away with six thousand of his Souldiers, and he himself with his two and twenty thousand Perfians entered into the Turks Army, who now to withstand his assault, had on that side also made head against him. A gallant thing it was, and terrible withal, to see what a mortal Batel was made, what singular Prowess shewed even presently in the fore-front of the Batel; for in a moment you might have seen the Tents and Pavilions turned upside down, and their incamping Lodgings replenished with dead Carcasses and Blood, victorious Death ranging and reigning in every Corner. The Turks themselves were astonished and marvelled to see their Enemies (so few in number, and intermingled among so populous an Army of warlike People) more like fatal Ministers of Death, than mortal men; so brandish their Swords over them, as if it had lightened, and to make fo general a slaughter; and do to this day with great Admiration recount the Valour and Prowels of the Perfians. But they all now doubtless have entered the very Lodgings of the sick Visier, now at the last gasp, but by him who at that time commanded in his Name) That without delay the Artillery should be unbarr'd and discharged: which in that Medly and Confusion of both Armies, without any Exception or Distinction of Persons, overthrow both Friends and Foes, and did more harm perhaps among the Turks themselves, than among the Perfians: for at the first thundering noise thereof the Prince with all speed retired; after whom presently followed all the rest: so that the Turks which remained behind, were more annoyed with the deadly thro, than with the Perfians, who flying away, could not feel the damage, but that the Turks must first be well paid for their Labour. The Turks pursuing the flying Perfians, made them as if they would gladly have overtaken them; but Night coming on, they feared to proceed any further than they might without Danger return. In this Batel of Sancacan were slain twenty thousand Turks, without any notable loss of the Perfians.

Among the rest, in the same place died the Visier Ofman, General of the late dreadful, but now desolate Army; not by the hand of the Enemy, but consumed with the vehemency of an Age, and flux of Blood. Whole Death notwithstanding was kept secret from the whole Army, every man verily thinking, that it was but only the continuance of his Sickness, because the Charters wherein he lay, were fill kept close; and in his Name Cicila Baffa (for so he had appointed in his will) gave out Answers and Commandments to the whole Army. Nevertheless it was disclosed to the Perfians by means of three young men, who in the Life of Ofman having charge of his Jewels and Treasure, were with the best thereof and the fairest of his Horse fled to the King, to whom they revealed the Death of the General. The Perfians, who before had thought it not possible for so great cowardice and dishonourable kind of fighting and ordering an Army to have proved true, as that from the Virtue and Valour of Ofman, of whose worth they had too manifest a trial and experience in times past, now understanding of his Death, were thereby encouraged to attempt the utter overthrow of the Turkish remnant, and so to give them an honourable farewell. Whereupon the Perfian Prince with 14000 men followed the Turks, who had now rallied the Camp, and were encamped to a certain River, called Sale-water, not far from Sancacan, where the Prince caused a few Tents to be pitched, about four or five miles distant from the Turkish Camp, the afore said Book running in the midst between the two Armies. Now the Prince had purposed to have assailed the Turks in the Morning, whilst they were lodging their Carriages, hoping in that Confusion to have wrought them some notable Mischief; which his designment was revealed unto the Turks by one of his Spies whom they had caught. And therefore they did neither rise fo early in the Morning as their manner was, nor load their stuff until such time as they were all armed, and on Horseback ready to receive their Enemies. By which their wary and unusual manner of rising, the Perfians perceived that their purpose was by some means discovered. And yet considering that if they should lose this occasion, they should find no other good Opportunity to annoy them before the next Spring, they usually resolved to adventure the assault; and having observed that the Enemies Artillery was on the right side of the Army, they in the fight of every man began to enter on the left. But the Turks presently fo uncovered and unbarr'd their Artillery against the assailants, as was to their great loss and danger. Howbeit they were fo nimble and fo quick to shroud themselves under the Enemies Army, and to avoid the mischievous Tempets, that being come now very near the Turks Squadrons, they must needs joy Batel with them. The Perfians had purposed before, as soon as they saw the Turks begin to stir, to retire, and so to draw them on into a very filthy and deep marish; which being then dry, was not feared or doubted of any, but only by those, that were acquainted therewithal, or born thereabouts. Which their policy the Rebel Mazen Chan, and with him Dam Chan (as being well acquainted with those places) perceiving, gave notice thereof to Cicila Baffa, who presently caused a great compassing wing to be made, commanding them to set upon the Perfians, and charge them home; which was forthwith put in Execution, so that their fore-front opened it self with very large and spacious corners upon the Prince, who no sooner saw this their unwonted order of coming on, but by and by he perceived that his purpose was discovered; and thereupon without any stay he began to retire, calling his People after him; which could not so suddenly be done, but that three thousand of them remained behind, all miserably stifled, overthrowen in the mire, with very little loss to the Turks. And this only batel of five that were fought under Tauris, and in those quarters, was less hurtful to the Turks than to the Perfians.

The Prince returned to the King his Fathers Camp, returning unto him the whole Action, together with the departure of the Enemy. And fo the Turks came to Salmis, where the Death of the General was published; from Salmis they went afterwards to Van, where they took a survey of their Army, and found wanting therein about fourscore and five thousand Perfians, or as some lay more. At Van all the Souldiers were dismissed; and Cicila from thence gave notice to Amurath at Constantinople, of all that had happened. Where first was published the Death of Ofman the General, (for whom were made many great and great sorrow) and together with his Death, were blazed the bloody and mortal Actions that were in that Expedition performed; so that the whole City seemed to be greatly discomfited; and in many places were heard much sorer railing upon the King, many Curses of this War, and insolent Maledictions of these manifold Mischiefs. After that, was dispersed the great Fame of the new Fortrefs erected at Tauris; a certain River, called Sale-water, and of all the loss that had happened therein; and a general Edict published in the Kings Name, that through all the Cities of his Empire they should make solemn Feasts, with other exprets Tokens of Joy and Rejoicing; which was accordingly done both in Constantinople and other Places. There was also word sent to the Ambassadors of Hungary, of France, of Venice, and of other Countries, That they should do the like; but they all with one accord answered, That it was never the Custom of Ambassadors to make any such signs of Rejoicing, but only when the King himself in Person returned from any the like Victories.

In the mean time Consultation was held at Van, for the sending of Succours to Teflis in Georgia; unto which important Service, Dam Chan to deserve some Reward at Amurath's hand, offered himself, unto whom Cicila Baffa delivered thirty thousand Creschies to be conveyed to the Fort at Teflis. Which piece of service the Kensagat performed, and without trouble relieved the Souldiers in the Fort; which was so well accepted of Amurath, that he for the same good Service honoured him with the Dignity of the Baffa of Maras. Mazen Chan also the other Perfian Rebel, that guided the Turkish Army to Roivan, and afterwards to Tauris, was in like manner by the same Amurath honoured with the great rich Office of the Baffa of Alleppe.

The Mischies the Turkish Army endured in this Expedition for Tauris, beside the Losses before rehearsed, were wonderful; for as the Sanczak of Amurath (a City of Soria, called in ancient time Amapea) present in all this Action, reporteth in a Letter which he wrote to Ali Baffa of Alleppe, there was such a dearth in the Turks Army, that they were enforced to give their Camels Biquet and Rice, and when that was scarce, they gave them their pack-Saddles to eat, and after that, pieces of Wood 1585 beaten into Powder, and at last the very Earth, which death endured until they arrived at Tauris. And at Tauris, whilst the Fortels were in building, they were of necessity constrained to give their Horses their Dung in very drie Powder. By reason whereof there followed a grievous mortality of Horses, Camels, Mules, and Men; and the stink which grew of this Mortality was so great, that every man was faine to carry a piece of a strong smelling Onion under his Nose, to avoid the heaveins thereof.

The Fort so lately built in the Royal City of Tauris, exceedingly grieved the Perfians in general, but especially the King and the Prince his Son; to let it alone, they reckoned it too great a shame, and how to demolish it they knew not well, finding themselves not only destitute of Artillery, but also of such sufficient strength as was requisite for performance of so great an Enterprize; yet, picked on with desire of Glory, and the necessity of the Cause, they determined even in the depth of Winter to gather new Forces, and with Trenches of Earth to approach the Ditch, and to try if they could advance a Countermine as high as their Walls, and so to attain to the Conquest thereof. But in the gathering of their Men they discovered new Difficulties; for, to hire any Souldiers either from Heri or Cheilan, was denied them by Abas and Amir Chan; and their Turcoman Nation, which might have been the readiest and the nearest at such a need, for the Death of Emir Chan, and for the Succession of Alchah, were grown very contumacious; so that neither the King, nor the Prince, nor the Presidents and Governors of that Kingdom, could tell which way to turn themselves. At last, for the common safety, they determined to draw the Turcomans to a Reconciliation; hoping that by promising them any honest Satisfaction for the wrong wherewith they challenged themselves grieved for the Death of their Captain, they would become more tractable to do them Service in their common Necessities. Whereupon the King sent kind Letters to the Heads and Captains of these Nations, and principally to Mahamet Chan, and to Chahise the Sultan; declaring plainly unto them the Perils of his State, and of the Liberty of the whole Kingdom, with the Confidence he had in their Valour; and that therefore forgetting all that was past, as done not in shame or scorn of their Nation, but only for Zeal and Love to the Kingdom, they would demand full Satisfaction as they desired, and that he would be ready to agree to any just request they should make. To which Letters they readily answered, that they would come unto him, to put in Execution whatsoever he should for the common Necessity or Honour of his State command. Now they had crafted amongst themselves already concluded not to suffer any other to sit in the room of Emir Chan their late Governour, but only young Tamas the Kings third Son. Which Conclusion they had plotted to themselves, with a Resolution in the end, to cause him to be accepted for King at Casbin, in despite of the King himself, and of the Prince Hamek; nothing regarding, that by this Action far greater Troubles would arise in Perfia than ever were yet heard of; but only being wholly bent to revenge the Death of one only Emir Chan. With this malicious and fraudulent Resolution, they to the number of ten thousand (under the conduct of two Captains, Mahamet and Calife) went to the King, in all Reverence offering themselves with all readines to be employed in the enterprise wherunto they were called. The old credulous King, not suspecting any mischief plotted by these secret Rebels, was greatly comforted at their coming; and although by some of his Sultans that had felt some inkling of this Conspiracy, he had secretly to use and to be used with them, and not commit any matter of importance to their trust; yet did he think every hour a thousand until he had offered them Satisfaction, promising them, that what Captain soever they would desire in the room of Emir Chan, if it were possible, they should have him. Whereunto the dissembling Mahamet Chan made answer, That their desire above all things, was to do him Pleasure and Service; not doubting but he would appoint them such a Chieftain, as should be valourous, noble, and acceptable unto them. The King could say no longer, but frankly declared unto them, That to assure them of his good will, and to give them an Hostage in pawn thereof, he had made choice of young Tamas his Son, to succeed in the room of Emir Chan their late Governour. As soon as Mahamet Chan heard this Resolution of the King, who beside all expectation, voluntarily of himself yielded them the means to put in Execution what they had maliciously before contrived against the Peace and Liberty of the Kingdom; he became more joyful than he was wont to be, and outwardly shewed himself ready for whatsoever the King would command him; and in the Names of the rest, yielded also large Promises of Fidelity and Obedience, so that the matter might be performed for which he had now given his Word.

The King, who desired nothing more than to see the Fort of Tauris raised (which could hardly be done without the help of those Turcomans) conformed to the Advice of the wisest of the Sultans, and of the Prince, secretly, and as it were by stealth, gave his young Son Tamas into the hands of Mahamet, as chief of all the Turcomans. Who, to nourish the good Opinion and Credulity of the King, and to secure the Prince and the Sultans, gave a lustre beginning, by the help of his Followers, with Trenches and Rampiers to approach the Fort. Neither was there any great time spent therein; for they had now almost made their Trenches and Rampiers even with the Enemies Wall, and the Ditch it self was almost filled up with Earth, so that there wanted but little more Labour to begin the desired assault; when, contrary to all Mens Expectation, the false and wicked Traitor Mahamet Chan with all his Turcomans, leading away with them the Child Tamas, departed in the Night-time, and upon a sudden, from so noble and honourable an enterprize; and, blinded with desire to put in Execution his ill-hatched purpose, covertly and without any noise, removed from the besieged Walls, and put himself on his way towards Casbin, still terming Tamas by the Name of the King of Perfia, and sundry ways abusing and mocking the poor old King and the Prince. This so sudden and so dangerous a Rebellion, whereby not only so honourable and so necessary an enterprize was to be abandoned, but the whole state of the Kingdom like to be endangered, exceedingly grieved all good men, but most of all the old King and the Prince his Son; who, no less careful of his rightful Succession, than was the aged King of his present Estate, both now hazarded by this Rebellion; wholly incensed with Grief and Anguish of Mind, began to cast a thousand Devices in his troubled Head, what course to take, and what to resolve upon. To abandon the siege it grieved him above measure, and to suffer so pernicious a Rebellion to go forward, seemed too dangerous for the State of Perfia; and to provide for both these Michiefs at once, was altogether impossible. In these huge Waves of contrary Thoughts, he resolved at last to turn himself against the Turcomans, and to suppress that Rebellion, as most dangerous to the State. And so with twelve 1585 twelve thousand Souldiers, and a part also of the Kings ordinary Guard, all courageous and hardy men, he followed after the rebellious Turcomans; and marching directly toward Casbin, he overtook them at a place called Calfeza, a daies Journey on this side Casbin, and there joined Battell with them. Wherein, many of them being sorry for that they had done, would not so much as draw their Swords against the Prince; many others fled also away for fear, so that he easily obtained a wished Victory over them. The feditious Mahamet Chan was taken Prisoner, and by the Princes Commandment presently beheaded; so was also Calife the Sultan, and divers other Captains of this pestilent Conspiracy. Young Tamas was also taken, and by the Direction of the Prince sent to the City of Chahise. Five thousand Turcomans of the late Followers of the Rebel Mahamet, fled out of the Battell towards Babylon by the way of Siras, and yielded themselves to Solyman, Basha of that City; who afterwards repenting themselves of their Folly, fought to return again into the Favour of their King, but all in vain; so that being become Rebels to the one, and suspected to the other, they did at one time lose their Country, their Liberty, their Honour, and the Favour of all Men, as well Friends as Enemies. The Prince after this Victory held on his way to Casbin, and there staying, laboured to gather the dispersed Turcomans, especially those that (moved with the honesty of the cause) would not bear Arms in so unjust an Action, intending afterwards to return to Tauris, to attend the besieging and conquest of the Fort. This was the end of this dangerous Rebellion, the chief cause that Tauris was not again recovered out of the hands of the Turks, to the great weakening of the Perfian Kingdom.

Now Giasfer the Eunuch Basha Governour of the Castle of Tauris, fearing lest the Perfian Prince would with a greater Army again return to the siege; perceiving himself to wax every day weaker and weaker, by reason that many of his men secretly fled from him, beside them that perished with Sicknes, and others slain in adventuring too boldly to go abroad to seek for Victuals; sent Advertisement thereof to Cicada Basha at Van; signifying further unto him by Writing, That if the Prince should again return to assault the Fort, he should of Necessity be enforced to yield it; and that therefore, as he tendered the honour of his Sultan, he would be careful to send him Succour, whereby he might be able to maintain the Fort; adding moreover, That now it was most easily to be done, because there was no Forces of the Enemies in those quarters, saving only a few which remained about the King, lying twelve miles off from Tauris. Cicada, moved with the importance of the enterprize propounded, and withall desirous to gain some credit of Glory and Renown with his King, entertained the Advices of Giasfer, and getting him to horse with a train of three thousand Harquebuzers, and good store of Munition, set forward toward Tauris. The Perfian King advertised thereof, sent out Spies to learn what way they held, meaning to meet them and to set upon them; but these Spies coming near to Salmas, were apprehended by the fore-runners of Cicada, and being put to Torture, revealed at last, how that their King was in Arms, and on his way towards Sancascan. At which News Cicada was greatly affrighted, as well for the danger wherewith the Forces and Munition which he had with him were likely to fall, as also for that by any loss which his Troops should sustain in this Expedition, the City of Van (being indeed the greater and most noble frontier Town in all those Countries) must needs be in hazard to be lost, having left in

The Turcomans did combine, and Mahamet Chan and Calife the Sultan beheaded.

Giasfer Basha sent to Cicada Basha for Aid.

The Turcomans forsook the siege, and fell into Rebellion.

1585 it but his Lieutenant with a very few Souldiers. Whereupon he determined to relinquish this dangerous enterprize, and to withdraw himself back to the Defence and Preservation of the City committed to his Trust and Government. But although these expected and desired Succours were not conveyed to Tauris as was intended, yet had Giasfer as good Fortune as he could wish; for the Preparations of the Prince were so long and troublesome, and his return so much prolonged, that there was time enough yielded unto the Turks great General, now newly chosen (as by and by shall be declared) to go with a strong Army into those quarters, and to preserve all that which the only Expedition and Celerity of the Enemy might have put in great hazard, and almost have brought to a desperate case.

In the mean time, Annurath the Turkish Emperour was greatly troubled at Constantinople in making choice of a new General, on the one side, Ofman Basha having by his last Will left Sinan Cicada to be his Successor, as a man of approved Valour; and the many dangers he had run through in the late Service about Tauris, with the great favours he had in the Court, did not a little incline the King to his Election: on the other side, he heard of a public Rumour spread amongst the Souldiers, that they could by no means indure to be commanded by so young a Captain; and that some plain terms should lay, That they would not obey him: Which caused Annurath to doubt, that some dangerous discord might thereof ensue in the Army, if he should proceed to make choice of him. Then there was also Ferat Basha, the same man which had already sustained the charge before Ofman, who now very ambitiously fought again for this Honour, having of late performed some good Service to the good liking of the King. Or any other to make better his Cause, he had none, so that he stood in great doubt what to do. In the end, because he was in good time to provide for his Affairs, he made choice of Ferat Basha, the same man whom he had before made proof of: a man of great Fidelity, of an honourable Carriage, and already experienced in the leading and commanding of such an Army, to whom he granted the ordinary Authority, to manage at his pleasure such Affairs of the Empire as concerned his Journey. Upon this Resolution, general Precepts were sent out to all Cities within the Kingdom, to the Bashes and other Governours, with special Commandment, That all their Souldiers, together with their Taxes, Tentis, Munitions, Victuals, Armour, Artificers, and to be short, all their necessary Furniture and Provision should be ready and in order, upon the first warning should be sent them the next Spring. Great provision of Money was made, and in Soria (besides the ordinary sum that is bestowed upon the yearly pay of Souldiers in Reison, Erzurum, Lari, Tamania, Albata, and Chors, which swallow up all the Revenue of that Country, and of the City of Tripoli, amounting to the sum of six hundred thousand Ducckats) there was taken up in prest of private Merchants in the City of Alleppe only, the sum of three hundred thousand Cecchini, to be repaid unto them with the first Monies that should be received by the Officers of his Custom-houses. A matter that moved an extraordinary grudging among the People, for that it seemed to every man a very strange and intolerable Exaction, beside so many grievances laid upon them, for Corn, for Carriages, for Pioneers, and for Workmen, to endure this burdenable load of lending their Money, without hope of Restitution thereof: yea and indeed every man did greatly wonder how they were thus ill-advised, to make it known to the Christian People what scarcity and want of Money they had.

had. The General had also with him four hundred pieces of Artillery, and did bidde to work the matter, as that Musul Chan (who was appointed Baffa of Aleppo) was granted unto him to be the guide of his Army, as he had been of Ofman; and that Cicada Baffa of Van (for his good fidelity) was removed from thence, and sent farther off out of his way as Baffa to Babylon.

And thus having put all things in readinesse, he departed from Constantinople in the Month of April, in the year 1586, and passing over the Strait into Asia, came to Sivas somewhat later than he should have done, being hindered partly by the Plague, which then raged exceedingly in Constantinople, and partly by other occasions incident to such Actions. At Sivas he staid so long for the coming together of his Army, and in mustering Men, that it was the latter end of July before he departed thence; staying indeed the longer at Sivas, by reason of the exceeding Dearth and want of Victuals at Erzirum: which Dearth was also for great in Aleppo, that a Venice bushel of Wheat was sold for twelve Cecchiat.

But yet making his abode at Sivas, but ready to depart, was advertised by certain Posts sent from Giasfer the Baffa of Tauris, how that the Perfian Prince was hourly expected with a great Army, and that if he did foreclose to send Succours, and to prevent the coming of the Prince, and so give him time and leisure to assault the Castle, he doubted greatly how he should be able to hold the fame. Upon which Advertisement Ferat presently removed, and so halted his Journey, that about the beginning of August he was at Erzirum; and still hearing more and more of the Princes coming, staid not there, but halted to Van; where having gathered together all his Souldiers, and taken a new Survey of his Army, he departed thence; and being presently come into the open and large Cham-pains, to make use of the readinesse of his Souldiers, he marshalled the Troops, as if he should forthwith have joynted Battle with the Enemy, and so in feemly order marched on.

The Turkish General continually feared, lest the Perfian should come upon him with some sudden assault; besides that, the constant report of the Princes coming to Tauris with his Army, much increased his troubled Thoughts. But on the other side, he repoyed great Confidence in the Conspiracy that was now plotted against the Life of the Prince, with the privacy of Ali-chi Chan the Protector and Champion of Abas Mirise of Heri, who under the colour of accompanying the Prince to assist his Forces, had resolutely concluded with himself, and absolutely-promised Abas (having also given Intelligence thereof to the Turkish General) to rid the Prince Hamm of his Life; or at least (which he thought might more easily be brought to pass) in the sundry Revolutions and variable Chances of the Battle, at some time or other to make him fall into the hands of Ferat, and so to settle his Lord and Master Abas in his Estate. Upon these Treacheries Ferat grounding himself, being with greater Confidence to dispose his Designs, and somewhat less to fear the Fame of the huge Preparations of Perfians against him. Which Preparations in truth, as by most wicked Devices and malicious Conspiracies they were turned quite contrary from that end whereunto the Prince Hamm had continually appointed them; so if they had been employed with such Faith and Fidelity as so righteous a cause required, without all doubt the Writers of our time should have had matter enough in this 80 year to shew and represent unto the World fuch Accidents as should be nothing inferior to those of the year before-going. But forasmuch as Rebellion and Discord, the two inferiour Ministers of the Devil, have for the utter undoing and overthrow of the Glory of Perfia, continually favoured the Turks Army, no marvel it is that the Perfians cannot vaunt of any Revenge taken for the Indignities offered them by their Enemies; and that our Writers cannot chide but write of the true and undoubted Victories of the Turks, and the bare Shadows of the Perfians Exploits; which notwithstanding many Christians vainly believe, because they most earnestly desire them to be true, although they do see to the contrary, the manifest prospering and evident Conquests which the Turks have in divers their States and Countries.

The Perfian Prince about the latter end of July arrived at Tauris with the greatest part of his Army, where he (contrary to the Opinion of all men) staid not, for what cause is uncertain. But understanding that Zeinel Baffa of Salmas, by Nation a Curd, lay encamped before the City, who of a Perfian was become a Turk, and had done great harm against the State of Perfia; he determined suddenly to set upon him, and to chastise him for his Rebellion. According to which Resolution, being accompanied with twelve thousand Souldiers, he rode to Salmas, where finding Zeinel with all his People encamped as he had been before informed, he gave him the assault. Zeinel more ready to fight than to flight, and his Souldiers as ready as he, fied presently, and fell before the Perfians, so that the Baffa himself with a few others had much ado to escape and save themselves in the closest Corners thereof, leaving the City committed to their charge, for a prey unto the angry Enemy; who entering into the fame, sacked and spoiled it, executing thereon all such Cruelties, as partly the natural desires of Souldiers use to practise, and partly such as the Turks themselves shewed unto them in that miserable and most lamentable sacking of Tauris the last year. The like Spoils did the Perfian Army in all those quarters round about, and so would have peradventure returned to Tauris, but that certain Spies arrived upon them, with Advertisement, That the Baffa of Reivan being issued for his Fortresses with fifteen hundred Harquebussiers, had committed the like outrages in the Villages and Fields thereof, as the Prince had done about Salmas: With which News the Prince was greatly moved; and immediately rising with his Army, and marching towards Reivan, not far from the City encountered the Baffa; who discovering the Enemies Forces afar off, began in great disorder to fide and retire into his Fort, leaving the greatest part of his Souldiers (making not so much speed in flight as himself) to the Fury of the Prince, who put them all to the Sword, and did what harm he possibly could in all the Places thereof.

At the very same time great Troubles arose in the Drusian Country; for Man-Ogl the valiant Drusian (of whom we have before spoken) in Re- venge of the Injuries done unto him and his People by Ebrahim Baffa, and by a valiant kind of Resistance to recompence himself of all those Bribes and Presents, which by so many Gifts and Subtilties were by the covetous Baffa wrung from him (as is before declared) had now taken up Arms, and having waited and sacked all the Territory of Eh-ne-Manfir, and of his other Enemies who had yielded their Obedience unto the Turks, without lett forced all that Country with sudden Invasions and Incursions, even very near unto the Cities of Balbecke and Tripoli, and did thus exceeding harm. For redress whereof, Amurath was glad to dispatch away from the Court Ali Baffa born at Jesusa with the Title of the Baffa of Damask, and with Authority to muster fresh Souldiers, and so wholly to attend the utter Subversion of Man-Ogl. But coming thither, he found all again quiet, so that his Presence in that Country served rather for a Reconciliation and Peace-making amongst them, than for the prosecuting of any further War; which at that time was most necessary for the Turks to be avoided, as well for want of Money in the common Treasury, as for the exceeding scarcity of Victuals.

Now the Perfian Prince having made an end of the Outroads and Spoils before-mentioned, retired himself to Tauris, and so towards the Fathers Camp, where the rest of his Army was now arrived, to the number of about forty thousand; of whom the Prince dispatched away the Souldiers of Heri, to the number of eight thousand, under the conduct of the traitorous Ali-chi Chan their General; and part also of the Turcomans, under the leading of Emangul Chan; with special charge, That they should by the way, in places of most advantage, meet and receive the Enemies Army, and in those narrow and troublesome Passages to do them what mischief they possible could. Which the Prince thus appointed, thinking by this means to weaken the Enemies Forces, and so at their arrival at Tauris, to come upon them with all his Power, and so utterly to destroy them.

But
the Turks put-

Succours into
at Tauris.

Both these Captains departed accordingly, making them that they would with all Affection accomplish the Commandment of their Prince; yet never the less heard any service of moment put in Execution by them, for Ali-chi full of Treason, after their departure began to allege many forced Reasons and Excuses, Why they should not stirre out from meeting with the Turks; and Emangul as yet utterly ignorant of the wicked Purposes and mischievous Treachery of Ali-chi, suffered himself to be misled by him also. By the Delays and Negligence of these two Perfian Captains, the Turkish General took leisure, without any loss or hindrance at all to the Fort, to put the desired Perfian Succours into the Fort, so that when the Perfian Prince by good hap had got Knowledge of the Treachery of Ali-chi, and of the Delignment, which many of the Sultans had lately contrived, for the betraying of him alive into the hands of the Turkish General. Of which Suspicion he being greatly afraid, durst not only not trust himself to perform those Barrels that he had before determined to have performed, but quite abandoning this noble and admirable enterprise, wholly employed all his Care and Study for the safety of his own Person, and so left the Triumph of the Matter in the Power of the Turks. And thus those great Hopes and Expectations which the Perfians had conceived of great Exploits to have been done against the Enemy, did not only prove vain and come to no good Issue, but contrariwise by this discovery were converted into most strange Disturbances, and all Perfia thereby endured sundry Alterations and Revolutions of most important Consequences. For both Ali-chi Chan and his Complices were purified by the Prince, as Rebels and Traitors; and also Abas Mirise of Heri was manifestly discovered for a wicked and treacherous contriver of his Brothers Death; whereby the common Mischiefes were encreased more than ever they were before, and the publick Calamities yielded greater hopes unto the Turks, than they had ever before conceived in all the course of their Wars.

When Ferat had thus relieved them in the Castle of Tauris, leaving for the Custody thereof Giasfer the Baffa with his former Companies, he returned towards Erzirum, having first caused a Fort to be erected at Curchive Tauris, a Place near unto Tauris; another at Coy, and the third at Cum; in every one of which Forts he left a convenient number of Souldiers, with all things necessary and sufficient for their maintenance, and defence of the Places they were to keep. He sent also Succours to the Fort at Tat, in Georgia, which they had long expected, and now most joyfully received. But the Perfian Prince having heard Ali-chi Chan out of the quarters of Tauris, thought himself now wholly delivered from the great fear of Treason and Rebellion, wherein he of late lived; and therefore in as great haste as he could, put himself on his Journey towards Genge in which place having gathered together a good number of Souldiers, he determined to remove thence, to intercept the Succours that were by the Turks to be brought to Tat. Now he had always found Emangul Chan to be both faithful and wise, and as him he repoyed an assured Confidence for performing any enterprise that he had in hand, and communicated with him every Device that he had conceived in these Wars. And therefore he made head and joynted with him; and lodging most familiarly in his City, he stayed there for the setting in order and disposing of his aforefaid Designment, being very desirous not to let such an Opportunity to overstep, without Signification unto the World of some notable Novelty, which might be correspondent to the Fame that of matters passed and performed the year before, was now spread and published abroad over all the World. But when he was even at the very fairest to have put this his desire in Execution, and least of all feared any Treachery or Treason, upon a sudden in the Night-time as he slept upon a Pallat he was miserably stricken through the Body, by an Eunuch of his that attended upon him, and so most rependently and bright lustre that ever shined in Perfia, was utterly extinguished. What was the occasion thereof, and who procured his Death, divers and sundry are the Opinions of Men. Some think that his Brother Abas Mirise of Heri, who had before conspired to have him betrayed into the hands of the Turkish General, had now by force of Money and Gifts seduced the wicked Eunuch thereto. Others deemed it not to have been done without the privacy of his Father, as more desirous to prefer Abas Mirise of his other Son unto the Kingdom. Divers others do diversly reason of the matter, so that to affirm of a certainty, that thus or thus the Death of so worthy a Prince was procured, were great rashness; and therefore we leave it, with the further process of the Perfian State, unto the further discovery of Time, the ancient Mother of Truth.

Notwithstanding the League betwixt the Christian Emperor Rodolph the second, and Amurath the great Turk, many sharp skirmishes oftentimes fell out betwixt the Christians and the Turks, upon the Frontiers of their Territories and Dominions, especially in Hungary, Croatia, and Sirvia; as now in the latter end of this year 1586, in the Month of December, the Turks, after their insolent manner making an incursion into the Borders of Croatia, being in number much fewer; where amongst others, the Baffa of Bosna with his Brother was slain, whose Head with certain Prisoners was sent to Viennoa Ernstus Arch-duke of Austria, the Emperours Brother. This Baffa of Bosna and his Brother, slain in this Conflict (as we have said) are reported to have been the Sons of Muhanet the late great Vizier, by one of the Daughters of Selymus the second, Amuraths Sister. For divers years following, Amurath did no great matter worth the Remembrance, contenting himself (as it should seem) with that he had already got from the Perfians; and holding his league in some reasonable sort with the Christians; yet not so, but that many a bloody broyl, tending at last even to the breach of the League, passed betwixt the Turks and the Christians; which for the Continuation of the History we will briefly set down, as they are unto us by the Writers of our time reported.

In February the year following, which was the year 1587, the Christians, provoked by the often outrages of the Turks, letting upon the Castle of Koppa, not far from the lake of Balaton, being then frozen, by good fortune surprised it. There was at that time in the Castle three of the Turks, Samacki, and about a thousand Turks, of whom an hundred and ninety of the better sort, with seventy Women, besides divers of the meaner sort, fell into the hands of the Christians; the rest saving themselves by flight, or by creeping into secret corners; an hundred Horses for service were there taken also, and so much Booty as was esteemed to be worth forty thousand Ducats. Of the three Samacks that were there present, Ali Samack of Koppa was taken, and brought first to Vienna, and afterward presented to the Emperor; Another of them standing upon his defence in a vault under Ground, was there smothered; the third escaped by flight, but was afterwards the same year taken with divers others, as shall be forthwith declared.

The eighth of August following, four of the Turks great Commanders in Hungary, viz. The Bassa of Ziget, the Samacks of Mohas, of Quinque Ecclesie, and the new Samack of Koppa, with five thousand Soldiers, made an assault on the borders of the Christians, and in most cruel manner destroyed seventeen Country Villages about Limbach, carrying away with them all the miserable Country People, with the spoil of the Country. Whereof George Count Serinus (Son to that most valiant Count Nicholas Serinus slain at Ziget) Commander of the Garrison of Canisla, understanding, with as much speed as was possible raised such Forces as he was able out of his Territory between the Rivers of Drauw and Mura, and being unto him the Count Nadaldi, the Lord Baithanis, and some other valiant Captains that had the charge of those Frontiers; with such diligence took the Strights and Passages whereby the Turks must needs return again to the Marishes, that the Turks coming back again that way with a very rich Prey and many Prisoners, being in the break of the day hardly charged by those most expert and resolute Soldiers, in those threight and troublesome Passages about a mile from Canisla, were at length cut off and put to flight with such a miserable slaughter, that many of them yielded up their Scimiters, pitifully crying for Mercy; other some fled back into the Woods and Forests, and many running headlong into the Marishes, there perished, or sticking fast in the deep mud, cried together for mercy and help of their Enemies. In this Conflict Muhamet the Samack of Quinque Ecclesie (Son to Haly Bassa, slain in the Battle of Lepanto) was taken Prisoner. Sinan Beg Samack of Mohas, thinking to escape through the Marish, stuck fast with his Horse, and was thro' through the Head with a small shot, and there died. The Bassa of Ziget, with Chafan the new Samack of Koppa, seeing all desperate and lost, fled betimes out of the Battle; but he of Koppa, wandering up and down in the Woods, was the next night after the Battle with others taken; the Bassa of Ziget, almost spent with Hunger and Grief of Mind, escaped on foot seven days after to Bresenza. There were taken of the Turks a thousand three hundred, of whom many died afterwards of their Wounds. In this Battle there was slain of the Turks, with them that perished in the Marishes and Woods, about 20000, and of the Turks Horses were taken about 1500. All the Prey before taken by the Turks, with the miserable Captives, was again recovered. The number of them that performed this notable Service, was in all but fifteen hundred foot, and five hundred horse; of whom there was but eleven slain, but most of the rest wounded. Four hundred heads of the slain Turks were (after the manner of those bordering Soldiers) carried for them to Canisla, with five hundred Prisoners. The Christian Soldiers, with the help of the Country People, ceased not for certain days to hunt after the Turks that were fled into the Woods, as after wild Beasts, of whom they found a great number; divers other, also fleeing no means to escape, came forth of their lurking Places, and yielded themselves.

Amurath understanding of all these Troubles that had so happened, commanded Ali the Bassa of Buda to be strangled, for that he had broken the League, and not refrained the Infidelity of his Samacks, whom he might have commanded; and in his stead placed Sinan Bassa, whom, before in disgrace, he had now at the request of his Wife again received into Favour, and restored to his former Dignity. About this time also Sigismund (the King of Sweden's Son) now after the Death of King Stephen chosen King of Polonia, and Maximilian the Emperours Brother rejected even in the beginning of his Reign sought to renew the League which Stephen's Predecessor, and other the Polonian Kings had before made with Amurath and his Predecessors, the Turkish Sultans. And to that purpose writ unto him as followeth.

Sigismund the Third, King of Polonia, unto Amurath the Third, Emperour of the Turks, fiftenth greeting.

THE Almighty long keep and preserve your Majesty in Health and Honour. Most Mighty Prince, and our beloved Friend and Neighbour, after that we by the Grace and Goodness of our Lord Jesus Christ govern the Kingdom of Polonia, and the Ambassadors of that Kingdom had signified so much unto us; we, providing us of Necessaries, came to Danske the eighteenth of October, from whence we send John Zamogil our Secretary, to give your Majesty to understand of this our coming. For being told by the Polonian Ambassadors, That we were chosen unto the Government of that Kingdom, upon Condition, That according unto the Custom of our Predecessors the Polonian Kings, we should keep Love and Friendship with the most excellent * Musliman Emperours; we promise unto your Sovereign Majesty, that we are willing with all like or greater Zeal and Devotion, to continue that Amity and Friendship with your most excellent Majesty and the Othoman Emperours your Successors. For confirmation whereof, so soon as we shall come unto Cracovia the regal City of Polonia, and there be crowned, we will forthwith send our great Ambassador unto your Majesty. In the mean time we most earnestly request your Majesty, that our Kingdom may on your Majesties behalf rest in Safety and Peace; which we persuade our selves you will easily grant. So willing unto you all Health and Happiness, we bid you farewell. From Danske the 18th of October, in the year 1587, and of our Reign the fifth.

Unto which the Kings Request and Letters, Amurath not long after returned this Answer in Writing.

Amurath the Third, Emperour of the Turks, unto Sigismund King of Polonia, greeting.

I Take it well, and as a token of your Love, that your Ambassador John Zamogil came with your Letters unto our most high and glorious Court, the refuge of distressed Princes; wherein you have given us to understand, how that instead of the most excellent and famous King Stephen, of worthy Memory, late King of Polonia, Polonia; you, descended of the same noble Stock and Race of the Polonian Kings, are by the free election of the whole State of the famous Kingdom of Polonia, and the great Kingdom of Lithuania, chosen King of Polonia; and being sent for by lawful Ambassadors, by the Favour and Goodness of God, to be come unto the City of Danske, and from thence to be about to go unto Cracovia, the chief City of the Kingdom of Polonia. And when you are there arrived, to send your Ambassador unto our most high and glorious Court, to confirm, preserve, and establish the League and Amity commodious and necessary for both our Kingdoms, and kept by your ancient Predecessors, with our Grandfathers and Great-Grandfathers; yea, and that with greater Zeal and Devotion than any your noble Ancestors. And therefore your Ambassador in your Name requesteth, That no Invasion on our behalf be made into the Borders of the Kingdom of Polonia, or any harm there done; and that the most noble Tartar Prince Isabam Gerai (whom God bless) should be warned, that he neither make nor suffer any Invasion to be made into the Confines of the Kingdom of Polonia. All which things in your Letters contained with the rest which your Ambassador hath by word of mouth delivered, are with speed orderly by us conceived. Know you therefore our most lately and magnificent Court to be always open unto such as request therewith, and that from thence never man had refuse, neither shall hereafter have; wherefore it befleemeth you, as upon as these our Letters shall be brought unto you, to open your Eyes, and to beware that nothing be on your part done against the Majesty of our Court, and the League; and that our Peace and amity be neither in much or little disturbed, but at best befleemeth, well and sincerely kept, and so persuade your self it shall on our part also be most inviolately observed. Our Letters are also directed unto the most excellent Tartar Prince Isabam Gerai (whom God bless) straightly charging and commanding him, not to make or suffer any Invasion to be made into the Borders of Polonia. In brief, the League and Amity shall on our part be religiously kept; and we desire your Majesty to do any harm unto the Kingdom or Confines of Polonia, shall therefore without fail receive from us due Punishment. So on your part it is requisite that the same be done, and that in Declaration of your Love, you forget not oftentimes to intimate unto our most high and glorious Court, such certain Occurrences and News as shall happen in those parts, which shall be unto us a sign of your sincere Love and Friendship. So know you, and give credit unto this our Seal from Constantinople.

Neither was King Sigismund unmindful of this his Promise before made for the lending of his Ambassador; but being possessed of the Polonian Kingdom, sent Christopher Dziercisk (his Secretary) Ambassador unto Amurath for the confirming of the League; which he hath ever since so firmly kept with the Turk, that he could never by any Entreaty of the Emperour, or of the Princes Electors, or others, or in respect of the common danger, be drawn into the Fellowship of this long and religious War, so hardly maintained by the Emperour, and some few other Christian Princes his Confederates; first against Amurath, whilst he lived, and ever since against Mahomet his Son, whom now reigneth; the issue whereof, God grant it prove not as well unto the Polonians as others farther off, in time, lamentable.

The year following, Perat (yet the Turkish Genral in Perfia) took the City of Genoa, being before for fear of the Turks quite abandoned and forsaken by the Inhabitants; who yet, upon his Faith given for their Safety, returned again, yielding to pay unto the Turk a yearly Tribute of five thousand Ducats. But when he would have gone further into the Enemies Country, having part of his Army cut off by the way, he was by his mutinous Soldiers foully entreated, wounded, and enforced to retire. Goela Bassa also pading over the River Euphrates, had in those quarters divers bloody Skirmishes with the Persians, sometime carrying away the better, and sometime the worse, as the Fortune of the Field leaved. Until at length, Amurath himself, no less weary than his People of that long and chargeable War, and the Persian King also inclining to Peace; he, by the perswasion of Sinan Bassa (but lately before received into Favour) was now contented to be intreated to hearken unto the same; moved therewith, as well by reason of new Troubles then in other Places arising, as for the great Famine and Plague then raging in Constantinople. And considering withal what a great Territory he had won from the Persians, and how necessary it was for him by Peace to confirm himself in those his new Conquests, and by the building of certain strong Forts for the Succour of one another, and by the placing of his Timariots therein, to assure the same unto him; all which without our Peace he could not possibly do, as the old Bassa right wisely told him. For which Reasons he yielded to Peace; and so Ambassadors passing to and fro, a Peace was at length agreed-upon between these two great Mahometan Princes; the Turk covenanting to keep unto himself the Places he had already gained; namely, Tauris, Genoa, Sirvan, and Chars; with all the Profits thereof arising, for the maintenance of his Garrisons and Timariots there. Whereof it was thought new profits would presently arise; the Turks grew insatiable of these late Victories, being not able to content themselves with the Conditions of the League; and the Persians not willing to live in continual fear of the Turks, especially seeing themselves to be daily by them more and more oppressed; and withal doubting lest the Turks, after they had taken fast footing in those new conquered Countries, and so grown strong, and gotten better knowledge of the Passages, should, (after their ambitious manner) seek to possess themselves of the rest; not keeping the Covenants agreed upon between them, nor at all regarding the Capitulations of the League. Which was nevertheless (as we said) on both sides for the space of ten years orderly confirmed, with all due Circumstances and Ceremonies, in like Occurrences by the great Potentates of the World used; and the more assurance thereof, one of the Persian King's Sons, or, as some others say, one of his Nephews, given unto the Turks in Hostage, as Amurath required.

These long Wars thus ended, shortly after a great Sedition was raised at Constantinople by the Soldiers of the Court, which, returning out of Perfia, with great Infidelity demanded their Pay. For the satisfying of whom, by the content of the great Sultan himself, the Value of the Coin was increased, and a new kind of Subsidy for levying of Money imposed upon the Subjects in general, none excepted; who, standing upon their ancient Liberties and Privileges, refused to pay it, especially the Janizaries and other Soldiers of the Court. Wherefore their Agas or Captain was commanded to appease them, and to persuade them to pay the demanded Tribute; in attempting whereof he was in danger to have been slain by the intolent Janizaries; and yet nevertheless for prevailing no more with them, was in disaffection thrust out of his Office, and another placed in his room, that should have married Amurath's Daughter; of whom for all that, the Janizaries would not accept in any case, but threw Stones at him, and threatened to kill him. The next Night a great Fire arose in the City, for the quenching whereof the Janizaries were commanded (as their Duty was) to put to their helping hands; which they not only refused to do, but also kept back others that brought Water for the quenching thereof, and together with the other Souldiers of the Court, did what they might to make it burn the faster. With the rage of this Fire were consumed fives of their Temples, twenty five great Inns, fifteen thousand Houses, with many Warehouses and Shops. To appease this dangerous fire, and to prevent further mischief, commandment was given to the Reglerberg of Græcia and David Passy a Jew (the first Authors of this new Inposition that they should either gather the aforesaid Tribute by their devils, and pay the Souldiers, or by some other means to give them Contentment. But here began the Priests publicly to perswade the People from payment of this new Tribute, or any other such like; perswading them in any case to defend their ancient Liberties and Customs; whereupon the Churches were by the Priests shut up, publick Prayers for the Health of the Sultan intermitted, the Basses Houses assaulted, and all the City in a new hurly bully. For the appeaching whereof, Amurath was glad to yield unto the Janizaries, to pay the Souldiers out of his own Treasurie, to revoke his Mandates given out for the exaction of the new tribute, and to deliver the two Perswaders thereof to the Pleasure of the Janizaries; who drew them up and down the Streets at Horfes Tails, and afterwards cutting off their Heads, in scorn tossed them from hand to hand one to another, as if they had been Tennis Balls.

About the latter end of September, Sinan, Bassa of Buda, having with the assistance of the Sannacks about Fille, raised an Army of eleven thousand Souldiers, with purpose to have spoiled all the upper part of Hungary, came the sixth of October before the Castle of Punose, and gave thereunto summons, but finding them in the Castle better provided and more resolute than he had before supposed, he departed thence, and passing the River Schabo, came to Sixs, a Town of about five hundred Houses, which after a fore battery he took, and burnt it down to the Ground. In the mean while, Claudius Ruffel, General for the Wars in that part of Hungary, having assembled his Forces, came upon him, and after a hard fight put him to the worse, when he had slain of his Turks about two thousand five hundred; besides three hundred other drowned in the River Schabo. Shortly after, the Christians in like manner breaking into the Frontiers of the Turks, took from them the Castles of Blavenslein, Gefers, with some other small Forts therabouts in the upper part of Hungary.

Sinan, for that he had contrary to the League, and without the Commandment of Amurath, to unfortunately attempted War in Hungary, was the next year in great Displeasure sent for to Constantinople, and Ferrat Bassa of Budine (late General of the Turkish Army against the Perlians, and now but newly come home) placed in his room at Buda.

Amurath, before not ignorant of the great Preparation that Philip the King of Spain had made, and of the invincible Armado (as it was termed) by him set forth for the Invasion of England (the same whereof had long before filled a great part of the World, viz. 1588), and of the purpose her Majesty of England had for the troubling of her rich Trade, especially into the West Indies, and for the relieving of Don Antonio, by him driven out of Portugal, wrote unto her about this time concerning her and such like matters as had been moved by her Agent, as followeth:

Queen of England.

MOST Honourable Matron of the Christian Religion, Mirror of Chastity, adorned with the Brightness of Sovereignty and Power amongst the most chaste Women of the People which serve Jesus, Mistress of great Kingdoms, reputed of greatest Majesty and Praise amongst the Nazarenes, Elizabeth Queen of England, to whom we with a most happy and prosperous Reign. You shall understand by our high and Imperial Letters directed unto you, how that your Orator, resident in our State and magnificent Court, hath presented unto the Throne of our Majesty, a certain writing, wherein he hath certified us, how that about four years ago you have made war upon the King of Spain for the abating and breaking of his Forces, wherewith he threatneth all other Christian Princes, and purposeth to make himself the sole Monarch both of them and all the World beside. As also, how that the same King of Spain hath by force taken from Don Antonio (a lawfully created King of Portugal) his Kingdom; and that your Intention is, that his Ships which came and come into the Indies may from henceforth be embarrased and stayed from that Navigation; wherein are yearly brought into Spain, precious Stones, Spices, Gold and Silver, esteemed worth many millions, where-with the aforesaid King, as with a great Treasure enriched, hath means to molest and trouble all other Christian Princes; which if he shall proceed to do, he will make himself daily stronger and stronger, and such an one as may not easily be weakened. After that, your aforesaid Orator requested our Highness, in the beginning of the next Spring to send us our Imperial Fleet against him, being assured that the King of Spain could not be able easily to withstand it, for that he had now already received a great overthrow by your Fleet; and being scarce able to withstand you alone, if he should be on divers parts invaded, much needs be overcome to the great benefit of all the Christian Princes, as also of our Imperial State. Besides this, that whereas the aforesaid Don Antonio is by force driven out and deprived of his Kingdom, that we (to the imitation of our noble Progenitors of happy Memory, whose Graves the Almighty lighten) should also give the Aid and Succour of our magnificent State, as did they unto all such as had recourse unto their high Courts and Palaces for relief. In brief, all these things, with many others which your aforesaid Orator hath at large declared unto our Imperial Throne, we have well understood, and laid them up in our deep remembrance. But forasmuch as we have for many years past made Wars in Persia, with a full Resolution and intent utterly to conquer and subdue the Kingdom of that accursed Persian Heretic, and to join the same unto our ancient Dominions; and now by the Grace of God, and help of our great Prophet, are now upon the point for the satisfying of our desire; that once done, due Provision shall be assigned unto all such things as you have of us requested or desired. Wherefore, if you shall sincerely and purely continue the bond of Amity and Friendship with our high Court, you shall find no more secure Refuge or safer Harbour of good Will or Love. So at length all things shall go well and according to your Hearts desire in your Wars with Spain, under the shadow of our happy Throne. And forasmuch as the King of Spain hath by Fraud and Deceit got whatsoever he holdeth, without doubt his deceitful Deceiters shall by the Power of God in short time be dispatched and taken out of the way. In the mean time we exhort you not to lose any Opportunity or Time, but to be always vigilant, and according to the Conventions betwixt us, favour able unto our Friends, and unto our Enemies a Foe. And give notice here to our high Court, of all the new War which you shall shall understand of concerning the said King of Spain, for the behoof both of your self and us. To be sure, if you are dissatisfied, after he had with all care and diligence dispatched his Ambassage, and here left in his place one Edward Bardou, his Deputy and Agent, now by our leave maketh his return towards your Kingdom, being for the good and faithful Service here done, worthy to be of you esteemed, honoured, and before others promoted; who when he hath obtained of you all those his deserved Honours and Preferments, let him or some other principal Ambassador without delay be appointed to our Imperial Court, to continue this Office of Legation. This we thought good to have you certified of under our most honourable Seal, wherewith you may give unwritten Credence. From our Imperial Palace at Constantinople, the 15th of this blessed Month * Ramazan, 1589.

* September.

Yet for all these fair shews, it may seem unto him that looketh more near into the state of the Turkish Affairs at those times, and that which hath ensued since, that Amurath, glad of the Discord of these two great Christian Princes, and not well assured of his new Conquests in Persia, had no great mind to the Invasion of Spain, as too far from the strength of his Empire, an Enterprize not to be so easily managed by Sea, as were the Wars he shortly after undertook against the Christian Emperour Rodolph by Land; wherewith for all that (God be thanked) he found his hands full all the remainder of his Life, as did also his Son Mahomet that reigned after him.

The Pol-nish Col-lacks invade the
and Turkey.

About this time also the Polonian Borders (whom they call Collocks) a rough and warlike kind of People; after their wonted manner making an invade upon the Turks and Tartarians, upon the sudden surprised Koflan, a Port Town within a days Journey of Caffa, where they had the spoil of many rich Warehouses of the Turks Merchants, and the rifling of certain Shipping lying there in Harbour; and having taken all the Pleasure, they returned, and with a great booty returned to their lurking Places. With which Injury the Tartars, provoked and set on by the Turks, to the number of forty thousand, brake into Podolia and the Provinces near unto Polonia, and resting in no place, but burning the Country before them, slew the poor Country People without Mercy, and making havock of all that they light upon, besides the spoil, carried away with them many thousands of most miserable Captives; who gave great grief and trouble to the Polonians refused, with the notable laughter of the Enemy, surprised in their return. Whereupon such unkindness life between the Turkish Emperour and Sigismund the Polonian King, that it was thought it would have broken out into open Wars, had not the Polonian by his Ambassadors and the Mediation of the Queen of England, wisely appealed the angry Turk, and so again renewed his League.

Amurath, now at Peace with the World, from which he by Nature abhorred not, and sitting idle and melancholy at home, was perswaded by the Basses his Counsellors, to take some new War in hand; for that great Empires (as they said) could not without the continual use of Arms long stand or continue; as appeared by the Roman State, which so long as it was at Wars with Carthage, or their great Captains and Commanders occupied in arms against their Neighbour Princes, still remained triumphant, and commanded over a great part of the World; but giving it self to Ease and Pleasure, and the Martial Men not after their wonted manner employed, it in short time by Civil Discord fell, and of the Mistress of the World, became it self a Prey even unto the basest Nations. Which also Cato in his great Wildom foreseeing, cried out in the Senate, That the Souldiers and Men of War were to be kept still busied in Arms far from home, for that in so doing, all should go well with the State, and the Glory thereof increase. Whereunto the Osman Emperours, his noble Progenitors, having respect, propounded not Peace as the end of their Wars (as do other weak Princes having their own Forces in distrust) but as invincible Conquerors, still fowed Wars upon Wars, making one Victory the beginning of another; whereby they not only brought that their Empire unto that greatness it was now of, but by such continual Employment made their Souldiers more courageous and ready, and also kept them from Rebellions and Tumults; whereunto in time of Peace and living at ease, these Martial Men are most commonly inclined, learning (as all others do) by doing nothing, to do that is evil and naughty. Every thing (as they said) was by the same means to be maintained, whereby it was at the first increased; and that therefore great Empires, as they were by Wars begun and augmented, so were they by continual Wars also to be from time to time embellished, whereas otherwise the Souldiers living in Peace, and forgetting their Martial Prowess, would for most part grow cowardly, as giving themselves over to the Love of their own Dwellings, of their Wives, and of their Children, and other Pleasures; or else converting their Studies to Merchandize, or other profitable Trades, would in time forget the use of Arms, and be thereto again hardly drawn; unto the great weakening of his strength both by Sea and Land, and the diminishing of the number of his great Commanders and expert Captains, not to be had without the continual use of War. With these and such like Reasons, the great Basses of the Court perswaded Amurath, That he must of necessity take some new Expedition in hand, and not to suffer his valiant Souldiers, but now lately returned out of Persia, to grow lazy or insolent for lack of Employment. Which they did not so much for the Love of their Prince, or Zeal unto the State, as for their own private gain; especially the two old Basses Sinan and Ferrat, the envious Competitors the one of the others Honour, who, although they both much and almost all commanded both in Peace and War, yet was their Honour greater, and their Profit far more, in commanding of the Turks great Armies abroad, than in sitting in the Divans at home; unto which no less honourable than profitable Prefecture they both with like Ambition aspired, accompanied with the hot desires of their own great and many Favours both at home and elsewhere. These Perswasions well pleased Amurath; who although he were himself no Souldier, yet was he defensible of new Conquests, and to increase his Name; accounting it no less honour unto himself, by his Servants at his appointment to perform great things, than it was unto his Ancestors to do that they did themselves in Person.

But in this so serious a matter, and of so great consequence, Amurath at the first could not tell what best to resolve upon; not that he was not desirous of Wars, but because as yet he certainly knew not against whom he might with great Profit and least Difficulty and Danger convert his Forces; upon which point his Counsellors agreed not, but for divers Reasons were of divers Opinions. Which, forasmuch as they contain matters of greatest importance of all things then in the World done, but especially concerning the Profit of the Christian Commonweal, I shall not think it unworthy my Labour, to set them down in such order as I find them credibly reported; having moreover in them many Letters and most weighty matters not yet come to all mens Knowledge; as also opening the Devices of the Turkish Tyrant against the Christian Princes; a move not only for they might seem hardly able to be helped or defended by their own People, but should need the Aid and help of the other near Provinces subject unto this Kingdom; which if they should be either letted, or flay to come in good time, they should leave so much the more easie Victory unto their Enemies.

The fifth Opinion for the Invasion of the Venetians, and the Reasons why.

In the fifth place were they which went about to perfwade Amurath to break his League with the Venetians; using Reasons rather probable than true, although they might seem unto the Turks less doubtful, for that men easily and willingly believe such things as they themselves desire. These men went about to prove no Expedition to be less difficult than this, as judging of things present, by the event of former Wars passed; wherein the Turks had always taken something from the Venetians: who to redeem their Peace, were divers ways enforced to satisfy the Turks. That the Venetian Common-wealth was afraid of the Turks, and abhorred War, was manifest (they said) that, that in all Actions it had propounded unto it self Peace, as the end thereof; and after the manner of their Ancestors, never entered into Wars, but enforced thereunto: and would happily upon the first denouncing of Wars, willingly depart with certain Places, for fear of greater harm, or to be utterly overcome, as it appeared they did in the yielding up of Cyprus. The Power and Force whereof was not so great, as that it could alone stand against the great Sultan, and to confederate it self with others, would require no small delay, for the great and many Difficulties which commonly used to arise in making of Leagues; not being now so conjoined with the Spaniards as in times past, of whose aid it being of late destitute, was constrained to make an hard Peace with Selimus. And if so be the Spaniard would needs joyn himself unto the Venetians against the Turks, yet that he could by no means afford them such Aid and Succours as were of necessity to be required unto to great a War, he himself being in his Wars otherwise so intangled; as for all other Consideration they could make without him, to be but weak and to no purpose. That which the Pope could do herein, to be but little; for albeit he should according to his Duty exhort other Christian Princes to give Aid, and to fit them up unto this War, yet that beside some little supply of Money hardly drawn out of his own Clef, and the Ecclesiastical Revenues, he could scarcely perform any thing more; or when he had done his utmost devotion, could but joyn five Gallies of his own unto the Venetian Fleet; which, with the Gallies of the Duke of Savoy, of the Knights of Malta, and of the Florentines, could but make a Fleet of some twenty Gallies, which was but a small matter. Besides that, the Turks were perfwaded, that betwixt the Venetian State and the other Christian Princes was no such Friendship and good Agreement, as the greatness of the imminent Danger of that War, and as the necessity of the cause would require; and that hitherto their Treasures had been so exhausted in paying the Debt they were run into in the last War, and in building of Fortresses, that happily they were not now so furnished with Coin, as was requisite for the defraying of so great a War. And unto this War against the Venetians, consented almost all the Vicer Baffas, differing only in this, Where, or against what Place of the Venetian Territory this War were to be first begun; some naming one place, and some another (for divers Reasons thereunto leading) which for brevity we pass over.

The sixth Opinion, for the attempting of Italy, and the Reasons thereof.

Otherwise of the Baffas in the sixth place, rejecting all the former Opinions concerning the War to be taken in hand, would have had all the Forces of the Ottoman Empire, as well by Land as Sea, to have been converted against Italy; for that otherwise the Turks should never come unto the Monarchy of the whole World (whereunto as at a mark they had directed all their Actions) except they did first subdue Italy. For that this Country, as the Center of the whole World, was wont to give both Council and Aid unto the rest of the Limbs, whereby the Devices of others were crossed; and that the Romans had at length commanded over all the World, especially for that they held in Possession this Country. Hereof did the Hungarians, the Alani and Gethes, the Vandales, the Frenchmen, the Spaniards, and Saracens, direct all their Thoughts and Cogitations. In fine, they concluded, That no Expedition could be taken in hand more honourable or profitable than this; for that Italy was a Queen amongst other Provinces, for commodious Situation, the wholefomeness of the Air, the plenty of all things necessary for Mans Life, for great, fair, and most rich Cities, for the ancient Glory and Majesty of the Roman Empire, and many other Causes also. Neither that this Expedition was to be deemed of much Difficulty, for that Italy was under the Rule of divers Princes, unto whose command most of their Subjects unwillingly obeyed; as also, for that the Inhabitants of that Country had now for many years lived in continual Peace, and were therefore the more intimate and fearful, and to unfit for the Wars; and that if that Expedition were in one or divers places taken in hand before the Corn were full ripe, the Turks in that so fruitful a Country could never want Necessaries for them to live upon; whereas the Inhabitants in great number wanting the same, and shut up within the Walls and Fortifications of their Cities and strong Towns, should be brought into extreme wants; which was the more evidently to be seen, for that at this time wherein they were at Peace, they had not Corn sufficient in the Country for their own use. People to live upon, but were glad to have it brought unto them from other Places, especially from Peloponessus, Constantinople, and the Cities upon the Coast of the great Ocean. Furthermore, that it was to be considered, that most part of the Italians lived by no other means than by their handy Labour, or the trade of Merchandise; of which means if they were deprived, they should in short time be brought to that point, as to be glad to accept of such Conditions as the Venetians should propound unto them, or as Tributaries, to submit themselves unto the Ottoman Government. Neither that the Souldiers would unwillingly be drawn unto that War; for that they were not to pass through barren Regions of the Enemy, frozen with ice, or delatred, either by rough Woods or inaccessible Mountains; but were all the way thither to travel through their own Country, and as it were in the sight of their own Houses; and if the Turks could oftentimes enter so far, where as they had their Confines more remote, and their Passages more difficult, that the same might now much more easily be effected, when as they had a far greater Opportunity, and their Enemies so near at hand.

The seventh Opinion was theirs which thought it best to have the War transferred into Polonia, and from thence into Hungary and Germany; for which they alleged these Reasons: First, for that they thought it a disgrace unto the Majesty and Reputation of the Ottoman Empire, that the King of Polonia had sometime refused to pay his Tribute due (for so the Turks account of all such Presents as are unto their Sultan usually sent by their Neighbour Princes, of Courtship) and that therefore he was by force of Arms to be compelled thereunto.

The eighth Opinion for War to be made against the Emperor, and the Reasons thereof.

Which they thought would the more easily be obtained, for that there was much secret hatred and heart-burning amongst the Polonian Nobility. Neither that it would be any difficult or dangerous War to be taken in hand; forasmuch as Polonia was confined with Moldavia, the Tartars, and the Sarmacks of Adoramus, Bendera, and Vofia; and moreover, for that the Turks could never have any assured or full Possession of Moldavia or Valachia, except the Infidelity of the Polonians were repented; the Vayvods of which Countries, when they had enriched themselves with much Wealth, used still to flie into the Kingdom of Polonia. Besides that, they should thereby revenge themselves for the Injuries done them by the Cossacks, and have more free and safe Traffick into Muscovia, and bring a Terror upon the Duke of Muscovia, by reason of the nearness of the Country; which great Duke was an Impediment unto the Ottoman Emperour, that he conquered not the whole Kingdom of Persia. And when they had by this means by little and little drawn unto Germany, happily it might come to pass, as that the Christian Emperour should thereby receive some notable loss, his Empire being still more and more expofed and en-vironed with the Turks Forces and Garrisons. Polonia they said to be a plain and open Country, neither to have any strong Places for to withstand them, and the Inhabitants to have small skill in Martial Affairs, for that they had now long lived in Peace. For as for the War that they had with Maximilian the Arch-duke of Austria, it continued not long, and King Stephen in the late Wars he had with the Muscovites, used for most part the Hungarian Souldiers, and ended those Wars rather by befieging than by fighting.

The eighth Opinion, for War to be made against the Emperor, and the Reasons thereof.

They which in the eighth and last place delivered their Opinions concerning the intended War, perfwaded to have it converted upon the Christian Emperour; whom the Turks call the King of Vienna. The Causes they alleged for the beginning of this War was, For that the Vfockie were grown so insolent as to make good prize of the Turks both by Sea and Land; in such sort, as that not only for the harms which they did, but even for the Majesty and Honour of the Ottoman Empire, their Infidelity was no longer to be suffered. By whose Injuries it was especially brought to pass, that the Merchants, to their great hinderance in private, and the Sultans great loss in common, having left the Town of Narenta or Naronia in the Turks Dominion, had removed their Mart to Salona (now called Spalato) a Town of the Venetians; and that yet for all that was not so sufficiently provided for the Security of the said Merchants, although there were Peace betwixt the Emperour and the Venetians; for that these unruly men for most part living upon the spoil, troubled all both by Sea and Land with their Robberies, driving away mens Cattel, burning the Villages, and taking away the young Babels out of the Mothers Arms and Laps. Whereby it was easily to be seen what mind they were of; and that it was not to be doubted, but that if Occasion should serve for them to surprize any of the Turks strong holds upon the Frontiers, they would with all their Power attempt the same; which, what a Dishonour and Infamy (not to speak of the loss) it would be unto the whole Ottoman Empire, every man might easily guess. Neither that it was unknown, how little the Christian Emperour had esteemed of the Turks, at such time as he was in War with the Persians, paying his Tribute too low at his Pleasure; an evident sign rather of violating than of establishing the League. And that the good Success of this War was not to be deemed either difficult or doubtful; for that the attempt might be given both by Croatia, Hungary, and Austria, Countries abounding with all things necessary for the maintenance of a great Army; as also for that they were, namely Belgrade, Buda, and Alba Regalis, with many other strong places, were already holden by the Turks Garrisons, whither their Armies might in all cases of Extremity in safety retire, or out of the same Garrisons repair their Losses, if any should be. The Roman Empire (as they said) was more desirous of Peace full, than how to heap up and preserve their Treasures; and the Princes, of nothing more careful, than how to heap up and preserve their Treasures; and the People of Germany, for that of long they had had no Wars, to be less fit than to bear Arms, and worse to be commanded by their Captains; always having in distrust the Hungarians, the Italians, and Spaniards, for that those Nations are not beloved, but rather hated of the Germans, being not at Unity amongst themselves, but divided, especially about matters of Religion. Neither that it was to be feared, lest foreign Princes should give Aid unto the Emperour in this War; with the Turks, and therefore would by no means turn the heat of this War into their own Boiloms; as also, for that the Polonians were afraid, lest in so doing, they should be driven out of their Country, and enforced to remove themselves toward the frozen Sea; and the Transilvanians, having received his Sovereignty from the Turk, no less in fear (if he should so do) to be of him again strip and spoiled of the same, as for the King of Spain, although he were of such Power, as might afford unto the House of Austria great Aid, yet that he was in other Places now too much bound; and that the Bishop of Rome could not in all Places be ready to serve his own; the Princes of Italy would not spend their Subjects and Treasures to pleasure another man; and that the Venetian State would not rashly fit up the Turks Arms against themselves, but rather at ease expect the event of the War,gers. These were the chief Opinions of the great Baffas concerning the War to be taken in hand, not so much proceeding from any ripe or sound Advice, (as commonly they do) but rather from a certain barbarous Infidelity and Contempt of others; wherewith, they moved, do oftentimes vainly perfwade them of the easie performance of divers Expeditions, which in proof they find to be not only most difficult, but unto themselves also most pernicious.

In this so great diversity of Opinions, Amurath stood long in doubt what to resolve upon; a desirous he was in all places to shew his Power, and (if it were possible) to exceed the Glory of his Predecessors, as he thought himself to have already done in Persia; having, as he boasted, by his Servants there performed more than they could themselves in Persia with their mighty Armies. Wherefore, contenting himself with that he had already done in the East, he resolved now to turn his Forces against the Christian Emperour towards the West, and that for divers respects. First, it grieved him to see the Honour of the House of Austria, and that it durst to make head against him; besides that, to make War upon a Country confining upon his own, would be a thing of far less Difficulty than was the Persian War, where his Armies were now still to be led through his own peaceable Countries, from whence they were to be at all times plentifully relieved with Victuals, in case whatsoever they they needed. In which Opinion he was also confirmed by Sinan Baffa, who having in vain perfwaded him to have made War against the Venetians, furthered now this War; in hope thereby

Now was it no great matter for Haffan Bassa to do what Amurath his great Lord and Master had commanded for the disturbing of the Peace betwixt him and the Christian Emperour; the Turks Leagues with their neighbour Princes being seldom so religiously kept, but that as well their Soldiers in Garrison upon their Frontiers by Land, as their Adventurers by Sea, might, to keep themselves doing, upon a Military Infoleny (as the Turks term it) now and then at their pleasures make incursions for booty both by Sea and Land: which, answered with the like from their Neighbours to molest, there never wanted new Grievances, and just causes of Complaint, to the stirring up of greater troubles even amongst the greatest Princes. The Venitians thus wronged at Sea, and their Merchants robbed; by their Ambassadors complained at Constantinople of the Injuries done them by the Turks Pirates, requiring to have them called home and Justice done upon them. In like manner the Emperor also, seeing many things both this year and the next attempted by Haffan Bassa in Croatia, and the other Turks in Hungary, contrary to the League, to the great disturbance of his Subjects in both those Countries, by his Ambassador then lying at Constantinople complained of these Outrages, desiring to know whether they were done by the consent and knowledge of Amurath or not; and if not, then to require that order might be taken for the restraining thereof; which was accordingly done, and those Incursions for a while stayed, and the former Peace seemed to flourish.

1591 As for Amurath, he did not stand idle, but flew as if he were willing that the League agreed upon for eight years, should not be in any wife on his part infringed. At which time the Perfian King's 1591 Son (the League not long before concluded) died in the Turks Court, where he lay in Hostage; whose dead body Amurath caused to be honourably sent home to his Father into Perfia, with an Apology in defence of himself, against the suspicion conceived by some, That he should have been the cause of the untimely death of that young Prince; justifying withal the confirmation of the League, which by the death of the Prince was like enough to have been broken. Whereof Amurath was the more desirous, for that persuaded by his Bassa's (as is aforesaid) to make Wars with the Emperour (although he notably dissembled the same) he was in hope thereby to add unto his Empire the reliques of Hungary, with some good part of the Territory of the House of Austria also, and so to open himself a way into the heart of Germany. For which purposes he now called very great preparation to be made, and a strong Army to be raised; and at the same time put a great Fleet of Gallies into the Archipelago, for the safety of his Islands in that Sea.

According to these Desigments, the Bassa of Bofnia, by the Commandment of Amurath, with an Army of fifty thousand entered into Croatia, and without resistance, burnt and destroyed the Country before him, sparing nothing that came in his way. And not so contented, laid siege to the City of Whitine, being the metropolitane City of that Country, strongly fortified as it were in an Island, compassed about with the River Dna. Which City, after he had fore battered and twice assailed, was by the distressed Defendants (now despairing of relief, and unable longer to hold it out) yielded unto the Bassa upon Composition. That the German Soldiers there in Garrison, might in safety with bag and baggage depart; and that each of the Christian Citizens as would, might there still remain without hurt from the Turks, either in Body or Goods. Which Conditions the Bassa faithfully performed to the Garrison Soldiers, whom, in number but four hundred, he sent with safe convey into their own Territory: but afterwards, contrary to his faith and promise, exercised all manner of Turkish Tyranny upon the poor Citizens. The Emperour troubled with this unexpected Invasion of the Turks, sent the Lord Petersen (whom he had many times employed in Embassages to the Turk) to pray Aid of the German Princes against the common Enemy. Who, according to the greatness of the danger, in large terms promised their help. The first that made head was Ernestus, Arch-duke of Austria, the Emperour's Brother, who with five thousand Soldiers came from Piemont to Savaria, commonly called Graz, the Metropolis of Stiria; to whom repaired daily more strength out of Carinthia.

In the mean time, the Turks Army daily increasing in Croatia, inclosed fix thousand Foot-men and five hundred Horse-men of the Christians, who had taken the Mountains, Woods, and streight Passages, and so hardly beset them, that of all that number few escaped with life: amongst whom many valiant Soldiers and expert Captains were slain; namely James Pratis, George Elebach, and John Weberburg. The Bassa, after the barbarous manner of the Turks, to make his Victory seem more famous, laded fix Waggon with the Heads of the slain Christians. The Turks thus raging in Croatia, brought a general fear upon all Hungary, Bavaria, Bohemia, Stiria, Carinthia, Silefia, and the rest of the Provinces thereabouts. Whereupon the Emperour, calling together the States of Silefia and Moldavia, declared unto them the imminent danger; persuading them to join their Forces with the rest, for the repelling of so dangerous an Enemy, and so imminent a Danger.

After long delay, Ernestus the Arch-duke, the tenth of August came to the Emperour his Brother, with the Ambassadors of Hungary, and the seventh day after were called together the Embassadors of the Kingdoms and Provinces of the Empire; where it was thoroughly debated, how the Turks were to be resisted, and their attempts infringed; as also from whence Forces, Money, and other Warlike provision was to be raised. For now it was manifestly seen, that longer to delay the matter was dangerous, and the rather, for that the Beglerbey or great Commandment of Greece, with three thousand select Soldiers both Horse and Foot, of long time exercised in the Perfian War, was ere long expected; who, joining with the rest of the Turks Army, might do great matters both in Hungary and the Places adjoining. For preventing of which to great and manifest dangers, they late daily in Council in Prague, yearning themselves even from morning until night, for the Hungarians, and especially the Lord Nadasthi, a most noble and valiant Gentleman amongst them, instantly urged to have Succours sent into Hungary; so far as the Turkish Emperour, if he should get into his hands the rest of the Towns and Castles yet holden by the Christians in Hungary, it was to be feared lest he should in short time after endanger the whole State of Germany; the strength whereof the Turks feared not so much, as he did those poor reliques of Hungary. Others were no less careful of the dangers of Croatia and Stiria, as more proper to themselves, the Enemy now there raging. In these so great dangers, the Hungarians, with the rest of the distressed, cried upon the Emperour for help; and he likewise called upon the Princes of the Empire. Divers Assemblies were made in Bohemia, Hungary, Moravia, Silefia, and the other Provinces of the Empire, and Embassadors sent from almost all the German Princes to the Emperour: all was full of Consultation, but as for help that came in very slowly; yet such as was to be had, was forthwith sent into Croatia, to defend the Fortresses there against the further attempts and proceedings of the furious Enemy.

Certain vain attempts of the Turks.

The eighteenth of September, the Turks, with all warlike Provision upon the sudden by Night assaulted the strong Castle of Tocay in the upper Hungary, in hope to have surprised it; but finding it a matter of more Difficulty than they had before imagined, they departed thence, and attempted the lesser Comara, which, standing in a marshy Ground, was also easily defended. At which time also the Bassa of Buda with his Power entered into the Frontiers of the Christians, but having well viewed the Cities, Towns, Castles, and Forts upon those Borders, and finding nothing for his purpose, he without any thing doing returned again to Buda.

The fix and twentieth day of September, Haffan, the Bassa of Bofnia, incamped with his Army betwixt the Rivers of Kulp and Sauer, and in the Darkness of the Night passing over part of his Army into Turkopolis, with Fire and Sword most miserably spoiled all that pleasant and fertile Island; the Lord of Bony, to whom the keeping thereof was committed, labouring in vain to defend the same.

About the end of this Month, the Bassa of Ziget, with the Sannacks of Mobas, Koppas, and Quinque, Ecklesia, and other Turks of great name, came with a strong Army, and encamped between Ziget and Rodofe. And shortly after News was brought to the Emperours Court, that Ramsia, a City of Stiria (not far from the River Zala) was hardly besieged by the Enemy, and that the Turks in coming thither had taken many Christian Captives; which they had thus to be sold at Constantinople; and that there was in the Turks Army about an hundred and sixty thousand men. But forasmuch as the Christian Army daily increased also, and was now grown to the number of threecore thousand men, began to hope well that the Enemies Rage would be stayed from any further proceeding. About the same time, Ernestus, the Arch-duke, appointed General of the Army, with the Marquis (Son to Ferdinand the Arch-duke) his Lieutenant, came both unto the Army.

1592 In these Preparations, about the beginning of October, heavy News was brought unto the Emperours Court, how that 7000 men, whom he but a little before had sent into Croatia under the Conduct of Thomas Arctelus Begne, George Gleichpacher, and Dionysius Denke, to hinder the Course of the Turks Proceedings, being incamped betwixt Whitine and Carastar, and having the twelfth of September discovered from an high Hill certain Companies of the Turks, (which were indeed of purpose come thither to view the Army of the Christians) sent out fifty Horsemen to discover the Turks Army where it lay, and what it attempted. Who, finding no more of the Turks than those whom they had before seen from the Mountain, returned again unto the Army with such simple Intelligence: whereunto the Christians giving Credit, became secure in their Tents, as Men out of fear of the Enemy, and so kept but negligent Watch. But in this they were deceived, the Enemy, of a sudden came upon them, and with an hundred thousand men brake into their Trenches; where the Christian Foot-men for all that, for the space of four hours maintained a notable fight, wherein many were on both sides slain. But the poor Christians being better round, and oppressed with the Multitude of their Enemies, were slain almost all; yet the Captains seeing the Danger, by speedy flight saved themselves; for which their Cowardice and careless Negligence they were afterwards apprehended and beheaded. Almost all the common Soldiers were there slain; yea such as fell alive into the hand of the Enemy, were most cruelly cut in pieces. The spoil also of the Tents of the Christians fell unto the Enemy; wherein, beside the abundance of other things, they found sixty thousand Dollars, brought but two days before from Lipsa for the Soldiers pay. The Turks, after their barbarous manner, in Observation of their Victory, laded fourteen Waggon with the Heads of the slain Christians, which they sent unto divers places thereabouts. This was indeed a great Victory, but gained by the Turks with much blood; for the Christians, fighting as men desperate, flew for their Enemies about twelve thousand, and died themselves as men rather with number oppressed, than with true Valour vanquished.

The Night following, the Turks upon the sudden in the dead time of the Night surprised the Castle of St. George, and without respect of Age or Sex, cruelly put to the Sword all them that were therein, except an hundred and fifty Persons, whom they carried away Captives; and so leaving the Castle on fire, departed. At the same time divers Companies of the Turks were seen about Silefia, who led away with them about fix hundred Christians into most miserable Captivity. And that nothing might be wanting unto the Calamities of this so miserable a wretched Country, three hundred Waggon charged with all manner of Provision, sent out of the Provinces thereby for the Relief of the Garrison Soldiers in Croatia, were all intercepted by the Turks, and so carried away.

The Emperour, considering these Proceedings of the Turks, and that their Strength daily increased, gave notice by Writing, to all the Princes and States of the Empire, what Incursions the Turks had had of late made into Croatia and the Frontiers of Hungary, with other Places near unto them; and that the Beglerbeg of Græcia, with the Baſſas of Boſnia, Buda, and Temefwar, without regard of the League was in Force, had taken divers Cities, Towns, Caſtles, and ſtrong Places, and to extend the bounds of their Dominion above forty German Miles, having ſlain or carried away into Captivity the poor Inhabitants of thoſe Countries; and now to be grown to that height of Pride, that except their farther Proceedings were with like Forces reſpected, they would in ſhort time ſet Foot in Germany it ſelf, and poſſeſſing themſelves of Sirria and Carlinibia, would from thence daily more and more incroach upon the Empire, which to hinder, was not in his Power only, but required their help in general. Wherefore he requeſted them now at length, in ſo publick a Danger to open their Coſſiers, and to fend out their Forces againſt the common Enemy. Which Requeſt of the Emperor, with the due Conſideration of ſo great a Danger, moved not only the Princes and States of the Empire, but others alſo farther off, to yield liberal Contribution unto ſo neceſſary and general a Cauſe.

The Turk now hearing of the great Preparation of the Chriſtian Princes, beſide the Army which was already in the Field, and that they had made a ſtrong Bridge over the River of Drauw, which they had alſo fortified, thereby in ſafety at their Pleaſure to tranſport their Army; without further delay ſupplied ſuch Places as they had gotten with ſtrong Garrifons, and ſo withdrew themſelves into their own Territory; which they did the rather, for that the Plague then raged fore in Conſtantinople, informed that there died a thouſand a day. Which Contagion had alſo taken hold of the Turk Army; ſo that the Chriſtians for fear of Infection, forthwith flew what Turk ſoever fell into their hands. And thus ended the Troubles of this year, being as it were an Introduction for greater to enſue the year following.

The Turks, together with the beginning of the new year, began alſo their wonted Incuſions into the Frontiers of the Chriſtians. They of the Garrifon of Perrinia, (a ſtrong Fort, but lately, and contrary to the League, built by the Turk upon the River of Colapis or Kulp, for the further Invaſion of Croatia) made daily Incuſions out of that new Fort, and entering into the Iſland Thynopolis, ſpoiled and burnt the Town and Caſtle of Beck-Vochobinam, and having made a great ſlaughter, carried away with them 400 Prifoners. And in Hungary the Turkiſh Garrifons, to ſupply their Wants, made divers Incuſions upon the Chriſtians, and did exceeding much harm; of which Adventurers, fix hundred in paſſing over the frozen Lake, were all drowned in the miſt thereof. In another place, three thouſand of them near unto Nuſſe, divided themſelves into two Companies; whereof the one ſhewed it ſelf in the fight of the Towns-men, the other ſtill lying in ambush. They of the Town, upon the ſight of theſe Turks, ſallied out, and cauſing them to retire, followed them ſo far, that they were paſt the Place where the reſt of the Turks lay; who preſently ſtarting up, ran with all ſpeed toward the Town, in hope to have ſurprized it, and wanted not much of that they deſired; for there was ſcarce an hundred of the Germans there in Garrifon left in the Town, who had ſcarce ſo much time as to draw up the Bridges; which done, they with the great Ordnance from the Walls, enforced the Turks to retire and forſake the Town.

About the ſame time alſo, the Turks in Garrifon at Perrinia, falling upon the ſudden, took the Town of Martenzie, which they ſpoiled, and having ſlain and taken about ſeven hundred Perſons, ſet fire on the Town, and ſo returned, having loſt in this Exploit not paſt an hundred and fifty of their own Men. Not long after, the ſame Garrifon Soldiers of Perrinia took another Caſtle three miles diſtant from the River of Kulp, whereinto the Chriſtians dwelling round about had for fear of the Enemy conveyed all their Wealth, with great ſtore of Viſuals; all which the Turks took, and having ſlain fix hundred men in the Caſtle, returned with an exceeding rich booty to Perrinia; which they fought with the Lives of five hundred of their Fellows, ſlain in taking of the Caſtle. With like Inſolency did alſo the other Garrifons of the Turks rage in all the other parts of Hungary. About Sajſovia in the upper Hungary, they carried away about three hundred Chriſtian Captives. And in the neſther part of Hungary, they took the ſtrong Caſtle of S. Hedwig, upon the Lake of Ballaton, which they ſpoiled and burnt; and ſo likewiſe the Caſtle of Uſſa; but attempting the leſſer Comara, they were by the Garrifon Soldiers valiantly repulſed. They alſo fortified the Caſtle of Swick, which they had but a little before taken, that ſo it might ſerve for a ſafe Refuge for their Adventurers. Which their manifold Outrages, contrary to the League, evidently declared the deſire they had to begin that bloody War which preſently appeared enſued; and was indeed more ſuſpected, for that at the ſame time the Emperor's Ambaſſador, Frederick Comaritis, was by the Commandment of Amurath ſhut up cloſe in his Houſe at Conſtantinople, and not ſuffered to ſpeak with any man, neither to write or to ſend any Meſſenger to the Emperor; which cauſed him the more to ſuſpect ſome great matter to be by the Turk intended, and therefore began to raiſe new Forces. The Hungarians and Bohemians alſo ſecing their Towns and Caſtles thus taken, their Provences ſpoiled, infinite number of People led away into Captivity, and the Enemy daily increaſing in ſtrength; at length agreed upon their own Charges to maintain a certain number both of horſe and foot, for the repreſſing of theſe Turkiſh Incuſions.

Now although the Emperor knew right well all theſe Outrages of the Turks, contrary unto the League, could not be done without the knowledge and good liking alſo of Amurath (as before informed thereof by his Ambaſſador from Conſtantinople) yet, to ſhew himſelf willing to have the League on his behalf kept, alſo to make a further proof of Amurath his Reſolution for Peace or War, he wrote unto him as followeth:

Rodolph the Second, Emperor of the Romans, unto Amurath the Third, King of the Turks,

Whereas nothing is hitherto on our behalf omitted for the preſervation and continuance of the League and Amity betwixt your moſt Excellent Maſty and Us, by the renewed Capitulations of Peace; and that we have with all ſincerity and love performed, and are hereafter ready to perform whatſoever is on our part to be performed and done; and as we have hitherto, ſo for ever hereafter alſo make offer of the ſame; we moſt aſſuredly promiſe unto our ſelves on your Maſties behalf, that you in like manner will not ſuffer any thing on your part to be wanting; but gladly and willingly to do all things which ſhall be meet and needful for the preſervation and keeping of this our mutual love and friendſhip. Upon which good hope grounded on our ſelves, to declare our plain meaning and ſincerity indeed, we will cauſe our honourable Prefent (which is now ready) to be brought unto

your moſt Royal Maſty, at ſuch time as ſhall be agreed upon betwixt our Ambaſſador and you; unto whom in all ſuch matters as he by our Commandment ſhall have to deal with your moſt Excellent Maſty, your Viſcous, or ſervants, we requeſt you to give full Credence. In the ſame time, your Excellency ſhall do well to provide, that as we have now ſeverely commanded our Subjects to keep the Peace upon our Frontiers, ſo that your Soldiers alſo make no Incuſions as Enemies into our Territories, nor do in them any harm, but to endeavour themſelves alſo to Peace and Quietneſs; and eſpecially, that all ſuch things, as contrary to the Capitulations of the League have been there of late taken from our People, or otherwiſe unjuſtly poſſeſſed, may be again reſtored, the Loſſes recompenſed, the new Fort of Perrinia demoliſhed, and the Baſſa of Boſna and others, the Authours of breacking of the League, puniſhed and diſplaced; whereby we ſhall gather your Royal Maſties moſt noble and kind affection towards Us and our State, which as it ſhall be a thing moſt juſt, ſo ſhall it be a ſingular Confirmation of our League. But concerning theſe Matters, and others to the ſame belonging, our Ambaſſador is to declare our Mind more at large, that ſo our preſent deſire for the continuance of our League and Friendſhip with your Maſty, may more plainly be known. So with we all Health and Proſperity unto your moſt Royal Maſty. From Prague the eighth of March, 1593.

The Emperor alſo, at the ſame time, and to the ſame purpoſe, ſent to ſin Baſſa in this fort:

The Emperours Letters unto ſin Baſſa.

We write at this preſent unto your moſt Excellent Maſty, our moſt honoured Friend and Neighbour, concerning ſuch matters as we thought fit for the Preſervation of the Peace and League betwixt us, leſt happily otherwiſe we might ſeem to have forgotten our Duty. Now it ſhall well-becomme your uprightness and good will, which we have at other times proved for the high Place and Authority which you hold (and which we joyce to be again reſtored unto you) to give unto theſe things ſuch eſſe paſſage before his Maſty, as that we may acknowledge your kindneſs and favour, and have occaſion therefore to ſhew our ſelves unto you thankful. Firſt, we offer our ſelves moſt ready to continue the Peace, and to perform whatſoever is according to the conventions of the renewed Peace on our part to be performed; alſo to ſend the honourable Prefent (which is not as yet by us ſent) when as our Ambaſſador ſhall have with you appointed any certain time wherein it may be ſent. And we alſo aſſuredly hope ſo to prevail with your Emperor, that on your part the Places within our Territories, by your People forcibly poſſeſſed, together with all ſuch things as have been wrongfully taken away, may be again reſtored, and the Fort of Perrinia razed. The Baſſa of Boſna alſo (who we think would have been kept within the compaſs of Duty, if you had at that time held the Place of the chief Viſier) and whoſeever elſe, guilty of the wicked breach of the League, to be worthily according to their deſerts puniſhed and diſplaced, and your Soldiers ſeverely charged not to make any further Incuſions, nor to do any thing that may tend to the breach of the League; as we likewiſe ſhall with new and ſtrait Commands moſt carefully refrain our Gar-riſon Soldiers upon our Frontiers; from all ſuch Incuſions and Enemies Actions. But of theſe things our Ambaſſador is more fully and at large to treat with you; unto whoſe Speech we deſire ſuch Credence to be given as unto our own; and we will ſo provide, that you ſhall have good proof of our great good-will towards you. From Prague the eighth of March, 1593.

Unto which the Emperours Letters, ſin returned anſwer as followeth:

ſin Baſſa, Chief Viſier to Amurath the Third, Emperor of the Turks; unto Rodolph the Second, Emperor of the Romans, greeting.

By theſe we give your Maſty to underſtand, That two of your Maſties Letters were brought hither before we were choſen and confirmed Chief Viſier in this moſt Royal Court; wherein your Maſty excuſes your ſelf, and ſhews the cauſes why the ſending of the wonted Prefents hath been ſo long deferred, by laying the fault upon the Inſolency of our Garrifon Soldiers in Boſna, and the breach of the publick Peace; which your Letters being by us read before our moſt mighty Emperor, his Highneſs in great choler burnt out into theſe words, And thy Son, the Beglerbeg of Buda, hath ſill hitherto writ, and given us to underſtand, that the ſuſal Prefents would certainly come, and that the King of Vienna would not in any caſe conſent unto the breach of the League, or of the Amity betwixt us and him; and yet for all that, the Prefents are not hitherto come, wherefore thy Sons Writings and Relations are not true. But now the Baſſa of Boſna hath ſent word unto the Court, That your Maſty will not ſend them, and all your doings to be but meer deceit and fraud. For which cauſe our moſt Mighty Emperor hath removed my Son from his Place in Buda, and rewarded the Baſſa of Boſna with honourable Garments, whereas my Son is for your Maſties ſake diſplaced. Now on our behalf nothing is done againſt the Peace, but our Soldiers as with a Bridle kept in; whereas on your Maſties part excuſions and harms into the Territories of our Emperor never ceaſe, eſpecially into Boſna, wherein your Soldiers have of late in warlike manner broken, although they were by our Garrifons over-come, their great Ordnance taken, and brought hither unto the Court. Wherefore, ſeeing the cauſe ſo handeth, your Maſty is to relieve us upon two points; whereof the firſt is, That when you be minded to keep friendſhip with us as before; and to ſend hither the two laſt years Prefents, or not. And the ſecond, Whether you will ſet at liberty our Captive Sinacack, or no? Now if your Maſty ſhall be content to keep the League, and within theſe two Months next, to ſend the two years Prefents, alſo to diſmiſs our Sinacack; the League ſhall on our part be likewiſe undoubtedly kept, your Territories ſhall be in no caſe moleſted, ſuch Chriſtian Captives as your Maſty ſhall require, be inlarged, and a moſt firm and ſure Friendſhip by us continued. Whereas if you ſhall upon any cauſe or excuſe longer delay the ſending of thoſe honourable Prefents, and unto theſe our Demands ſend us nothing but certain vain and windy Anſwers; let God on High be therefore for ever praized; for now our moſt Mighty and Victorious Emperor, who waneſh neither Ability nor Power, hath Comanded, That we our ſelf ſhould Perſon go in this War; and putting our Confidence in the Highneſs, with the Army of the right-believing Turks to come into choſe Parts.

1592 And therefore assure your Majesty, that we will not fail there to encounter you, at which time shall appear unto the World, what is by God our Creator (whose Holy Name be forever blessed) in his deep Wisdom pre-ordained and set down for Us. Wherefore, seeing that all which concerneth the League, together with the safety and quiet of our People on both sides, is unto your Majesty thus declared; you are to consider the End, and to follow out good Advice; whereas if otherwise you shall be the cause of the breach of this so wholesome Peace and Unity, (which we hitherto have so sincerely and firmly kept) the excuse thereof both in this World and in the World to come, shall lie upon you. Now we request of you no more, but forthwith to send us answer of these our Letters. As for the rest, we may well expect that taketh the right way. Yet for all these fair offers of Peace thus made by Sinan Bassa in his Letters, was his purpose nothing less than to have performed the same, seeking only to have drawn the two years Presents from the Emperor, amounting to a great sum of Money, and so nevertheless to have prosecuted the intended War; the Emperor being the only man of whom Amrath his great Master had, amongst all the Christian Princes, made choice of to exercise his force upon. Of all which things the Emperor was not ignorant, being thereof (as we said) fully before by his Ambassador advertised from Constantinople.

These Troubles of the Spring thus past, ensued the Summer much more troublesome, for Haffan, Bassa of Bosnia, chief author and devil of these Brawls, could not, for the increase of his Credit, to work what mischief he could against the Christians that bordered upon him. This great Bassa, naturally hated the Governour, or as some call him the Abbot of Sileg, a strong Castle situate upon the borders of that part of Croatia, yet holden by the Christians, where the River Rulp falleth into the famous River of Sava or Saw, (and was indeed the very Bulwark of that Country) the cause of which his hatred is reported to have been this: the year before, the Bassa had sent a Messenger to this Abbot, to require him to deliver the Castle or Monastery unto him; which Messenger for certain days the Abbot entertained with many honourable Speeches, learning in the mean time of him so much as he possibly could of the Bassa's intention, with what Power, in what Place, and with what Engines he had determined to besiege the Castle. In the mean time it was discovered, that his Steward had long before plotted with the Turk to have betrayed the Castle, and had for certain years past received of him a yearly Pension. Upon which occasion, the Abbot caught both the Messenger and his own Steward to be apprehended, and so fast-bound hand and foot, to be cast out at a Window of the Castle into the River of Sava. The Bassa seeing his Messenger not to return, sent another to the Abbot, grievously threatening him, if he did not send him back again his Messenger. Whereupon the Abbot answered, That he had dismissed him certain days before, and therefore marvelled if he were not as yet returned; nevertheless concerning his demand, That he was resolved to yield the Monastery unto the Bassa, against whose Forces he saw himself unable to hold it, requesting only that it would please him to send some men of account to receive it at his hand, for that it would be no small dishonour unto him to deliver it up unto common Soldiers. The Bas-sa, in glad of this message, sent forthwith certain principal men of great account, hoping now without any loss to have that strong Place yielded unto him, which had so long time stood in his way. Three days after, certain Troops of Horse-men, sent from the Bassa, came to the Monastery, as was appointed, and finding the Gates open, entered, first the Noblemen, and after them five hundred others, or thereabouts; who were no less with-in the Gates, but that the Porcellus was let fall, and certain murthering Pieces (secretly placed in the Court for that purpose) discharged; with the violence whereof, the Turks that were already entered, were most miserably rent in pieces, their Heads, Arms, and Legs, flying in the Air; when presently the Garrison Soldiers, starting out of their lurking places, made a quick dispatch of all them that had escaped the fury of the great Artillery. The rest of the Turks, shut out, hearing the noise and cry of them within, turning their Horses, broke themselves to speedy flight. The great Bassa, hearing of this slaughter of his men, and how he had been deceived; wrote in great rage by his lieutenant, to raze this Monastery down to the ground, and to pluck the Abbot's skin over his ears: and so by threatening Letters gave him to understand, as followeth:

Haffan, Bassa of Bosnia, unto the Abbot of Sileg.

It is not to thee unknown, how often we have sent unto thee our Messengers with Letters, declaring unto thee our Love and good Will; requesting thee in friendly sort, and without further resistance, to yield up unto us thy Fortress of Sileg, not longer to be by thee holden. Thus which our Request thou hast so much most wilfully at thy Pleasure, opposed thyself, to our spite, on the slaughter of our men; and in so doing, hast given cause unto the great Sultan to overhinder and raze that thy Fortress, whereof thou for the Emperor's sake needs be the chief. Thinkst thou it will be for thy good, or yet well takes, that thou shalt so shamefully and perditionally circumvented and laid our Ambassadors and Servants sent unto thee? Nay, assure thyself, that if Mahomet grant us Life, we will never give over the siege of that thy Fort, wherein thou doest much trust, until I have before thy Face overthrown it, and (if thy God shall give thee alive into my hands) have plucked thy Skin over thine Ears, to the great reproach and shame of the Christians! For I am fully resolved, not to depart from this Place, but to continue the siege thereof until I have it. Take a little time yet, pass, and thou shalt see thyself on every side besieged, thy Fort with more and greater pieces of Artillery than ever, battered, and our Power strong enough to conquer, and to take thine. How hast thou hitherto put thy greatest hope and comfort in the "Banne Ercodus, in whom, by the help of Mahomet we are too much trusted. Tell us, if we are of nothing more careful, than how to get thee into our Power; which if we do, look not for any Mercy at our hands.

Neither was the Bassa unmindful of his Promise, or of the loss he had received; but in the beginning of June, with an Army of thirty thousand Horse and Foot, came and besieged the Fortress of Trenchin, which with continual Battery and often Assaults he at length took, lacked the Town, (few most part of the Inhabitants, except 800, or thereabouts of the younger sort, which he carried away with him into Captivity. And being proud of this Victory, removed thence by a Bridge which he had first made, passed over the River, and to the south of June, came and intrenched before the Monastery of Sileg; and after vainly storming given to the same, the next day caused his great Ordnance to be planted; and with great Fury thundering against the

The threatening Letter of Haffan Bassa of Bosnia unto the Abbot of Sileg.

the Walls, in short time overthrew the new Tower, in the fall whereof two of the Christian Cannons perished. This furious Battery he maintained by the space of ten days without intermission, giving no time of rest unto the besieged; so that it seemed not possible for the Monastery to be any long time defended, if it were not with speed relieved. The Bishop of Zagabria, and Kaperus Eggenius, General of the Emperor's Forces that then were at Zagabria, gave knowledge thereof to Andrew Lord Auerberg, Governour of Caroth, craving his aid and counsel: who calling together his own Forces, raised a good number of good Horse and Foot; and called also unto him the bordering Horsemen of Karnia and Carmania; who the 17th day of June met all together not far from the Tschinewitz, and there tarried that night. The next day, passing over the River Sava near unto Zagabria, they joined themselves with the Emperor's Forces, and marched the 19th day in good order to Seline, where they expected the coming of County Serinus. The 20th day Peter Herdelius with his Horse, and the Lord Stephen Grafstein, came unto the Camp, with many of those light Horsemen, whom the Hungarians called Ujocshi. The 21st day they lodged at Gradium, still expecting the coming of the County Serinus, who, otherwise busied, could not come. The next day after, a Soldier sent from the besieged, came unto the Camp, who gave the Captains to understand, that except they made haste that day to relieve the distressed Monastery, it would undoubtedly be lost, for that the Enemy had made it assailable, and would that night give the assault; and the defendants doubting how they should be able to maintain the Place, began before his departure thence to think of composition with the Enemy. Upon which news, the Captains forthwith began to consult amongst themselves, what course to take in so doubtful and dangerous a case: where Auerberg was of opinion, that it were best to march on, and to give the Enemy Battle; with whom also agreed the Lord Redern: the rest of the Captains being of a contrary mind, for that the strength of the Christians compared to the Turk, was too weak; and therefore they thought it better in time to retire whilst they yet might, than to hazard unto most manifest peril the lives of so many valiant men, at so great odds. At which counsel Auerberg was the first much opposed; but was overruled (as he was a man of great clemency) plainly first before them the necessity of the Cause, and with lively Reasons cheered up the fearful Croats; notably persuading them all in general, to put their whole trust and confidence in God, to whom it was as easy to give Victory by few, as by many; and to fight like valiant men, for their Religion, their Country, their Lives, their Wives, their Children and Friends, and whatsoever else they held dear; against that cowardly Enemy, whose valour never brought him into the field, but only the vain trust he had in his multitude; and would therefore no doubt easily be put to flight, if he should venture to 4000 men against himself but a little hardly laid out. With these and other like Reasons he prevailed so much, that they all yielded to his opinion, and with one consent resolved to go against the Enemy, and to do what they might to relieve their besieged friends. So upon a sign given, the whole Army (in number not above 4000) formation first moved, and with great cry, halted towards the Enemy; and being come within a mile of the Camp, put themselves in order of Battle. The Turk, by their Signals understanding of the approach of the Christians, brought all their Horsemen over the River of Rulp, by a Bridge which they had made, and having put themselves in order, came on to join Battle with the Christians: who had in their Vanguard placed the Croats; and Haffan; in the left wing them of Caroth, and the Haquebushers of Karnia; all Horsemen; in the main Battle the rest of the Soldiers, with the Horsemen of Sileg, under the conduct of Siegmund Paradise; the Rearward was included with Christian Companies of the Emperor's Soldiers. The first charge upon the Enemy, the Vanguard gave the good space made a great Fight, but having for a while retired, and discouraged with the multitude of the Enemies, were even upon the point to have fled: when Auerberg (General of the Christian Army) came on with his Squadron, and not only reformed the Battle, but so resolutely charged the main Battle of the Enemy, that the Bassa was confirmed at the first to retire, and afterwards to fly, after whom all the rest of the Army followed. The Christians still keeping their array, pursued them with great speed, and coming to the new made Bridge before them, took from them that passage, to the great discomfort of themselves, who seeing the miserable slaughter of themselves, and no way to escape, ran headlong some into the River Odera, some into Rulp, and were there for the most part drowned; the rest were all slain by the Christians, before determined not to take any Prisoners. In the mean time, the Turk, that remained at the Siege, understanding of the overthrow of their fellows, set fire on their Powder and other Provision, and so in great fear broke themselves to flight: Whole Tents the Christians immediately after took, and in them nine great pieces of Artillery, and good store of great Shot of 44 Baylison of the Bassa, and many other rich Spoils, which was all carried into the Monastery of Sileg. The number of the Turks slain in this Battle, and drowned in the Rivers, is of divers diversly reported, but most agree upon 18000. And amongst them was Haffan Bassa himself, found in the River near unto the Bridge, and near unto him Mahomet-Beg, and Achmet-Beg. In other places were also found the dead Bodies of Saffer-Beg, the Bassa's Brother, Meniege, Haraman-Beg, Achmet-Beg, O perd Beg, and Golschi, the Bassa's chief Counsellors, and Masters of his Household. But of all others, the untimely death of Sivan-Beg, Amrath's Nephew, his Sisters only Son, sent thither to have learned the Feats of Arms under Haffan the great Bassa, was of the Turks most lamented. Of 40000 Turks that came over the River Gory obtained, all the Army of the Christians went falling all down upon their knees, gave unto God most hearty thanks for the same, as by hits miraculously given, and not by themselves won; and afterwards made all the show of joy and gladness they could possibly devise.

Sileg thus delivered, thrown, the Christians, and the Turk Army over the River, all forced laid siege to Petrinia, the strong new Fort of the Turk, which they for the space of five days most furiously battered; but hearing that the great Governour of Gracia (whom the Turks call the Beglerbeg of Romania) was with a great power coming to the relief of the Fort, they raised their Siege, brake up their Army, and retreated every man to his wonted charge.

Whilst these things were in doing at Petrinia, a Raft came from Constantinople to Buda, who brought wither the first news of the overthrow of Buda. Sileg 3.

News of the overthrow of the Turk at Sileg, brought to Buda.

1503 Sifeg; for the report thereof was not as yet come to Buda; wherefore the Bassa called unto him the Messenger, Author of so bad News, and diligently examined him of the truth thereof; who told him, That at his departure from Constantinople, nothing was there known of that loss, but that upon the way as he came, he met with divers Horsemen, but lately escaped from the slaughter, who told him of a certainty, that the Bassa was slain, and his Army destroyed. Whereunto the Bassa of Buda replied, That he was happy in his Death, for that if he had by chance escaped, he should for his Indiscretion undoubtedly have suffered some other more shameful Death at the Court.

When News of the aforesaid Victory was brought to the Emperor at Prague, he commanded publick Prayers, with thanksgiving to Almighty God to be made in all Churches; and sent a Messenger with Letters to Amurath, to know of him how he understood these insolent Proceedings of his Soldiers, and especially this late Expedition of the Bassa of Buda and his Complices, contrary to the League, yet in force betwixt them. After which Messenger he sent also the Lord Popelusz, with the yearly Present (or rather Tribute) he used to send unto the Turkish Emperor at Constantinople; yet with this charge, that when he was come as far as Comara in the Borders of Hungary, he should there stay until the return of the aforesaid Messenger; who, if he brought Tidings of Peace from Amurath, then to proceed on his Journey to the Turks Court; otherwise, to return again with his Present; as he afterwards did. For Amurath, engaged with the notable loss received at Sifeg, and grieved forward with the Tears and Prayers of his Sister (desirous of nothing more than to be revenged for the death of her Son) the Anger of August caused open War to be proclaimed against the Christian Emperor, both at Constantinople and Buda. The managing whereof he committed to Sinan Bassa, the old Enemy of the Christians, his Lieutenant-General, and perswaded of this War; who, departing from Constantinople with an Army of forty thousand, wherein were 5000 Janisaries, was by Amurath himself and the great Men of the Court brought a mile on his way; having in charge from the great Sultan, by the assistance of the Beglerbeg of Greece, the Bassas of Buda and Temeswar, and other his Sanacks and Commanders in that part of his Empire, to revenge the Death of his Nephew, and the Dishonour received at Sifeg;

This War Amurath with great Pride denounced unto the Christian Emperor, and the rest of the Princes his Confederates in this fort.

Amurath the Third, by the Grace of the great God in Heaven, the only Monarch of the World, a great and mighty God on Earth, an invincible Caesar, King of all Kings, from the East unto the West, Sultan of Babylon, Sovereign of the most noble Families of Persia and Armenia, triumphant Victor of Hierusalem, Lord possessor of the Sepulchre of the crucified God, Subverter and sworn Enemy of the Christians, and of all them that call upon the Name of Christ.

The proud and blasphemous Denunciation of War given out by Amurath against Rudolph the Christian Emperor.

WE denounce unto thee, Rudolph the Emperor, and to all the German Nation taking part with thee, unto the great Bishop also, all the Cardinals and Bishops, to all your Sons and Subjects; we earnestly bid (I say) by our Great God and Empire denounce unto you open War, and give you to understand; that our purpose is, with the Power of thirteen Kingdoms; and certain hundred thousand of men, Horse and Foot, with our Turks and Turkish Army, yes, with all our Strength and Power (such as neither thou nor any of thine hath ever yet seen or heard of, much less had any proof of) to besiege you in your chief and Metropolitane City, and with Fire and Sword, to persecute you and all yours, and whosoever shall join with you, to burn, destroy, and kill, and with the most exquisite Torments we can devise, to torture unto Death, and slay such Christian Captives as shall fall into our hands, or else to keep them as Dogs, Captives in perpetual Misery; to empale upon Stakes your fairest Sons and Daughters; and, to the further shame and reproach of you and yours, to kill like Dogs your Women great with Child, and the Children in their Belies; for now we are fully resolved to bring into our Subjection, you which rule but in a small Country, and by strong hand and force of Arms to keep from you your Kingdom, as also to oppress, root up, and destroy the Keys and See of Rome, together with the golden Scripture thereof; and the will prove whether your crucified Jesus will help you, and do for you as your persuade you. Believe him still, and trust in him, and hee how he hath halpen his Messengers which have put their Confidence in him; for we neither believe, neither can we endure to hear, such incomprehensible things, that he can help, which is dead so many Myddell years ago, which could not help himself, nor deliver his own Country and Inheritance from our Power, over which we have so long time reigned. These things, O ye poor and miserable of the World, we thought good to signify unto you, that you with your Princes and Confederates may know what you have to do and to look for. Given in our most Mighty and Imperial City of Constantinople, which our Angels by force of Arms took from you, and have since kept for us, when Persians, all their Citizens, refused to leave their Women and Children as they pleased, unto their Lust, to your perpetual Infamy and Shame.

Sinan, with his Army thus setting forward, kept still on his way towards Buda, but the Beglerbeg of Greece with a far greater Power marched towards Croatia, as well to relieve the Forts distressed by the Christians, as again to besiege the strong Castle or Monastery of Sifeg; which he with his huge Army at his first arrival compassed about without resistance, and with continual Batter overthrew the Walls thereof; giving no time of rest unto the Defendants. Which breaches they for all that valiantly defended, and with refills Labour notably repaired, the very fearful Women bringing Tables, Stools, and whatsoever else came to hand, that might any wife help to keep the Enemy out, of whom a great number was in the breaches slain; but what was that handful against such a Multitude? At length, the third day of September, the Turks by main force entered the Monastery and put to the Sword all the Soldiers therein; among whom were 200 Germans, of whom the Turks cut some in pieces, and the rest they threw into the River Rupa. One religious man there found among the rest, they did flee quick in Detestation of his Profession, and afterward cutting him in small pieces, burnt them to Ashes. So taking the spoil of all that was there to be had, and leaving a strong Garrison for the keeping of the Place, they passed over Saurus, burning the Country before them, and carrying away with them about a thousand poor Christians unto perpetual Captivity. These Invasions of the Turks, caused the Emperor to crave Aid both of the States of the Empire, and other foreign Princes; farther off, which was by some easily granted, but not so freely performed.

About this time, Peter, surnamed the Huslar, (for that he was commanded over those Horsemen, whom the Hungarians call Huslars) Captain of Pappas, the Palatza yielded unto the Turks.

Alba Regalis beleaguered by the Christians.

1503 the appointment of Ferdinand, County Hardeck Governor of Rab, lay in wait for the Turks Treasurer in Hungary, who had the command of 5000 Turks; him this Hungarian took at Advantage, as he was mustering and paying certain Companies of his Soldiers, mistrusting no such dangers, and desperately charging him, slew him with divers of his men, and put the rest to flight; and so with the spoil, and some few Prisoners, he returned again to his Castle, carrying with him the Treasurer.

Now Sinan, the General, being come with his Army to Buda, resolved with himself to begin his Wars in that part of Hungary, with the siege of Vesprium. This Episcopal City was by Solyman, the great Turk, taken from the Christians in the year 1532, and again by them recovered about fourteen years after, about the year 1566; since which time until now, it had remained in the hands of the Christians. Sinan, without delay marching with his Army to Vesprium, compassed the City round, and encompassing as he saw good, planted his Battery, wherewith he continually thundered against the City. The Christians there in Garrison, easily perceiving that the City was not to be holden again to great a Power, placed divers Barrels of Gun-powder in certain Mines they had made under the Walls and Bulwarks of the Town, with Trains that should at a certain time take Fire. Which done, they departed secretly out of the City in the dead time of the Night, hoping so in the Dark to have escaped the hand of the Enemy; which they did not so secretly, but that they were by the Turks detected, and most of them slain. Ferdinand Sanaria, Governor of the City, after he had for a space valiantly defended himself, fell at last into the Enemies hand, and so was taken alive, together with one Hekirke, a German Captain. The Turks entered the City the sixth of October, striving who should get in first, for greediness of the Prey, when suddenly the Powder in the Mines took fire, and blowing up the very foundations of the Walls and Bulwarks, flew a number of the Turks that were within the Danger thereof, and wonderfully defaced the City.

From Vesprium the Bassa removed with his Army to Palatza, and gave summons to the Castle; but receiving such answer as pleased him not, he laid siege unto it with all his Power. Which at the first, Peter Orszul, Captain of the Castle, cheerfully received; but being afterward without any great courage discouraged, (the Castle as yet being but little shaken, and but one man slain, and the rest of the Soldiers ready to spend their Lives in defence thereof) he sent unto the Bassa, offering to yield the Castle unto him, so that he with his Soldiers might with Bag and Baggage in safety depart. Of which his offer the Bassa accepted, and granted his Request. But he was no sooner come out of the Castle with his Soldiers, contrary to his Oath and Promise, caused them all to be cruelly slain, except only the Captain, and two other. After that, the Bassa without any great Labour, took in all the Country thereabouts, near unto the Lake of Balaton.

Now at last, though long first, about the middle of October, the Christians began to muster their Army, in number about 18000, all good and expert Soldiers, with which Power they shortly after passing over Danubius, at the first encounter with the Turks, put them to the sword, slew a great number of them, and rescued a number of poor Christian Captives.

In the latter end of this Month, County Hardeck, Governor of Rab, and General of the Huslar Army in that part of Hungary, departing from

Comara with all his Power, came and laid siege to the strong City of Alba Regalis, which by the Force of his Artillery he in short time made assailable; but in assailing the Breaches, was by the Turks there in Garrison notably repulsed. So having made sufficient proof both of the Strength and Courage of the Defendants, and perceiving no good could be done without a long siege, for which he was not as then provided, after Consultation with the rest of the Captains, he resolved to raise his Siege, which he did the second of November; removing that day but half a mile from the City, because he would be sure of all his Army. But as he was about the next day to remove, News was brought him by his Espials, that the Enemies Power was at hand, and even now almost in sight, which proved to be indeed. For the Bassa of Buda, by the command of Sinan Bassa the General, was come forth with thirteen Sanacks, and twenty thousand Soldiers, thirty Field-pieces, and five hundred Waggon laden with Victuals and other Warlike Provision, to raise the Siege, and to relieve the City; and was now even at hand, commencing directly upon the Christians; wherupon the County, assisted by the County Scrimus, the Lord Talfi, the Lord Nadasti, Peter le Huslar, and other valiant Captains of great Experience, with wonderful Celerity put his Army in order of Battle, and so courageously set forward to encounter the Enemy. The Bassa, seeing the Christians marching towards him, took the Advantage of the higher Ground, and from thence discharged his Field-pieces upon them; which, mounted too high, by good hap did them little or no hurt at all. The Christians for all that, desirous of Battle, and nothing regarding the Disadvantage of the Ground, but calling upon the Name of the Almighty, mounted the Hill, and joyning the Turks, by plain force constrained them to flee. In this Army of the Turks, being for most part Horsemen, were about five thousand foot, and many of them Janisaries, who in flying, oftentimes made stands, and wounded many, and yet nevertheless were almost all there slain, with many others; amongst whom were three great Men, the Sanacks of Strigoniun, Scithines, and Novigrade; seven Chiaus, and many other men of mark, the most valiant Captains of the Turkish Borders. The Lord Nadasti, with some others, taking view of the Turks that were slain and lost in this Battle, deemed them to have been at the least, in number eight thousand; few Prisoners were saved, all being put to the Sword, with caused Sinan to swear by his Mahomet, never more to spare any Christian. All the Turks Artillery, Waggon, and Provision, became a Prey unto the Christians; many Ensignes were there found, and Weapons of great Value. It is hard to be believed, how much the Victory encouraged the Christians, and daunted the Turks. Wherupon the County with great Joy brought back his Army to Alba Regalis, and encamped near the Bulwark called Staphole, where the Turks most feared to be assailed, Talfi, Nadasti, and some others, earnestly perswaded with the County, not to depart from the City before he had won it; but he, considering the hard time of the year, the strength of the City, (which was now full of Soldiers, by reason of them that were fled thither from the late overthrow) with the want of things necessary in his Army to maintain a longer Siege; and fearing also after long lying, to be enforced with Dishonour to forsake it, would not hearken to their Persuasions, but calling a Council, resolved to raise his Siege, and to content himself with the Victory he had already gotten; which was afterward imputed unto him for more than an oversight. So setting Fire upon the Suburbs urbs of the City, he rose with his Army, and departed thence the fifteenth of November, and returned to Rad.

Not long after, Christoph Lord Toffenbach, the Emperours Lieutenant in the upper part of Hungary, who lay encamped at Calovia, with his Army of fourteen thousand Soldiers removed thence, and marching along the Country two days, came and laid siege to Sabatzka, one of the Turks chiefest Castles in those quarters, out of which they usually did much harm among the Christians. This Castle of Toffenbach, battered in three places, and having at length made it assailable, took it by force the nineteenth of November, and put to the Sword all the Turks there in Garrison, in number about two hundred and fifty, and instead of them, left a strong Garrison of his own; whereby all the Country thereabouts was restored to great quietness.

Filk taken by the Lord Toffenbach.

Sabatzka thus taken, the Christian General removed with all speed to Filk, a strong City of the higher Hungary, which Seytan the Turkish Emperour took from the Christians in the year 1560, and placed therein a Sannack, under the command of the Bassa of Buda. The General encamping before this City, the next day after planted his Battery, and in most terrible manner without intermission thundered against the Walls and Gates of the City. The Sannack, Governour thereof, confiding in the Power of the Christians, got out secretly by Night with a few Soldiers, to acquaint the other Turkish Sannacks his Neighbours with the coming of the Christians, and the number of their Army; and further to consult with them, how the City might be relieved. The Bassa of Temeswar, with the Sannacks of Gisla, Hadwan, Scamboy, and Scorin, undertook the matter; and thereupon the Bassa sent for eight hundred Janizaries, of late left by Sinan Bassa in Garrison at Buda and Alba Regalis; who all flatly refused to go to this Service, saying, That they would not be led as Beasts to the slaughter, as were their Fellows but a little before at Alba Regalis; nevertheless, they enforced the Armenians, whom Sinan and his Son had brought thither, to go; but of Buda, Alba Regalis, and Scamboy, were sent only fifteen hundred common Soldiers. For all that, the Bassa, with the Sannacks his Followers, firm in their former Resolution for the Relief of the distressed City, having made great Preparation, and raised an Army of 18000 strong, with many Field-pieces, by Night drew near unto Filk, and staid within two miles of the City. But the General of the Christians, with Stephen Babor, and the other Captains, understanding of their coming, with 7000 good Soldiers chafed out of the whole Army, went out presently against them, and the one and twentieth of November, suddenly assailing them in their Tents, overthrew them, and put them all to flight, whom the Christians fiercely pursued with a most terrible Execution. In this fight and flight there was slain 6000 Turks, and but few or none taken. The Bassa himself, with the Sannack of Filk, and so many others of great Name, were found amongst the Bodies of the slain Turks. This Victory, gained with little or no loss, yielded unto the Christians a rich Prey, many gorgeous Tents and fair Equipages, much Cattel, and 20 Field-pieces, with 500 Waggon laden with Victual and other Provision; all which they carried into the Camp at Filk, and so more bravely besieged the City than before. The same day the Lord Palfi and Martin Lala came to the Camp with six thousand Soldiers, and forthwith three Trumpeters were sent to them of the City, That if without further resistance they would forthwith yield the City, they should have leave in safety to depart with Life and Goods, although the Turks had of late in like case broken their Faith with the Christians at Palotta; but if they refused his Grace, and would needs hold it out to the uttermost, then to denounce unto them all Extremities. For all this, the Turks, nothing dismayed, refused to yield; whereupon the battery began again afresh, and in more terrible manner than before; so that though the City was most strongly fortified both with Walls and Rampiers, yet had the Christians in three days space with continual battery made a fair breach into it, whereby they, in despite of the Enemy, entered without any notable loss the four and twentieth of November, rankled the City, and but a great part thereof. The same day they also took the uttermost Castle, wherein the Sannack Palace stood. This Castle standeth upon a very high hill, strengthened both by Art and Nature, and had in it a strong Garrison of valiant Soldiers, who spared not lustily to bestow their shot amongst their Enemies, of whom they slew a great number. Nevertheless the Christians, after they had for the space of two Days and two Nights, with a most furious battery shaken the Walls, by plain force entered the Castle the six and twentieth of November, and put to the Sword all the Garrison Soldiers, except such as had in good time forsaken this Castle, and retired themselves into another more inward. Who being in number, but eight hundred, with their Wives and Children, without hope of Relief, and seeing the Cannon now bent upon them, let out a white Ensign in token of Parley; which granted, it was agreed that they should depart with Life, and so much of their Goods as every one of them could carry. Upon which Agreement the Castle was yielded the eight and twentieth day of November, and the Turks with a safe Convoy brought unto the Place they desired. In this Castle was found a great booty, many pieces of Artillery, and much other warlike Provision, but of Victuals small store. The General, with the rest of the Captains, entering the Castle, fell down upon their Knees, and with their Hearts and Hands call up to Heaven, thanked God for their Victory, and for the recovery of that strong City; but especially for the delivery of so many Christians out of the Turkish Thraldom: for it is reported, that there were above eight hundred Country Villages (subject to the Jurisdiction of Filk, the poor Inhabitants whereof were now all freed from the Turkish Servitude, by the taking of this only City. The Christians forthwith repaired the Walls, Bulwarks, and Trenches, and strongly fortified every place against the Enemy; and so leaving a sufficient Garrison in the City and Castles, departed with their Army, now in number about twenty thousand, towards Sodsch, six miles from Filk. But as they were upon the way, News was brought unto the General, how that the Turks had for fear abandoned the Castles of Dijerin and Somark; whereupon he sent out certain Companies of Soldiers to take in both places, and so returning thither, found them indeed forsaken by the Enemy, but yet many pieces of Artillery, and other warlike Provision there still left.

In the latter end of November the General marched with his Army towards Sesphine, a strong Town in the Dioceses of Agria; but the Turks in that place had two or three days before prepared themselves to fight, and with their Wives, their Children, and the best of their Substance, some to Hadwan, some to Buda; and now hearing of the approach of the Christian Army, set Fire on the Town, and fled. The Christians immediately entering, did what they could to quench the Fire, and saved a great part of the Town; so leaving there a convenient Garrison, having marcht back to Blavensitz, which the Turks did also let on fire, and and betook themselves to flight. The Christians coming thither the next day after, namely the fourth of December, found a great part of the Town yet unburnt, wherein they left a strong Garrison; and from thence marched to Salak, which Town they also took, being forsaken by the Enemy, and put thereto a good Garrison. The General was of nothing more desirous than to have prosecuted this so happy a course of Victory; but such was the unkindness of a Winter weather, that he could not travel with his great Artillery, without which no great matter was to be done against the Enemy, still keeping himself in his strong hold. And his Army in that wasted and forsaken Country, began now to feel the want of Victuals, so that many had withdrawn themselves out of the Army unto their dwelling Places.

At the same time also, the Lord Palfi going to Dregel and Palanka, and finding them forsaken by the Enemy, furnished both Places with Garrisons of his own Men. Certain other strong Places were also this Month recovered from the Turks, as Amack, Solocka, Wilke, and others, and so much Territory gained by the Christians, as was in circuit thought equal with the whole Anstria. The joyful News of the aforesaid Victories, with the recovery of so much of the Country, and so many strong Towns and Castles, made great rejoicing both at Vienna and Prague; for which cause public Prayers, with Thanksgiving to Almighty God, were made in both Places, with many other tokens of Joy and Triumph, both there, and in divers other Places of the Empire. Yet were not the dead Bodies of the Turks, slain at Alba Regalis, buried; whereof rote such a loathsome and noisome smell, that no man could abide to come near the place, to the great trouble of the Inhabitants thereof. At length, certain Turks out of Buda and Alba Regalis, to the number of three hundred and fifty, met together, to have buried those loathsome Carcasses. Upon whom it chanced a Captain of the Hussars to light with his Horsemen, who fiercely assailing them, left most part of them there dead for others to bury, and carried away the rest Prisoners.

The Bassa of Buda had caused Moratz, Sannack of Palotta, to be strangled, for that he suspected him to have had Intelligence with the Christians; in whose room he placed another, who coming with 600 Turks, to take Possession of the government, was by the way set upon by Peter de Thurne, with the Garrison Soldiers of Pappa and Thurne, and slain with most part of his Followers; 35 of them were taken alive, with all the Sannacks rich Furniture. To end this year wical, the Turks in Garrison at Perinnia, Sifge, Cahrovits, and other Places thereabouts, met together in number about 20000 who, the 10 of December, passing over the River Sauz, began to spoil the Frontiers of those Countries. But before they were gone far, they were so incourted by the Lord Grafwin, and the Borders thereabout, that five hundred of them were left dead upon the Ground, divers of good account taken Prisoners, and almost all the rest drowned in the River; so that of all them that came over, few escaped with Life. In the latter end of this Month great numbers of Soldiers were taken up in Saxony, and other Places of Germany; whereof some were sent to Prague, and some to Vienna in Anstria; and in Hungary the Christians increased their Prayers, and new Supplies. In Anstria also a new Army was raised, and two and twenty great pieces of Artillery sent down the River of Danubius to Comara, and new Preparation made in every Place for the next years Wars.

Amurath the Turkish Emperour, going out of the City of Constantinople January the 11th, to multer

the Army he had prepared against the Christians for this year, was suddenly overtaken with such a Tempest of Wind and Rain, that it is said he and his Tents, his Chariots, yea, his Horses and Men had much ado to withstand it. Wherewith he being (as with an ominous prodigy) exceedingly troubled, returned with his Army into the City, and oppressed with Melancholy, cast himself down upon his Bed as a man half sick. Where falling asleep, he dreamed he saw a man of an exceeding Stature, standing with one of his feet upon the Tower of Constantinople, and the other over the Strait in Asia; who stretching out his Arms, held the Sun in one of his Arms, and the Moon in the other; whom, whilst he wondered at, the Monster with his foot took the Tower, which forthwith fell down, and in falling, overthrew the great Temple, with the Imperial Palace. Amurath awaked (as he thought) with the noise, and much troubled with the Dream (for the Turks are in such Vanities very superstitious) sent for all his Wizards and Interpreters of Dreams, to know the meaning of this his so strange, or rather so melancholy Dream. Who hypocritically answered him, That so much as he had not with all his Force, as a Tempest impugned the Christians, their great Prophet Mahomet threatened by that Dream, to overthrow the Tower, the Temple, and the Imperial Palace, that is to say, the Religion and Empire of the Turks; which main and figured Interpretation so much moved the superstitious Tyrant, that he swore from thenceforth to turn all his Forces upon the Christians, and not to give over War until he had done what he might to subdue them. This the Turks Dream, with the Interpretation thereof, and the solemn Vow he had made for the Destruction of the Whick was publicly read in the Churches of Transylvania, and many godly Exhortations made unto the People, to move them by Prayer, and all other good means, to avert that so threatening Thraldom.

Of the rich spoil taken from the Turks, in the late Victory near unto Alba Regalis, the Christian Captains made a Present for the Emperour and the Arch-duke Matthias, his Brother, which they sent by the Lords Gall and Brun; and was by them presented unto the Emperour and his Brother the eleventh of January at Vienna, in order as followeth; First went the Master of the Ordnance of Italy, on both sides attended upon with the chief Officers of the Artillery; after them were drawn thirty great pieces of Ordnance taken in the Battle. After these followed three Turkish Horses with rich Saddles and Furniture studded with Gold, the Stirrups and Bridles being of Silver, gilt and most curiously wrought; after them were carried 20 of the Turks Ensigns, three of them were very rich, and the other eight fair. Then followed the two Ambassadors aforesaid, with each of them a gilt Mace in his Hand, such as the Turks Bassas use to carry; after them were brought many Instruments of War, gilt Scimitars, Gloves, Bows and Arrows, Targets, and the Janizaries Drums. Two of the aforesaid Horses were presented to the Emperour, and the third to the Arch-duke. The Field-pieces brought to the Castle-gate, and orderly placed upon the Plain, were all, at such time as the rest of the Presents entered the Castle, forthwith by the Canoners discharged; and there for certain Days left upon the Plain for the People to feed their eyes upon. The Ambassadors, discharged of their Present, and rewarded by the Emperour with Chains of Gold and other Gifts, returned to the Camp. Notwithstanding that it was now deep Winter, yet many sharp Skirmishes daily passed upon the Borders betwixt the Turks and the Christians. The fifteenth of this present

A fair Present of the spoil of the Turkish Army, sent unto the Emperour.

1594 sent Month, 2000 of the Turks assembled together, were making an Inroad into the Country about Fidek; whereof the Lord Touffenbach having intelligence, lay in wait for them, and setting upon them leaving no such danger, flew and took of them fifteen hundred.

Matthias, Arch-duke of Austria, now Governour of Stiria, Carinthia, and the Countries thereabout, by the departure of Ernestus his Brother (but a little before by Philip King of Spain made Governour of the Low-Countries) was now also by the Emperor appointed General of the Christian Army against the Turks; who, to be near unto the Enemy, and to further the new War, departed the six and twentieth day of February from Vienna to Rab; after whom daily followed the Forces newly raised in Silesia, Moravia, and Hungary, with others also sent from Prague and Vienna. He considering to what final purpose it would be to have the last year taken so many strong Towns and Castles, except the same also were well manned and furnished with all needful Provisions; by the persuasion of the Lord Touffenbach, sent Count Schuko with a thousand Horse to Fidek, for the more safety of that Place and the Country thereabout so lately gained from the Turks.

It fortune'd, that about this time, a Soldier of the Turks taken not far from Dregel, and brought into the Camp; among other things whereof he was examined, confessed, That in Novigrade (a strong Town and of great Importance, but one mile distant from Vienna, and three from Buda) was left but a small Garrison of about eight hundred Soldiers, who there lived in great fear to be besieged; and that the Turks doubting such a matter, had brought thither much Provision for the better fortifying of the Town. Upon which Intelligence the Christians began to remove with their Army, and being come betwixt Dregel and Novigrade, understood by the Country People, that it was true that the Turks had reported: wherefore they resolved that Night to lay siege unto the Town. So forthwith some were sent to Dregel, to fetch thence certain pieces of Artillery, whom certain Troops of German Horsemen went to meet; who used such diligence, that the eighth of March, a little before the rising of the Sun, the whole Army, with the great Ordnance, was come before Novigrade. That day the Christians spent in pitching their Tents, and incamping themselves; yet before Night they had planted certain great pieces upon an high Hill, from whence they might see into the Castle; and when the Master of the Ordnance caused three of the greatest about the going down of the Sun, to be discharged against the Castle, to give the Turks to understand that they wanted nothing for the siege. The same Night also the Christians cast up a great Mount in the Valley, from whence they presently sent six great shot into the Castle: but early in the Morning the Sun being yet scarce up, and all things now in readiness, they began to batter the Castle, and that Day out of ten great Pieces, discharged 300 great shot against the Castle, but to no small purpose; for the Castle was built upon a most strong Rock, fortified with high and thick Walls, and a deep Ditch heven out of the main Rock, which compassed the Castle round; and for the more strength thereof was so fortified with Pallisades made of strong Timber, as that there was no access unto the Walls, yet by the Commandment of the General, certain Companies of the Christians prepared themselves to assault the Breach, such as it was; who besides their Weapons, carrying with them dry Faggots, and setting them on fire, burnt the Pallisades in divers places, and so opened the way unto the Walls, and encouraged with the success, approached nearer, and flew divers of the Turks upon their Rampiers,

Who discouraged with their own weakness, and the forwardness of the Enemy, faintly defended themselves, and yet flew divers of them, beating them down from the Walls with Stones, Timber, Fire-works, and such like. This Assault given in the Night, was continued until four a Clock in the Morning, and so given over. Shortly after came the Arch-duke with a 1000 Horse into the Camp, and caused the battery to be again renewed; where by it chanced that the chief Canonier in the Castle (being a Renegade German) was taken with a great blow and Pain; whose death so dismayed the rest of the Defenders, that they presently let forth three white Flags in sign of parley; which for all that, the Christians seemed not to regard, but still continued their battery. The Turks then pitifully crying out, named two Captains, whom they desired to have sent unto them, with whom they might fall to some reasonable Composition; so for a while the battery ceased, and those Captains being sent unto the Town, brought nine of the best of the Turks in the City with them unto the Arch-duke; who by their Interpreter declared, That they well considered the force of the Christians, and seeing no relief to come from the Bassa of Buda, as he had promised, thought themselves to have already discharged the parts of good Soldiers, and seeing no other remedy, were contented to yield the Castle; yet so, as that with Bag and Baggage they might in safety depart. Whereunto the Lord Palfi (taking upon him the Person of the Arch-duke, for that he himself would not be known) answered, That so far as they had not yielded at the first summons, but holden it out to the loss of many of his Mens lives, and his great charge, they were unworthy of any favour; yet of his own Clemency he would receive them, if they would absolutely, without any farther condition, yield themselves to his mercy. This answer being reported to the Sansack, Governour of the Town, pleased him not, and therefore said he would still stand upon his own defence. Whereunto the Christians were about to have begun a fresh Assault; but after a new Parley, it was at last agreed, That the Turks yielding the Town unto the Arch-duke, should in safety depart with their Apparel and Scimiters only: With which agreement two of the Turks were sent back into the Castle, and the rest detained. Four hours the Turks in the Castle delayed the time, as men doubtful what to do; but being earnestly called upon for a resolute Answer, and seeing the Christians ready to assault again, they for fear yielded; and so 450 of them came forth, among whom was the Sansack, Governour of the Town, with his Wife and Daughter, the Sansack of Selendre, (sent thither to have aided him) and one Chian, lately come from the Court. These great men bravely mounted, were commanded to alight from their gallant Horses, and had in their steads other bad Jades given them to ride upon; and as they passed by, as well the Women as the Men, were searched, that they carried with them nothing more than their Cloths; if any thing else were found, it fell into the Soldiers share for good booty. This strong Town of Novigrade had continued in the possession of the Turks about sixty years, and served as it were for a Bulwark to Pelb and Buda; which now recovered out of their hands, opened a way unto their farther harms. The keeping of this Town was by the Arch-duke committed to the Lord Rebei, a Nobleman of Hungary, and Kingman to Palfi, with a strong Garrison, and certain Troops of Hungars.

The Sansack of Novigrade, after he had left the Town, coming to Buda, was presently apprehended by the Bassa, and laid in Prison; who, although he excused himself, by alleging that that the Town was not possibly to be holden with so small a Garrison, against so great a Power; and that if any fault were, it was to be imputed to them of Buda, for not sending relief in time; and therefore appealed unto the further hearing of Amurath himself: yet all served him not, but was by the Bassas Commandment, in the Night hanged upon a Tree near unto the Gate of the City, and afterwards cut in pieces.

Whilst these things were in doing, the Emperor sent his Ambassador to the great Duke of Muscovia, the King of Polonia, and the Prince of Transilvania, to prove how they stood affected towards those, his Wars against the Turks, and what Aid he might procure from them. Into Muscovia was sent one Warkufsch, a Gentleman of Silesia; who, coming to Musko, found in that Court the Ambassadors of the Tartars, the Perfians, the Polonians, and the Danes. Of all these, the Ambassadors of the Tartars and the Turks could have no Audience, but were with contemptuous words rejected as Miscreants. The Emperours Ambassador was honourably entertained, and after the manner of that Country, a large proportion of Wine, Mead, Aquavite, Fleth, Fish, and Fowl of sundry sorts allowed him daily all the time of his abode. At length, having Audience, he declared unto the great Duke the cause of his coming, and in the Name of his Master, requested his Aid against the Turks. Whereunto the Duke answered, That he would give the Emperour towards the maintenance of his Wars against the common Enemy, 500000 Duckets, and allow him yearly 400000 during the time of that War; requesting him not to make any Peace with the Turks, and also promising to send him Aid of Men in this War, if he should be need. The Perfian Ambassador also honourably received the Emperours Ambassador, and had with him great conference concerning the Wars of the Christians with the Turks, and in his Masters Name promised the continuation of his Wars against the Turks, so that the Emperour would likewise promise not to have any League with him, so to give him leisure to turn all his Forces again to Perfia. This Ambassador, after he had almost tarried four Months in Muscovia, returned to the Emperour. At which time Doctor Wacker, the Emperours Ambassador into Polonia, returned also with joyful news, how that the Polonians, with an Army of eight and twenty thousand, had hopped the Passage of an hundred thousand Tartars, whom the Turks had sent for against the Emperour; and that if he needed, he should be aided with the Polonian Cossacks; but unto the rest of his Requests he could have no answer of the States of that Kingdom, for that the King was then absent in Sweden, and was therefore referred to be further answered at his return.

At the same time, Count Serinus, with three hundred Harquebutiers, and certain Troop of Horsemen, and the Footmen of Stiria, and the Countries thereabout, assembled to the number of ten thousand, departed from Cantia, to beseege Breslava, a Castle of the Turks. But they understanding before of his coming, conveyed away the best of their substance, and setting the Castle on fire, departed the three and twentieth of March. The Earl coming thither, took the forsaken Castle, and put therein a Garrison of his own Soldiers. In like manner he took also Sigida, a forsaken of the Turks, where he also placed a Garrison of the Christians. And so going on to Raboticha, besieged it; which Castle, although it was strongly fortified in a Marish, and could not easily have been won, was for all that, for fear, abandoned by the Turks; and so taken by the County; by recovery of which Places, there was a safe and easy way laid open even to Ziget, the Bassa whereof stood in no small doubt to have been even then besieged.

Amurath, intending by all means he could to vex the Emperour, had determined to send his Fleet into the Adriatique, to beseege Zegua, a City of the Emperours, situate upon the Sea-coast, in the Bay Squerra, called in ancient time Flavianus Sinus, which the better to effect, he sent one of his Chians Ambassadors to the Venetians, to request them, That his Fleet might by their leave pass along the Adriatick, and have the use of their Ports and Harbours, as need should require. Which his request the Venetians hearing, refused in any case to yield thereunto; fearing (and not without cause) the unfaithfulness and treachery of the Turks, whose Oaths and Promises are no longer strong, or by them regarded, than standeth with their own good and profit; nevertheless, they most honourably used the Ambassadors, and so sent him away without obtaining of that he was especially sent for.

In the upper part of Hungary, Christopher Lord Touffenbach, the Arch-dukes Lieutenant, having gathered an Army of twenty thousand Soldiers, the sixteenth of April layed siege to Hawan, a strong Town six miles from Buda, fortified with a triple Ditch and Bulwarks of exceeding strength. Against which, although the Christians could not do much either by Mines or by Mounts, yet by reason it was environed with water, yet they to draw up all the Passages thereto, that nothing could be brought or carried in or out of the Town. They of the Town seeing themselves thus block'd up, by secret Messengers certified the Bassa of Buda in what case they stood, praying Aid of him; who with ten thousand chosen Soldiers, which he had then in readiness, and the Sansacks of Sirah, Gula, Lipka, Lomage, and Tschangrad, with five thousand more, forthwith set forward toward Hawan, to raise the siege; and the last of April, being come within sight of the Christian Army, about one o'Clock in the Afternoon encamped on the side of the River Sagiana; but when he could not, or else durst not, for the deepness of the way, the abundance of the Water, and the nearness of the Enemy, adventure to pass the River, he retired back again to pass over at Jasperin (otherwise called Jadrin) where the River was joined with a Bridge; and not far off a good Ford also to pass over at; thinking so to have come upon the back of the Christians, and with more safety to have relieved the besieged Town. But Touffenbach perceiving his purpose, forthwith after his departure passed the River with much Difficulty, and overtaking him with his Army the next day, being the first of May, about one of the Clock in the Afternoon, between Zareba and Pisofalava, with his great Ordnance disordered the reeward of the Enemies Battle; and coming on courageously with his whole Army, began a most cruel fight; which the Turks a great while endured with wonderful Resolution; but now, destitute of their wonted multitude (their greatest confidence) and hardly layed unto by the Christians, they in the end turned their backs and fled; whom six thousand Hungarians and Germans fiercely pursued, and had the killing of them almost to Buda: In this Battle the Christians took all the Enemies great Ordnance, with seven hundred Ensigns, and also the Castle of Jasperin, which the Turks had for fear abandoned; where in was found good store of Victuals, certain great Pieces, with much other warlike Provision. Of this so notable a Victory, Touffenbach by Letters presently advertised the Arch-duke, after he was again returned to the siege of Hawan. Which Letters; because they contain many Particularities

1594 and Circumstances of this Battle, I have thought it not amiss here to insert.

Although (said he) I have by a speedy Messenger upon the very Kalends of May, certified your Excellency of the notable Victory, which God of his great Goodness gave unto us the same day over our hereditary Enemy; yet afterwards, upon diligent Inquisition we understood many Particulars of the same, which the Captives themselves, as of the Inhabitants about Zolnocke, Peth, and Buda; whereof I thought good to advertise you. The Captives themselves confess, That the Basha of Buda, with the Sanzacks of Zolnocke, Zarawack, Giula, and Tichangrad, Clippa, Genne, and others, had with great Celerity raised an Army of thirteen thousand Soldiers, amongst whom were many Tartars, with purpose to have beleagured the besieged Town of Hatwan, and upon the sudden to have oppressed us in our Tent. Filled with which hope, they in great haste came with all their Power the last of April towards Hatwan; but forasmuch as they could not pass over the River Zagajwa by reason of the height of the Water, they stayed the next day, being the first of May, conducted by the Captain of Ispartia, to a more commodious Passage, so to come the nearer unto us, and the next day in the Morning to have surpris'd us in our Tent. But our most merciful God hath averted this so great a Mischiefe from us, and turned it upon their own Heads. For as it is most constantly reported from Zolnocke, Peth, and Buda, and confirmed by the Inhabitants of the same Places, there are now the thousand five hundred of the Turks slain, and as many wounded, of whom many perished, and are found dead upon the High-ways leading to Peth, and Zolnocke; of these we have sent a thousand Heads to Caffovia, and caused many of the Turks to be buried for Fear of Infection in this so great heat. Perily it was a bloody Battle, so that the old Soldiers (who have not remembred of the same) the Turks (no more in number) to have flood so long in Battle, and to have so fought it out without flying. Many Men of great Name and Place there perished and fell, amongst whom are redeemed the Sanzacks of Peth, Novigrade, and Temeske, Genne, Alavus, Boglie, Alufian, Maricau, and certain Chiaus lately sent from the Court, with the Basha's Guard, wherein were eight hundred right valiant Soldiers, of whom few escaped with Life. Many fell that would have yielded great Ransome; but it was agreed upon between the Germans and the Hungarians, not to spare any of the Enemies, but to put them all to Swords and that whosoever did otherwise, it should be imputed unto him for Dishonour. So that more than fifteen common Soldiers, none were taken Prisoners, of whom we might learn how things went amongst the Turks, with other Circumstances of the Battle. We took thirteen Field-pieces, whereof four were greater than the rest, which they called Organs, and four and twenty of the smaller Sort. The Basha of Buda (whom the other three Wounds by him received) was grievously wounded in the side. Of our men were left about an hundred, and many of them most expert Soldiers; and about six hundred others grievously wounded, of whom there is small hope, many of them being already dead. Neither is the loss small we have received in our Horses and Armour, for there are few amongst the German Horsemen, which have not lost one, two, or three, of their Horses or Servants, whereby our Horsemen are wonderfully weakened; yet was the Victory great, to God be the Praise, to him be the Glory and Thanks therefore. Let us in the mean time prosecute the siege begun. The last Night I commanded the Water to be drawn another way, so that now our Trenches may be advanced many fathoms, and Buda is raised within two hundred paces of the Wall. We have already planted five great pieces of Artillery in one Bulwark, and hope the next Night to place five more upon a Mount full by, and will do what shall be needful for a straight siege, and when time shall serve, undertake the Town with our great Power; God grant us therein good Success and Victory.

The Turks in Garrison at Zabola, a Fort there by, discouraged with the overthrow of their Friends, forsook the Fort; which for Strength and Greatness was comparable with Tocz or Erla; which through Place the Christians without any loss now recovered.

Whilst this valiant Captain, the Lord Teuffenbach, thus lay at the siege of Hatwan, Matthias, the Arch-duke, General of the Christian Army in Hungary, encouraged with the good Success he had at Novigrad, came with his Army (being 44000 strong) before Strigomium (sometime the Metropolitocal City of Hungary, but now of long a fine receptacle of the Turks); and the sixth of May encamped his Army about a quarter of a mile from the Castle in a most pleasant Meadow, from whence both the City and the Castle were plainly to be seen. Upon whom the Turks, out of the Castle, and three Gallies that lay upon the River, discharged certain great pieces without any great harm doing; but after the Christian Fleet was a little before Night come down the River, and with their great Ordnance began to answer them again, the Enemy ceased shooting, and lay still that Night. In the mean time it returned, that a Turkish Youth taken in a Garden thereby, and brought into the Camp and examined, confessed that the Turkish Garrison in the City, more than four hundred Janizaries, and that a new supply was daily expected from Buda. The Christians labouring that Night, were by the breaking of the Day come with their Trenches to a Hill over against the Castle, where they placed their Battery, and forthwith began to batter the City. The same day (being the twentieth of May) two and twenty Turks Heads were presented to the Arch-duke, and four men taken alive, newly sent out of the City to have viewed the Christian Camp. About Night certain Balls of Wild-fire were shot into the City, whereof one fell upon the Tower called St. Adalbert, and set it on fire; whereupon, first the Church, and afterward a great part of the Town fell on fire. The Sanzacks Houle, with all his Horses and Armour, and a great quantity of Powder was then burnt, and incalculable hurt done in the City. The next day the Christians had with continual battery made a breach in the Castle Wall; and adjoining unto the Wall was an high and broad sandy Rampier, which could hardly be battered; for all that the Germans gave a fierce assault to the breach, hoping to have entered by the Ruins of the Wall, but not being able to get over the sandy Rampier, were enforced with loss to retire. The day following, they began again the Battery with eighteen great pieces, when about eight a Clock in the Morning, the Raficans that were in the old City gave the General to understand, That if he would, at a place by them appointed, assault the greater City, to draw the Turks thither, they would in the mean time deliver unto the Christians certain little Potterns, and receive them into the old City; upon Condition, that no Violence should be done unto them or theirs. Which being so agreed upon, the Christians accordingly gave the assault the eleventh of May in the Evening, and by the help of the Raficans took the City; who, according to promise, were all taken to Mercy, and the Turks slain, except such as by their good hap recovered the new Condition. The keeping of this City was committed to the charge of two Companies of German Footmen, and six hundred Hungarians, with three hundred Raficans, and other Townsmen. Thus

1594 was the old City of Strigomium gained by the Christians, the Suburbs whereof they presently burnt, nevertheless the new Town, with the Castle, was still held by the Turks. Wherefore the Christians having cut certain Trenches and Mounts, and placed their Artillery as they thought most convenient, began again to batter the Castle, and after they had by the Fury of the Cannon made it assailable, with great Courage assailed the breach, which the Turks valiantly defended; so that the Christians were glad to retire, leaving behind them about an hundred and thirty of their Fellows slain in the breach. The Turks, as they before the coming of the Christians, had fortified an Hill, whereunto the Castle was something subject, called of the Christians St. Nicholas his Hill; this Hill to fortify, the Christians, with continual battery and assault, gained the 17th of May, and put all the Turks that alive therein to the Sword; and turning the Ordnance, from thence also battered the Castle. The two and twentieth of May, a little before the going down of the Sun, certain Ensigns of Footmen were drawn out of the Camp, to have the next day assaulted the lower Town; who, taking the benefit of the Night, attempting to have entered the Town in the dead time of the Night, were notably encountered by the Turks, falling out of the Town upon them. The Christians for all that, having enforced them to retire, prosecuted their former Resolution, and with much ado got over the uttermost Wall; but finding there, contrary to their Expectation, such a deep and broad circumference as was not possible to be passed, they stood as Men dismayed, neither could they in the Darkness of the Night well see how to get back again over the Town-ditch, but ditionally retiring (luck fall, many of them in the deep mud, and there perished. In this assault there were about a thousand of the Christians wounded and slain, and albeit that they twice or thrice renewed the assault, yet prevailed they nothing, but were still repulsed with loss. Many also of the Turkish Garrison were likewise slain, yea, the Sanzack himself hurt with a great shot, with many other wounded men sent down the River to Buda, brought thither true News of the aforesaid Assaults, and of the state of the besieged.

The Raficans rise up against the Turks.

In the mean time, News was brought to the Camp, That Sinan Basha, the old Enemy of the Christians, and the Turks great Lieutenant, coming towards Hungary with a great Army, and having by Boats conveyed over part thereof, was set upon by the Raficans; (these are poor oppressed Christians, dwelling on both sides of Danubius, who, weary of the Turkish Tyranny, and desirous of their ancient Liberty, have oftentimes taken up Arms against the Turks, as they now did, encouraged by the good Success of the Christians on the other side of Hungary) and that after divers Skirmishes, they had taken thirteen of the Turkish Vessels, wherein, besides Victuals, and certain great pieces of Artillery, they found about 4400 weight of Powder, 447 hundred of Lead, 46454 bundles of March, 1200 great shot, whereof 1205 were of 66 pound weight, and of small shot for Harquebuses, 48500, with much other warlike Provision; a great part whereof was brought into the Camp at Strigomium, and the rest reserved to future Uses. This loss troubled the great Basha, that he altered his purpose before intended for Caffovia.

The fourth of June, about five hundred Turks, sent up the River from Buda, conducted by two Sanzacks under two red and white Ensigns, landed near to Gokera, on the further side of Danubius, over against Strigomium; where, after they had a while refreshed themselves, and left some few for the more assurance of the Place, all the rest were conveyed over the River into Strigomium; where they had been long looked for, the old Garrison being now fore weakened by the former Assault. Four days after, the Turks, encouraged with this supply, sallied out upon a sudden, and had entered one of the Forts of the Christians; but were forth again repulsed, having lost fix and twenty of their men, and twenty of their Ensigns; not far off lay a troop of Horsemen, who, if they had in time come in, not one of the Turks had escaped. Long it were to tell, how often, and in what manner the Christians assaulted this City, but were by the Turks received, that in five Assaults they lost five thousand of their Men, amongst whom were divers Captains, Lieutenants, Antients, and others of good account; three and twenty Cannons were also slain, and ten great pieces of Artillery so spoiled, as that they were no more serviceable. The Garrison of this City consisted for most part of the Janizaries (the Turks best soldiers) whose notable Valour in holding out of this siege, was both of their own Praises, and their Enemies, much commended; whatsoever was beaten down by Day, that they again repaired by Night, and still relieved with Victual, and things necessary from Buda, did what was possible to be done for defence of the City. About the same time certain Turks coming upon a Troop of German Horsemen, in flight flew about fifty of them, and put the rest to flight; whereupon, an alarm being given in the Camp, many ran out to the rescue of their Fellows, taking with them certain small Field-pieces. Which the Turks perceiving, began to fire; whom the Christians eagerly pursuing, were suddenly assailed by other Turks, falling out of a Fort fall by, and enforced shamefully to retire, and to leave their Field-pieces behind them. Which the Turks seizing upon, cloyed them, brake their Carriages, and made them altogether unserviceable.

All this while the Lord Teuffenbach, lying at the siege of Hatwan, about this time requested Aid of the Archduke, for that his Power was with often Confusions, Hunger, and other Difficulties always attending long sieges, so much weakened, as that he had scarcely fix thousand found Men in his Camp; to whom the Arch-duke forthwith sent twelve hundred Footmen, being lost to spare any more, for too much weakening of his own Army. Amurath, disdaining to see the Frontiers of his Empire in so many places impugned by the Christians, and daily to receive them to great Hurt, was fain to retire, and to leave them to great wherefore, beside the great Power of his own, which he was now about to send with Sinan Basha into Hungary, he had also procured from the great Tartar, a wonderful number of those rough and savage People to be sent into Hungary, there to join with his Army. These wild People, to the number of five thousand, according to direction given, breaking into Padolia, Walachia, and Moldavia, gathered together an incredible number of Oxen and Kine; to this end and purpose, that driving them before them, they might both be assured of Victuals, and the better to come out of Polonia. But when they were come unto the Borders of that Country, and there found the Power of Samsofche the great Chancellor, and the Polonian Cossacks in Arms, they easily perceived that they could not pass that way without great loss. Wherefore they placed the aforesaid Herds of Cattle, some before, some behind, and some on each side of the Army, and so inclosed round about with those Cattle, as with a Trench, marched on. But when they were come near unto the Polonians, this rude Device served them to no other purpose than the overthrow of themselves; for the Polonians, discharging their great Ordnance, so terrified the Cattel, that they turned upon the Tatars; and overthrowing whomsoever came in their way, did exceed much harm, whom the Polonians immediately following, and hardly charging the confused Army, armed only with Bow and Arrows, after some small fight, put them at last to flight, and obtained of them a notable Victory, with an exceeding rich Prey. Of the Polonians were lost about eighteen hundred, but of the Tatars were slain thirty thousand. The rest retired unto Podolia, and passing the River Nieper by the way of Transilvania, where they did exceeding much harm, came to Temeswar, and so afterwards further into Hungary; unto whom the Turks sent seven hundred Horsemen, to conduct them to the Army.

But to return again to the siege of Strigoniun. The fourteenth day of June, the Christians, between eight and nine of the Clock in the Morning, with great Fury assaulted the Town in three places; which assault they most notably maintained, until it was almost three a Clock in the Afternoon. Nevertheless, the Turks so valiantly defended themselves, that at last the Christians were glad to give over the assault, and with loss to retire. The Archduke from an high place beholding the Assault, had one of his Foot-men slain fast by him with a small shot. Many of the Turks were also slain in this assault, and amongst them, one of the three Sansacks that defended the City. The Night following there arose a violent Storm, with much raging Wind, and abundance of Rain, that many thought they should never have seen day; with the Violence whereof the Archduke's Tent was overthrown, and divers others blown down, or rent in sunder, were in the Air carried from Place to Place. About the same time, the Lord Palfi, within the City, called up the Christians to take Fort, with high Mounts and strong Trenches (even in the self same place where Sohman lay about fifty years before, when he besieged and won Strigoniun) by which Fort to build, the Enemy was embarras to convey any thing up the River for the relief of the City, to the great discomfiture of the besieged; for to have hindered the breach work, the Enemy oftentimes failed out, but to no purpose. This Fort being brought to Perfection, the Christians took also another Fort in an Island on the further side of the River, which the Turks had but few days before taken from the Christians, and cloyed the great Pieces therein; which Fort the Christians now again to be furnished with a sufficient Garrison, and other great Ordnance.

force beated.

These things thus done, the Castle and the lower Town were in five divers places out of the new built Fort, the old Town, and the Island, so battered with continual shot, that a man should have said, that one Stone would not have been left upon another, but that all should have been broken down, and laid even with the Ground. The seventeenth of June, one of the Christian Canoners so dismounted one of the great pieces in the Castle, that the piece, together with the Turkish Canoner that had charge thereof, fell down out of the Castle into the Ditch. And the same day, a Malon that fled out of the Castle into the Camp, amongst other things reported. That many of the Turks were slain with this continual battery and often assaults, and that not past an hour before, forty of them were slain in one Chamber, and now acknowledged themselves to be indeed besieged; and to have resolved, that when they were brought to the last cast, then desperately to fall out upon the Christians, and so either to die in the Victory, or to make kill every man for himself as he might. Which his report seemed not altogether feigned; for about Midnight, a thousand of the Turks fall-lying out of the Castle upon the Fort newly built upon the River, in hope to have surprised it, were by the Christians therein nobly repulsed and forced to retire; in which conflict fifty of the Turks were slain, and many more wounded and taken Prisoners. And the same day toward Evening, eight Turks of good fort being taken and brought into the Camp, confessed, That but six days before, they had seen seven Boats full of wounded and dead men sent down the River, toward Buda. Whereby it was easily to be gathered how bloody a siege this was unto the Turks, forasmuch as all those Bodies were the Bodies of men of good account and place; for the Bodies of such common Soldiers as were slain, they still threw into the River running by.

built Fort hardly at-

The Fort newly built upon the Bank of Strigoniun, much troubled the besieged Turks in Strigoniun, because nothing could without danger of it be sent up the River for their Relief; Wherefore they by six Messengers sent word out of the Castle to the Admiral of the Gallies lying below in the River, That he should at an appointed time come up the River with his Gallies as high as the Fort, and on that side at leastwise to make them as if he would assault it; at which time they of the Town would be likewise ready to fall out, and to assault it indeed on the other side by Land. The Admiral accordingly came up the River with his Gallies, and by discharging of certain great pieces, made them as if he would assault it, and so battered the Fort. But was so welcomed thereunto, that he was glad with his rent Gallies, quickly to fall down the River again further off out of danger. But whilst the thundering shot was thus flying two and two towards the River, they of the Town falling out, assaulted the Fort on the other side toward the Land, and so with great force and rate Resolution, that some of them were got up to the top of the Rampiers, and there, for the space of two hours, maintained a most cruel fight; wherein many of them were slain and wounded, and the rest enforced with flame to retire.

The Christians thus fill lying at the siege, and attentive to all Occasions, partly by their Epals, and partly by such as they had taken Prisoners, understood, that a new supply, both of Men and Victuals, was shortly to be put into Strigoniun; and therefore sent out certain Companies of Soldiers, who lying in two convenient Places, the one upon the River, the other by Land, might intercept the said supply. Both of which they did before by the provident Enemy possessed; who suddenly assailing the Christians coming thither, and fearing no such matter, slew some of them, and put the rest to flight; who nevertheless in their retreat, brake the Bridge which the Turks had made of Boats under the Castle of Strigoniun over Danubius. Of which Boats, some were carried away with the Violence of the Stream, and of the thirty fell into the hands of the Christians, without loss of any man more than five, who making too much haste out of a little Boat, fell into the River, and so perished. In this time, Fame, the fore-runner of all great Attempts, had brought News into the Christian Camps, That Sinan Bassa, the Turks great General, was coming to the relief of Strigoniun, of whose Power divers diversly reported. But the greater part doubting the worst, and weary of the long Siege, and of the Calamities incident thereunto, added still something to the last report, to make the danger of longer stay to seem the greater; certain it is, that the News of the coming of so great and puissant an Enemy, raised in the Christians great doubt in the Minds of so great a Multitude. Now were the besieged Turks in great wails in Strigoniun, as appeared by Letters intercepted from the Sansack sack to the Bassa of Buda, declaring unto him the hard estate of the besieged, and humbly craving his promised help, without which the City could not, for want of Victuals, possibly be defended by the fainting Soldiers above three days. Which Letters being read in the Camp, caused great Preparation to be made for the continuing of the siege, and the withstanding of the Enemy, whose coming was every hour expected. All this while the great Christians did their best, and so ended the day, whereby many were slain, as well of the Christians, as of the Turks, and amongst others many of the Canoners.

But forasmuch as the rise of Sinan Bassa's coming increased daily, and the Christian Camp possessed with a general fear, gave unto the wile, oft Suspicion of some great Michief likely to ensue; Matthias the General entered into Council with Count Ferdinand Hardack, the Lord Palfi, the Lord Ungaden, President of the Council for the Wars, and Erasmus Braun, Governour of Comara. What was the best to be done in so dangerous a time. Who with general consent agreed betimes, before the coming of Sinan, to raise the siege, and to remove with the Army into some place of more safety. Which their determinate Resolution, the day following, being the six and twentieth of June, they made known to the other Princes and great Commanders in the Army; who wonderfully discontented therewith, especially the Germans; both only by word of mouth, but also by writing, protested against the same, as most dishonourable, and altogether made without their Knowledge or good liking. To whom the President of the Council for their further Satisfaction, declared, That the Enemy was coming with a very great Army, and even now at hand, whose strength increased daily, and withal, that the Turks had sent out to assault them in their Tents, was uncertain; besides that it was manifestly known unto the World, how that in the former assaults they had lost many of their best Soldiers, beside others that died in the Camp; and that the Place wherein they lay encamped, was subject to many dangers, for which so urgent Causes the General had resolved to raise his siege, and before the coming of so strong an Enemy, to remove his Army into a place of more safety. Which Reasons for all that, did not so well satisfy the German Princes and Commanders, but that they still urged their former Protestation, requesting his Excellency to have them excused before God and man, for that they were bound to stand fast, as to their General, did that which they thought not altogether best, and which they would not otherwise have done. For the more Evidence whereof, the said German Princes and great Commanders, caused their said Protestation to be solemnly conceived in Writing, which they affirmed with their Swear, and subscribed with their own hands in order as followeth: Francis, Duke of Saxony, Augustus, Duke of Brunswick, Sebastian Schlick, Count Wigand Maltzan, Ernestus of Altan, Henry Phibuck, John Nicholas Rastworb, Henry Curwiger Heertrath, Johr Oberkaufan, Henry Roittrath, Melchior von Nothwitz.

But the Archduke, with the rest, constant in their former Resolution, sent first of all a great Ordinance, and raising the siege the 28th of June, followed after with the whole Army, passing over Danubius, not far from Kokara, doubtfully expecting what counseil Sinan the great Bassa (who was then reported to be even at hand) would take. Yet before their departure, they let the old Town again, and so ended the Fort. So that the Turks before taken by the Enemy, which they had once purposed to have kept. This unexpected departure of the Christians much gladdened the besieged Turks; who for want of Victuals, had not been able long to have held out. Yet lay the Lord Teuffenbach still at the siege of Havran, labouring by all means with Earth and Baggage to fill up their Ditches; which work he had now happily brought to some good Perfection. Whereof they in the Town by Letters advertised the Bassa of Buda, and that except they were within the space of three days relieved, they should be enclosed to yield the Town. Which their distress the Bassa considering, with speed assembled all his Forces, and so let forward to relieve them, hoping to have come upon the Christians before they were aware of his coming. But Teuffenbach understanding thereof, with five thousand chosen Horsemen went out of the Camp to meet him, and suddenly coming upon him, fearing no such thing, slew five thousand of the Turks, put the Bassa to flight, and together with the Victory, obtained an exceeding rich Prey.

Now was there no less expectation and hope of the winning or yielding up of Havran, than was before of Strigoniun; but according to the chance of War, it fell out otherwise. For Teuffenbach happened, and made choice of such a place, as he thought meet for the assault, was in the performing thereof notably repulsed by the Turks, that he was glad to retire with the loss of his belt and most resolute Soldiers; which put him out of all hope of taking the Town by force. For beside the choice of good men, he had scarce so many found men left, as might suffice to furnish his Garrisons for defence of their Frontiers; by reason that the Hungarians were almost all thrunk home, and of the Germans were left scarce two thousand. Besides that, he had oftentimes craved new Supplies of the Archduke, but all in vain; for which Cause he was glad to abandon two strong Forts he had built before Havran, and to leave the Town, now brought to great Extremity. Thus two notable Cities, which were now as it were in the hands of the Christians, and by the recovery whereof, the broken state of the afflicted Christians in Hungary had been much strengthened, were as it were again restored unto the barbarous and cruel Enemy.

Whilst the Christians thus lay at the siege of Strigoniun and Havran, the Rasians (of whom we have before spoken) striving still more and more to rid themselves from the Turkish Thralldom, gathered themselves together to the number of fifteen thousand, between Buda and Belgrade, under a General of their own Chuse, to leave the siege of the Bassa of Temeswar for fear of whom, a thousand went to fortify and victual Lipsa, doubting lest it should by them be surprised, but having done that he went for, in his return he was met with by the same Rasians, and twice fought withal in one day, and both times put to the worse, with the loss of the greatest part of his Army. After which Victory the Rasians took Beckereke, a strong Town standing in a Marsh four miles from Belgrade, and slew all the Turks they found therein. After that, they took a Castle called Outade, and dealt with the Turks in like manner. From thence they went and besieged Beche, a Castle standing upon the River Thibens or Tesse, where the Town adjoining unto it yielded presently; but they in the Castle standing a while upon their Guard, offered at last to yield also upon certain Conditions. But the Rasians knowing that the Turks thereabouts had conveyed into the Castle the best part of their Walth, and wital, that it was but weakly manned, would accept of no Conditions, but needs have it absolutely delivered up to their Pleasure. In the mean time the old Bassa of Temeswar, and his Son, knowing it to tend to their 1504 four thousand Tartarian Horsemen swam over the Danubius, between Rab and Comara, after whom followed six thousand Turks, who being with much ado got over to the farther side, suddenly surprised a Fort of the Christians next unto the River, and forthwith turning five great pieces of Ordnance which they found therein, discharged them upon the Camp of the Christians; who, terrified with the sudden accident, rose up all in Arms, and hardly charging those desperate adventures, slew many of them, effects of which seeking after booty, had dispersed themselves from their Fellows, and over the left again to take the Water, wherein most of them perished. About five days after, the Tartarians (living for the most part upon prey) swam again over the River, and upon the sudden burnt a Village in the Island, and flew certain Christians in their Tents, but being quickly encountered by the Christian Horsemen, they were easily overthrown and many of them slain; the rest, calling away their Weapons, and forking their Horses, ran head-long into the River, trusting more to their swimming than to their fighting; whom the Christians hardly pursuing, in the very River flew about two thousand of them; and by this Victory obtained many of the Tartarians' Swift Horses with their Scimitars, their Bows and Arrows, and such Ensigns as they had. All this while, Sinan Bassa, without intermission, lay thundering with sixty great pieces of battery against the City, but to little or no purpose, for as yet he had made no breach whereby to enter, or high built Houses, or the Camp, by such random shot, as flying over the Town, fell by chance among the Tents of the Christians. And the Janizaries, intentive to all opportunities, in a great Rain, furiously, and with a most horrible cry, (as their manner is) assaulted an utter Bulwark of the Christians, which they for fear forsook, and retired themselves into the City. Upon which Bulwark so taken, the Janizaries had set up three of their Ensigns: when the Christians, alarmed of that they had done, and better advised, taking courage unto them, forthwith sallied out again, and courageously charging the Janizaries, but now crested, flew many of them, and recovered again the Bulwark.

Sinai Bassa, leaving nothing unattempted that might further his desire for the winning of the City, was now calling up a great Mount against the City; which whilst he daily furveyed, he chanced to fall sick, and therefore appointed one of the Balleis in his own stead, to oversee the work; who, whilst he was walking to and fro, hastening the work, and commanding this and that thing to be done, was taken with a flux out of the Town and slain. The fifteenth of August, certain Turks before the rising of the Sun, getting over Danubius in Boats, assaulted a Fort of the Christians; which the Soldiers that had the keeping of it, presently took and left it to the Enemy. Which John de Medeiros, lately come into the Camp with two thousand Italians, perceiving, forthwith came to the rescue of the Fort, drove out the Turks, and having slain divers of them, forced the rest into the River, where they were all drowned. At which time five thousand Tartars in another Place passing over the River into the Island, were encountered by the Lord Palfi, and the Hungars his Followers, and without any great resistance put to flight, wherein many of them were slain; the rest taking the River, were in good hope to have got over, and so to have saved themselves; but other Turks meeting them in the River, would with their Weapons have beaten them back, and flayed their flight; against whom the Tartars opposing themselves, made with them in the very River a most cruel fight, but with such loss unto the Tartars, that of the five thousand which adventured over, few returned to carry News unto their Fellows, how they had sped. Now began great scarcity of Victuals in the City, so that the Soldiers were fain to feed upon unripe Fruit, and such other unwholesome things, whereof ensued the bloody Flux, and many other dangerous Diseases; which raging amongst them, did wonderfully confuse the Bassa's Army. Beside that, they of the City with continual fear had slain many, and amongst them a Son-in-law of the great Bassa, whose death he is reported to have taken so unpatiently, that he fell sick for Grief, but in short time after passed it over, and recovered again.

The Tartars, not yet worn by their often losses, but passing again over the River into the Island the nineteenth of this Month, were there 3000 of them slain. In the mean time, certain Companies also of the Turks, having fiercely passed the River, in another quarter assailed the Christians in their Camp; in which hurly-burly, other of the Tartars got over the River not far from Comara, hoping now at length to perform some great matter, which they had before to their cost vainly attempted; but finding the Turks overthrown before their coming, and the Christians (contrary to their expectation) in Arms ready to receive them, they were easily discomfited, and two thousand of them slain. In this conflict the Sannack of Strigomium, with two others, and many more of great account among the Turks, perished. Shortly after, the Christians rallying out of the City, flew a great number of the Turks, and to retired with small loss. Thus was the Turks Army daily diminished, till at length, the want of Victuals, with the Bloody-flux, increased, that many perished the Bassa to have raised his siege, and to have removed with his Army to some other more wholesome place, and of greater plenty; but he, reluctantly set down not to depart before he had either won the Town, or enforced them therein to yield, would not hearken to any persuasions to the contrary.

Whilst Sinan thus lay at the siege at Rab, Maximilian, the Emperour's Brother, took Crafovia, a Fortress of the Turks, upon the borders of Croatia, and put to the Sword all the Turks there in Garrison. After that, he laid siege to Petrinia, a strong Fort of the Turks, which they but a few years before had contrary to the League built in the Emperour's Territory, for the annoying of Croatia, and for the exceeding strength thereof, was thought almost impregnable. Yet such was the industry of Maximilian and his Soldiers, that what with continual battery and mines, they so terrified the Turks there in Garrison, that they for fear set fire on the Fort, and flying away by Night, made shift every man for himself as he might: Which they in the Castle of Sifeg hearing, set fire also upon it, and so left it to the Christians: Whole Example they also of Gara followed; by which so prosperous and happy Successes of Maximilian's, not the Frontiers only, but even the whole Country of Hungary, was for that time delivered of a wonderful trouble and no less danger.

The eight and twentieth day of August, twenty thousand of the Christians passing over the River by a Bridge out of the Island, and joining with them of the Town, sallied out upon the Turks Camp; the Hungarian Haidons in the forefront at the first Onset took two of the Turks Bulwarks, and having beaten out the Enemies, cloyed certain of their great pieces; but the Turks returning with greater power, enforced the Christians to retire, and recovered again their lost Bulwarks. In this conflict many were slain, as well Christians as Turks. In the mean while Thonbanse, a great Captain of the Christians, 1504 flims, and Gitschhofer, County Hardeck's Lieutenant, with fifteen hundred Hungarians and German Foot came in great Boats to have helped their Fellows, but landing somewhat too late, they were by the Enemy beaten back, and enforced with loss to retire, that many of them being not able to recover the Boats, were drowned in the River; amongst whom, Gitschhofer himself perished, and Thonbanse was deadly wounded in his Breast. Yet the Christians, not discouraged with this loss, but gathering themselves together under the very Walls of the City, gave a second assault unto the Enemy; in the forefront were the Footmen, who were by the Enemies Horsemen easily repulsed; but by the coming in of the Lord Rhinsberg, who was at the first out of the City, the Turks were divided from their Trenches, except some few, which, divided from the rest, hid themselves in the Vineyards, but being found out by the Christians, were there all slain. In this Skirmish the Lord Palfi was grievously wounded in his Thigh. Of the Christians were slain four hundred, and of the Turks above two thousand. These conflicts endured from seven a Clock in the Morning until twelve, at which time the Christians returning into the City, and so into the Camp, amongst other spoils, carried away with them seven of the Enemies Ensigns.

No day now passing without some skirmish, at length, the ninth of September, ten thousand Turks, some in Boats, some by other means, having got over the River of Danubius into the Island of Schut, suddenly fell upon the Christians, all sleeping in security, and little fearing any such danger of whom they flew about two thousand, and after some small fight put the rest to flight. In this fight, which Lord Mathias, the Arch-duke being with, with the other Noblemen and Captains, had much ado by flight to escape. Thus, whilst every man surprised with fear, made what shift he could for himself, the Enemy in the mean time entered the Trenches, took their Tents, their great Ordnance, the Shot and Powder, and all the Money, which but a little before was brought for the Soldiers Pay; besides, about a thousand Waggon, and two hundred Boats well loaded with Provision for the Camp, and ten Gallies, wherein were an hundred and twenty pieces of great Ordnance. The loss received this day was valued at 500000 Ducats. And albeit that this Victory cost the Turks two thousand and five hundred of their lives, yet thereby they gained the mastery, both upon the River and the Land; so that now, roaming far and near, without resistance, they spoiled the Country all about, and burnt certain Country Villages not far from Vienna; so that for many miles space the Country Towns were for fear of the Enemy forsaken by the Inhabitants, of whom some were taken and slain, some carried into Captivity, and some others, (referred to a better Fortune) with such things as they had, got themselves farther off into Places of more security. And the more to increase these calamities, the Tartars shortly after passing over Danubius, next unto Albenberg, first sacked Wolfersburg, and after burnt it, with certain Towns thereabout; but adventuring to have gone farther into the Country, they were with loss enforced to return.

Whilst the Turks thus prevailed in Hungary, Cicada Bassa, the Turks Admiral then at Sea, with a Fleet of Gallies, landing his Men in divers places of Barb, did exceeding much harm, but especially in Calabria, where he upon a sudden surprised Rhegium, rased the Town, and afterwards burnt it; from thence taking his course towards Sicilia, he, in the night of Messina, landed certain of his Men; who, adventuring too far a shore, were by the Country People overthrown and put to flight. So the Turks returning again to Reggio, utterly rased what they had before left of that Town. In the mean time, not far from Messina, even in the sight of the Garrison of the Town, they took a certain Ship coming out of the East Countries, and three other coming from Apulia. Afterward, chancing upon certain Gallies of the East, they changed some few shot with them, but to no great purpose; and so turning their course, and sailing along the Coast of Calabria, they oftentimes landed certain Companies, which, skirmishing with the Calabrians, had sometimes the better, and sometimes the worse, and so with such Fortune as befell them, were again received into their Gallies. They of Messina, unto whose eyes those dangers were daily presented, both by Letters and speedily Messenger, gave the Viceroy knowledge thereof, who then for his pleasure lay at Palermo) requesting his present Aid; but he laying off the time, they, for the more safeguard of the City and of the Sea Coast, of themselves raised five hundred Horsemen, whom they committed to the Leading of Philip Cicada, the Retired Turkish Admiral's Brother; and besides, filled the City with all such things as they thought necessary for the enduring of a Siege, if it should chance the Turk to have any such purpose; of all which they certified the King of Spain, as also of the negligence of the Viceroy, requesting his speedy Aid against these Terrours of the Turks. In the mean while, the Neapolitan King, for his Coast put to Sea thirty Gallies; unto whom the Pope, the Duke of Florence, the Genoa, and the Knights of Malta joined also theirs; in all, to the number of about eighty Gallies, under the conduct of Austria. The provident Venetians also, although they were as then in League with the Turks; yet for the safety of their State, put to Sea a Fleet of about an hundred sail, some Ships, some Gallies, and the leading of Foccarin, their Admiral. Which two Fleets sailing up and down those Seas, delivered Italy, Sicily, Dalmatia, with many Provinces and Islands of the Christians, of a great fear.

Sinai Bassa, having before encouraged his Soldiers with great hope and large Promises, commanded an Assault to be given to the City of Rab; which was accordingly by them begun the twenty third of September, the Sun being as yet scarce up, and furiously maintained all that day from Morning until Night. But they of the Town so valiantly defended themselves, that at last the Turks were glad to give over the Assault, and with loss to retire. Nevertheless, the next day, the Assault was again renewed, and most desperately continued by the space of two days, wherein twelve thousand of the Turks there lost their lives, the other with shame retiring themselves into their Trenches. In few days after, the Turks by a Mine blew up one of the Bulwarks of the Town, with the fall whereof the Town-Ditch was in that place somewhat filled; whereby the Turks with all their Power attempted thrice the next day to have entered, but were by the Valour of the Defendants fully noticably with loss repulsed. Yet notwithstanding all this cheerfulness and contentment of them in the Town, the Puffant Enemy ceased not with continual battery and furious assaults to attempt the City, until that at length he had gained two of the Bulwarks, from whence he might, to his great advantage, by the rubbish and earth fallen out of the battered Bulwarks and Rampiers, have access unto the Town, to the great terror of the Government (who, Whereupon County Hardeck the Governour (who, corrupted by the Turk, had of purpose many times before said that the Town could not possibly be long defended) now took occasion to enter into Council with the other Captains of the Town, (divers of whom he had already framed to his purpose) what course were best to take for the yielding of it

1504 flims, and Gitschhofer, County Hardeck's Lieutenant, with fifteen hundred Hungarians and German Foot came in great Boats to have helped their Fellows, but landing somewhat too late, they were by the Enemy beaten back, and enforced with loss to retire, that many of them being not able to recover the Boats, were drowned in the River; amongst whom, Gitschhofer himself perished, and Thonbanse was deadly wounded in his Breast. Yet the Christians, not discouraged with this loss, but gathering themselves together under the very Walls of the City, gave a second assault unto the Enemy; in the forefront were the Footmen, who were by the Enemies Horsemen easily repulsed; but by the coming in of the Lord Rhinsberg, who was at the first out of the City, the Turks were divided from their Trenches, except some few, which, divided from the rest, hid themselves in the Vineyards, but being found out by the Christians, were there all slain. In this Skirmish the Lord Palfi was grievously wounded in his Thigh. Of the Christians were slain four hundred, and of the Turks above two thousand. up. And so after a little Consultation, holden more for fashion-fake, than for that he doubted what to do; resolved to send a Messenger unto the Bassa, for a Truce to be granted for a while, to see if haply in the mean time some reasonable Composition might be agreed upon. Yet the Governor, considering into what scorn and danger he should expose himself, by yielding up of so strong a Town, to colour the matter, and to excuse his doings unto the rest of the Nobility and Garrisons of Hungary, caused a public Instrument to be made in his and all the rest of the Captains Names conceived in Writing; wherein he solemnly protested unto the World, That forasmuch as it was impossible (by reason of the weakness of the Garrison) for them alone to defend the Town against so mighty an Enemy, without new Supplies instead of them that were slain, (which they had oftentimes in vain requested) they were therefore of necessity enforced to come to Composition with the Enemy. Which Protestation he made, the Governor with the chief Captains confirmed with their Hands and Seals. So after a Truce granted, and Pledges given on both sides, at length it was agreed upon, That all the Garrison Soldiers, together with the County and other Captains, should in Arms with Engines dismantled, with Bag and Baggage depart in safety, and with a safe Convey be brought to Altenburg. Which Agreement, though by Oath confirmed, was not on the Turks part altogether performed; for when the County had the 14th day of September, at ten a Clock in the Forenoon, delivered up the City to the Bassa, and the Christians all come out, with the County himself, with a few of his Friends, was with a Convey of Turks brought in safety to the appointed place; but the Italians, and other Garrison Soldiers that came behind, and ought to have been by the Governor protected, were, contrary to the Turks promise, spoiled of all that they had, and hardly escaping with Life, came that Night to Hochstrate, and the next day to Altenburg. This was Rab, one of the strongest Bulwarks of Christendom, traitorously delivered unto the most mortal Enemy of the Christian Religion; being even then when it was given up, victualled for a year, and sufficiently furnished with all things necessary for defence; all which Provision, together with the City, fell into the hands of the faithless Enemy. A loss never to have been sufficiently lamented, had it not been about four years after, even as it were miraculously again recovered, to the great rejoicing of all that side of Christendom, as in the Process of this History shall appear.

Sinans, glad of this victory, as the greatest Trophy of his Masters glory over the Christians, gave him speedy knowledge thereof, both by Letters and Messengers. Of whom he was for that good service highly commended, and afterward bountifully rewarded: for now had Amurath already in hope devoured all Anatolia, with the Provinces thereabout. The great Bassa, because he would not with too long lay hinder the course of this victory, without delay repaired the rent City, new fortified the battered Bulwarks, enlarged the Ditches, and filled the Cathedral Church with earth, in manner of a strong Bulwerk, whereupon he planted great store of great Ordnance: and with exceeding speed dispatched all things necessary for the holding of the place. In the mean time he sent certain Tartars to summon the Town and Castle of Pappa: which Castle and little Town (subject thereto), the Christians the night following set on fire, because it should not stand the Enemy in any stead for the farther troubling of the country; and so fled.

The Bassa, having at his pleasure disposed of all things in Rab, and leaving there four thousand Janizaries, and two thousand Horsemen in Garrison, departed thence with his Army and laid siege to Komar, a strong Town of that most fertile Island, which the Hungarians call Seben; about, situated within the very point thereof, about your miles from Rab, is on the East, South, and North, inclosed with the two Arms of Danubius. All these ways Sinan with his Fleet (which he had there notably well appointed) laid hard siege unto the Town, and gave thereto divers assaults; and by Land, the Beglerbeg of Greece, created not both by continual battery and Mines, to shake the Walls and Bulwarks thereof. Thus was the City on all sides, both by Water and by Land, hardly laid unto. But the Christians within, with no less Courage defended themselves and the City, than did the Turks assail them; shewing indeed, that the Liberty of their Religion and Country, was unto them dearer than their Lives. Murshid, the Arch-duce, in the mean time, not ignorant how much it concerned the Emperor his Brother to have this City defended; having after his late overthrow, gathered together a good Army of German, Bohemian, and Hungarian, resolved to go and raise the siege; and to march forward with his Army, came and encamped the 28th day of October at Nitra, about five miles from Komar. Now this Nitra was a little before departed from the Camp, with purpose to return home; yea, the Turks themselves, weary of the siege, and wanting Victual both for themselves and their Horses, began also, as men discontented, to shrink away. Which the Bassa well considering, thought it not best with his heartless Soldiers and Army, now (are weak) to persevere in the coming of the Christians; and therefore upon their approach he forthwith forsook the City, which he had by the space of three weeks hardly besieged, and by a Bridge made of Boats, transported his Army and Artillery over Danubius to Dotis, where he the next day after broke up his Army. Immediately after the Turks were thus departed, the Arch-duce arrived at Komar, where he with great Diligence caused the Breaches to be repaired; the Mines to be filled up, and new Bulwarks and Rampiers to be made in divers Places for the more strength of the City, leaving the charge thereof still unto the Lord Brown the old Governor, who in the defence thereof, had received a grievous Wound in his right Knee; of whom also in the next Page is reported. The Bassa, in time of the late siege of Komar, under the Colour of a Parley, had sent five Turks into the City to the Governor, but indeed to prove if he were by any means to be won to yield up the City, and not to hold it out to the last. The faithful Governor, having given them the hearing until they had discharged their whole Treachery, presently caused four of their Heads to be stricken off, and to be set upon long Pikes upon one of the Bulwarks for the Bassa to look upon; but the fifth (the beholder of this Tragedy) he sent back unto the Bassa, to tell him, That although he had found one in Rab to serve his turn, he was much deceived, if in him he thought to find County Hardeck, and that he withheld rather to die the Emperours faithful Servant in the blood of the Turks, than to betray the City committed to his Charge.

County Hardeck, late Governor of Rab, generally before suspected to have treacherously betrayed that strong Town unto the Bassa, was therefore sent for to Vienna, and there by the Emperours Commandment committed to Prison. Where, among many things laid to his Charge, as that he should in the beginning of the siege, negligently have have suffered many things to be done by the Enemy, which afterwards, to the great damage of the Town; and that in the time of the siege, he had caused some of the Canoneers to discharge certain great Pieces against the Enemy, with Powder only, without Shot; and that seeing one Piece among the rest to do the Enemy much harm, he had caused the same to be removed, and so placed, as that it never so little or no use it belied, as if he (as it should seem) making small reckoning of the Town, should oftentimes say, That if the Turks should win it, he should be but one Town the richer; with divers other such things, giving just cause of suspicion. The thing that lay most heavy upon him, was the Testimony of one of Sinan Bassa's Chamber, who being taken young by the Turks, and serving in the Balkas Chamber, was now fled from the Turks; and coming to the Arch-duce in the time of his siege, declared unto him, that there was Treason in his Camp; and that he, but three days before, by the Commandment of his Master, had delivered two bags full of Ducats unto two Christians, of whom the one had a notable scar in his Face, and was afterwards known to have been one of the Counties Servants. Upon this and such like Proofs, the County was, after many days hearing, in open Court, by the Judgment of seven and forty Noblemen and Captains of Name, condemned of Treason, and adjudged to be hanged, his dead Body to remain upon the Gallows by the space of three days, and all his Lands and Goods to be confiscated; the rigour of which Sentence was afterwards by the Emperour mitigated, and the Traitor by him adjudged to have his right Hand (by him before given unto the Emperour in pawn of his Faith) and his Head struck off upon a Scaffold at Vienna, and so beheaded. Which severe sentence was afterwards accordingly put in Execution; for the tenth of June following, the Traitor being brought to the Scaffold, built of purpose in the high Street of Vienna, after the Sentence of his Condemnation there solemnly read, commanding himself upon his knees to the Mercy of God, with his Eyes covered, and his right Hand laid upon a Black covered with black, had both his Hand and Head so suddenly struck off by the Executioners, as that the Beholders could hardly judge which of them was first off. His dead Body with his Head and Hand, was presently by his Servant wrapp'd in a black Cloth, and layed in his Coach, which stood there by the Gallows, and was presently afterwards buried amongst his Ancestors.

The Tartars, but lately before departed from Sinans Camp, passing over Danubius at Strigonium, had purposed through the upper part of Hungary, and by the Borders of Transilvania and Moldavia, to have again returned into their Country; of whom two Companies falling into the Towns and Villages of Palf, were by him cut off, and utterly defeated; the rest coming unto the Borders of Transilvania, and finding the Passages to be set by the Prince and the Vayvod of Valachia, as that they could not without most manifest danger pass that way, returned again the same way they came; and having killed and burnt certain Towns and Villages in the upper Hungary about Tokeay, passed the River again at Strigonium, and wintering at Voprinum, Palotta, and other Places in the Country which is about Rab, lived upon the spoil of the poor distressed Christians, upon the Frontiers of Anatolia, even as far as Meinor-Palf.

These Tartars (of whom we have so often spoken) at their first coming to the Aid of Sinan, by direction from the Turkish Sultan, stayed upon the Frontiers of Transilvania, of purpose to have furnished that Country, and either to have thrust Sigmund Bator, the young Prince, out of the Government thereof, or else to have sent him in bonds to Constantinople; but it was commonly reported, That he, weary of the heavy Tribute which he yearly paid unto the Turks, and had now after their greedy manner been divers times enhaunted, had purposed to revolt from the Turkish Sultan, and to enter into Confederation with the Christian Emperour. Which Innovation and Change, certain of the Nobility and chief Lords of Transilvania, fought by all means to hinder; and acquainting Amurath with the matter, and entering into Conspiracy with the Tartars, undertook to deliver the whole Country into their Hands, and to send the Prince Prisoner to Huf, where the Tartars then lay upon the Borders encamped. Wherefore, dissembling their purpose, they cunningly persuaded the Prince, that Siniffo, the great Chancellor of Polonia, in the Confines of his Country, lay with a great Power expecting his coming, to confult with him of matters of great Importance: and the better to colour this their Treachery, they had counterfeited Letters to that effect from the Chancellor to the Prince, and had wrought so effectually, that the Prince, not suspecting any such Treason, gave credit to their Persuasions, and so put himself upon his way towards the Chancellor, (as he supposed); but by the way, he was advised by some of his Friends, which had got some suspicion of the matter, not to go any farther, for that his coming was not intended by the Polonians his Friends, but was perfwaded) but by the Tartars his Enemies who lay in wait for him at Huf, to bereave him of his Life and Government. The Prince, astonished with the novelty of the matter, lifted unto their Persuasion, and retired with his Train to the strong Fort of Kehweze; where he stayed fourteen days, as if it had been only for fresh Victuals, which few days time, he gave notice to the Nobility and Governors of the Country, his Friends, of the imminent and common danger; who forthwith repaired unto him in Arms. But the Traitors proceeding in their purpose, caused not to persuade Bornemissli, who had the Leading of the Prince's Army, That to fight with the Tartars was a matter of no small danger; and that therefore, if he wished well to his Country, he should not have to do with them, but only their himself near unto them, and that he was not unpurposed for them; which was accordingly done, and the Transilvanian Army brought to fight unto the Tartars, as that they might hear the noise of their Drums and Trumpets. Whereby the Tartars, as by the Watch-word, perceiving themselves discovered, and nothing to fall out according to their Expectation, as had been unto them promised for the betraying of the Prince; they removed thence, and by another way breaking through the midst of Transilvania, and so into Hungary, rifled and burnt five hundred Villages, slew all the Males that were above twelve years of Age, and carried away the rest unto the Turkish Army, then lying at the siege of Rab. In the mean time the Traitors (when as this first Plot served them not) conspired to let up one Balbasor Bator, the young Prince's nephew, and with the good favour of Amurath, to prefer him to the Sovereign Government of that Country. Which their purpose the Prince perceiving, and doubting altogether to trust unto the fidelity of his own Subjects; writ to his Neighbours, the Rascians, and other his Confederates, praying their Aid in this his dangerous and doubtful Estate. Which after he had received, he appointed a general Assembly of all his States to be holden at Clusenburgh, and that upon a great pain to be inflicted upon all such as should not there personally appear; so at the prefixed day all came, except the Cardinal Bator, and Stephen his Brother, depair, by the Goodness of God, contrary to all hope, find sometime such unexpected Help and Relief, as that thereby they, beyond their hope, even to the astonishment of the World, mount up again unto a greater lustre of their State, than was that from which they before fell; it had even so by the singular Mercy of God, a noble Prince, who was the founder of the Valachians, not knowing which way to turn themselves. There was at Grallima (a City in the Confines of Valachia, towards the Confines of the Hungarians and Turks, where the Governor of those Borders is for the defence thereof with a strong Garrison always resident) a noble Gentleman called Ion Michael, Son to Per, the Palatine of that Country, the aforesaid Alexander's Predecessor; who, as he was unto the People for the Honour of his Father, the Prerogative of his Birth, the Comeliness of his Person, and Tallness of his Stature, well known, so was he for his Zeal towards the Christian Religion, his Love towards his Country, his Kindness towards his Equals, his Courtesy towards his Inferiours, his upright Dealing, his Confidence and Bounty unto them, no less Gracious; and for other the noble Virtues of his Heroical Mind, and natural Disposition for the Performance of great Matters, his deep Wisdom and quick Foresight, his sweet and pleasing Speech, of all Affection, unto all good men most dear; whose Fame, both for the Honour of his House, and his own Virtues, fill more and more increasing; and time in the Ears of Alexander the Vayvod, was the cause that he commanded him, as the ready, or rather natural Competitor of his State and Honour, to be secretly apprehended; and so taken out of the way; where by good Fortune having Intelligence, and care of his own Health, he safeguard of himself fled first into Hungary, and thence not flying long (God so directing him) went to Constantinople in the Year 1591, to sue for the Vayvod's Place, all the Nobility of his Country, and the Provinces thereto adjoining, secretly rejoicing thereat. About which time, the chief and most grave of the Valachian Nobility and Councillors prostituting themselves at the Feet of Amurath, most grievously complained unto him of the manifold and intolerable Injuries they had already sustained, and were still like to endure, without hope of redress, from Alexander their Vayvod, and the Followers of his Court; the Turks Garrisons and Merchants with plentiful Money, declaring his many most foul and detestable Facts, and afterward highly commending Ion Michael for his rare Virtues, as true Hero of their Province; most humbly requested Amurath, either to have him appointed the lawful Governour of their Country, or else some other Place by him assigned for them to dwell in, wishing any where to live, rather than under the heavy command of so merciless a man as was Alexander. For the furthering of which their Suit, Michael, his Uncle by the Mothers side, a Greek born, and a Man for his exceeding Wealth in great Favour in the Turks Court, (paired for no cost. So Michael, by the Goodness of God, was by Amurath with great Solemnity declared Vayvod of Valachia, and the oppressed and almost forlorn State of that sometime most flourishing Country by little and little well relieved (although not altogether without most sharp and violent Remedies, such as Extremities of require) began now again to lift up the head, and to aspire unto the ancient Liberty and Honour thereof. As the beginning of whole happy Sovereignty, Alexander, his Predecessor, in his own Conscience guilty of his evil and shameful Government of that so notable and great a Province, and now in fear to be called to account, secretly fled. But certain years after, removing to Constantinople with his Wife, and there attempting divers evil means for the obtaining of the Palatine of Moldavia, and for those his unlawful Practices accused by the Palatine's Agent; he was by the Commandment of Amurath taken in his own House, and there in his princely Apparel, most miserably strangled upon Palin Summit by the singular Mercy of God, about six years after his departure out of Valachia.

Michael thus made Vayvod of Valachia, long it was not but that it fortune'd, the Reverend Father Cornelius de Nona, sent from Pope Clement the Eighth, unto the great Duke of Muscovy, in his return conferring with Sigismund, the Transilvanian Prince; and Aurad, the Palatine of Moldavia, informed them of the great content of divers zealous Christian Princes, for the maintenance of the War against the dangerous and common Enemy; with many grave and effectual Reasonings persuading them (but especially for that they were themselves Christians) in that Christian quarrel to join unto them their Forces also, raised in those their Countries near unto the great Rivers of Danubius and Nether; but unto Michael, the Vayvod of Valachia, he could not for divers his other important Businessness then come; whom for all that, the aforesaid Transilvanian Prince, Sigismund, his Neighbour, desirously sought to draw into the Fellowship of this War, even for the same Reason as most, wherewith he had been himself moved, that the great Reasons removing such doubts as might justly seem to hinder him from giving his consent therunto; and then by declaring the Turkish Infidelity daily increasing, with the infinite Grievances by them devised against the miserable Valachians; when as the Incursions of the Turks or Tartars, or their Palatine that way, (no less troublesome to the Innards) was almost every Month to be feared, their Armies, as Friends, to be in Winter and Summer received, their Soldiers to their great charges relieved, and their Commanders and Captains rewarded. Valachia thus impoverished, was not able (as he said) to pay the great Sum it did already owe, neither was to expect any reliefment of the evils it was wrapped in, much less was it able to suffice unto the grievous Exactions to be thereunto by them afterwards imposed. None of his Predecessors (as he said, and as truth was) had for many years now paid, for any long time, or with any Security held their State or Government; but that either by the Calumnies of the Envious, or Bribes of their ambitious Competitors; brought into Suspicion with the Sultan, they were violently thrust out, or most cruelly put to death. In brief, he said it was a wise mans part, not without most manifest and weighty Reasons, to promise unto himself better Fortune, or more continuance of his State, than had his unfortunate Predecessors before him; but warned by their Harms, betimes to provide for his own Safety. By which Persuasion he so prevailed, that the Vayvod (whose Name, whole Fame, whole Wealth and Life, together with his Subjects, was all thereby endangered) although he would not (for the weightiness of the matter) at the full yield therunto; yet assuredly promised, with his Friends, and the rest of the Nobility of his Country, to confer thereupon. Having it by the Prince plainly laid down before him, how a sufficient number of Soldiers might at all times be raised, their Pay provided, and Aid still sent him as need should be, from the German Emperour, or himself out of Transylvania; as also that Aaron the Palatine of Moldavia, would at all times be ready to combine himself unto them; that so with their united Forces they might upon the Banks of Danubius and Nether, easily repulse the Incursions both of the Turks and Tartars their Enemies; the Christian Emperour in the mean time, with with less trouble proceeding in his Wars against the Turks in the other side of Hungary. Now whilst this Plot was thus in laying, and Matters debating too and fro, not altogether without the Turk Suspicion; Sinan Bassa, coming with a great Army into Hungary, had taken the strong Town of Rab, as is before declared; with which Michalchase so much concerning the poor remainders of Hungary, the Vayvod, now a little moved, began more deeply to consider of his own Estate. And as he was a man of great Spirit, and no less Zeal toward his Country, grieving to see his Subjects committed to his Charge, to be so daily by the insolent Turks, still more and more oppressed; he (as he had before promised to the Transilvanian) callous, he had before offered to the State of Valachia, to confide with them what were left to be done for the Remedy of so great Evils, as also for the preventing of greater, not without cause then to be feared. Where, by the general Content of them all, it was agreed, rather to join with the Emperour and the other Christian Princes in Confederation, as they had been oftentimes by them requested, than longer to endure that heavy Yoke of the Turkish Thraldom and Slavery. Whereupon the Vayvod taking unto him two thousand of the Hungarian Garrison Soldiers, now before, for that purgatory, secretly laid upon the Frontiers of his Country; and calling upon the Name of Christ Jesus, in one day to begin withal, flew about to thousand of the Janizaries, (who had been in the Country proudly feared themselves) with all the rest of the Turks, (in the midst of their Infidelity) together with the traitorous Jews, not leaving one of them that he could come by alive, in all the open Country. And putting to drive them out of their strong holds also, and to take a more readiness of their way, he with fourteen days after, came to Dziurdzowa, a great Town of the Turks upon the Bank of Danubius; all which he burnt, saving the Castle: and having there made a great slaughter, and loaded with the spoil of the Turks, returned to Bucharesta, the chief Seat of his Palatine.

But long it was not after this his so great Presumption, but that he perceived the Turks in Revenge thereof, to seek after his Life, although he yet seemed to yield his Obedience unto Amurath, and to have done that he did, as enforced thereto by the Infidelity of the Turks, and for the necessary relief both of himself and his Subjects. For the same Town (Rab being, as is aforesaid, taken by Sinan) one of the Turks Emirs, descended of the great Family and Stock of Mahomet their false Prophet, and then Cadiliche (a man of great Account and Place amongst the Turks) accompanied with 2000 chosen Soldiers, fifty of the great Sultans Chamber, and many of the Zanli and Spahi, upon the sudden came to Bucharesta, under the colour any self or themselves after their long march, but indeed with purpose to have taken the Vayvod, where they without Controulment, committed all kind of outrageous Villany; and taking up all the chief Houses in the City, imperiously demanded of the Vayvod (who then lay at his Palace near unto the new Monastery without the City, built without any self or themselves upon the River Dravda, wize) 100000 Florens for a Present, with Victuals and other necessary Provision for his Followers. And presently after, being certainly informed that he lay there but slenderly accompanied, and almost himself alone, the Emir himself on foot, with a thousand of his Soldiers, went out of the City, as if it had been told in his Pleas, and in Courtage to have seen him. Of which so suspicious a Guests coming, the Vayvod understanding, got him betimes away into the Camp of his Hungarian Mercenaries, which then lay but fast by; when the Turk thus deceived of the hope he had before conceived for the taking of him, craftily sent certain of his Followers, to know of him to what end he in time of Peace, did entertain such a number of Hungarian Soldiers; Whereunto the Vayvod cunningly answered, That they were at the first entertained for the taking of Peter, the Son of Alexander, sometime Palatine of Moldavia; who, although he were an Hook at Constantinople, yet that those Soldiers were, for their ready Service, necessarily still to be billeted in the Country, until such time as their pay might be provided. Which the Turk hearing, commanded the Vayvod forthwith to discharge them, as men unnecessary, and to his Subjects troublesome, promising the next day to lend him a Tun of Gold to pay them their Wages. Which feigned promise the Vayvod, somewhat thankfully to take; yet nevertheless commanded the Hungarians long with in Arms to stand in readiness in the Camp, for the intercepting of the Turks, if haply by him distressed, they should betake themselves to flight; whilst he in the mean time, with his Counters and other Soldiers, secretly assembled into a Valley thereby, came suddenly upon the Turks (not then dreaming of any such thing) compassed about the Inns wherein they lay, and setting fire upon them in five Places, notably forced them both with Fire and Sword, the two greatest Extremities of War; leaving now for nothing more than the just Revenge of his spoiled City, his forced Villages, and wronged Subjects. Howbeit, the Turks put a space right valiantly defended themselves, and by plain force (although in vain) sought to have broken through the midst of their Enemies, and so to have fled. Yea, many of them by force of the Fire driven out of their Lodgings, and tearing off their burning Cloaths, fought stark naked; and most of them which could, fled unto the Palace where the great Emir lay, there with him ready to die or live. All which their last endeavours of Desperation the Vayvod caught frustrated, with two great Pieces of Artillery opening a way for his Soldiers unto them. So that the proud Emir now in dispair (like the hunted Caster) threw down all of a Window, a great Chest full of Gold and precious Stones, and other Jewels of great value; if haply he might have so appeased the Vayvod's Wrath; humbly now requesting no more, but to have his Life spared; fearfully promising a large ransom for himself and those few which were yet alive with him. Howbeit, the Vayvod mindful of the manifold Injuries by them done unto him and his Subjects, and nothing mitigated or moved with the rich Spoils thrust upon him, or the large Promises the Turks had made him; commanded all those his Enemies now in Power, to be slain every Mothers Son; of whom his Soldiers had a wonderful rich spoil, although much more was left in the fire; and so giving thanks unto God for the Victory, rested with his People a while at quiet. Yet within less than a Month after, he sent Abderris Kural, his Lieutenant, with an Army to Phech, (a great open unwall'd Town on the farther side of Danubius, equally distant from Proszek and Nicopolis), from whence the Turks, often times passing over that frozen River into Valachia, had there done great harm; which Town, not inferior unto a good City, he suddenly surprized, and sacked it, and put to the Sword all the Inhabitants thereof, except such as were before his coming fled. And thortly after (the more to annoy the Turks) marching again over the frozen River, to have surprized Herbowia, a walled City, but one day's Journey from Brailova, he was by the way encountered upon the Ice by the Turks, whom he there in a great conflict

1595 overthrew; and having slain many of them, and put the rest to flight, holding on his intended Journey, took that rich City, which he rifled and burnt down to the Ground, all except the Castle, which was yet by the Turks valiantly defended; and so with the spoil of the City, returned again over the River, there to refresh his Soldiers, wearied with Labour and the Extremity of the Winter weather. And yet not so contented, within six days after passing again over the River, and having upon the side thereof in a great Battel overthrow the Turks Garrisons, took Silistra, a great City of Macedonia, built by Constantine the Great, (being the Seat of one of the Turks Sanzacks, and well inhabited with rich Merchants) which fair City he ransacked, and having slain most part of the Inhabitants, burnt it down to the Ground, as he had the other: no less Terror than Grief unto the Turks.

But whilst the aforesaid Confederation betwixt the Emperour and the Transilvanian Prince was yer in hand, and the Troubles in Valachia thus arising, Amurath, the great Sultan, grievously troubled with the Stone, and anointed with the falling Sickneſs, his wonted Disease, and inwardly also tormented with the late Infelency of the Janizaries, and Revolt of the Countries of Transilvania, Valachia, and Moldavia, (no small hinderance to the proceeding of his Wars in Hungary) as a man both in Soul and Body tormented, with great Impatiency and Agony of Mind, departed this Life the eighteenth day of January, in the year of our Lord 1595; when he had lived one and fifty, or as some say, two and fifty years, and thereof reigned nineteen. At the time of his Death arose such a sudden and terrible Tempest at Constantinople, that many thought the World should even presently have been dissolved. His dead Body was not long after, with great Pomp and Solemnity, buried by Mahomet, his eldest Son, in a Mosque which he himself had before built at Constantinople.

To not thy voice, nor thy dread command,
 That make thee great, nor thy victorious hand,
 Thine an almighty God who maketh thee so,
 From him thou gloriest, O Saviour, on thee flow.
 As in thy infant hands the Scepter placed,
 As in thy vigorous youth rich honours grac'd.
 Not for thy merits he exalted thee,
 But that his Saviour of vengeance thou shouldst be.
 Brought thou not then, of what is not thine own,
 For he that ree thee up, may pull thee down.
 Be humble in thy most triumphant state,
 For great things sink deprecate by their own weight.
 For feed thy self with hopes of endless date,
 For at Fate's summons thou must see thy woe.

THE LIFE OF MAHOMET,

The Third of that Name, Seventh Emperour of the Turky.

THE Death of the late great Sultan Amurath was not forthwith made known in the Court, but with wonderful secrecy concealed, not only for fear of the Janizaries, (who in the time of the vacancy of the Empire always do whatsoever pleases themselves) but also for that the People, having in distrust the fierce Nature of Mahomet, Amurath's eldest Son, were generally better affected to Amurath, the younger Brother, a Prince of a more mild spirit and courteous disposition, unto whom they in heart wished those flatly honours, which could by no means, without the great wrong and prejudice of his elder Brother, and danger of the whole State, be given unto him. Ten days after came Mahomet in post from Amasia to Constantinople, and was there by the great Baffa, and other his mighty Favorites, saluted Emperour: which done, he presently after caused all his Brethren to be invited to a solemn Feast in the Court; wherunto they (yet ignorant of the death of their Father) came cheerfully, as men fearing no harm; but being come, were there all by his commandment most miserably strangled: and at once to rid himself of the fear of all Competitors, (the greatest torment of the Mighty) he the same day (as is reported) caused ten of his Father's Wives and Concubines, such as by whom any Issue was to be feared, to be all drowned in the Sea.

He murdered his Brethren.

The Janizaries in a Tumult.

The Janizaries, and other Souldiers of the Court, not before acquainted with the Death of Amurath, before with the choice that the great Baffa had without their privy made of Mahomet, and not a little offended to see themselves so disappointed of such Spoils as they reckoned due unto them in the time of their Vacancy, as men discontented, rose up in a rage, and made such havoc and spoil in the Imperial City, as greater they could not well have made had there been as yet no Emperour chosen at all; and not so contented, were now even upon the point to have seized their new Emperour's Court, and to have laid violent hands upon the Person of himself, in revenge of the tyranny by him executed upon his Brethren and Fathers Wives (which inhumane cruelty the Turkish Emperours easily excuse by the name of the Policy of their State.) For the appeasing of which so dangerous a Tumult, Mahomet called unto him certain of the chief men among the Seditious, such as were thought to be able to do most with them, whom he sought by fair persuasions and large promises to win unto him, and by them to pacify the rest. Which served him to little or no purpose, until such time as the great Baffa themselves came out with their followers; who, with many fair persuasions, mixt with most grievous threats, and firm promise of a general pardon, with much ado appeased the Tumult; yet for the more safety, kept all the chief Streets of the City with strong Watch and Ward. This Brawl thus overblown, a new Tent was by the Commandment of the new Emperour set up before the Temple of Sophia; whereto, on the right hand was placed the dead Body of the late Sultan Amurath, his Father, and on the left-hand the Bodies of his nineteen strangled Brethren, layd forth of purpose, as an heavy Spectacle for the People to behold; who all, not long after were, together with their Father, with great Solemnity, after the Turkish manner buried; and Mahomet himself (being about nine and twenty years old) now openly proclaimed great Emperour of the Turky, and Lord of all, from the rising of the Sun, to the going down of the same. After that, returning to his Palace, he made unto his Baffas, and other great men, a sumptuous and Royal Feast, as the manner was; but whilst in the midst of their Mirth, upon the sudden all the City was again in an uprore, and the People in Arms, in such sort, as that it was thought scarce one man would have escaped alive from that Banquet, had not the chief Baffa with his Gravity and Wisdom, and wonderful Labour, in good time appeased their Fury; and withal, to their greater Terror, caused all the great Ordnance in the City to be brought forth into the Streets ready charged, to be shot off amongst them.

The Tumult appeased.

The Janizaries were again in an uprore.

Divers fortresses made by the Christians upon the Turky.

Whilst these Troubles thus passed at Constantinople, upon the late Confederation made between the Emperour, the Transilvanian Prince, the Polishians, and Moldavians, divers fortunate Inroads and Skirmishes were by them made in the Frontiers of the Turky's Dominions, many strong Places were surpris'd, many rich Booties taken, and notable Exploits done, which we will briefly pass over, as the Precedents of a greater War. The City of Wetras, before taken by the Turks, was now again in the beginning of this year recovered; and the Christians about Scutchie, in number about four thousand, breaking into the Turky's Frontiers, carried away an exceeding rich Prey, with divers notable Captives. The like did also the Christians of Vivaria; at which time also the Garrison Souldiers of Altenburg, taking a Road into the Country about Ras, encountered with four thousand Turks, of whom they slew two hundred, took certain Prisoners, whom they sent, some to Presburg, some to Altenburg; and Sinan Baffa, the late General, returning towards Constantinople with much Treasure, which he had greedily scraped together in the late Wars in Hungary, was by the Polishians set upon by the way not far from Belgrade, and stript of all that he had, having much ado to escape himself

M m m m m z with

The same Valachians, together with the Transilvanians, entered the conduct of their valiant Captain, Géttin Ferenc, entering further upon the Turks, took from them six of their Towns and Castles, as Pondéle, Nicopolis, Killa, and Rebénichs; and meeting with twelve thousand of the Tartars, who were in the Infidelity of the Valachians, his late Tributaries; he, their Enemies, the Turk Emperor was highly offended; and therefore sent one Bogdan, a Valachian born, defended of the Palatine House, with a great Power, to expulſe the old Vayvod, and to possess himſelf of that Honour, as his Tributary: promising unto him a great Kindness. Bogdan, thus ſupported and furniſhed, came with his power into Valachia, yet thought it best before he tempted any great matter, to expect the coming of the Tartars, left the last year in Hungary by Sinan; of whose coming the Valachians and Transilvanians having underſtanding, met them by the ways and ſent him by Barcel a ſumme, flew eight thousand of them, put the rest to flight, and returned: unto whom, presently after this Victory, the Turk Prince sent fourteen thousand Soldiers more to aid them againſt the Turks. But Bogdan underſtanding both of the Overthrow of the Tartars, and the coming of this new Supply, durſt not proſeſſe ſtill in his Enterprize, but kept himſelf ſtill in his Country, till longer after, by the Commandment of the Turk Emperor, than the Crim Tartar, with a great power of Turks, whoſe Horſe, entered into Moldavia, with purpose to have by Fire and Sword reduced that Country again unto the Turks Obedience: of whose coming, Aaron Vayvod of Moldavia having knowledge, and ſeeing by his Neighbour Michael Vayvod of Valachia, who he believed to be the ſame, that he in three diviſe Battels overthrew them, and saving ſain twelve thousand of them, enforced the Turks to retire againe out of his Country: and following the courſe of this Victory, presently after took Bendari, Schinitz, Tigna, Mechins, with ſome other Caſtles and Fortreſſes of the Turks, united unto the River of Danubius, all which he ſurrounded with his own Garrisons, and whithal took the rich County of Bobrag, the Inhabitants thereof willingly ſubjecting themſelves unto him, as men weary of the Turk Thraldom. With like good fortune, aided by the Polonian Collocks, he overthrew Janiſſa, the Son of Bogdan, ſometime Vayvod of Moldavia, ſent inſtantly by Mahomet with a great Power, as a ſuccour to ſuccour the ſaid Vayvod, and to recover again that Country: ſo that Aaron courageouſly encountering at Scarpel, ſent him from Danubius, overthrew him in plain Barrel; and having ſlain eight thousand of his Turks, put him to flight, and took the ſpoil of his whole Camp. Neithert yet ſo contented, marched preſently to Nagard, where he put the Turks in a great fear, and afterwards burnt the Suburbs of the City, and ſo retired

How Anwarath, the late Sultan, in the beginning of these Troubles, had at Constantinople. But up on the Prisoner Frederick Rorczewitz, the Emperor's Ambassador, is before declared. This Ambassador Sinan Bajfa brought with him the last year, when he came into Hungary; who, after many Indignities by him suffered, both upon the way and at Belgrade, there died; five of whose Servants the false cause carried off; Kept in Irregular Prison, as guilty of the Master's Death. But to avert the Infamy thereof from himself. But to avert the Infamy Belgrade for the better managing of the Affairs of Wars, upon the coming of a new Treasurer from the Court, he cauled the five poor Prisoners to be brought before him, and most impudently charged them with the Death of their Master; saying, that they should answer for the same unto God and their Emperor; and that his purpose in sending of him from Constantinople, was to no other end, but to have used his help in concluding a Peace between the Great Sultan and the Emperor, and so that he was to him, with all his, alibiety: but now that he was to see, that he had sent them his treacherous Servants to the Emperor, and that he had examined; and withal to tell him, That he was sent from the Great Sultan (whose Power was not by any but God only to be withstood) to befriend Vienna, which he could (as he said) the last year have taken, and left about that he had done Ratis, and that therefore it was his duty, him betime to seek for Peace, before to great a Power he should see the Field: and that for farther Instructions, he would refer them to his Son, the Bassa of Buda, to whom he sent them from Belgrade, together with some Low-comer Treasurer. Being come to Buda, they were thought before the Bassa, and amongst them the late Emperor's Secretary, unto whom, after he had said somewhat of the hard dealing with the Ambassador and his Followers, he declared, That he had always disliked of that manner of proceeding, and oftentimes intreated his Father to restore their Liberty, and now at last to have obtained, that he should have desired, that his Servants might be set free; and that he was in good hope, that they should in short time be restored to their wonted Liberty: in the mean time, that one of them should go unto the Emperor's Court, and there speak with one of his Secretaries, whom he had thought he should be able to bethink himself of Peace; unto whom also he gave words, upon what Conditions he thought Peace might be procured in his hand obtained. Which were, If all the Castles and Strong-holds, taken by the Emperor's Forces in these Wars, as Fiken, Seckine, and Nagatsch, with their Territories, should be restored, and that he should be satisfied if the Emperor should give them thenceforth refuge, and that he should have Transilvania, Moldavia, and Valachians, and give them to the Great Sultan to be chastised as Rebels; and finally, the Emperor would at once fend unto the Turks Court his wonted Tribute for the years ensuing, and the yearly afterwards: so he could be content, by the assistance of his Father, to attempt to appease the fierce and angry Displeasure of the Sultan, and to further the Treaty of Peace. This he commanded the Secretary to write, and to send it by the young Lord Perling, and to require Answer thereof: yet that he should go with this Secretary, and that if he laid Perling within the space of five or six weeks, he should not wait with Answer, till the self should, by his default, be returned into his subtil Deceit, and full of deceit, wherein the Viennese Bassas, both the Father and the Son, sought for nothing else but to see what confidence the Christians had in themselves, and to break the friendship made between the Emperor, the Transilvanians, Moldavians, Valachians; and that other Princes, whom God had made his assistance of to just a cause, hearing of a rumour of ease, might grow cold, and defer to tend for their comfort Aid. For now the Turks had found by experience, how hurtful and dangerous the Revolt of the Christians, and Cities of Transilvania, Moldavia, and Valachia was unto them, which they thought in hundred thousand Duckets, they had lost the Great Sultan's Treasury: besides that, those People, now become their Enemies, were of all other meet to intercept all manner of Provision to be brought by Land either to or from Constantinople, and to hinder their warlike Province. Notwithstanding this motion, the Emperor sent by the Bassas, Singai, the old Bassa in France, and with great Diligence at Belgrade, prepared all things necessary for War, and caused three Bridges to be made, whereby he might in divers Places, as he thought best, transport his Army over Danubius and at the same time sent for the Garrisons round about, and other Souldiers before billeted in the Country, and put in readines all things necessary for a most mortal War.

Within the appointed time came Perling from the Emperours Court, with answer to the Letters written by the Ambassadors Secretary, at the Commandment of the Baffa; the effect whereof was, that he had received his Letters by Perling, and did thereby understand what had passed between the Emperor and the Reverend Father Ambafador, and that he was not ignorant of the Ambafador and Sinan Baffa at Belgrade, and also how the Sultan Sinan Baffa the Son of Buda; and that the Emperours Mind was never other, but that a firm Peace might have been made between him and the Sultan; and that the Emperour had done nothing else by his Ambafador at Comstantinople, or by others in other Places, but that such reasonable Conditions might be offered to the Sultan, as he might be able to take, and have on both sides delivered their innocent Subjects from their great and daily Calamities; which might easily have been done, if Sinan, the Author and Fautor of this War, had with like desire furthered the Peace. But that it was manifest to the whole World, that all Complements of friendship and civility, which the Ambafador, yea, and by the Emperours himself, by his Letters laid open unto the Sultan and his chief Baffaes, had not only nothing prevailed, but also to have been with great Contempt rejected, and the Treaty of Peace once begun, to have by the Infidelity of the Baffa of Baffia, been interrupted; and that notwithstanding all this, the matter should not break out into open War, his father had sent a bute into the Confinnes of Hungary, which was a great while laid up at Comara, until the Sultans Mind was known. But when all his Designs tended to War, and the Christian Provinces were by his Robbers on every side ravaged, the Inhabitants led out to the Field, and the Towns, Cities, Castles, Towns and Villages burnt, yea, whole Counties laid waste and solate, and all manner of Outrages were upon a mere Pride and Contempt, as it were of the whole World, exercised; then the Emperour has just taken his Refuge unto the defence of his just cause, and to have used such Remedies as are both before and after the Event of this War, and so by lawfull means to have repulged War, which he had done, but he had not the last year prolofered in his hand, but that he had received some loss; yet that Sinan Baffa himself and the Baffa of Buda, his Son, with other of the wiser sort of the Turks, must needs confesse that to have chanced, not by their Willdom, Policy, or Reason, but by the Infirmitie of God, by a violent Misfortune, through the Ignorance, Inexperience and Treason of such as he had put in power with the Confinnes of his Empire, without much severe Chastisement. And that no man could deny, but that great Powers of the Turks, had not once, but oftentimes been overthrowen and discomfited, by small handfuls of the Christians; therefore their Power was not to be feared, as they vainly vaunted of. But whereas it was his Son, who had suffered Sinan, and the Baffa his Son, are of Opinion, that the Emperour is brought to so low an ebb, that he must be glad to accept of most hard and dishonourable Conditions of Peace propounded by others; therein they are much, and deceive themselves, and they are deceived, and they should be taught by Experience know, that his Son, who thirty wethereth neither Power nor Wealth, to repair the loss received through the Treason of them he trusted, yea, and to recover whatsoever else he had loft; and that it should in short time be witness'd unto the whole World, by the help of God, and the defence of a most just Cause, that the Emperor was not so poor and weak as they supposed him to be. Yet, as he of his own natural Goodness and Clemency, with his own incomparable love and harm, had always sought for the Quiet and Peace of his Subjects, and to the uttermost of his Power, maintain'd the effusion of all blood, and now almost forgetting all Injuries, he could happily be mov'd to think of an honourable Peace; whereunto he was more inclin'd than to protract the War with the unpeakable harms of the Subjects on both sides. Yet above all things, it behoved Sinan to know, that he must be the cause of all Calles and Towns as have in this War been taken, and the beginning at Whitiz in Croatia, even to the last innocent Subject by them carried away into Captivity: And that the Transilvanians, Moldavians, and Valachians, (People many Ages join'd and united as one People) should return to the Kingdom of Hungary, as unto the true Birth-land, and not of late by the Prachtreich Treachery of certain rebellious Persons separated from the same) were from henceforth to be left under the Protection and Government of his Imperial Majesty, and never more to be impugned by the Turks. If these things were done, and the Emperor should the Injury and Dilgrace done unto him, be forgiven, and the Emperor should leave all the Princes of the World cried shame of mankind, not remain unpunished; and that his Servants in durance at Buda and Constantinople, might be reſtor'd unto their wonted Liberty, then some good form of Peace, and bounding of their Territories, might be proposed; upon agreement; without which Conditions, all talk of Peace, was vain. And God, the just and mighty Protector of such as put their Trust in him, would not fail to help his Imperial Majesty, with the rest of the Confederate Princes, in their so just a quarrel, and abate the Power of such as trust in their own Strength and Power.

This answer the Captives at Bada, either by Writing or by word of Mouth; and withal, earnestly to request him, both for their own Liberty and their Country, wrongfully detained at Constantinople. Which if he should obtain, yet to comfort themselves with that, they desired the Countess to send them a Letter, by which they might have manner receive from the Emperour such allowance, as should suffice to provide them things necessary; as he had granted to Perling, whom he might have justly detained, and not sent him back again, but for his Oaths sake, being no lawful Prisoner. Thus the unreasonable Conditions of Peace, craftily by the Bads gotten, and by others answered; but by whom he knew not, no Mans Name being set thereunto.

The Emperor, not ignorant with what an Enemy he had to do, and of nothing more careful than of the Kingdom (or more truly to say, of the Reliques of the Kingdom) of Hungary, lying now as it were in the Lions Mouth, ceased not to pray Aid, from the Princes Electors only, but of others also farther off; yea, even as far as Italy and Spain, but especially of the King of Poland, as his Neighbour and Neighbour. Unto whom both he and the States of Hungary sent their Ambassadors, at such time as he, moved with the daily Incursions of the Turks and Tartars into the Counties adjoining upon his, bad for the safety of his own Kingdom, called the Parliament of all his States in Feyribach last Christmas. Whereof Mahomet, the great Turk, hearing, sent also two Ambassadors, in this ultimate Age, to the King and his States, to assemble, to crave his Aid in his Wars in Hungary; which if the King should not refuse, then to promise promise him to want no Coin to pay his Souldiers; and that Mahomet, mindful of to great a courtship, would at all times be ready to requite him with like, when his Occasions should require. These Ambassadors, having obtained safe conduct from Michael the Vayvod of Valachia, for their Passage through his Country, coming thither, were by the Vayvod himself honourably entertained and well come, and so brought into a fair Lodging, where they discomfited with him of many matters. But the Vayvod's Followers, grieved to see so great Honour done to these their sworn and mortal Enemies, with Weapons in their hands brake into the Room where the Ambassadors were, and without more ado flew them both; and in the same Fury setting upon the rest of the Turks their Followers, cut them all in pieces, so that of them none came into Polonia to do their great Master's Message, neither yet returned to Constantinople to carry news of the rest, but there altogether perished. Of which Outrage Mahomet yet understanding, was there-with wonderfully enraged, threatening all evils both to the Moldavians and Valachians, and going to wrack in those Countries, and fore taken on that side of Hungary, Mahomet, the Turkish Emperor, called home to the Count Sinan Bassa, his General in Hungary, to confer with him (as it was thought) of some great matters. In whole place he sent Ferhat Bassa, he who sometime had the leading of Amurat's great Armies against the Poles, who now departing from Constantinople, came to Belgrade in April, and there took the charge upon him. Where, at his first coming, in the night time all the Ropes and Cords of the Tents were suddenly cut in funder, and so the Tent let fall about his Ears; which some supposed to have been done by his Disgrace, by the procurement of Cicula Bassa, before by him wronged; or, as others thought, by the insolent Janizaries, who disliking of him, did it in delight, wishing rather to have been led by Mahomet himself. Now at his coming, the Famine which the last year began amongst the Turks was grown exceeding great, not at Buda and Belgrade only, but generally in most places of Hungary possessed by the Turks. Inasmuch, that the Turur Women that followed the Camp were fain to roast their own Children, and eat them. This Famine was also accompanied with a most terrible Plague, whereof great numbers of the Turks and Tartars died daily: so that of fourscore five thousand Tartars, which came the last year into Hungary, now remained scarce eight thousand, the rest being all devoured with the Sword, Famine, and Pestilence.

of Valachia doth the Turks great

Great were the harms the Turks still daily received from the late revolted Countries of Transylvania, Valachia, and Moldavia, the Christians of those Places seeking by all means to annoy them. Michael Vayvod of Valachia, not contented with what he had already done, but entering into the Turks Frontiers, surprised Scimbele, together with the Cattle; wherein he found fourteen field pieces, amongst which were two which had upon them the Arms of the Emperor Ferdinand, and other two having upon them the Arms of Humyadi, which Pieces he afterwards sent as a Present to the Transylvanian Prince. After that, he took Drogea, a famous Port-Town, the dwelling place of the Turks great Purveyor for Butter, Cheese, and Honey, and such other Provision for the Court, wherein he found such store of the aforesaid Provision, as might well have sufficed eight thousand men for a whole year; and still adding his good Fortune, took from the Turks Kilic and Calatone, with the strong Castle of S. George, commonly called Grigin, and at length besieged Laganos.

With the beginning of the Spring came Matthias, the Arch-duke, and General of the Christian Army, from the Assembly of the Nobility of Hungary at Presburg, to Besma, and so from thence to the Empirour his Brother at Prague, who appointed him General of the lower Hungary, and Maximilian his Brother General of the upper Country; giving them for their Lieutenants, unto Maximilian the Lord Teuffenbach, and to Matthias the Count Charles Mansfeld, by him sent for out of Flanders, and after created one of the Princes of the Empire, and John de Medicez, who was yet in Hungary, he made Master of the great Ordinance, with charge to fortify Komara; which he so well performed, as that it was thought nothing in strength inferior to Rab. All this while the Empirour ceased not, by his Ambassadors and Letters, to sollicit the Christian Princes, for the terrifying of the common Enemy put to their helping hands; and so much he prevailed with them; that out of his own hereditary Provinces, and from other Princes his Friends, he had this Spring raised a right puissant and strong Army for the defence of Hungary; which how it was raised, and from whom, it shall not be much from out purpose briefly to remember, as the chief strength, under God, whereby the Christian Commonwealth was this year most notably defended. Out of the higher Saxony came a thousand two hundred Horse-men, and out of the lower Saxony six hundred; from Franconia a thousand Horse-men; from Suevia four thousand Foot-men; out of the County of Tirol, as many as thirty thousand; out of Bohemia two thousand five hundred Arms, fix hundred light Horse-men, and fix thousand Foot-men; from Silesia a thousand five hundred Horse-men; from Lusatia five hundred Horse and a thousand Foot; from Moravia a thousand two hundred Foot; out of Austria four thousand Horse and fix thousand Foot; from Hungary five hundred Horse and a thousand Foot: from the Nobility of Suevia and Franconia four thousand Foot; from the King of Spain out of the Low-Countries, under the Conduct of Charles Count Mansfeld, two thousand Horse-men and fix thousand Foot; unto these the Bishop of Rome added two thousand five hundred Foot-men; the Duke of Florence sent five hundred Horse and three thousand Foot; the Duke of Ferrara a thousand five hundred Foot-men; the Duke of Manitua a thousand Foot; and the Duke Vermee five hundred Horse. All which being put together, fill up the number of fifteen thousand nine hundred Horse-men, and fifty thousand five hundred Foot. Which notable Army, raised from the power of divers Christian Princes, and conducted by worthy Chiefs, had, by the goodness of God, much better Success this Summer against the ancient Enemies of Christendome, than had the like Army the Year before, as in the process of this History shall appear.

Among the worthy Commanders that were in this puissant Army, Charles Count Mansfeld, the Son of Peter Erneste the old Count, from his Youth brought up in Arms, was by the King of Spain, at the request of the Empirour, sent with the aforesaid Forces of two thousand Horse, and fix thousand Foot out of the Low-Countries, as a Man for his approved Valour and Direction, first to manage these dangerous Wars against the Turks under Matthias the Arch-duke, as his Lieutenant-General; who having raised the appointed Forces, for most part Wallons, departed from Brussels, about the middle of February; and by the way taking his leave of hisaged Father at Luxemburg, and travelling through Germany, came in March to Prague, where he was by the Empirour, and the Arch-duke his Brother, most honourably entertained, and shortly after, with great Solemnity, created one of the Princes of the Empire. His Forces following after him, were by the great layed, partly by the inundation of Waters (the Rivers they were to pass over at that time rising to an unwonted height) partly by the Jealousie of some of the German Princes, who denied them Passage through their Territories, until such time as that the Empirour, by his Letters, had opened unto him the way; which Princes, for as much, stood upon their guard, and so gave him Passage.

Now ran great Rumours of the wonderful Preparations of the Turks, as also of the Christians; Fame, after her wonted manner, increasing the report of all things above measure: which caused the Turks, with exceeding care, to look to the Fortification of their frontier Towns, especially of Rab and Ungespiggen, as did the Christians to the Fortification of Komara and Athenburg. In the mean time, many hot Skirmishes passed between the Christians and the Turks, especially in the late revolted Countries of Transylvania and Valachia, wherein the Turks were still put to the worse, to the great discontentment of their Emperour.

At Constantinople the great Army, led forth by the valiant Captain Gefius Ferents, and the Transylvanians. And in Valachia, the Turks General entring with a great Army, was there also, by the Lord Nadadji and the Valachians, aided with the Transylvanians, in a great Battle discomfited and overthrown. Eight thousand of the Turks heads, in token of this Victory, were sent to the Emperor. Abdulla Sultan, the Transylvanian Prince, and certain Ensigns, amongst which, one was most richly garnished with precious Stones and Pearl, thought to be worth thirty thousand Dollars; which the Prince afterward restored again to Nadadji, offering him great Possessions in Transylvania, if he could have been contented thereto to have loved himself.

All this Spring the Turks contemned their Wars with greater Boasts and Threats than true force, giving it out, That they would in short time work Wonders both by Sea and Land. For the more credit whereof, Marat Rays, a notable Pirate, was sent out with twelve Gallies, who landing here and there upon the Coast of Italy, did much harm; and caused it to be reported in every place where he landed, That this was but the beginning of a greater War, and that a wonderful Fleet was to follow him: which raised a great fear, as well in other places as in Italy. Howbeit, no such Fleet afterwards appeared; for why, the Turkish Emperour, much troubled with the Revolt of Transylvania, Valachia, and Moldavia, and the great Mortality then raging both among his Souldiers and their Horses, was not at leisure to look into the Sea, having his hands full enough with the Troubles of Hungary, where his men of War enjoyed little rest in the Frontiers of his Territories.

Sigismund, the Transylvanian Prince, had, upon some just causes, of late suspected Aaron the Vayvod of Moldavia, to have Intelligence not only with the Polonians, but also with the Cardinal Bator, and other his mortal Enemies, and secretly to have been about to make his Peace with Mahomet, and so again to fall off from him unto the Turks: which vehement Suspicion growing daily more and more, was about the time manifestly confirmed by certain Letters intercepted concerning that matter. For the preventing whereof, the Prince caused Aaron to be apprehended, and with his Wife and Son to be sent as Prisoners to Prague; in whose Room, he, by the consent of the Nobility of the Country, placed one Stephen Roznowa, a wife and discreet man amongst them, and such an one as had been always faithful unto him: so, as much as in him was, providing that Country should not be rent from him, and the Union of the other. But against the secret Practices of the Polonians, he proceeded openly, by Letters unto the Emperour, by the Power of God, and Aid of his faithful Subjects, to redress those to great Injuries himself by the Sword.

In the midst of these Troubles came three Chiaus, Ambassadors from the Turkish Sultan, unto the Prince, to persuade him again to put himself into his Protection, and to give him Passage through his Country, as in former time, unto Hungary, promising him, that all the Injuries done by him, or his People, should be for ever forgotten and forgiven; and that he should have those three Countries of Transylvania, Valachia, and Moldavia, as his own free Inheritance, without paying any Tribute; and so to be accounted as the Turks' most loving friend and Vassal. What the Prince answered therunto was not known; but by his discourses afterwards it was easily to be gathered, that he hearkened not unto the deceitful Charms of the faithless Tyrant, trusting more unto the League he had with the Christian Emperour. These Ambassadors were scarce gone, but that a secret Messenger came with Letters from the Christian Emperour, in Bulgaria to the Prince, declaring unto him, That if he did any good Success procure him, his Wars, they would be ready to follow his Fortune, and to join hands with him against the cruel Tyrant, and to shut up all the Passages that way into Valachia, Moldavia, and Hungary.

Whilst these great times thus passed in Transylvania and Hungary, one of the old Janizaries, called Wahide Giez, an old Souldier, but a confident bold spoken Fellow, moved, as should seem with the Discontentments of the time, came unto Mahomet the great Sultan, at Constantinople, and there openly set upon him with this rough and abrupt Speech:

How long at last, most mighty Emperour, wilt thou endure thyself to be seduced and blinded by the great Bassaes of thy Court, and Commanders of thine Armies? How long wilt thou suffer thyself to be deceived, to the great danger of thyself, and hurt of thy Subjects? Seest thou not how overtimely, from thy dulcety, and cunningly, they moved only with their own covetous and ambitious Humour, have hitherto dealt with thee and thy Father? especially in that, that persuaded by them, thou hast dishonourably broken thy League, and taken up Arms against the Christian Emperour. At length open thine eyes and see their deceit, and how much they abuse thy Power. Sinan Bassa, who hath been himself honoured and exalted above all others, hath not by strong band honourously won Rab, as hath been the manner of thine Ancestors, but hath craftily bought it with thy money, and thereby cast thee into a most dangerous War and infinite Troubles. O Rab, Rab! now the age of great triumph, and rejoicing, as if thereby all Christendome should in short time be taken by the Scepter. But thou art therein much deceived; thy Barns, thy Store-houses, as are Transylvania, Valachia, Moldavia, Bulgaria, and other Provinces adjoining, from whence, thy thy Imperial City of Constantinople, with the Country about it, thy Court, yea thy Self are to be relieved, are by this War put up; so that doubtless thou shalt in short time manifestly confound the Exultation of Rab, thou art not able to look for any Provision. From whence then, O most mighty Emperour, wilt thou maintain thyself, thy Court, this populous City, and

Now had the Christians with long and continual Battery fore beaten both the upper and the lower City, which Battery they now maintained with greater fury than at any time from the beginning of the Siege, and within the City their wants increased daily, having nothing left to live upon but a little Wheat and Barley, with some Horsetflesh; unto whom thus distressed, the Lord Palfi, by the commandment of the County (to try what confidence they yet had in themselves) the Ninth of August, sent two Gentlemen to the City, to do a Message from him to the Governour: who advertised thereof, being a very aged and courteous man, accompanied with the Aga of the Janizaries, came to the Walls to hear what they had to say; where one of the said Gentlemen in few words delivered him this short Message.

*M*ost gracious Lord, the Lord Palfi, most worthy Governour, greeteth thee well, and knowing thee to be a Captain both valiant and wise, and one that hath always courteously used such as have fallen into thine hands, hath Compassion of thy desperate Obstinacy: and therefore, whereat thou art to look or hope for nothing else but perishing Life and Destruction, he, as thy Neighbour, and a Lover of thy Vertues, adviseth and exhorteth thee, if thou wilt save thy self and thine from most undoubted and imminent Death, and utter Confusion, without delay to deliver up this City, which thou canst not longer hold.

Unto whom the old Governour thus, without stay, courteously answered:

*T*hy Speech, my Friend, and thy Masters Advice, are unto me both vain. Tell the Lord Palfi, in my Name, that I cannot please him with the least fine in this City. One foot I have already in the grave, and will with the same carry these my gray Hairs into the same; and am yet contented with a most certain and undoubted Hope, that my most dread and mighty Sovereign, and my Lord Sinan Bassa, will not forsake me: yea, and that if they should write unto me, that they could find no means or way to relieve me (which I am sure they can) yet would I well, and at leisure, consider whether it were fit for me to deliver up this City or not; seeing that of this defence thereof dependeth all mine Honour and Credit. Besides that, what Reward they have on both sides that so easily deliver over the Cities they have in charge, all the World doth see.

With this Answer he sent them away. All this while the Aga of the Janizaries standing by, spoke not one word, but fighting in silence and grinding his Teeth, declared by his Countenance his Indignation and inward Grief.

In the mid-way between Buda and Strigomium, in the midst of the River of Danubius, lieth a little Island called Pisze, where many rich Cloisters dwell: this Island the Hungarian Heidons spoiled, and in returning thence, met with twenty four Wagons laden with Corn, going to Buda, which they took, with eight and twenty Prisoners which they brought into the Camp. The lower Town being with long and continual Battery made assailable, was by the Christians, the Thirtieth of August, in three divers places taken. The Bavarians were by lot to give the first Charge, who in the performing thereof beginning to faint (for that they were notably repulsed by the Turks) but seconded by ones of Reinman and Suevia, plucked down a great Pallisado, filled the Ditches, removed whatsoever stood in their way, and so long fought with the Turks in the breaches, that by the coming in of the Marquess of Burgaw with six Companies of fresh men, they prevailed upon the En-my, and so all together brake into the Town. In the midst of this dangerous Fight was the Marquess himself, who both with his Presence and cheerful Speech so encouraged his Soldiers, that they, as men fearing no peril, ran headlong into all danger, until they had entered the Town: there might a man have heard a most miserable Cry, especially of Women and Children throughout the City; whereas the Christians breaking in on every side, slew whoever came in their way, without respect of Age or Sex, sparing neither Woman great with Child, neither the little Children hanging at their Mothers Breasts. Yet did not the Christians stop so much attend the present Execution, as some of them did the Spoil and Prey; and especially the Hungarians, unto whom all was good Booty, even the very Hinges of the Doors and Windows; whereby many escaped into the Castle and upper Town. The Christians had not many hours possessed the Town, but that divers fires began to break out in divers places, but by what means was not at the first known: at last it was found out, that the Turks, doubting the loss of the Town, had before, where they thought best, left Gun-powder, which taking fire by Matches kindled a most horrible fire, should at a certain time for all on fire; by which means many most horrible Fires were raised in the Town, which consumed many good Buildings, and other things which might have flooded the Christians in great dread, and could hardly in a day or two be quenched.

This so joyful and Victorious law not he, by whose good direction, next unto God, it was gained, the worthy County; for he a few days before being fallen sick of a Fever, taken by drinking too much cold drink in his Heat, with immoderate pains taking in the late Battle, and so afterwards falling into a great flux with a Fever, was by the counsel of his Physicians (for the better recovering of his Health) removed to Komara, a place near to his end, he almost every hour enquired how the Army did, and whether the City were yet taken, or what hope there was of the taking thereof. But when it was told him a little before his Death that the lower Town was won, he thereat greatly rejoiced; and the next day, being the Fourteenth of August, towards night, quietly departed this World, to the great loss of the Christian Commonwealth, and the exceeding grief of the whole Army. A Man even from his Child-hood brought up in Arms, of Stature great, but of Courage greater, and painful above measure, not the least cause of his untimely death. All the time of this Siege he took little Rest, either by day or night, scarce to much as lie down upon his Bed in two or three hours together. The little Meat he did eat, he most part eat it standing or walking, and, sometimes on Horse-back. He was a most severe Observer of Martial Discipline, which caused him to be of his Soldiers both beloved and feared. His Bowels were with due Solemnity buried at Komara, where he died; but his Body was brought back again to Luxemburg, there to be honourably interred with his Ancestors.

About which time, Theodore, the great Duke of Moscovia, hearing of the Wars between the Emperor and the Turks, sent two Ambassadors with Letters and Presents to the Emperours; which Ambassadors coming to Prague the first of August, accompanied with two hundred and fifty Horse, were, by the Emperours appointment, honourably received and entertained. And afterward having Audience, first delivered the Letters of Credence from the great Duke, reported to have been of this purport.

*Y*our Majesty hath sent unto us your Ambassador Nicholas Warkotke, requesting our brotherly Aid against the hereditary Enemy of all Christianity, the Turkish Sultan. Wherefore, we also desiring to live with you dear and well beloved Brother in all personal Amity and Friendship, find us bound by our faithful Counsel and Servant Michael Ivanovitch, and John Sohne; Aid out of our Treasury against the said Enemy, unto whom we have also given other things in charge to be propounded to your Majesty, requesting you to give unto them full credit in all things. Given in the great Court of our Power at Muscovy, in the year of the World 7103, and from the Nativity of Christ 1595, in the Month of April.

What things in particular these Ambassadors were sent for, was not commonly known, but among others it is said, that the Moscovite requested the Emperour to lend an Ambassador unto the Persian King, to draw him also into the League with them against the Turks; which Ambassador should first come into Moscovia, and that way to pass into Persia. The Presents which the great Duke sent unto the Emperour, were, an hundred and fifty thousand Florens of Gold, great store of most rich Furs, and precious Perfumes deemed to be of exceeding value, two white Fawnes, and three Leopards alive. And Ismaim, the Ambassador himself, presented unto the Emperour of himself, certain rich Turky, Persian, and Babylonian Hangings and Carpets, certain Timbers of Sables, with other rich Furs no less precious than Sables, so many as eight Porters could hardly carry. These Ambassadors tarried at Prague until the seven and twentieth day of December, and then taking their leave, returned with the Emperours answer to the Duke.

But to return again unto Strigomium. The Christians now possessed of the lower Town, bent their whole Battery upon the higher Town, where it fortuned the fourteenth of August, that the old Governour Ali-Beg, whilst he was carefully walking from Place to Place to see where most danger was, had his Arm struck off with a great shot, of which he himself died. He was as man of great Gravity, about the Age of fourscore years, and had of long time nobly both governed and defended that famous City, the loss whereof was like needful to have been unto him greater Grief than was the loss of his Life there. Much about the same time also died the Aga of the Janizaries, being before mortally wounded. Both the chief Commanders thus slain, the Janizaries with the other Soldiers and Citizens made choice of the Bassa of Naretia (who as is aforesaid escaped out of the lower Town into the City) for their Governour; who with heavy cheer took upon him that forlorn charge. The Christians, not ignorant of the death of these two worthy Men, in whole great and approved Valour they supplied the chief Defence of the City to have redress, were in good hope that now the rest would therefore readily hearten to some good Composition; and therefore sent a Messenger to demand if they would yet, whilst there were some Mercy left, yield the City. Who, though they had lost their chief Commanders, with the greatest part of the Garrison, and were in great wants both of Victuals and all Things else necessary for their Defence; yet their Answer was in few words, That they would hold it out even to the last man. The greatest cause of which their obstinate Resolution, was the strict charge the Bassa of Buda had given them for the defence thereof; besides that, they accounted their City holy, as won by their magnificent Emperour Solyman, whom the Turks generally yet have in a devout remembrance, and therefore thought it a great Impiety to deliver it up unto the Christians. The next day after came Matthias the Arch-Duke into the Camp; and the manner of the siege, he called together into his Tent the chief Commanders, namely, the Marquess of Burgaw, his Cousin, John de Medice the Florentine, and the Lord Palfi the Hungarian; to confer with them what was further to be done for the winning of the City. Shortly after, he commanded the City to be assaulted in two Places at once, which was by the Wallons and *German*s courageously performed; but such was the Valour of the Defendants, that when the Christians had done what they could, they were glad at last to give over the assault and wish to retire. About this time came the Duke of Mantua, with the three Counties his Brethren to the siege, and now the Turks began again to draw together near unto Buda, there to make head for the relief of Strigomium, and to be revenged of the loss they had there before received. Whereof the Arch-Duke having Intelligence, sent out against them eight thousand chosen Soldiers out of the Camp, who suddenly falling upon the Turks in their Camp, who suddenly rising of the Sun made a great laughter amongst them, and took certain Prisoners, of whom the Sanzack of Copan was one; and so with Victory returned to the siege.

The besieged Turks in Strigomium understanding of this overthrow of their Friends, from whom they expected most speedy relief, and beside the Terror of the continual Battery and still flaming Assaults, pinched also with extrem want of all things; began now to faint. Wherefore the Bassa with the other Captains, overcome with the aforesaid Difficulties, and the general outcry of the fearful People, resolved with one consent to come now to parley, and upon reasonable Conditions to yield up the City; whereupon a flag of Truce was set up, and Parley craved. Which granted, the Arch-Duke after the going down of the Sun came into the lower Town, where nine of the Turks attended his coming; who entering into Parley, required that they might under safe Conveyance with Bag and Baggage depart, and so leave him the City; which the Arch-Duke would not by any means agree unto. At length, with much Intreaty, they obtained that they might upon the same Conditions depart by their sides, and so much of their Goods as they could carry upon their Backs, unto such Ships as were to be appointed for the carriage of them to Buda. For the performance whereof, Hostages were on both sides given; and so the next day (being the second of September) they began to come out of the City, more in number than either the Prisoners taken in the time of the siege had been, or the Christians had thought. Thirty Ships were appointed for the conveying of them down the River to Buda, which not lasting, many of them tarried in the City until the next day, at which time the Bassa, with the sick and wounded, failed to Buda, the Prisoners and Pledges on both sides being before faithfully delivered. Thus by the Goodness of God, and the good Conduct of a few valiant Christians, was Strigomium, the Metropolitane City of Hungary, after it had fifty two years groaned under the miserable Yoke of the Turkish Servitude, again restored unto the Christian Commonwealth; which the Christians forthwith repaired and new furnished, as was thought.

bell for the defence thereof against the Enemy. Al which being done, about the midst of this Month the Arch-Duke sent eighteen thousand to besiege Piccadra, otherwise called Plindenburg, a strong Castle of the Turks; upon the River between Strigimium and Buda; which Castle they took. Which, when they of Buda understood, they were so stricken with such a fear, that many of them forsook their fort were ready to forsake the City. At length, that the Batarians saw their flight, was glad to come to the Gates of the City to be shut upon them, and no man suffered to pass out. This good Success of the Christians in these Wars, caused great rejoicing to be made in most parts of Chriftendom.

All this while the Christians were thus busied at the siege of Strigimium, the Transilbanian Prince was not idle, but in divers places did march. He succeeding much in his wars, his new Name being come to be famous unto them. It fortuned that about the same day that the County Mansfeld departed at Konnara, that the Prince at Ala-India with great Solemnity married Maria Chribina, the Daughter of the late Arch Duke Charles; the Son of the Emperour Ferdinand; her other Sister Anna being before married unto Sigismund, now King of Poland; for so it was agreed for the more increase of the League between these two Kingdoms, and him, that he should take to his Wife out of the House of Austria, which was now did. Of this Solemnity the Turks (his evil Neighbours) having Intelligence, assembling to the number of 30000, or more, thought as unwelcome Guests, to have come unbidden or unlooked for thereunto; but the vigilant Prince understanding of their coming, provided for his Entertainment accordingly, and fetting his Neighbours for a while apart, and coming upon them when they least looked for him, he did so overcome them, that he slew most part of them, carrying away with him as a triumphant Victor, the whole spoil of his Enemies.

About the same time, the Transbalkanians also besieged Paigat, a Town holden by the Turks not far from Temeswar, where, after they had lain 12 days, they of the Town, despairing to be able long to hold out, came to Parley, and covenanting to depart with Bag and Baggage, began to go out of the Town. But in their departure, understanding that the Bassa of Temeswar, with the Voys of Lippa and Jenne, were coming to their relief, they and those that were in the Town began to find delays, and those that were already gone out, began to return. Wherewith the Transbalkanians much moved, by plain force entered the Town, and put them all to the Sword; and afterward turning upon the Bassa, who with ten thousand Turks and certain Field-pieces was coming to have relieved the Town, had with them a cruel Batel; wherein most part of the Turks fell with small loss of the Transbalkanians; who so eagerly pursued the Voys, that the Bassa himself with the Voys of Lippa fled out of the Town, and fled away with the Field-pieces. The two Sanzacks, with divers others of good Place, were taken and sent Prisoners to the Prince. Not long after, about the latter end of August, the Transbalkanians also besieged Lippa, a famous City of Hungary, standing upon the River Maracze, not far from Temeswar, which the Turks being not able longer to hold, fled into the Castle; where finding themselves in no great safety, after three days siege they came to Parley, and so yielded, upon Condition that they might in safety depart with so many of their Goods as they could carry with them. About which time also the Bassa of Bofna, with ten thousand Turks and Tartars, went forth to have again recovered
Rabofca, a frontier Town, before taken by the Christians; which the Sirians and the rest of the Christians dwelling thereabouts, between the two Rivers of Sannus and Drauns, understanding, conducted by the Lords Herbenstein, Leucowitz, and Eckenberg, that had the charge of those Frontiers, overtook the said Turks and Tartars near unto Babofca, fought with them, and in the plain Field overthrow them.

Mahomet, not a little grieved with the good Success of the Christians in every part of Hungary, and above measure offended with Ferat Basha, his General, through whose Negligence all, or at least his wife most part of this had happened (as he was by the Envoy of Sinath Basha perfwaded) sent for Ferat home, and in his Place sent out Sinan. Of which the great Sultans Displeasure Ferat was not ignorant, as forewarned thereof by her that bef knew; even the Sultans Mother, and advised not to come in fight until his Peace were made. Who, nevertheless trusting to his own Innocency (the comfortablest and most dangerous and weak way the world has) and desiring not to submit, whatsoever Sinan should be able to charge him with, came to the Court; where he was by the Commandment of Mahomet shortly after strangled, and his Goods; to the value of five hundred thousand Ducats, confiscated.

Among the dangerous Enemies of the Christian Common-wealth, was none at this time more cruel than was Sinan, an Euphrat born, a Filibuster Son, of a rough and uncivil Politian, and a cruel and bloody Prince, who sold his Youth to the Wart, and brought up in the Wars; and yet (as his Motto was) breathing nothing but Blood and War. He had many times fortunately led the brave Armies of the Turkish Empire into Poland, Saxony, and Germany; and he is not sent by the great Sultan Mahomet, as the fittest man to reduce the late revolted Countries of Transylvania, Valachia, and Moldavia to their former Thraldom which to do, he before he promised to take, he first purfuit Armies, by a Bridge made of Boats (after a Months Labour) (sent therein) puffed over the great River of Danubius, into Valachia; of whose coming the Transylvanians were so much terrified, that they durst not stand their legs, but had before so flur up the Passages of the Country, as that he could not without much danger have entered far; and were also ready with their united Forces, even at his first entrance, to give him the same Wart. But he was not to have such a mortal and cruel fight, with much blood hied on both sides. Thrice revere the Transfusions inforced to retire, but still relieved with new Supplies, and knowing that they then carried in their Arms the welfare of their whole Country, came on fresh again, and as hardly charged the Turks, as they had been by them charged. Thus with doubting courage, and fluctuating valour, the Battel maintained from the Morning until Night, Victory with doubtful Wings hovering now over the one side, now over the other; until that at length, the Turks, overcome by true Valour, their Battels being quite disordered and broken, were now glad to seek to save themselves. In the morning, they fought the eleventh of September, besides many thousands of the common Soldiers, were slain also divers of great account amongst the Turks; and amongst the rest, Halder Baffa, a man of them much regarded, was found dead even in the same place where the Battel was fought. He was much huffed to get over the Bridge, fell into the deep Mud, and in that general Confusion of his Army, was like enough there to have perished; but as the common Proverb goes, Seldome lyeth the Devil dead in a Dike, the old Peishaw was with much ado drawn out by them of his Guard, and so he returned forth Mischief. Nevertheless, the danger was so great, great, that for certain days it was commonly reported, that he was there drowned, most of his own people not as yet certainly knowing what was become of him. All the spoil of the Turks became Prey unto the Christians, as did also their great Ordnance, and many of their Ensigns; amongst which, was one green one, which they accounted religious, as fabled to their Prophet Mahomet, whereunto they in time of their greatest Distress fled, as unto their last Refuge: there was taken also all their Tents, with great abundance of Victuals, and other warlike Provision.

The old Baffa thus overthrown, full of Grief and even mad for delight, posited himself in all haste to the Court, thinking it better himself to make the best of that which was indeed nought, than to see his Country brought by the cruel and ruinous Report of others; and withal, the desire of the great Sultan with desire of Revenge, when no man too much longed after as himself: wherein he so discreetly used the matter, as that the late loss of his Country, as received by the common loss of the Christian Army, was not so much to be regretted, rather than by any default of his; and new Commission given him for the raising of another Army for the subduing of the late revolted Countries, he now came, to show his Hated unto the Sultan, and to shew his Country to the Christians, and to shew his Country to the Court with the novelty of the Sight, he caused an hundred and twelve Christian Captives, whom he had in Prison at Belgrade, to be brought in chains like Beasts to Constantinople, and to be led thro' the great Streets of that City, as the vain contentment of the Citizens, to behold the Court-gate, for the Sultan to look upon, and the Courtiers to deride; from whence they were, after many unpeakeable Indignities, conveyed to most filthy and loathsome Prisons, there to be fed with the bread of Grief.

About this time, the Turks, under the Command of the Baſia of Bofnia, to the number of almoſt twenty thouſand, made a Road into Croatia, where they were by the Chriſtians, under the leading of the Lord Reichenberg and Leuowicz, overthrowen, and almoſt all ſlain: the Chriſtians following the Chafe even into the Turky Frontiers, burnt fireſt of ſix Ages, and took the Caſtle of Varſauar: but ſoon after, the Turks, ſending back ſome of their immediately ſubordinate Generals, ſet out on their coming in the Lord Herberghin, Governor of Valeria and Windſparche, and certain other Troops of Horſe-men out of Carinhia and the Countries thereabout, they returned, the thirteenth of September, to beſiege Pertinia, otherwiſe called Petroſina; which, becauſe they were in hope to take by ſurprize, they even at their firſt coming courageouſly lay ſiege to it. But the Chriſtians, ſeeing theſe with greater reſiſtance, and more diſtance, than they had before ſuppoſed to have found, and that without great Ordnance (which could not in ſhort time be got over the Mountains) there was no good to be done, they were glad to give over the Aſſault, and with ſuch loſs as they had received, to return homeward, to conſult farther of the matter. But the Turks again, a fugitive Horſe-man fled from the Enemy, ſent ſome of their Troops to the Chriſtians, That Kuſtan Be, Governor of Pertinia, was in the late Aſſault wounded in the Breaſt with a ſmall Shot, and dead; and that the Turky in the Town, diſcouraged with his Death, and the late Overthrow of their Friends in Croatia, would upon the firſt fight of their abandon the Town, if they ſhould again return to beſiege it. Upon which good hope, the Chriſtians, preferringly reſolved to go forward again towards Pertinia, ſent ſome of their Turks (hearing of their coming) had before ſent, as the Soldier reported, for fear abandoned. So the Chriſtians, without Reſiſtance, entering the Town, found therein some Pillage, but better store of Shot and Powder; and presently sending for certain Troops of Horse-men to pursue the flying Turks, took divers of them, and among the rest the late Governours Lieutenant, whom they brought back again into the Town. Thus was Petrina again recovered from the Turks, to the great quiet and safety of all that side about.

of all that thrūd the Country.

Weghmond, the Transilvanian Prince, not ignorant of the malice of old Sin, who he knew would not be long before he returned to the Empire of the Polesians, for the wife of the Prince of the Moldavia, from him, fought now for all means (as it flood him upon) to make him self (so strong as he could again) to many Storms arising. It fortuned, that even at the same time the Zaculians (now known by the name of Scyth) in former time a warlike people, but then tributary unto the Turks, bordering upon the North-east part of Transilvania; now wearied of the Scyth Thralldom, and seeing the good Success of the Polish and the late revolted Countries, their Neighbourhood, offered unto the Prince their Service; promising of their own charge to maintain forty thousand men in the Field during his Wars with the Turk, and to pay him of every houle a Dollar, with a certain quantity of Wheat, Oats, and Barley, after the manner of the other Country; and further, that if God should bid him to give a Son to succeed him in his Government, they were willing they should give unto him a good fat Oxe. For this Service, they craved no more, but that they might as his Subjects live under his Protection; yet so, as to be governed by their own ancient Laws and Customs. Of which their Offer the Prince accepting, it was forthwith by them proclaimed in their Country, that the People sworn to the performance of the aforesaid Conditions. And having at that present but five and twenty thousand in the Field, they, without delay, sent out their Army to press out fifteen thousand more, for the filling up of the promised number of forty thousand; wherewith they came unto the Prince, who, taking a view of his Army, found himself to be now fourty thousand men strong, to welcome the Bassaw whither when he should come again into his Country.

Now had Sinan, with great speed, raised an Army of 70000 choice Soldiers, amongst whom were many whole Bands of Janissaries, the flower of the Turkish Empire. With which Power, joyful unto the Reliques of his other broken Forces, he thought himself strong enough for the subduing of the Prince, unto whom came also afterward Hassan Basha, the son of the great Basha Muhamet, one of the Turks most renowned for his arms, and many others of great name. With this Army, the old Basha, by a Bridge, which he with exceeding charge had made of Boats, passed over the great River, the son of the great Basha, called the great River S. George in Palatyna, a great way beneath that place where sometime the Emperour Turk built his famous Bridge of Stone, worthily accounted amongst the rare and wonderful Buildings of the World. From Torona he marched with his Army, to the City of Constantinople, the Vayvod's chief City, but then in the Port of the Turks where is a notable Monastery, which he called the Castle, fortifying it with deep Trenches and strong Bulwarks, and good store of great Ordnance, purposing to make that the Seat of his War, until he might reinforce those late revolted Countries unto the Prince, to which he, upon pain of his Head, had undertaken to deliver the Prince, both by Messages and Letters, with great the Baffes arrival there, and having his Army in good readines, let forward to meet him, and to give him Battel. But being come unto Valachia, and there incamped, it is reported, That a great Eagle, descending from as high Rock thence, called the Kings Rock, and hovering over the Christian Army, flew about the Princes Tent, and there lighting, was taken and presented to the Prince, who commanded her to be kept as the preface of his good Fortune, holding fill on his way; and the fifteenth of October, being come within half a days march of Tergovista, he understood by two Christians lately escaped from the Turks, That two days before, the Turks hearing of his coming were fructen with such a general and sudden fear, that Sinan had much ado, either by fire means or by foul to flay the Janissaries from flight; and that when he had done what he could, yet that certain Companies of them were quite fled and gon. But the Truth was, That Sinan, seeing the general fear of his Army, and he himself no less fearful than the rest; upon the Princes approach fled with all his Army, leaving his Tents behind him for halfe, his great Ordnance, with much Victuals and other warlike Provision, carrying with him only such things as were of most value. As for the City of Tergovista, with the Castle which he had made of the Monastery, he committed to the keeping of Hajfan Baffa and Bogdanus the late Vayvod, now become a Renegade Turk, with a Garrison of 4000 chosen Souldiers, promising within a few days, if need should be, to relieve them, but fled himself in all haste with his Army to Buchargia, a days Journey from Tergovista. From whence he presently writ back again to Hajfan Baffa, willing him if he could to defend the Castle; but if he should think it not possible to be kept against the Power of the Prince, then betime to forsake it and to flit for himself. But these Letters being intercepted by the Christians, never came to the Baffes Hands. Not long after the departing of Sinan, the Prince coming to Tergovista, entered the forsaken Camp, where he found many Tents, with some Ordnance, and great store of Victuals, and without further delay summoned both the City and the Castle, which for all that were both denied him. But the next day after, Hajfan, considering the flight of Sinan, the Power of the Prince, and withal, doubting, if need should be, to be relieved by Sinan, whom he not without cause suspected not to love him, was about some reasonable Composition to have yielded up both the City and the Castle; whereunto the Garrison Souldiers (being most part of them Janissaries) would not in any case give their Consent, but stood upon the defence of the Place. Whereupon the Prince began furiously to batter both the City and the Castle, and after some few hours battery, by assault took both, and put to the Sword the whole Garrison; only Hajfan Baffa, as Sarazacks, Bogdanus the Renegade was there slain among the rest. The Christians had there a rich Prey, besides forty two great pieces of Ordnance, and good store of all manner of warlike Provision. Hajfan thus taken, grievously complained, That Sinan had of a malicious purpose exposed him to so manifold Peril, for the grudge he bare unto his dead Father, the Vizier Mabomet, upon whom, because he could never be revenged, he now by sinister means had cunningly performed it upon his Son; yet he craved of the Prince to be well used, offering for his ranfome 100000 Hungarian Duckets. Yet whilst the Prince thus lay at Tergovista, came thither 4000 Turks, whom Sinan had before his departure thence, sent forth to spoil the Country, and to seek after Prey, thinking in this Cave he found him still; who now falling into the Hands of the Christians, were there all slain, and 60000 head of Cattel recovered, which these Turks had taken out of Valachia and Moldavia, and should by *Sinan*s appointment have been sent to Constantinople. For Valachia and Moldavia do so abound with Corn and Cattel, that they plentifully serve the Imperial City of Constantinople, not only with Corn and Fleth, but also yearly send at the least 150 Ships thither by the black Sea, laden with other kind of Victuals. Of which so great Commodities the Turks were now deprived, by the revolt of the aforesaid Countries.

The Prince, leaving a strong Garrison in Tergovista, let forward with his Army towards Bucaresta, hoping there to have found Sinan. But he hearing of the loss of Tergovista, and thinking himself in no good safety at Bucaresta, fled thence also to Zorza. The Prince coming to Bucaresta, found it abandoned by the Turks, and so took it without resistance, yet had therein certain field-pieces, with good store of Shot and Powder, left there by Sinan. Having there stayed a while for the marning of the Place, he set forwards again towards Zorza; and that with such speed, that he overtook great numbers of the Turks, all whom he put to the Sword; so that the Fields between Bucaresta and Zorza, were in many Places covered with the dead Bodies of the Turks. Nevertheless, he could not make so great haste, marching fill in good order, but that the fearful Baffa, disorderly halting, was about some fix hours or more before come to aq Bridge he had with great charge made over the River of Danubius.

Over the hithermost part of which Bridge (being in length about a mile) was Sinan with the greatest part of his Army (before the coming of the Prince) got over into an Island in the midst of the River, wherein he had as his coming over incamped, but doubting thence to fly, with all the speed he could, got him over the other part of the Bridge also unto the farther side of the River, with so many of his Men as in so short time possibly could. Where to flay the farther pursuit of the Prince, he brake the Bridge on that side, and let it on fire; and thereby cut off also many of his own men that were not as yet come over. Whom the Prince inclosing, forced many of them into the River, where they perished; the rest flying into the Island, were by the Christians fiercely pursuing them, either there slain, or seeking by the other part of the Bridge to have got over, (whereof the farther end was before broken down by Sinan, and the hinder end toward the Island now cut off by the Christians) were, together with the Bridge, carried away by the violence of the River, and so altogether perished. Other some of the Christians in the mean time took the Bridge that leadeth unto the Castle of Zorza, which standeth compassed about with an Arm of Danubius, and being very great, was kept by a Garrison of seven hundred select Souldiers. Unto which Castle the Prince presently laid siege, (the resolute Souldiers being not by any means to be perswaded to yield it up, but to hold it out even unto the last man) and after he had fore battered it, by plain force took it, and put to the Sword all the Garrison Souldiers he could lay hands upon. About an hundred of these Turks, seeing they must needs fall into the Power of their Enemies, desperately leapt from the top of the Castle into the River, where not one of them escaped, being all either drowned or slain with small loss. In the winning of this place, hundred and fifty of the Christians were lost, and many wounded; but of the Turks and Tartars, betwixt the eighteenth and the last of October, perished above six and twenty thousand. In this Cave were taken thirty nine great Pieces, with such store of Armour and other warlike Provision, as might have served for an whole Kingdom, and four thousand Christians, which the Women and Children, whom Sinan had taken out of Valachia, restored to their former Liberty. With whom, the Prince, after he had let all things in order, returned in great Triumph to Tergovista, and so afterwards to his Palace at Alba-Julia, where, as also at Claudiopolis, and other Cities through his Dominions, he caused publick Prayers, with thanksgiving unto Almighty God, to be devoutly made for so great a Victory: as did also Michael the Vayvod in Valachia; who in all these great Wars against the Turks was nothing inferior unto the Transilvanian himself. A greater loss than this, the Turkish Emperor received not at Land in many Years before, being by this so happy and victorious a Prince, and the Revolt of these three Countries, deprived of so much Territory as they had not from the Christians of long time gained. It was by some of them the better sort of the Turks that were taken, reported, That Sinan Baffa should oftentimes say, That this young Transilvanian Prince had bereft him of all his Honour and Reputation he had with great travel got in the course of his long Life; and that although he had cicaped his hands, yet that he feared he would be the cause for him in these his great years, even in the winding up of all, to lose his Life together with his Goods and Honour. Now was the Transilvanian Prince's Name (after the overthrow of his great Baffa) become dreadful unto the Turks, and also famous through all Christendome.

Whilst this worthy Prince was thus buied in this Expedition against Sinan, he caused the Castle of Jenna (standing upon the High-way between Temeswar and Gisla) to be beset by certain of his Captains appointed to that Service, in which time he sent a party of the Turks Sarazacks, with a Garrison of seven hundred Turks, who much troubled such as passed that way. They, now brought to some Extremity, and terrified with the Success of the Prince, offered to give up the Castle, so that as Souldiers, with their Scimitars by their sides, they might in safety be brought to Pamela. Which their Offer being accepted of, and they now upon their way, the Hungarian light Horse-men that should have conducted them, informed that these Turks now under their charge had secret Intelligence with the Turks in Garrison at Gisla and Temeswar, that they should lie in Ambush for them near Pamela, and so cut them off by the way; for which the Turks whom they should have conducted, and cut the Throats of four hundred of them; and yet fill holding on their way, met with these Turks that lay in Ambush for them, whom they, after a sharp Skirmish, overthrew; and having slain a great many of them, put the rest to flight. By the taking of Jenna the ways therabouts were quietted, especially for them of Waraden. The Sarzack of Jenna reported, That Mabomet had a little before sent word unto his Baffas and Sarzances in Hungary, That such Castles and Towns as they thought were not to be defended against the Christians, they should betimes, as occasion served, yield them up, or forsake them; so to spare the needless loss of his good Souldiers; of whom he had, with so many Towns and strong-holds, lost no small number this Year in Hungary. Jenna thus taken, divers of the richer sort in Temeswar, fearing to be even presently besieged, sent their Wives and Children, with their Treasures and such other things as they made most reckoning of, out of the City, in Waggon, to be conveyed unto Places of more safety; of which Waggon, seventy were by the Christians (lying therabout in Garrison) intercepted, and in them an exceeding rich Booty.

Mabomet having this year fully purposed the utter Ruine of the Transilvanian Prince, and the reducing of the Countries of Transilvania, Moldavia, and Valachia, unto his Obedience, by the great Baffa Sinan had, for the better choosing thereof, before provided, that the Crim Tartar (ready fill at his call) should with his own People (whereof he hath great store) and certain Bands of the Turks, at the same time invade Moldavia; and possessing himself of the Country, to place one Sidriake Vayvod, instead of Stephen the late Vayvod by the Prince, and to people the Country with his Tartars, in reward of his good Service, as he said; but indeed to have them always near at hand to do his Commandments in Hungary, Polonia, Transilvania, or the other Countries of the Christians thereunto adjoining. The Tartars, according to their Appointment, came with seventy thousand Tartars, accompanied with their Wives and Children, to have platted themselves in the Country, at the very same time that Sinan came to Tergovista. But being come upon the Frontiers of Moldavia, to have put in Execution what he was by Mabomet commanded, he found there Zemislav, the great Chancellor of Polonia, ready with a strong Army to oppose himself against him, and to flay his farther Passage. Whereupon, some light Skirmishes passed between the Tartars and the Polonians; where the Tartars were fill put to the worse, with the loss of three thousand of their men. The Tartar Cham, with Sidriake the Vayvod, appointed by the Turks, finding themselves, though in number more, yet in strength inferior unto the Polonian, and that without his good leave he could not pass; sent unto the Chancellor to excuse that was already past, as done without their consent, by the Insolvency of their Souldiers; and to tell him, that their coming was not to fight with him, as having express Commandment from the great Sultan Mabomet, to go and to stir the League betwixt him and the Polonians, but quietly to pass by their Frontiers into Moldavia, and there to place Sidriake Vayvod, his Tributary, instead of Stephen, that now usurped the place by the appointment of the Transilvanian; which that they might do, they craved his leave, as Friends, to pass. Whereunto the Chancellor answered, That he was come thither, by the commandment of the King, to defend those Countries from the Invasion of such as had in them no right; and that there had of long time been an ancient League betwixt the Polonian Kings and Turkish Emperours, upon certain Conditions, which he would for his part keep inviolate, with the favour of the Turkish Emperour; yet so, as that the Kingdom of Polonia took no harm thereby, and that they might quietly live by him as their good Neighbour; which League he protested not to have been by him, but by them, infringed; as for to give them Passage, he said he could not. Messengers passing thus to and fro, and some Parle had, at last certain Articles were agreed upon, to the reasonable contentment both of the Tartar and of the Chancellor, (though not of Sidriake, disappointed thereby of his Vayvodship) as also of the Turkish Sultan, whose Pleasure they both seemed to have in full regard. Hereupon, the Tartar, with his Multitude, presently returned, leaving the Chancellor to his own designs. Now was it commonly thought, that the Chancellor had done the Transilvanian Prince great Service, by keeping out of the Tartars, and much Honour was, by many that saw least, spoken of him therefore. But far was it from his thought to do the Transilvanian therein any such good, at whose Glory he envied, and had with the Cardinal and his Brother, the Princes Uncles (but most deadly Enemies) secretly conspired, so much as in them was, his utter Ruine and Overthrow; wishing those Countries rather in the Subjection of the Turk than to see them to be honourably at liberty, governed by the Prince; such is the force of malicious Envy, the infernal Companion of worthy Vertue. Which the Chancellor (otherwise a man of great Fame and Honour) began now openly to pour forth; for presently after the capture of the Tartars, he with all his Power passing over the River Nijeter, or Tyros, into Moldavia, even at such time as the Prince was going against Sinan at Tergoviffa, first seized upon the Castle of Chotim, which he furnished with his own Souldiers: and from thence marching to Zornia, the metropolitical City of that Province, and from thence the Vayvod, had it yielded unto him; and so proceeding on, had in short time almost the whole Country delivered unto him; Stephen the Vayvod, placed by the Prince, flying from place to place before him, from whom he left least any such thing, having made account of no other Enemies but of the Turks and Tartars. Stephen the Vayvod thus driven out, and the Chancellor possessed of the Country, he presently placed one Hieremias Vayvod instead of Stephen, to hold that Honour of the Polonian King as his Sovereign. Yet nevertheless, to satisfy the Turk, he sent a Messenger to Sinan Bassa, then but newly come to Tergoviffa, requesting him not to take it in evil part that he had entered into Moldavia, and there placed a new Vayvod, but in the name of the great Sultan Mabomet to confirm this doing, and the Vayvod by him placed; promising the Country of Moldavia to remain tributary still unto the Sultan, and that this new Vayvod should forthwith pay unto what this Tribute was behind, and from thenceforth a far greater Tribute than he had paid the Country of Moldavia before. Whereunto the haughty Bassa (then fearing nothing less than that which immediately after happened, to be driven out of those Countries by the Prince) proudly answered, that it was not the great Sultan's mind that the Polonians should at all invade Moldavia, for that beside he could, without their help, reduce those Countries to his Obedience, he had given that Country unto the Tartars, in reward of his good Service already done in Hungary and other places; whose Subjects, the Tartars, would ere long be ready, with their Wives and Children, to take Possession of. Nevertheless the Chancellor proceeded to defend the new Vayvod by him placed, which was no great matter for him to do, Sinan, the Turks Champion (as is before declared) being presently after overthrown, and driven quite out of those Countries by the Prince: who, if he had not then gained the Victory, the Chancellor had not now holden Moldavia, but the Turk, whose Quarrel he seemed rather to favour than the Prince. The Chancellor, to colour this his Invasion, pretended that the Country of Moldavia did of ancient Right belong unto the Kingdom of Polonia; which the Transilvanians took to be no other but mere and open wrong. This supposed Title, such as it was, the Chancellor had so fashioned out unto the King and the States of that Kingdom, that they referred it to his Discretion to invade the Country, and the Vayvod by him placed by the Prince, to place another in his stead; and the rather to persuade them, laboured by many forced Reasons to shew the Power of the Transilvanian Prince to be so far inferior unto the Turks, that it was to be feared he should at length be thrust out of all his Dominions, and so they, together with Moldavia, become tributary to the Turks; which if it should come to pass, then should the Polonians have an untrusty and troublesome Neighbour: and that therefore it were better that Moldavia were possessed by them that were better able to defend it than was he, that so the Turk might be kept farther off from Polonia. Which occasion he laid was not longer to be delayed, but now became to be laid hold upon; persuading himself to find such Grace and Favour with the Turkish Emperor, as that he should be therewith right well contented; which was like enough for a time to be, for that the Transilvanian should thereby be much weakened. By these and such like Reasons, framed to serve his own turn, the Chancellor so prevailed with the King and the States of the Kingdom, that he received (as I said) full Authority to proceed in the matter as he did, and as is before declared, to the great trouble of the Prince, and benefit of the Turk; the late chosen Vayvod not long after opening a way in three places for the Tartars into Transilvania, one by the Country of Sicchia, another by the way that leadeth to Alba Julia, and the third by Radac (as I said).

The Transilvanian Prince, seeing the Country of Moldavia, by the practice of the Chancellor, thus taken from him, and delivered from the other united Provinces, to the great weakening of his Estate; the flight of Sinan lent certain Companies both of Horse and Foot, to Stephen the late Vayvod, now driven out by the Polonians, to prove if he could by that means drive out the Polonians again, and recover his former Dignity. With this aid sent from the Prince, and others that favoured his Quarrel, he joyed a bloody Batel with the Polonians; but being therein by them overcome and taken, and for a space kept (as the Prince feared, to have been delivered unto the Turk, he put by them (as is reported) cruelly afterwards put to death.

This deal dealing of the Polonian in Moldavia much grieved many good Christians, as tending to the general hurt of the Christian Commonwealth. For which cause, the Emperor, by his Ambassadors lent for that purpose unto the Polonian, sought to persuade him to desist from such Invasion of the Transilvanian Prince, by his Chancellor, as nothing standing with his Honour; and that some good Reconciliation might be made between the Prince and the Cardinal Baron and his Brother, the Prince's Uncles, Authors of all these Troubles. To which purpose also the Pope sent a Messenger with like Instructions and Letters unto the King, persuading him, not to prosecute his Wars against the Prince, but to turn his Thoughts unto a more peaceable and Christian-like course, especially with him with whom he was so near linked in Lord, so much the more fervently we with all your Actions to be adorned with the greatest Commendation of true Godliness and Widow, both before God and Men; whereof it proceedeth, that we are so much the more vehemently and grievously moved, if we hear any such thing of you, as may seem not agreeable to your Vertue and approved Zeal toward the Catholic Religion, or tending to the obscuring of the Glory of your Name, as is now brought unto us concerning the Affairs of Moldavia; whereof, not without great grief, we write unto you. And to rehearse things a little before past: with what earnestness and fervency dealt I with you, that for God's Cause, and the the defence of the health and liberty of the Christian Commonwealth; against the Tyranny of the Turks, you would combine your self with our most dearly beloved Son Rodolph the Emperor, and divers other Christian Princes; and that you should not let slip so notable an occasion, so worthily to deserve of God, of the Catholic Faith, and of the Christian Commonwealth in general: And albeit we then thought as well for many your own private respects, as also of your Kingdoms, That you were to be borne withal and excused if you did not now openly descend into this Confederation of the Christian Princes against the most mortal and common Enemy, neither apertly join your Forces or give aid for the repelling of his Infolency; yet we always assured our selves, that no let should in any case proceed from you, whereby either the Emperor or the other Christian Princes should be the rather hindered, justly to prosecute their Injuries, or to call off from their Necks the heavy yoke of the most cruel Tyrant; whose defence of Sovereignty is not comprised within the compass of any bound. But that you should in favour of the Turk, impugn the Catholic Princes and Defenders of the Christian Faith, and so join hands with the Enemies of the Cross of Christ, as that by your help their force and fury should be encreased, and ours not only weakened, but in the most grievous of Vices humiliated, and cast into the most vicious perils; this we have not only not thought of you, but so much as once suspected; yea and can now scarce be persuaded to believe those things to be done by you, which are reported unto us as most true and undoubted. For the report goeth, That you having Intelligence with the Turks and Tartars, have with them conspired, and namedly against our well beloved Son Sigismund, Prince of Transilvania, who with invincible Courage fighteth the Battles of the Lord; and left he should be able to abate the force and attempts of the most proud Enemy (which by the singular mercy of God he hath hitherto against his own power performed) but rather be enforced much to fear his own Estate, a new Vayvod and Prince, as it were by a triumphant Authority, and compa, to be placed in Moldavia, and him by the Turks, You, and the Tartars together, to be made Governour of that Country. Which unto us seemeth so new and so strange, and contrary to the good Opinion we had always conceived of you, yea and so unbecoming your Zeal and Wisdom, that for grief and admiration I had almost cried out with the Prophet, Thou Heaven: be amazed at this, and thy Gates thereof be you exceedingly heavy. For what could be suspected or imagined farther from the Expectation of us and all good men, or more incredible, than that Sigismund, the most religious King of Polonia and Sweden, who had always professed himself a most earnest Defender of the Catholic Religion, who was ready, even with his own Blood to redeem the Victory of the Christians, and Glory of the Cross, against the most wicked Enemies of the same, to be upon the sudden become so unlike unto himself; and (so much as it might seem) to off the hope and happy felicity of that religious War, and to do harm to a Christian and Catholic Prince, not to refuse to join in league and friendship, even with the most barbarous Nations and the Tartars, the perpetual enemies of himself, and of the Kingdom of Polonia. In which Causes, our mind is tormented with such bitter grief, that we could not but by speedy Messengers write unto you concerning this matter, that hereby you might the sooner see the greatness of our grief; and we also without delay might signify unto you, what our fatherly Love towards you requesteth in so important a matter. For happily we will send one even of purpose to you concerning this cause, the care whereof grieves us more than can well be expressed. Wherefore, most dearly beloved Son, we exhort you, and in the most effectual manner we can, advise you, and beseech you in the Lord, more attentively to consider what great displeasure both of God and Man, this your Adition and Resolution may incur, what a stain it may bring unto your Crown and Dignity. For believe us, that are to you instead of a Father in Christ, who love you not feignedly, but faithfully, and indeed as we who wish for your glory in this World, and your eternal Felicity in the World to come: believe us (I say) this doth much blemish your Fame with all Christian Kings and Princes; all men take it in evil part, and detest it as a thing monstrous, that it should by your means be wrought, that the Christian Affairs should not prosper, that an heretic Prince, who should not himself for Christ and his Country, should not have prosperous success in this religious and necessary War against the Infidels, Turks, and Tartars, no less yours, or peradventure also more yours, and other Christian Princes Enemies, than his. But what do we say? You to hinder the proceedings of the Transilvanian Prince: this were happily but a small matter; nay verily, by this means not only a Christian and Catholic Prince, and valiant Champion of the Christian Faith (a Vertue both admirable and amiable in the very Enemy) but your own Brother-in-law, bound unto you with many bonds of Affinity, whose Children shall be as it were your Children Brethren, and by this means brought into great danger, exposed unto the fury of the most merciless Turks. What do you then most dearly beloved Son? Beware that all men, both now living, and hereafter to come, condemn you not of the greatest Inhumanity; but beware yet more, that you seem not ingrateful, not only to your own high Kinsman, but to God himself, who hath bountifully blessed you with two great Kingdoms, and so many good things; and that you provoke not him to Wrath against your self, that rejecteth and confoundeth all evil and wicked Devices; and that this mischief that you have brought upon your Brother, by the just judgment of God redound not to the greatest destruction of you and your Kingdom, which he in mercy forbid. Do you think, that the Transilvanian being overcome, you shall in safety live from the treachery of the Turks? Do you not know him to be a faithless man, which dealreth all things by his own profit, which keepeth faith with none but as (standeth with his own Commodity, who with an unsatiable desire gapeth after every Kingdom, may thrive after the Destruction of all Christendom? Think also my Son, what wrong you shall do unto the Emperor your Cousin, out of whose Imperial Blood you have begotten Sons and Heirs, and by the Grace of God shall more; but also our Dignity, and the Dignity of this Apostolical Seat, (which you have always so devoutly honoured) is thereby hurt, and your most dear Mother (which we know you of all other least would) the Roman Church is offended, which for the maintenance of this sacred War is at great and wonderful Charges; and our Forces, which by you ought to have been renewed and encreased, being in so unfit a time by these Sins in Moldavia delivered and diminished, and the Enemies on the contrary part encreased and strengthened, into what danger and distress may both our Army of the Church and the Emperor's fall! And withal, how greatly will the manner and managing of this whole War be thereby confounded, there is no man that seeth not. Yea and this moreover, which no little concerneth the Dignity of us and this Holy See, we have undertaken and certainly promised to our most dearly beloved Sons Rodolph and Sigismund, That your Royal Majesty should not in any thing hinder or hurt their Affairs: neither did we heretofore assure them upon a light occasion, but, moved with great reason, not only for that we deservingly ought to do to promise of you in of just a cause, but also for that it was to us into us plainly and expressly written by the Reverend Father the Bishop of S. Severus, our Apostolical Nuncio to you, whom we know to be both unto us faithful, and to you dutiful: neither can we by any means doubt thereof, because he hath writ unto us concerning so weighty a matter, that he received it even from your own Mouth. Which things so standing, seeing you of your self see the manifold Absurdities of this Fact, on every side, not to speak of the heinousness thereof, we request you again, yea and oftentimes, forthwith to apply the necessary Remedies to these Hurts.

The Transilvanian Prince, your Brother-in-law, devoted to your self, and desirous of your favour, either protect with your defence, or at leastwise hurt him not; yea, hurt not the whole State of the Christian Commonwealth, and relieve not by any means the Quarrel of the Enemies of Christ. If you have any controversy with the Prince Sigismund, or desire of him any thing, refer it unto us; that is to say, unto your most loving Father: you know your Affairs to be of us favoured, and we hope, by the Power of God, that it may easily come to pass, that some convenient means may be found whereby Peace and Quietness may be confirmed between you, and good Unity grow betwixt you two Brethren our Sons, and so all the root of Bitterness and Displeasure to be utterly plucked out of your Minds. This have I writ unto you my Son, frankly, and from a sincere Heart, though truly much grieved, because you love you, and are much careful of your Honour and Good: Shew you again in Deed that you take it to, as written from your Father; and that you altogether prefer our fatherly and wholesome Exhortations before the sinister Persuasions of others. Farther concerning these matters, you shall understand by the same Bishop our Nuncio, now with you, to whom you may (as you have done) give credit in all things, as to our self.

These Letters dated from Rome the eighth day of November, were delivered to the King in December, with others to the Cardinal and Chancellor, whom the Pope sharply reproves, as the Authors and Contrivers of this evil Michief.

The Tartar Cham, before stirred up by the Turkish Emperor Mahomet for the Invasion of Moldavia, (as is already before declared) about this time sent his Ambassador also unto the Polish King, for the Confirmation of such Articles as he had before argued upon with the Chancellor: which, because they manifestly declare the ground and purpose of his intended Expedition into Moldavia, with the foul collusion of the Chancellor with the Turks and Tartars against the Transilvanian Prince, I thought it not amiss, or from our purpose (for the more manifestation of that which is already said) here to let them down, as they are translated out of the Tartar Language.

Cham Kazikery unto the King of Polonia and Sweden, our Brother, one of the great Lords among the Christians, humbly boweth his Head. First, he signifies unto you, that Aaron Palatine of Moldavia was a forsaken Traitor, who, having gathered a Power of the Valchians, and joining unto him the Polishian Cossacks, spoiled the Territories of the great Sultan. But afterward, Dissention arising among them, the Hungarian Cossacks living in Valachia sent Aaron in bonds unto the King of Vienna: after him followed another Traitor called Rozwan, who also having ratified certain Companies of Soldiers, began in like manner to farrage the Countreys of the Turkish Emperor thereabout; which, as soon as he had knowledge of, he writ unto me his Brother, That I should, with all possible speed, go into Valachia, to chastise these Rebels, to burn their Houses and Towns; and having with the edge of the Sword slain their men, to carry away with me their Wives and Children into Captivity. Having this in Charge, I, the great Cham of the great Territory of the great Lord Karykery, with my Brother Letikery Galga, and other my Brethren and Counsellors, warlike and valiant Captains and Murzas, mounting my Horse, came with mine Army into Valachia unto the River Prut, where it meeteth in another River called Coccoza: here we chanced upon a faithful Servant of yours, our Brother the Chancellor, who was also come a little before us into Valachia, with whom, after some light contention, when we began to be more tractable, he declared unto us, that he was of purpose come into Valachia to place there a new Vayvod, which (as he said) of ancient Right belonged unto the Polonians, without any wrong or prejudice therein to be done to the Countreys, and further, that he desired was, that one Jeremias, whom he had appointed Vayvod, might have the Command of that Province; and that the ancient Amity, such as was in the time of Sultan Solymán and Cham Dawleth, might be faithfully kept. Which when I had for my part fully resolved to do, and he likewise had caused the same to be done by such of his as he therefore sent unto me, we decreed together, that the Cossacks on the farther side of Nijestret (disordered and rebellious men) should be utterly rooted out, that they should not hereafter do any harm in the Territories of the great Sultan, and that the Presents usually sent unto us of long, even since the time of Sultan Solymán, should no more be detraited; and that we have hereafter done in any part of our Dominions. And therefore, when the Chancellor had promised unto us, that he would take order that these Cossacks should be utterly destroyed, I also consented, that according to the Pleasure of the Royal Majesty of your Majesty, Hieremias should hold the Vayvodship of Valachia; which I forthwith by Letters signified unto the Turkish Emperor. Now if it be so, that your Majesty shall give your Consent unto those things which we have here agreed upon with your Chancellor, you shall then for ever find brotherly Friendship with me, my Brother, and all other our Captains and Murzas; but if you shall not destroy these Cossacks, you shall not then perform the Oath and Covenants made. Those things we have commanded to be declared unto you by our Ambassador, our Brother Gianach Metagra, whom we request your Majesty courteously to entertain, and by him to send the Presents unto us; for we will not now this Year send any other. Given at the River Prut in the Year of Mahomet 1024.

After the Tartar Ambassador had delivered those Letters unto the King, with a Speech in effect to the same purpose, he in the Name of the Cham gave unto him an Horse and an Arrow for a Present: and afterward being brought to a Lodging appointed for him, was commanded and there to expect his Answer. At length his Dispatch was given him in Letters sealed up, which he took much against his Will, requesting the King to send an Ambassador unto the Cham; and farther, by word of mouth to tell him what to answer unto his Lord. But other Answer could he get none than was already delivered him in writing, and so, rewarded with a Gown furred with Sables, was dismissed without the Present requested by the Cham, or any Ambassador to accompany him.

Thus the Transilvanian Prince, on the one side mightily impugned by the Turk, and on the other, by the setting on of the Turk, ready to have been no less endangered by the Invasion of the Tartars, received greater harm from the Polonians being Christians, than from both those great Mahometan Princes; the Polonian in some sort performing for the Turk what he had plotted to have been done by the Tartar; and so by the taking away of Moldavia from the Prince, not only weakened his strength, but also opened a way for the barbarous Enemies into his Country. Howbeit, much it is that the Polonians alledge for the excuse of themselves, and the defence of that which was by the great Chancellor then done in Moldavia; which, for that it cannot be better told by the great Chancellor himself, let us hear how he by his Letters answereth the matter, even unto Clement the Pope himself.

MOST holy and blessed Father in Christ, and your most blessed Feet, and my most humble Commendations, I have by your Holiness's Letters, directed both unto the Kings Majesty and my self, understood, as well his Royal Majesty, and my most gracious Lord and Master, as also my self as his Servant, to be both accused unto your Holiness; as if by those things by us done in Moldavia, the Endeavours of the Christians had been hindered, and the Power of the Enemy confirmed. Whereto I am not with many Words to purge my self unto your Holiness, forasmuch as I assure my self your Holiness to have already fully understood both what the things were that were done in Moldavia, and how they were done; partly by the Kings Majesties Letters, and partly by his principal Secretary, for that cause especially sent unto your Holiness. Yet doubt I not to request this one thing of your Holiness, that if it hath known me for a man, I will not lay of any Capacity or Wit, but even of the least Experience in the World, or of any Religion at all; so to persuade it self of me, nothing to have been done, especially in this matter, either rashly, or to the hindrance of the Christian Commonwealth. I will not now repeat what mine Opinion was concerning the League and Confederation to be made with the rest of the Christian Princes, for the combining of their Forces against the common Enemy, especially his Sacred Majesties; as also what mine own Labour and Endeavour was in the last assembly of the States in the high Court of Parliament. Which thing, after it was even by them whom it most concerned, either delayed or neglected, or utterly cast aside, and yet his Majesty had still a great desire to do the Christian Commonwealth some good, I also to the uttermost of my Power laboured to that end; that by the common desire of the Kingdom, an Expedition might be made into Tartary, not so much in revenge of the Injuries done by that Enemy in these late years past, as so in the mean time to turn him from the Necks of the Christians, as that he should not join his Forces with the Turk; or if it pleased God to bless those our Endeavours utterly in length to root out that so great a Michief. But how it came to pass that this Expedition, so much by the King desired (yet scarcely begun or taken in hand) took not effect; it is not needful for me to declare, for that I suppose your Holiness hath by others, especially your Nuncio, understood the same. In the mean time, by others also my Messengers News was brought, That Sinan Basha with a great Army was already come over Danubius; and I, by Letters from the Vayvod of the farther Valachia was advertised, how that he, not able to encounter him, had forsaken that Province, which at the first Impression taken and almost utterly swayed by Sinan, he was now come fast upon the Transilvania, and in Moldavia the Tartar was still expected, inasmuch that Rozwan (who having taken Prisoner Aaron the Palatine, whom he cured in his House, and so himself invaded the Palatine) began now also to quake for fear, and to crave help of me, or rather to seek how he might fly away, (as not long after he did) neither having any great strength about him, or expecting any greater from the People of that Countrey, for why, that Province was brought to low by the Miserie of the former years, but especially by such as had evil governed the same, that at such time as I entered into Moldavia, I assure your Holiness there were not in it of Householders, above, yea, 15000, and those also for the most part poor Country People that were left, in whom there could neither be any great help, neither if they had been able to have done any thing, durst Rozwan have trusted himself with them upon whom he had with all kind of Cruelty tyrannized. Chobim, a Cattle in the very Confinnes of this Kingdom, was kept with no greater Garrison than 200 Hungarians, not preserving the Confinnes neither of sufficient strength to hold the place, nor to withstand the Enemy, they also by and by followed after Rozwan. All the rest of the Province was not only unarmed, but altogether poor and naked, without any certain Government, without Count, without Strength, and without any Defence at all; two Castles only excepted; which, standing upon the Confinnes of Polonia, might have served better for the Enemy out of them to have infected us, than for the defence of Moldavia against them; so that had the Enemy once let foot into that Province, neither could it withstand a great Power have been recovered, neither being recovered, could easily have been defended against to pursue an Enemy; and that which worse was, was not it left alone, to have been consumed with that Fire, but like enough to have carried away with it Podolia also bordering upon it, with a great part of Russia. Wherefore, in this state of things, when as both that Province was in greatest danger to have been lost, and so many Enemies hovered, not more over the Heads of all Christians than over this Kingdom, what was of us to be done? I know to whom I speak these things, even unto him, not only whole divine Wisdom, but singular Love also towards my native Country is to me most known. Verily I entered into Moldavia with no great Army, yet such an one as haply (as in like case it often chanceth) Fame had made amongst the Enemies a very great one; so that Sinan, fearing if he should thrust himself with his Army into the Strights whereby he was to break into Transilvania, and so shut in by our Army, stayed his Journey; and the Tartar, who earnestly he was called upon by Sinan, (by reason of the Fame of this our Army) resolved to make himself so much the stronger. So that whilst he assembled the Nogaians Tartars and others farther off, and so from all parts raised the greatest Power he could, the matter was delayed almost unto the end of November, at which time he, with a most huge Army, accompanied with Sendiak Zelivense, and a great power of the Turks raised out of their Provinces thereby, came directly upon me in the Fields of Corone. Sendiak, the Tartar Cham's Sifters Son, now called himself the Basha of Moldavia, as did the Tartars eldest Son name himself Prince of another part of that Province also; for so that Country was to have been divided betwixt them, that that part which was next unto the Tartars Dominions should be allotted unto the Tartars, and the other part confining upon this Kingdom, to be governed by Sondrak, as Baſſa thereof, and so to make it the seat of a perpetual War, from whence Podolia, Rusſia, and the lesser Polonia, might be with continual Incurſions waſted even to this time: concerning which the Tartars now ſuffered their Letters, wherein they publiſhed the Power and Authority given them from the grand Signior, exhorting the People of that Country to receive the ſame. A whole day we fought with this multitude, our men always, by the goodness of God, having not only the upper hand, but without any notable loſe also, yet not without great slaughter of theirs: and would to God I had had such strength, as that not only the conditions of Peace, but even the Enemies themselves might have been in my power. But when we were oftentimes come to parole (they still requiring the ſame) and ſo at length unto Conditions of Peace, if ſuch were given them, as whereby this only Kingdom had without the wrong of any other been delivered from to great and sudden a danger, what reasonable man could find fault therewith, if we should have preferred the health and welfare of our Country (whereunto all good men owe all they have) before other mens Profits. But now that we are done, who have reported it was no less provided for the good of the neighbourhood Christians, yea and happily not the least for theirs, who for the ſame ſlander this Kingdom unto your Holiness: the fury of Sinan Baſſa was by this means repressed, who whilst he feared to be shut up in the Straits by our Army now come into Moldavia, and expected the Tartars to come, almost all the rest of the Summer idly, and without any thing doing. The Tartar himself was not only turned from the Bowels of Chriſtendom, whereunto he had purpoſed (as the year before) to have entered, we having with our own Breasts received his force and fury; but being brought unto Conditions, was expressly enjoyed in a most thorough pressed time, and without any more harm doing to return again into his Country by the ſelf ſame way he came, and by no other: whereby it is come to paſs, that until this day Chriſtendom hath not this year yet ſeſt the Tartars Weapons. But unto Transilvania and Hungary, what a ſpace and power was given for them to gather their Arms, and Forces together, and out of the ſame places to oppose them againſt the Enemy, whence our Army kept them ſafe at their Backs, and eſcaped not only Moldavia, but Valachia and Transilvania also of that care? Whereas if this cauſe of delay had not been objected unto the Turks first, and after unto the Tartars, not to ſay any thing of the Turks, the Tartars at the very ſelf ſame time that the Transilvanian Army was gone into Valachia againſt Sinan, might have broken into Transilvania before it could have returned home, or eſſe marching directly towards that Army, might have met with it out of Transilvania. As for Moldavia, which together with the Moldavia of the Chriſtian name, yet left in it, had utterly perished, it was most manifestly preferred by the coming of our Army. Which what end it would have had, if the Enemy might at his Pleasure have ragged as he did in the farther Valachia, thoſe most bitter remembrances in it yet at this day ſmoking, do well declare, out of which it is well known more thousands of Chriſtian Captives to have been carried away into most woful Captivity, than almost out of any other Province in all the time of theſe miſerable Wars. Which also it be thus, yet boast we not thereof, neither ſend

we any triumphant Letters unto your Holiness, nor brag we of your good Service done for the Chriſtian Commonweal; contenting our ſelves with the Conſcience of the thing it ſelf. In the mean time we are accuſed unto your Holiness; but for what cauſe? If any man complain for the taking of Moldavia, I will not ſay it was by them before willingly ſorſaken, whilst I was yet in the Frontiers thereof; but that this Kingdom hath a most ancient Right unto it, and is Right; that when our Kings being buſied in their Wars againſt the Muscovites, the Cruſian Tenney Brethren, or others; ſome others alſo troubling the ſake thereof, it for a time became a Prey unto the Turkish Tyrants; yet in all the Leagues made or renewed betwixt this Kingdom and them, was ſill excepted. That all ſuch things as the Palatine of Moldavia was of duty to perform unto the King, ſhould by him ſill be performed. Which Kings of Polonia, and namely Augustus himſelf, the laſt of the Jagellonian Race, appointed divers of thoſe Palatines themſelves. Which alſo they be things most manifest, yet having more regard unto the welfare of that Province, as a Chriſtian Country, than of our Right, we reſtored the ſame into the ſame ſlate wherein it hath been for many Years before theſe Wars. Wherefore, if any man think any thing done whereby the Enemies of the Croſs of Chriſt might be calſed or ſtrengthened, or the Defenders of the Faith hindered, it is ſo far from any ſuch thing to be done, that rather (as before declared) the Enemies force is reſtrained and averted, and greater means given unto the Chriſtians aſſent to impugn them, the Enemy being at their Backs by us ſhut from them. But I fear that they have not fully informed your Holiness, how theſe things were done, who have reported unto your ſaid Holiness not only the Name of the Turks to have been proclaimed together with the Polonians in Moldavia, but alſo the Name of the Tartars, the proper Enemies of the Polonians, and by the Power and Decrees of them three, as it were conſederate together, things to have been ordered in Moldavia. Which their Complaint if it tend to that end, as if a conſederation were made with them, I frankly confeſs certain Conditions to have been given them, but ſuch as whereby is provided not only for the quiet and ſecurity of this Kingdom, but no leſs alſo for the whole Chriſtian Commonweal, as is before declared. All which things for all that, alſo they ſay, that in the good of this Kingdom, and all Chriſtendom in general, yet were they done, that they were all by me referred unto the King's Maſteſty and the States of the Kingdom; ſo that at this preſent the Kingdom is at free liberty either to join in Conſederation with the reſt of the Chriſtian Princes; or if that cannot upon certain and indifferent conditions be agreed upon, yet with no mans injury or hurt to ratify this, joyned with the health and good of a great part of the Chriſtian Commonweal: only God grant that the Chriſtian Princes may leſſe ſeriously think both of this Chriſtian Conſederation againſt the common Enemy, and ſtrive alſo all together againſt the enemy whoſe ſeveral and ſundry conditions be with Miſrepports and Slanders one againſt another. They are not to aſſail the enemies ſelf, but his throat: neither is the ſeat of the war to be placed in the borders of Polonia, where it concerneth themſelves much to have all things rather peaceable beſide them; but let the War be undertaken with no leſs change & preparation, than if the enemy's ſeat were to be aſſailed; which ſtanding in an open and plain Country, ſhall always, without much ado, be his that being ſtrongeſt can take it. This have I written at large, as my purpoſe was, alſo which I moſt humbly beſeech your Holiness, with your divine Wisdom to conſider of, and with your wonted Clemency to accept the ſame. And ſo proſtrate at your Holiness's Feet, I moſt humbly commend me to your Clemency. From Zamoſchie the tenth of January, 1596.

Thus much the great Chancellor, in defence of himſelf, and of that he had done in Moldavia; which, howsoever it contented the Pope, well I wot it nothing pleaſed the Emperour, and much leſs the Transilvanian Prince, now not a little weakened by the taking away of the Country of Moldavia from him.

To end this troubleſome year wiſhal, many ſharp and bloody Skirmiſhes daily paſſed in divers Places of thoſe frontier Countries, the Turks almost in every Place ſill going to the worſe. In the beginning of November, Leucowus, Governour of Carpolia, the ſecond time ſorſpelled Whites in the Frontiers of Croatia, where theſe Wars firſt begun, but being not able to take the Caſtle, contented himſelf as before with the ſpoil of the City, and afterward letting it on fire, departed. Maximilian alſo attempted Zalme, and the Chriſtians in Garrison at Scripſonius and Hindenburg, now become near Neighbours unto the Turks at Buda, did with continual Inrodes not a little moleſt them both all the latter end of this year, and the beginning of the next. And the Turks in Braila, in Valachia, upon the ſide of Danubius, fearing after the flight of Sinan to be beſieged by the Vayvod, ſorſook the City, and in ſuch haſte paſſed the River, that in that tumultuous paſſage theſe hundreds of them perished. Sinan Baſſa, by the Transilvanian Prince, driven out of Valachia, was not long after ſent for to Conſtantinople; but the crafty old Fox, not ignorant of the fierce Nature of the great Sultan, and warned by the late miſery of Feraz, found occasions to delay the time to long, until that he was ſent for again, after that the third time alſo. In the mean while, he had ſo wrought by his mighty Friends in Court, and by rich Rewards, mightier than they, that at his coming to the Court he was there honourably received, as the chiefſt of the Baſſaes, and being afterwards offered to be diſcharged of the Wars, as men of above fourſcore years old; he reſuſed to be ſo ſaying, That he was born and brought up amongst Soldiers and martial men, and ſo wiſhed among them to dye, as not long after he did; dying as was thought of conceit of the evil ſuccesſes he had in his Wars againſt the Transilvanian.

His Death.

Mahomet, the Turkish Emperour, exceedingly grieved with the loſs of ſo many his Cities and ſtrong Places this year loſt, as namely Scripſonius, Vicegrade, Silſe, Petrinia, Jenna, Penna, Tergovſka, Buchareſta, Zorza, and many others of leſs Name; and both by Letters and Meſſengers undaunting daily of the slaughter of his People, and waſting of his Frontiers, commanded great Preparation to be made againſt the new Spring, giving it out, that he would then in Perſon himſelf, come down into Hungary with ſuch a Power as never had any his Predeceſſors the Othoman Kings and Emperors, and there take moſt ſharp revenge of all his former Wrongs. Nevertheless theſe his ſo haſty deſigns were by the Plague and Famine (which then both ragged extremely in moſt parts of his Empire) and by other great occurrents of the ſame time, ſo cracked, that by that time the Spring came, he ſcarcely well knew which way to turn himſelf firſt. For beſide theſe Troubles of the Weſt, of themſelves enough to have filled his hands, the Germans in the Boſphorus, a warlike People, moved with the good Succesſs of the Chriſtians in Valachia and Hungary, had taken up Arms againſt him, and the old Perſian King, but a little before dead, had left that great Kingdom to his Son, a man of greater Spirit than was like to endure the many Injuries before done unto his Father by the Turks, to the great diſhonour of that Kingdom, and prejudice of himſelf. Of which things the Baſſa of Tauris gave him ample Intelligence, wiſhing him beſtides to provide for ſuch Storms; which, joyned to the reſt, filled his Head with many troubled Thoughts, whereunto we leave him until the next Spring.

The Transilvanian Prince, careful of his Eſtate, and not a little troubled with the differing of Moldavia, thought it not unfit for his Affairs, now after the flight of Sinan, and diſcomſure of the Turks, to go in Perſon himſelf unto the Emperour, and to declare unto him the wrong done him by the Polonian; and further to conſult with him concerning the managing of the Wars againſt the common Enemy. So having put all things in readineſs for his Journey, he ſet forward in January, 1596, and by the way of Caſſovia, the fourth of February, arrived at Prague in Bohemia, where he was by the Emperours appointment moſt honourably entertained. But immediately after his coming thither he fell ſick of an Ague, which grievouſly vexed him by the ſpace of three Weeks. In the latter end of February, having ſomewhat recovered his Health, he went to the Church; where after his Devotions done, he was by the Dean of the Cathedral Church welcomed with a moſt eloquent Oration, ſetting forth his worthy Praiſes, and further animating him unto the like Exploits againſt the common Enemy of all Chriſtianity. Whereunto he forthwith answered in Latine ſo eloquently and ſo ſublimely in ſpeech, that all men marvelled that heard him; proſtrating in ſpeech, that he and his Subjects had not hitherto ſpared their Lives or Goods in defence of the common Cauſe; ſo would they not afterwards ſpare the ſame, but adventure all for the benefit of the Chriſtian Commonweal; well hoping, that the Emperour and the other Chriſtian Princes would not, as occasion ſhould require, be wanting unto him with their Forces, or the Clergy with their Prayers; which done, he doubted not (as he ſaid) by the Power of God, but to obtain more notable Victories than he had yet againſt the Turks, the Enemies of God.

Whilst he yet thus lay at the Emperours Court, it ſortuned that the People called Siculi, offended to have their Liberties, as ſome part intruſed in the late Aſſembly of the States holden in Transilvania in December laſt, riſe up now in Arms in divers Places, reſuſing to yield their former Obedience to the Prince. A matter like enough to have wrought him much trouble, and ſuppoſed not to have been done without the privy of the Cardinal his Uncle; but by the Wiſdom and Courage of ſuch as he had in his abſence put in truſt with the Government of his Country, divers of the Ringleaders of this Rebellion were apprehended, and in divers forts executed; and three hundred of their Complices, to the Terror of their Fellows, had their Noſes and Ears cut off. By which wholeſome Severity all thoſe Troubles were appeaſed, and the Country again quieted.

At the ſame time alſo the Transilvanians obtained of the Turks a notable Victory, with an exceeding rich booty. Mahomet the Turkish Sultan had about this time ſent a new Baſſa for the Government of Timolary, againſt the Cardinale coming the old Baſſa, before Governour, had in twenty five Wars gone truſted up a wonderful deal of Wealth, which he had there gotten in the time of his former Government, to have been, together with himſelf, with a ſtrong Convoy conducted to Belgrade. Of this his purpoſe the Hungarian Heidons, lying at Lippa and Jenna, having Intelligence, lay in wait for for him upon the way, and in his passing by let upon him; where in a sharp conflict they overthrew the Convoy, and slew the Batta, whole Head they sent for a Present to the Princes at Alba Julia, and took the Spoil of the Batta's Carriages, wherein was taken a wonderful Wealth; for in the midst of the Waggon's reported to have been found twenty thousand of Hungarian Ducats.

In this absence also of the Prince, 10000 of the Rafians revolting from the Turks, came and offered their Service unto the Princes; whereof, the by Letters, with great speed, certified the Prince her Husband; who thereupon halted to dischase of the Emperor, and having procured both from him and the Pope the Promise of some Aid to be afterwards sent him, took of him his leave; and being honourably accompanied, departed from Prague to Pienna, where he arrived the eleventh of March, fitting in a princely Chariot drawn with six most beautiful Horses, the gift of the Emperor. At his coming thither he was met by the Nobility of the Country, and by Abderamund the Pope's Nephew, who presented him with three goodly Horses for Service, richly furnished. Him the Prince took into his Chariot, and so accompanied, entered the City, where he was with all due Honour received and joyfully entertained, and so brought unto the Emperor's Palace, where, by the learned Students of that University, was for his pleasure held before him the notable History of Jephtha. Having stayed there three days, and purposing to have in his Return visited his Mother-in-law at Gries in Croatia; News was brought him, That the Turks and Tartars, by the letting on of Stephen Bathori, his Uncle, were about to break into Transylvania. Wherefore changing his purpose, he departed thence to Presburg, and so with all speed kept on his way towards Transylvania; where he, to the great joy and comfort of his Subjects in general, arrived in safety in the beginning of April.

In this while many hot Skirmishes passed betwixt the Christians and the Turks in the Frontiers of their Territories; and now the Plague and Famine which had of long raged in Constantinople and other places of the Turks Dominions, began to abate. Of which to great Calamities as had devoured many thousands of his People, the Turkish Emperor finding himself somewhat eased, forthwith caused the continuation of the War against the Emperor, and the Transylvanian Prince, to be three days together proclaimed in Constantinople, and a great Army to be raised to be sent into Transylvania and Hungary; giving it out, that he would, with that to pursue an Army, in Person himself come into Hungary. At which time it was also reported, That he had already sent his Tents and other necessary Provision before to Hadrangul; for now was nothing more odious in the Turks Court than the Name of the Transylvanian Prince.

Of all these things was not the Emperor ignorant, as fully thereof certified both by Letters and Epials, as also by the uniform Confession of such Turks as were daily taken Prisoners. For which cause, he also, with as much speed and care as he could, provided for the raising of his Army, as he had the Year before; as also for the levying of Money, and provision of all things necessary, that the Enemy at his coming might not find him unprovided. Neither spared he to pray Aid of the other Christian Princes his Neighbours, especially of the Polonian, whom he by divers times sought after to have drawn him into the Confederation with the other Christian Princes against the Turk. To which purpose he now also sent him the Bishop of Presburg, and the Lord Poppelen, his Ambassadors; as did the Pope also send him the Cardinal Cajetane his Legate, and the Princes Electors also their Ambassadors: unto whom the Polonian gave good hearing and good words, but would not by any means be persuaded to break his League with the Turk, or to afford any Aid unto the Christians; altho the Cardinal, with many pregnant Reasons, shewed him what small assistance there was in the Turk's Leagues, and how dangerous it might be to his State, if the Turk, making Peace with the Emperor, should turn his force upon him, which it was like enough he would, as knowing no man longer for Friend than stood with his Front; beside the immortal Blessing of Honour, by disavowing himself from the Union of the Christian Princes, to hold Friendship with the Turks and Infidels. But all this and much more to no purpose, so resolutely was the Polonian set down for the keeping of the Turks Favour. So that of all the Christian Princes to near unto the devouring Enemy, none stood the Christian Commonweal in less head than he. Which for all that, most men imputed not so much unto the King, as to others about him, especially to Zamolsky the great Chancellor, by whom that State was most swayed, who was not only supposed, but openly reported to have secret Intelligence both with the Turk and the Tartars.

All this while the Lord Palfi, Governour of Strigonia, ceased not with continual Inroads to vex the Turks, even to the Gates of Buda, as did also the other Christian Captains in other places of the Turks Frontiers in Hungary. Near unto Buda were two great Country Villages, for most part inhabited by Christians, who having given the Turks Obedience unto the Turk, lived a miserable life for the payment of an exorbitant Tribute yearly. These poor Christians, weary of the Turkish Thraldom, and the continual spoil of their Labours by them of Strigonia; by secret Messengers requested the Lord Palfi, of Mercy, to carry them with their Goods and Cattel away into some other Christian Territory, that to they might yet live amongst Christians, as he had but a little before done for them of old Buda. Unto which their reasonable Request, the Christian Governour charitably hearkened; willing them against a certain appointed time to put themselves, with all their things in readiness. There was of these Christians about 755 Families, who with their Wives and Children, and such trash as they had pack'd up into eighty Waggon's, drawn with fourteen or fifteen Oxen a-piece, at the appointed time, about mid-night, committed themselves, with all that they had, unto the conduct of them of Strigonia, sent out of purpose for them; by whom they were in safety brought to Strigonia. Amongst them were many rich men, who brought with them good store of Coin, with an exceeding great number of Cattel. Unto these new-come Guelts Palfi assigned certain Fields betwixt Strigonia and Visaria, on the North-side of Danubius; where they so commodiously lived as was possible in so troubled an Estate of a Country.

Shortly after, 600 Garrison Souldiers of Lippa, seeking after Booty, and adventuring too far into the Enemies Territory, were discovered by the Turks Scouts, and so beset by the Turks and Tartars billeted in the Country about Temeswar, that there was no way left for them to escape. Which they perceived, resolved among themselves (as became valiant men) to fight it out even unto the last man; and with no less Resolution performed what they had before determin'd, for being on every side beset, and hardly charged by their Enemies, they as men before resolved to die, also came out to twenty, fought most desperately, killing for nothing else but to sell their Lives as dear as they could unto their Enemies; and so fighting were all slain, except except some few which by great fortune escaped, leaving unto the Enemy a right bloody Victory. Yet by this loss of so great a Party was the Garrison of Lippa greatly weakened, which the Enemy knew right well, and thereupon began forthwith to prepare to besiege the Town. Which Bardula the Governour (a most valiant man) wisely foreseeing, sent in Post unto the Transylvanian Prince, to request him with all speed to send him four or five thousand good Souldiers, with which Power he doubted not, by the Help of God, to be able to defend the Town against all the Forces the Enemy was able to send against it. Unto whom the Prince without delay sent 8000, who all in safety, in good time arrived at Lippa; for shortly after their arrival, 40000 of the Turks and Tartars came and laid down before the Town, including it on every side, and so lay for certain days without any thing doing worth the speaking of; they of the Town in the mean time did them all the harm they could with their great shot, which they sent amongst them not sparingly; but they had not so long lain, but that News was brought into the Camp, That the Transylvanian Prince was with a great Power coming thither to relieve the Town; whereupon they presently rose, and retired to the place where they had before encamped, about two miles from Lippa; where certainly understanding that the Prince neither was, neither could in short time be in such readines as was before reported, they forthwith returned, and more faithfully besieged the Town than before. They had now brought with them seventeen pieces of battery, eight Wardons laden with Gunpowder, and forty six others laden with scaling Ladders, and other warlike Provision; thus appointed they began to batter the Town, and afterwards gave thereunto divers desperate assaults; which the Christians valiantly received, and fill with great slaughter requested their Enemies. For that strong Town was with Towers and Bulwarks flanking one another, so fortified, that out of them the Christians with their murthering pieces made great spoil of their Enemies, and still enforced them with lots to retire, no bullet almost flying in vain. In the heat of one of these assaults the Governour caused one of the Gates of the Town to be set open, having before within the Town placed sixteen great pieces at the very entrance of the same gate, charged with all kind of murthering Shot. Unto which Gate, as of mere Desperation set open by the Defendants, the Turks and Tartars desirous of revenge, came thronging as thick as might be, thinking to have thereby cured; when suddenly, and as it were in the turning of an hand, they were with the afore said murthering pieces cut down as with a Sitch, and so again, and the third and fourth time, before they could clear themselves of the danger thereof, their Heads, Arms, and Legs, and other rent Limbs, flying in the Air most terrible to behold. Nevertheless the Siege was by them continued, and the often assaults valiantly maintained, as if they had thereupon purposed to have engaged all their Lives. But this obstinate a Resolution was by an unexpected accident, when they least thought, converted into such a desperate fate and accomplishment, that they upon the sudden (no man form'd for it) forsook their Trenches wherein they lay encamped; and leaving behind them their Tents, their great Ordnance, and whatsoever else they had, they besook themselves to a most disorderly flight. The Transylvanian, who by chance were even then coming thither, pursuing them, slew divers of them, and took some others of them Prisoners. At this Siege the Batta of Temeswar himself was mortally wounded, and Hamat, Sanzack of Gula, with divers others of good place slain, and 4000 of the common Souldiers. The cause of the Turks so great and sudden fear was this; Whilst the Batta of Temeswar lay at the Siege of Lippa, as is aforesaid, that they were left in the City fearing no harm, lived in great Security, in the mean time the Governour of Lugas sent out six thousand Souldiers towards Temeswar, now in the absence of the Batta to seek after Booty; who coming to Temeswar with great speed, rifled the Suburbs of the City, slew all the Turks they could light upon, and let at Liberty a thousand captives; and so having trusted up their Booty, set on fire all the Suburbs, and departed. Which fire grew so great and so terrible, that it was plainly seen into the Camp at Lippa, making a show as if the whole City had been on a light fire: which so daunted the Hearts of the Turks at the Siege, that they presently fled (as is before said) leaving all that they had behind them.

The Transylvanian all this while busied in raising of his Army, and providing of things necessary for the maintenance of his Wars, was come into the Confines of Hungary, towards Temeswar, even as the Turks fled from Lippa. At which time certain Hungarian Heids that served him, getting over Danubius, not far from Nicopolis, took Plenia, a little Town of the Turks, which they ransacked and burnt, and having fled the Country thereabout above three thousand of the Turks, returned with a rich Prey unto the Prince.

Not long before, the Christians had surprised Cliffa, a strong frontier Town of the Turks in Dalmatia, not far from Spalato; which Town the Turks of Byssa sought now again to recover, and thereunto layd hard siege. For the relief whereof, Leucowitz, Governour of Stiria, and the other Provinces thereabouts belonging to the House of Austria, and the Governour of Zeng, with a Fleet of two and forty Ships, wherein they had embarked 4000 Souldiers well appointed with all things necessary, set forward toward Cliffa; and by the way lighting upon a Gallery of the Venetians, bound with certain warlike Provision towards the Turk Camp, took her as good Prize, and rifled her. This Fleet with a fair Wind arrived at Siret, near unto Tran, where the Governour landing his men, marched that Night part of his way toward Cliffa, and all the next day lay close. The Night following they set forward again, and having marched fifteen miles, came unto the Enemies Camp before day; where, setting upon the Turks in their Trenches, fearing no such Peril, they brought such a general fear upon the Turks whole Camp, that the Turks, as men amazed, fled some one way, some another, every man (as in such sudden fear it commonly happeneth) making shift for himself, leaving whatsoever they had in their Trenches behind them. The Christians, contented so to have put their Enemies to flight, fell presently to the spoil, as more desirous thereof, than by the hasty pursuit of their Enemies to put themselves in possession of an assured Victory. Which the Turks quickly perceiving, and from the Hills with the dawning of the day discovering the small number of the Christians, and how they were disordered, they gathered themselves again together, and coming down, included on every side the disordered Christians (greedily hunting after the spoil) and slew them downright. Leucowitz himself, with the Governour of Zeng, and some others, got into Cliffa, where having stayed two days, and doubting to be able to keep the Town, they secretly by Night issued out with 600 men, in hope to have recovered their Fleet; but the Turks suspecting such a matter, had so beset the Passages, that all that Company, Leucowitz had much ado himself, with three others to escape. The Enemy now again possessed of his 1596 Trenches, layd straighter siege to the Town than before; which they of the Garrison perceiving, and now out of hope of relief, agreed with the Baffa, that they might with Bag and Baggage depart, and so yielded up the Town. Thus Lissa, one of the strongest Towns of Dalmatia, through the greedy covetousness of the disordered Soldiers, fell again into the hands of the Turks.

Sumbe-
Lord Palfi.

About the same time, Palfi, Governour of Strigoniun, understanding of the meeting together of certain notable Adventurers of the Turks at Sumbecken, a Cattle almost in the midst way between Strigoniun and Buda, raised the greatest strength he could, and so with certain pieces of Artillery, and other things necessary for an assault, set forward from Strigoniun the two and twentieth of May, before the rising of the Sun, and about three a Clock in the Afternoon came to the aforesaid Cattle, whereunto he presently gave a most terrible assault, which he never gave over until he had taken it; for after he had by the space of three hours together with great danger maintained a most desperate assault, at length he with much difficulty prevailed, and put to the Sword all the Turks he found therein, Man, Woman, and Child; and with the rest, fifty Tartars, but that day came thither.

This Cattle was of great Beauty, and most pleasantly situated, whereunto the Baffa of Buda oftentimes for his Pleasure repaired; for which cause Palfi was very desirous to have taken it without spoiling; but the Fire he had therein already raised, so prevailed, that it burnt down all the goodly Buildings thereof, with great store of Victuals and other Provision, nothing remaining but what the Christians had saved for themselves.

The Transilvanian Prince, having raised a great Army for the relief of Lissa, being by great chance a little before his coming relieved, came and laid siege to the City of Temesvar; where he had no long lain, but that the Turks and Tartars, fearing to lose that so famous a City, assembled together from all places thereabouts, to the number of 40000, and so came to raise the Siege. Of whose coming the Prince hearing, rite with his Army, and went to meet them, and had with him a great and terrible Batle, the Victory for a great while hanging very doubtful, yet seeming to incline rather to the Turks and Tartars, than to the Christians: but at length the Turks, disordered with the great Artillery, and the Transilvanians charging them after began to give ground, and so at last to leave themselves to plain flight. In this Batle were slain of the Turks and Tartars 5000, and of the Christians 1500. It was for a time reported, That the Prince himself was in this Batle slain; which was not so, being referred to the further Plague of the Turks, and comfort of his afflicted Country. After this Victory he returned again to the Siege, which he more fraily continued than before, leaving nothing unattempted that he could possibly devise for the winning of the City. Where, whilst he yet thus lay battering the City both night and day, News was brought him, That Giasfer Baffa and the Tartars were coming with a great Army to the Relief of the Besieged. Whereupon, he considering his own strength, and the power of his Enemies, and that the Aid promised him both by the Emperor and out of Hungary was not yet ready, with great grief of mind raised his Siege, and retired with his Army to Lissa, there expecting new Supplies as well of his own as from his Friends. Whilst he yet there lay, he was certainly advertised, That the Baffa of Natolia (the tort-runner of the great Sultan Mahomet) was come to Belgrade with fifteen thousand Huns and four thousand Janisaries, to join with the Baffa of Buda for the relieving of Temesvar; whose Forces joynted together were in number about threecore thousand; and that Mahomet himself (of whose coming had been rife report all this year) was now coming after with a far greater Power. Whereupon he departed from Lissa, leaving therein a strong Garrison, and then returning to Alba-Julia, called there an Assembly of all his States, for the repelling of so puissant an Enemy.

Mahomet, for the better success of his Wars in Hungary, had drawn forth the Tartar with a mighty Power; who, altho he was at the first lo unwilling to that Service (considering the great loss he had therein before received) that he would not, as he laid, lend so much as one As therunto; yet, overcome with great gifts, and the respect he had of the Turkish Sultan, was now ready with a strong Army upon the Frontiers in Moldavia, to meet him in Hungary: unto whom the late chosen Vayvod sent certain Presents, with such store of Vidulas as he could possibly provide for him. Yet forasmuch as he was not that way to pass without the leave of the Polonian, Mahomet had both by Letters, and divers of his Ambassadors, intreated with the Polonian King for his Passage; as also for the Confirmation of the ancient League he and the Polonian Kings, his Predecessors, had, to their good, of long time had with the Othoman Emperours; from which he well knew the Christian Emperour, with divers other the Christian Princes, to seek by all means to withdraw him. Mahomet also, not ignorant how hurtful and dangerous the Confederation betwixt Michael the Vayvod of Valachia and the Polonian was unto him and his Designs, sent unto him an Ambassador, by the shew of great dangers to deter him from the Transilvanian, and by many glorious Promises to allure him to submit himself again unto his Protection, and in token of his Fidelity to deliver unto the Sultan two of his Frontier Towns, such as he should require in regard whereof he should, together with the Sultan's Favour, receive golden Mountains. Whereunto the Vayvod answered, That as yet he was not weary of the Friendship he held with the Prince: and for the Towns he required, that they were not in his Power to give, as belonging to the Prince; unto whom he laid he would write, and tlay the Ambassador in the mean time until he had from him Answer.

The Emperour, on the other side, had with all carefulness, so far as in him was, provided that his Army might be ready to take the Field with the beginning of the Spring; but as it commonly chanceth, the speedy Proceedings of great Affairs (wherein the hands of many mighty is required) to be much hindered by delays, sometimes of one, and sometimes of another; so fell it out with him now: for albeit that his own Forces were in some good time ready, yet was the Spring, yea and a good part of Summer also far past, before the Aid promised from other Princes met together. At length, after long expectation, when some convenient number for an Army was from divers places come together at Piemma; they were by the Lord Swartzenburg, and their other Commanders, brought forth into the Field, and not far from Altenburg encamped, within the self-same Trenches that were the last year cut by Count Manfield for the safety of his Army; there to expect the coming down of the great Ordinance, and other Provision, by the River from Piemma, as also the rest of the Christian Forces daily looked for. From Altenburg the Christian Army removed to Komara, and not staying there long, the four and twentieth of July marched towards Vacia, otherwise called Wexen; but before it came thither, the Turks hearing of the approach of the Christians, forsook the Town, and with their Cattel and best part of their substance fled to Pesth, carrying also away with them the great Ordinance, the greatest whereof they buried by the way, which was nevertheless afterwards found out by the Christians. And although the Turks at their departure had let fire both upon the Town and the Cattle, yet the Christians left therein did what they might to quench the same; by whose diligence, and the help of two thousand Foot men, and certain Troops of Horsemen sent thither by Swartzenburg, a great part both of the Town and the Cattle was preserved: the whole Army of the Christians following after, incamped in the open Field, and with the Christians men braved the Turks even to the Gates of Pesth. This so sudden a coming of the Christians brought a great fear both upon them of Pesth and Buda; inasmuch, that they sent their Wives and Children, with the chiefest of their Substance, down the River, unto places of more Safety, and farther off from danger, which was done so disorderly (as it happened in such common Fears) that many of them for haste thrust one another into the River, and so perished.

Hitherto, in the former Wars against the Turks, had Matthias been General of the Christian Armies; but now at length, Ferdinand, the Emperour's Uncle, Count of Tyrol, being dead, Matthias was by the Emperour his Brother preferred to the Government of that rich Country and the Provinces thereabouts, not inferior to some Kingdoms; and Masimilian, his younger Brother, appointed General in his stead; who, departing from Piemma in the latter end of July, came into the Camp the fourth of August, where he was by the Lord Swartzenburg, his Lieutenant, and the Lord Palfi, honourably and with great Triumph received.

Now were the Christians threecore thousand strong, and having fortified Vacia, and therein placed a convenient Garrison, resolved by common consent to besiege Hannau, a strong town of the Turks in the upper Hungary. And thereupon setting with their Army from Vacia the thirteenth of August, came the fifteenth of the same Month, about noon, and fat down before the Town; and that with such speed, that they were, before seen of the Turks, in the Town, than that they heard any thing of their coming: informing that at the first shew of them, they of the Town took them to have been some come out to seek after Booty; and therefore falling out upon them, skirmished with them a while, until they perceived the whole Batle coming. The Christians approaching the Town, incamped themselves, as they thought most convenient, and began in three places to batter the Counterfort. This frontier Town of the Turks, besides that it was kept with a strong Garrison, was also strengthened with a broad ditch, and fortified with a broad Counterfort and strong Pallisades. Whilst the Christians thus lay at the Siege, the Turks falling out of the Town brake into their Trenches, and there did great harm; and like enough they were to have done more had not the Horse-men in good time come in upon them, and enforced them to retire. In this Sally, amongst others, was one Greis, a notable Captain, slain, being shamefully forsaken of his own men; who for that their Cowardice, were all, in the flight of the whole Army, dismayed, and so turned out of the Camp, as men unworthy any longer to bear Arms. One morning also, as the Christians were in their Devotions in their Trenches, a Turkish Priest from out of an high Tower not far off, rallied most bitterly upon them cursing and deriding them; whereupon one of the Christian Canonets, much vexed, made a shot at the Tower, which he so well bestowed, that therewith he struck down the Tower, together with the Idolatrous Priest, as he was yet railing and blaspheming. At length the Christians had with exceeding Labour and continual Battery made the Town assailable: wherewith the Turks discouraged, offered (but all too late) to yield up the Town upon the same conditions that they of Strigoniun did; whereunto they received no Answer, yea commandment was given throughout the Camp, That no man, upon pain of Death, should have any Parle with them. Shortly after, all things being now in readines for the Assault, the Christians, one day about five a clock in the afternoon assaulted the Town in four places; and after three hours hard fight, and the Turks had took it, with men beheading and lamenting of the Women and Children, and other fearful People, who now gave themselves all lost and forlorn. Four hours Execution was done upon all that came to hand, without respect of Age, Sex, or Condition: Women were slain great with child, and young Children hanging at their Mothers Breasts, it bowed not to cry for Mercy, the bloody Sword devouring all. The fury of the Wallons here exceeded, who ripped the Children out of their Mothers Wombs, and made Thongs and Points of the skins of Men and Women whom they had read quick. Which their Cruelty they afterwards excused, when they were therefore restored by pretending thereby they did chastise the Turks hereafter not so wickedly to blaspheme against Christ, or with such their wonted and barbarous Cruelty to torment the Christians that fell into their hands, for fear of like themselves. In this assault and fury perished of the Turks about four thousand, and of the Christians not past three hundred. In this Town, which was the first they ventured, was found a very rich Prey. The first that entered the Town was one Torsky, a notable Captain, with his Company; after whom followed Rusfurme, who each of them were thought, in their Entrance at the Breach, to have slain with their own hand eight or ten Turks.

Now in the mean time Mahomet the great Sultan being come to Belgrade, removed thence to come down into the Heart of Hungary, sending Cicula Baffa before him; and at length, after long looking for, the second of September arrived at Buda, having in his Army about two hundred thousand men, and three hundred field-pieces. From thence he presently sent 40000 to Temesvar, but flayed there himself with the rest of his Army.

The Christians yet lying at Hannau, and doubting lest the Sultan suddenly passing the River should come upon them not yet ready for Batle; departing thence, and retiring back again, came and incamped not far from Vacia. And albeit that the Arch-duke, before his Departure from Hannau, had left a convenient Garrison for the keeping of the Town; yet such was the terror of the Turks approach, that the next day after, they that were left in Garrison forsook the Town, and letting it on fire, followed themselves after the Camp. This coming of the Turkish Sultan to Buda, brought also a great fear upon them at Piemma, as much doubting lest he should that way have turned his Forces; which caused them both day and night to labour for the better Fortification of the City, and for the provision of all things, as if it had been for a present Siege.

But Mahomet was not provided for the undertaking of so long a place, and not ignorant of the disgrace his great Grand-father, the victorious Solyman had sometime received under the Walls thereof, had no purpose thereto, as having bent his thoughts quite another way. In the upper part of Hungary is an ancient famous City, well fortified and honoured with a Bishops See called Agra, not far from Hannau: upon this City, as the chief Fort of the Christians in those Quarters, had Mahomet at his his coming into Hungary cast his eyes, and began now that way to make head, with purpose by taking of that City, and placing there a strong Garrison, to hinder the uniting of the two Kingdoms of Hungary, and the mutual strengthening of the one the other by the way of the upper Hungary. Which the Arch-duke perceiving, lent thither forthwith the valiant Colonnell Terzky with a notable Company of Irakians and Germans, and a thousand other Harquebusers, who all arrived there in safety. At which time also the Lord Tersky sent into the City three thousand Foot-men under the conduct of County Turne, with good flore of warlike Provision needful for the defence thereof. The one and twentieth of September, Mahomet, attended upon by the great Bassas, Abraham, Giaffer, Hassan, and Cicala, for old Sinan was now dead, with his Army of an 150000 men, came and encamped between the two Rivers of Arabis and Tiblis. Approaching the City, he with wonderful Celicity cast up five great Mounts, and from them with such fury battered the Walls, that the Christians were glad night and day to stand in Arms for the defence thereof. And altho that the Walls were so great, and in many places were fortified, as that they were not but by a greater Garrison to be defended against to pulliant an Enemy; and that therefore the Defendants with their Honour lawfully might even the first day have let the City on fire, and retired themselves into the Castle, which was both fair and strong, and the only place to be trusted unto; yet, for the space of six days they worthily defended the whole City against the fury of the Enemies, and so it did them great harm. But seeing the danger greatly encroaching, and that the City was no longer to be holden, they let it on fire; having before conveyed all the best of their Substante, with themselves, into the Castle: which the Turks quickly perceiving, brake so suddenly into the City, as if they would, together with the Christians, have entered the Castle also; but in the attempt thereof they were notably repulsed, and many of them slain. Adjoining to the Castle was a great and strong Bulwark, against which the Turks for certain days furiously thundred with their great Ordnance, and that without intermission; and having in divers places (as he sheweth it) in the space of two days failed it 12 times, but yet without the wonderful loss of their men: and yet gave it not so over; but as men with their loss more enraged, came on again with greater fury than before, and so at last by plain force took it; and there put to the Sword all they found therein, except such as by good hap got betimes into the Castle. This Bulwark thus lost, the Christians the next day falling out, again recovered; wherein they slew a great number of the Turks, with the loss of some thirty men, and as many more wounded. The besieged now divers times, both by Letters and Messengers, craved Aid of Maximilian the General, giving him to understand, that they could no longer hold out for want of Shot and Powder, if they were not betimes relieved (whereof the Enemy also was not ignorant) yet were they resolved to hold it out even to the last man; altho the great Sultan had oftentimes, by Messengers sent of purpose, willed them to yield it up, with promise that they should in safety with Life and Goods depart; else they were threatening them greater extremities than was of late threatened unto the Turks at Hatman, if they should as obstinate men hold it out unto the last: whereunto they never answered him any thing; for Terzky had forbidden all Parle with the Enemy; and in the midst of the Marke-place had caused a pair of Gallies to be let up, threatening to hang him there, whosoever he were, that should once make motion of yielding up the City.

Whilst the besieged thus live in hope of Relief, the Arch-duke, upon the coming over of the Sultan towards Agria, having received with his Army to Sirigium, and there flaid forward, expecting the coming of more Aid; began now at length to let forward, and to make those few as if he had indeed purposed to have relieved his distressed Friends lo hardly beler at Agria. But such was the foulness of the Weather, hindering the passage of his great Ordnance (not to speak of any thing else) that in fourteen days he marched no more than twelve miles forward. Whereof the Enemy took occasion to prevail as he did in his Siege: who now hearing of the coming of the Christians, and seeing how little purpose he had so long battered the Castle, converted all his endeavours to the filling up of the Ditch of the old Castle, with Faggots, Earth, and such like matters; for the hastening of which work, Mahomet himself paced not to ride up and down in all places of his Army, with his Presence and cheerful Speech encouraging his men in that desperate Work. But whilst the Turks are thus busie in fulfilling his Command, the Christians falling out upon them made great slaughter of them, and put to flight Abraham the great Bassa, with such as were about him; after whom they so eagerly followed, that he in the flight lost his Tulipant for haste, and was there very like to have been taken. Nevertheless, the work went still forward, and was now at length, with the restless labour of so great a multitude, brought to such perfection, that the Turks thought it now no great matter by assault to enter the City; and thereupon, the tenth of October, gave unto it five separate Assaults one upon another, being still with greater slaughter of his men repulsed. But coming on again the fifth time with fresh Supplies, and greater fury than at the first, they prevailed; and to entering, put to the Sword all they found in the Castle, in number about eight hundred; and slaid of whole Heads, one of the Turks Capitanes caused to be carried unto Mahomet in the Camp, in the beholding whereof, he is said to have taken great Pleasure, as in the undoubted Signs of his Victory.

The old Castle thus taken, nothing remained but the new Castle, against which the Turks converted their whole Forces, wherein they repulsed not so much hope (altho their Battery were very terrible, and their Power great) as in the secret Mines wherewith they had in fourteen places undermined the Castle, and were now almost ready to be blown up. Which the besieged perceiving, and withal considering the fate wherewith they stood, and not hearing any kind of relief, relieved amongst themselves (without the consent of their chief Commanders) no longer to hold out, but to yield. And thereupon altogether, as if it had been but one man, rise up in a Mutiny against their two Governours, Faul Niar, and Terzky; who at the first, by all the reasons they could devise, persuaded them from such Cowardice, putting them in mind of the Oath they had taken: which not prevailing, they afterwards upon their knees requested them, as men, to hold it out yet a while, in hope of speedy relief; yea Terzky, with his hands cast up, intreated them, that if they would no longer hold it out, but needs yield, they should first kill him with their own hands, that he might not live to see so great a Dishonour. But what availeth Persuasion with men possessed with so great fear? And in the mean time 250 of the common Soldiers, amongst whom were many Italians, secretly elaping out of the Castle fled into the Camp, of whom divers were taken, and tured Turk, which added to the former fear, so much discouraged the minds of the rest, that they forthwith required to come to parle with the Enemy, and so agreed, That they might with Bag and Baggage, and their Swords by their sides, in safety depart; the great Sultan giving his Faith for the performance thereof, with Hollages delivered on either side. So the thirtieth of October, about Noon, the Garrison Souldiers came out of the Castle, in number about 2000; but they were not gone far, but that they were in a great Place set up by the Turks and Tartars, and there in full view, some of them were slain quick, and some other of them otherwise shamefully dimembered; the Turks in the mean time upbraiding them, and saying, That Faith was not to be kept with them that had so cruelly before dealt with them of Hatman. This perfidious dealing much offended divots of the better sort of the Turks, inasmuch, that some of them complained thereof unto the Sultan; who as is reported) caused some of the chief Authors thereof to be put to death; and afterward, by open Proclamation commanded, that if any of the Turks or Tartars had taken any of them Prisoners, they should forthwith let them at liberty. Thus is the famous City of Agria, of long time a Christian Bishops Seat, now become a free Succubate for the Turks and Infidels.

Whilst Mahomet thus lay at the Siege of Agria, the Bassa of Bosnia, with certain other of the Sanzacks thereabouts, having raised a great Army, came and besieged Perinia in the Borders of Croatia: which he at his first coming lo furiously battered by the space of five days, that was of many thought not possible for it to hold out two so longer. In the mean time, the Lord Herbolstein and Leucowitz, with all the Power they could make out of Croatia and Windismarch, came towards Perinia; but having no means in lo great haste to make a Bridge over the River of Kulp, they retired towards Sieff, thence to pass over. The Turks hearing of their retire, and supposing them to be fled for fear, put six thousand Horsemen over the River to pursue them: upon whom the Christians turning, and charging them home, overthrow them; and having slain many of them, drave the rest headlong into the River, where most of them perished. The Christians nevertheless keeping on their way to Sieff, there the next day by a Bridge passed over the River, and so marching towards Perinia, and being come near unto the Town, were encountered by eight thousand Turks, whom they also put to flight; and by certain Prisoners there taken, understood that the Bassa, the day before, was slain from near the Town, and gone; which they at the first believed not, but coming thither found it so, to their good Contentment, and the great Joy of the late besieged.

Maximilian the General marching on fair and softly from Sirigium, at length, the seventeenth of October, came to Cassiova, four days after that Agria was lost; and there met with the Tartar Prince, who was come thither with eighteen thousand men, and forty field-pieces to aid him; of whom eight thousand were mercenary Horsemen, fifteen hundred were of the Nobility of his Country, and the rest Foot-men. The next day after, they setting forward from Cassiova, joynted themselves with the rest of the Army led by the Lord Tersky and Palk, and of all their united Forces made one Army, consisting now of 32000 Horse-men and 28000 Foot; who drew with them an 120 Field-pieces, and 20000 Waggon, where-with they every night encloled their Army as with a mole Trench. So orderly marching, they kept on their way towards Agria, with a full resolution to give the Turks Battle, whereof the whole Army seemed to be very desirous. By the way at length they came to a fair Heath two miles long and four broad, where they were to pass over a certain River, the Passage whereof Giaffer Bassa had before taken with 20000 Turks and Tartars, the rest of the Turkish Army lying still so far from Agria. Now the purpose of the Bassa was, to have enlarged the Passage of the River, and so to have made way for the whole Army to have afterwards passed to the other side, as most commodious for many purposes, especially for Water, whereof they lo might themselves have had plenty, and yet kept the Christians from it. But of this his purpose, by the coming of the Christians he was afterwards apprized; for the next day, being the 23th of October, they skirmished with him in divers places, especially at the Passage of the River; where, at the first Encounter he lost 300 of his men, and in the end seeing himself too weak to withstand the whole power coming on, fled to the Sultan, having lost two of his Ensigns and 20 field-pieces, but of his men none more, both for that he fled betime, and the approach of the night hindered the pursuit of the Christians, who were now become Masters both of the passage of the River, and of the place where the Bassa lay: which they finding not lo commodious for them as they had at the first supposed (especially for lack of Wood, the Weather being then extremely cold, as also hearing of the approach of the Sultan with his whole Army) they forthwith forsook the same, and retired again over the River to the place where they lay before, incloled themselves with their Waggon, as if it had been a City strongly incloled with wooden Walls. The next day, which was the 24th of October, towards night, Mahomet with all his Army, and the view of the Christians, and the sight of 3000 Tartars to pass the River; of whom the Christians flew a great number with their great horse, and put the rest to flight. Both the Armies were populous and strong, and covered a great deal of ground, a most goodly sight to behold: both drunk of the same River, as well the men as their Horses, and therefore kept continual watch all that night on both sides of the River, especially at the Passage. In the morning, betwixt six and seven o'clock, Mahomet, with his Army ranged in order of Battle, came within sight of the Christians, his Squadrons as it were covering all the Country on that side of the River, as far as the Christians could well see; and now again first part of his Army over the River; with whom the Christians skirmished from morning till night, both the Armies parted but by the River, all this while standing fast; and as it were facing the one the other. But being at length on both sides well wearied, and many slain, the Turks retired again over the River to the Camp; in the mean time, if it had been by consent) they retired on both sides the next day to try the fortune of a Battle; and lo Commandment was given through both the Armies, for every man, against a certain appointed time to make himself ready. So the next day, being the 26th of October, Mahomet brought forth his Army, and now thinking it time up not far from the Christians, and being now to draw down towards the River. Near unto this place were the ruins of an old Church, where Mahomet placed certain Companies of Janizaries, and 24 field-pieces, and commanded 10000 of his select Souldiers to pass the River, which they readily did. The Christians also ready for Battle, and now thinking it time up on the coming over of the Enemy to begin; with part of their Army thereunto appointed, lo fiercely charged the Turks that were already come over, that they quickly overthrew them, and not them only, but certain Companies of Tartars also that were in another place come over the River; and not so contented with having overcome them, but in chafe, put to flight them also, and then stood on the farther side of the River, of whom they flew a great number, and by the coming on of the rest of the Army, took from them an 1500 great pieces of Artillery; which he put in the Cities of the Enemies Camp; that Mahomet, with Ibrahim the great Basha, seeing the discomfiture of the Army, fled in all haste towards Agria, shedding some tears by the way as he went, and wiping his eyes with a piece of Mahomet's Garment, which he for reverence carried about him as a Relique. I drew now towards night, and the Arch-duke was about to have called a Retreat to be founded, and that day to have done no more. But the Transilvanian Prince, the Lord Palfi, and the rest, persuaded him in that to great fear of the Enemy to prosecute the Victory; and the rather, for that the Turks began again to make head, and to repair their disordered Battels. Wherefore the Christians fill keeping their Array, charged afresh the Front of their Enemies restored Battel, confounding 40000 men, and that with such violence, as that they in short time had slain the most part of them, and put the rest to flight; and with the like good fortune charging the body of the main Battel, forced the discouraged Turks, with great slaughter, into their own Camp. Now Commandment was before given throughout the Christian Army, that no man upon pain of Death should in seeking after spoil break his Array, or forsake his Place before the Victory were assuredly gotten. But they in this hot pursuit breaking order with the Turks in the Tents, and these killing a great number of them, and seeing in every place great store of rich spoil, contrary to the aforesaid Commandment, left the pursuit of the Enemy, and disorderly fell to the spoil of the Tents, until they came to the very Tent of the great Sultan. But here began all the mischief with a most sudden change of Fortune. For he these greatly disordered men, not now worthy the name of Soldiers, light upon a strong Squadron of resolute men, with good store of great Ordnance ready charged, which they discharged amongst the thickest of their Enemies, and rent in sunder a number of them, and after that, came on resolutely themselves, when in the mean time Ghazal Basha, with his Horse-men yet untouched, brake in upon them also, and with the terror of his coming brought forth a fear upon them, that they began a main to fly, especially the Hungarians and German, most buffed in the Spoil. Neither could they in that fear, by any threats or intreaty of their Commanders be persuaded to make a stand, or to make as once to look back, or to show any token of true Valour: which their hasty flight, was the overthrow not of themselves only, but of others also that would have fought, for whilst they fled head-long upon the Spur, and could not be afraid, they over-ran their own Foot-men, and so furnished the Enemies Victory. Thus far want of good order, thro the greedy covetousness of a sort of disordered men, the most notable Victory that ever the Christians were like to have had over the Turks, was let slip out of their hands. Many noble Gentlemen and Commanders, in seeking to save the flight of their own men, were here slain, and so all the Enemy collected the Chase scarce half a mile, yet were the Christians possessed with such a fear, that they fled mainly all over the Country, with greater shame than loss, no man pursuing them. The Arch-duke himself seeing all desperate, fled to Cassovia. The Transilvanian, and all others most orderly, retired himself towards Transilvania, having lost in this Battel above 1200 men, and of them never a man of name. All this loss he imputed to the Covetousness of the Hungarians, and Cowardice of the German Horse-men. The Lord Bernheim having charge of the great Artillery, fled also, and made shift for himself, as did Palfi, and in fine all the rest. Neither was the fear less amongst the Turks (a wonderful thing to be spoken) than it was among the Christians: for the Night following, they, for fear of the return of the Christians, trulling up the belt of their things, fled also towards Agria, and it was afterwards known, that the Turks great Ordnance, Tents, and Baggage, stood three days in their Trenches, either altogether unguarded, or so flenderly guarded, as that they might have been easily taken by the Christians, if they would but have made head again. Yet Mahomet himself is reported oftentimes to have confessed the danger, and he was then in to have been taken, and all his Army destroyed, if the Christians had (as they should) pursued the Victory, and not so basely run after the Spoil: by which danger he then warned, afterwards even flunned to adventure his Person to the like Peril in the Field. In this Battel of Koroff (for so it is of a place thereby called) and at the Siege of Agria, were lost of the Christians about 20000, and of the Turks 60000. Mahomet after this Victory fortified Agria, and for the keeping thereof left in it 10000 Soldiers, and so returned to Belgrade.

The Basha of Buda, persuading himself that the Turks after to great an Overthrow, could not this Year to any purpose recover their Strength, came with all the power he was able to make, and the fourth of November besieged Vachia, in hope to have easily carried it: but finding there greater resistance than he had before imagined, and hearing that the dispersed Christians in the upper part of Hungary were making head for to come to the relief of the Town, he, more afraid than hard, brake up his Siege, and so returned to Buda; for indeed the dispersed Reliques of the late Army of the Christians were drawing together, but unarmed and unprovided, as having in the late flight flamellously cast away their Arms, and therefore could have done the Basha small harm if he had continued the Siege.

Mahomet, thinking it Honour enough for him to have thus won Agria, and driven the Christians out of the Field, divided his Army into two parts at Belgrade; whereof the one he billeted in the Country thereabout, to be ready for all Events, and with the other he returned to Constantinople: but by the way he was set upon by Bartholus Janitschy the Transilvanian Prince's Lieutenant, and the Vayvod of Valachia, who with a great Power both of Horse and Foot being got over the River Danubius, and secretly favoured by the Country People, lay in Ambush for him in places of advantage, and fill following in the Tail of his Army, cut off 7000 of his men before he could be rid of them; and so with much trouble arrived at length at Constantinople, where we will for this Year leave him, until we hear of him more.

Maximilian, with a small Retinue, arrived at Vienna in the latter end of November, where he found the Viscount of Burgun, Sparatzenburg, and some other of the Commanders of his late Army: most of the rest, especially the Italians, being slain. The small remainder of this unfortunate Year was spent with often Skirmishes and Inroads one into another Frontiers, as the manner of War is, without any other great thing done worth the Remembrance.

Rodolph the Christian Emperor, notwithstanding the late discomfiture of his Army not far from Agria, made choice again of his Brother Maximilian the Arch-duke, for the managing of his Forces for his next Years Wars against the Turk. Whereunto the Pope by his Legate Prin-Aldon, recommended of his own charge to send him 10000 Italians, under the Conduct of the Duke of Mantua; as did also the German Princes their wanted aid, with some others. All which slowly at length meeting together near unto Posonium and Alemburg, in the Months of July and August; departing thence, marched to Pappa, which after eight days hard Siege they took, and so again retired to Adrianople, where they took a general Muster of the Army, and afterwards, in the beginning of September, rebed themselves before the strong Town of Rab: where the Lord Bernheim approaching too near the Walls, was with a Shot slain. Nevertheless, the rest there stayed, until that hearing of the coming of Mahomet Basha, the Turks General, with his great Army, they left the Siege, and the twenty fourth day of September, passing over the River Danubius, into the Island Schut towards Comara, there on the North-side of the River encamped. Where they had not lain past eight days, but that the Cattle of Doria, standing upon the South-side of Danubius, were by the Basha, before their Faces, and as it were, the whole Army of the Christians in the mean time, as idle Beholders, looking on, but not daring to relieve their distressed Friends: but afterwards arising, marched to Vachia, where, hearing of the Turks coming against them from Pappa, they set fire on the Cattle, and so retired along the North-side of the River, until they came over against Vicograde, a Castle of their own, on the farther side of Danubius; where, by the good direction of the Lord Gheza Basha, a most expert Captain, and Lieutenant-General of the Army, they escaped so strongly, as that the Turks, after many brave Attempts given to have forced them in their Trenches, were glad with some loss to depart.

Neither went things this Year better forward with the Christians in other places, than in this side of Hungary: for Sigismund the Transilvanian Prince, by his Chancellor, besegging the strong City of Temesvar in Obher, was, by the valour of the Defenders, and the unseasonableness of the Weather, intreated to raise his Siege, and with dishonour to depart. Michael also, the Vayvod of Valachia, who, moved with the example and persuasions of the Transilvanian Prince, had revolted from the Turks, and done them great harm (as is in part before declared) now wearied with their often Invasions and the spoil of his Country almost brought to utter Desolation, many thousands of his Subjects being by the Turks and Tartars carried away Captives, and his Towns and Castles for most part razed; to give his People a time of breathing, submitted himself again unto the Turkish Obedience, solemnly receiving at the hands of one of the Turks Chieftains (for that purpose sent from Constantinople) an Engise in token of his submission unto the Turkish Emperor, as also of his favour towards him. Which the more to assure him of, he by another honourable Messenger shortly after received from Mahomet the Turkish Emperor more kind Letters than at any time before, with the confirmation of the Vayvodship of Valachia by the grand Seigneur's solemn Oath, unto Michael the Vayvod, and his Son Peter, then about thirteen years old, for the term of but their Lives, without disturbance, paying but the half of the old yearly Tribute by the Turks before demanded. So glad they were upon any condition to have reduced that Martial man with his Country unto their Obedience: and in token of further Grace, together with these Letters he received also a goodly beard and most richly furnished, with a fair Scimitar and an Horse-man's Mace, in sign of his Power and Government committed unto him by the great Sultan Mahomet. All which goodly gifts and Honours the Vayvod seemed thankfully to accept: nevertheless, not daring too far to trust unto the Turkish Faith, of the small assurance whereof he had before by sufficient Experience, he still kept strong Garrisons upon the Frontiers of his Country, with such other Forces also as he was wont, excusing the same to be done for fear of the Tartars; by whom he also excused himself for not going with the Turk General this Year into Hungary, as he was by special Messengers from the grand Seigneur himself requested, telling him, that he might not in any case do so, for fear of the Tartars most horrible Incursions, and the Spoils of his Country; yet knew he right well, how that they charged not to do any harm either in Moldavia, or Valachia, as they went into Hungary. But this wary Vayvod not greatly trusting either the Sultan or them, as also to himself, a Christian, to go against the Christians, his Friends and late Confederates, excused himself by the necessary care he had of his Subjects and Country, and so requested that his reasonable Excuse might be in good part of the great Sultan accepted: but of him more is to be said hereafter. Thus passed this Year without any great thing done more than is before declared; both their great Princes, the Emperor and the Turkish Sultan, being warned by the late Years Work what it was to put all to the Fortune of a Battel: and therefore now, contenting themselves to have shewed their Forces, as not afraid one of the other, countenanced this years Wars more in shews than deeds.

What great things might by the Christian Princes as Unity amongst themselves be done against the Turk, is by the confederate Right easily to be gathered; but especially by the notable Victory of the famous Transilvanian Prince Sigismund, who confederated with his poor oppressed Neighbours the Valachians and Moldavians, and strengthened with some small Aid from the Emperor and the Hungarians, most only delivered those three Countries from the heavy burden of the Turkish Thraldom, but vanquished also their most renowned Captains, overthrew their mighty Armies, burnt and spoiled their Countries, razed their Towns and Cities; which, as it hath been before in part declared, if it should be all particularly set down, besides that it would be tedious, so also might it haply seem almost incredible. Besides which Calamities of War (commonly more felt of the Subjects than of the Prince) the great Sultan himself found no small Wane, as well in his Coffers, as other his necessary Supplies for the maintenance of his Wars, especially in Hungary; the only Country of Moldavia before the Troubles, yielding unto him yearly a Tun of Gold, 2000 Horses for Service, 10000 great measures of Wheat with as much Barley, and a wonderful proportion of Butter, Honey, and other Victuals; the other two Provinces paying the like or more: as a yearly Tribute: whereof he had the late, to his great discontentment, by the general Revolt of these three Countries, been quite disappointed. But this so wholesome a Confederation (to the great hurt of the Christian Commonwealth, and benefit of the Turks) now broken, and Moldavia by the Polonians differed from the rest, and again made tributary to the Turk, as is before declared, and now Valachia also in a sort acknowledging the Turks Obedience, the noble Transilvanian Prince, who hitherto with great Cheerfulness and Courage had fought the most Christian Battels against the Turk, now left as it were all alone, and doubting how with his own small Forces to be able long to defend his Country against such a man as him, left the hands should, together with himself, fall into the hands of the Turks or some other his Enemies, by a wonderful Change voluntarily resigned this his Country of Transilvania unto Rodolph the Christian Emperor, and his Heirs for ever: and so leaving his Wife in Transilvania, went himself in 1568 to Siefta, there to take Possession of the Dukedoms of Oppel and Ratibor, which, together with the yearly Pension of 50000 Joachims, or the Revenues of the Bithoprick of Draslawitz, he had in lieu thereof received of the Emperour; whereupon the Possession of Transylvania, by the general consent of all the States of that Country, was in the beginning of this Year 1568, delivered unto the Archbishop of Vacia, the County Nadafst, and Doctor Petzi, the Emperour's Commissioners; and a solemn Oath of Obedience and Loyalty taken of them all in general; which Oath, when the Commissioners, as also the Emperour himself, would have perused the Prince, either not at all, or at leastwise not so suddenly to have forsaken his Country, but to have still kept the Government thereof himself yet for a year or two; well foreseeing, that the same could not so conveniently be governed by any other as by himself, a natural Prince therein born, and exceedingly beloved of his Subjects. The same Commissioners also, in June following, going into valachia, there took the like Oath of Obedience of Michael the Yavod and his People: who, loathing the Turkish Sovereignty, all willingly yielded themselves unto the Emperour's Protection. Thereupon the Commissioners, at the same time came to agreement with the Tartars Ambassadors, offering unto the Emperour Peace and Aid for the yearly Pension of 40000 Duckats, and as many Sheep-skin Gowns, their usual manner of Apparel.

All this while continued the Diet of the Empire, begun in December last past at Ratibor, where the Emperour's Brethren, being all present, the Deputy, and in his Majesty's Name demanding a greater Aid for the maintenance of his Wars against the Turk, the common Enemy, than was by the Princes and States of the Empire offered: where, after great and long Deliberation, a large Proportion was by them all agreed upon for the defraying of the charges of those Wars and defence of the Christian Commonwealth, to be paid in three years next; and so thereupon was the Assembly dissolved. But as they were returning home, behold, contrary to all hope, Rab, one of the strongest Fortresses of Christendom, three Years before betrayed unto the Turks by Count Hardeck, was now by the Witdom and Valour of Adolphus Baron of Swartzenburg, the Emperour's Lieutenant in the lower Hungary, again recovered, to the great grief of the Turks, and wonderful rejoicing of the Christians, in such sort as followeth:

This noble Gentleman the Lord Swartzenburg, of no less Courage than Experience, then lying at Komara, and still in doubt left the Turks, for no time unto him at Rab, should attempt something against him and his Charge, provided for his own defence all that Winter-time with a strong Garrison, keeping continual Watch and Ward, altho it were as then no time for the Enemy with any Army to keep the Field. So Winter passing, and the Spring approaching, it fortuned, that the twelfth day of March, about seven o'clock in the night, the Gates being shut, were heard near under the Walls of the Town, two men, who by their Speech seemed to be Italians; with great instance requesting, for the safeguard of their Lives, to be let in, for fear of the Enemies Pursuit: which by one of the Sentinels was forthwith reported unto the Governor; who, doubting it to be some subtil practice of the Enemy, commanded them there to take their Fortune until the Morning; at which time they were received into the City, and being brought before the Governor, prostrating themselves forthwith at his Feet, pitifully requested him to have compassion of their Misery, and to comfort them with his charitable Relief, that so they might at length return again into their Country: who at the first asked them, What Country-men they were, and from whence they came at that time of the night: Whereunto they answered, That they were Italians, and that they had but even then escaped out of the cruel hands of the Turks at Rab. But desiring to know of them some News, they, after their manner, humbled themselves, shewing by their Gesture not to know any. Yet would he needs understand of them the Particularities, when and how they were taken by the Turks, and the means they had used to escape out of that cruel Servitude, in all order as had befallen them. Where the younger of them beginning, told him, That now almost two years ago, at such time as the Christians were overthrown by the Turks under Agria, and every man in that confusion then seeking the belt and nearest way to save themselves; they having by flight now escaped the greatest danger of the Enemy, and so travelling over the Country towards Vienna, were, to their great Misfortune (by an hundred Turks come out of Rab to scour the Country, and to seek after Prey) taken Prisoners, and as Slaves committed to the Chain, where they had almost two years, until now, with great Patience served. These men Fugitives, by their outward appearance, seemed to be men of good Spirit and Valour; which caused the Governor the more desirous to know of them the means they had used for their escape. So the younger proceeding in his Tale, gave him to understand of the whole matter, telling him, That they had been three Months before still carefully watching to recover their lost Liberty, which now seemed to make some offer of it felt unto them: for that since the time that the Emperour's Army rife the last year from before the Town, they were not kept so strait, or looked unto as before, but lay as men by the Turks not much regarded; which caused them the more cheerfully to take their opportunity, and to resolve either the sooner to dye, or to set themselves at liberty. And that so one day as they were carrying certain Munition from the Palace of Giasfer Bassa for the Soldiers, they secretly conveyed three pieces of Cord of some reasonable bigness, therewith by night to let themselves down from the Wall, and so make their Escape: which bold Cord, that it should not be seen, and so their purpose suspected, they buried in the ground. But the Night being come for them to effect in what they had so long desired, and they coming up and down in the dark, and still finding one let or other, they were enforced for that time to stay, and to defer it until the night following; which being come, and choice made of a most convenient place, they made fast the Cord above, and so thereby slid down, first the elder, and then the younger; who not knowing how to swim, was yet by the good direction and help of his Fellow conducted over unto the farther side of the broad and deep Ditch; and that so, in the night (so dark as that one of them could hardly see the other) they were come by chance to Komara, thinking to have taken the way to Vienna. The Governor thus fully instructed of their Escape, demanded of them further, how the strong Town of Rab was by the Turks governed and guarded; who told him, very evil, and with small care, especially since the Departure of the Emperour's Camp, and also that four Gates of the Town were filled up with Earth, which if they were broken open, would all fall into the Town-ditch, and so further them that would attempt to enter, with divers other Particularities. Whereof the Governor having well considered, thought with himself, that if by some ingenious Device he might by night write some good strength, upon the sudden enter the Town, it might happily be so again recovered. Upon which so great a designment he thought good, consult further with the Lord Palfi, whom he requested, in all haste, and with as much Secrecy as was possible, with 1600 Foot, and as many Horse as he could make, to come unto him to Komara. Who, upon this Advertisement, flaid not, but presently giving order unto his men, set forward by night, and the 26th of March, before day, with 1400 Foot and 120 Horse arrived at Komara; where they were all joyfully received, and the Gates, after they were entered, again shut fast, and so kept for fear of the Enemies secret Spies, of whom no man can be too wary, by he never so wise. Now whilst their Soldiers were refreshing themselves, in the mean time, the Governor, with the Lord Palfi, discoursed to the full concerning the intended Enterprize; which resolved upon, they found themselves, upon the view of their men, to have 1600 Foot of the Garrison Soldiers, and 300 Horse, all good and courageous men, and well appointed for the intended Service: who there staying two days after their coming, and many of them in the mean time (after the manner of their Religion) confessing themselves, and receiving the Sacrament, were become so courageous, as that they doubted not, in the Quarrel of the Christian Religion, to encounter a far greater number of the Turks than themselves. And the more to fit them up, the Lord Palfi at the same time delivered unto them a notable Speech; not for all that telling them their duties were to go; but, That they were his Christian Soldiers and Brethren, under his leading both of long and late time; who, never by him deceived of their wanted Pay at such time as it was due, were now, as he hoped, forsake him. And albeit that he well knew them to have deceived at his hands a greater Contentment, nevertheless, being himself deprived of his Revenue by these late Wars, and his Possessions subject every hour unto the incursions of the Turks, could not therefore, according to his Desire, and their Deserts, then unto them the great good Will he bore them; yet now and even presently was come the time where-in they might not only abundantly enrich themselves, but also adorn their Heads with an immortal Crown of Glory, and make themselves for ever famous, by performing the most happy and glorious Exploit that ever was by valiant Soldiers attempted or achieved in that part of the World. And to the intent that they might know how dear to him he accounted of the Life and Honour of every one of them, he would therefore himself, with the Lord Swartzenburg, (of whom proceeded all that fair Device and new Stratagem) be present with them in the Action; and that therefore they were not to think that they were led forth to any private danger, farther than the Commanders themselves, who wholly Folly were to be accounted great, if rashly and upon no good ground they should adventure their Lives and Honours together; whereof they ought not now to doubt, having by a thousand Proofs known how much they had been of them always regarded. And that therefore it behoved them so much the more to try their Valour in this piece of Service undertaken for the great benefit of the Christian Commonwealth, and the Honour of Christ Jesu, unto whom they were with one accord to make their Prayers, with his mighty hand to strengthen their Hearts, and with glorious Victory to bring to happy end the intended Exploit against his Enemies; to the honour of his Name, and the advancement of the Christian Religion and Faith. At the end of which Speech, all the Soldiers cried aloud, That they were most ready to do any their Commands, and to follow them whithersoever. So order was taken, that within three hours they should every man be preft and ready with their Arms according to their places; and so having well refreshed themselves, about eleven o'clock in the forenoon, the twelfth day of March they in good order began to set forward towards Rab. But for that the multitude of Soldiers oftentimes giveth the Enemy warning of that is intended against him, Palfi gave order to one John Strime, his Sergeant-Major, to follow fair and softly after him, with 1700 Horse and Foot; which he well performed: and the first break of the day they began to draw towards Rab, and there lay close in Ambush all that day until night, about five miles short of the Town; refreshing themselves in the mean time with plenty of Victuals, which they had brought with them from Komara. Night (the favourer of Deceit) being come, in two hours March they began to draw near to Rab, and there staid about five hours; from whence they sent before them a French Engineer, a man of great Judgment, with thirteen others (before rewarded with 1500 Duckats) having with them four Petards, Engines of Force to blow up into the Air any thing whereunto they be fastened, be it never so great and weighty; which by good chance, they found the Draw-bridge down, and the Portcullis up; for that the Turks then calling no Peril, expected every hour for certain Waggon with Provision from Alba Regalis. By which good hap, the Christians unperceived coming to the Gate, and thereunto fastening their Petards, in good order gave fire to the same, which presently took hold; yet were they not far gone, when there was sent a Sentinel detached, who demanding what they were, was presently answered by the violent Engines, which in a trice tore in under the Gate, with some part of the Wall and of the Fortifications near unto it. When now the Watch (but all too late) began to give the Alarm, and the Christians in the forward thrusting state, the Turks took the Gate, none of the Turks yet coming to the defence thereof, or to hinder them from entering. The first that appeared were 200 Turks, which with their wonted Cry Alla, Alla, in such hideous manner as if they would therewith have rent the Heavens, would have flaid the Christians from their entering; but were themselves over-charged by 300 which were already entered. At which time also the Bassa came on with more than a thousand following him, and that with such Courage and Fury as was never greater to be seen in any Turk; where, after a most terrible fight, maintained by the space of two hours, the Bassa himself being slain, the Turks began a little to retire, whereby a thousand Christians more had leisure to enter: when straightway after came Giasfer the great Bassa with above a thousand tall Soldiers following him, all the Inhabitants also of Rab running after him, and that with such force, that they constrained the Christians to retire unto the Gate whereby they entered. Who, resolved rather honourably to die within the Town, than with dishonour to be forced out, there, with incredible Courage, sustained the greatest Impression of the furious Enemy; where was to be seen the true Christian Valour for the performance of so great an Exploit, well worthy of eternal Memory. But this Bassa also (the other being dead of a Wound in his Neck) encountered by the Lord Swartzenburg, after he had in that sharp Conflict shewed great tokens of his Valour, was there at length slain also: both whole Heads struck off, were for a Present afterwards sent to the Emperour at Prague, with all the particularities of the whole Action. But now the Turks perceiving that their chief Commanders were slain, retired most part of them into the City: some 300 of them crept underneath one of the Bulwarks, where flood certain Barrels of Gunpowder, which they desperately set on fire, and so together with themselves blew up three hundred Christians that were above upon the Bulwark; the greatest loss the Christians had in all that Victory, who were otherwise supposed not to lose therein above two hundred of their men. Thus the Turks discomfited, and altogether full of fear, losing both their Force and Courage, fled in every place before the Christians, they in every corner making of them a most horrible Slaughter. The Turkish Women all this while out of their Windows and other high places, ceased not to cast down Stones, Timber, and such like things, upon the Heads of the Christians, whom they thought by all means to annoy, and to help the Turks. The bloody Execution continued all that day until night, the Christians fill finding one or other hidden in the most secret places of the City upon whom to exercise their Wrath; who, rankling also every corner thereof, were by the Wealth therein found greatly enriched. And coming to the Palace of Gigra the great Baffa, they found such great store of rich Furniture, as better befitted some great Prince than a Turkish Slave. There they found also Letters, written in Characters of Gold, from the Baffa of Buda to this Baffa, greeting him, and promising him in his behalf to deal with the grand Seigneur against the next Spring, with the first that Army should take the Field, that he might therein have some honourable place of Command, to the end he might in the Field show his greater Valour, and no longer lie idle in that strong Town. So found they there also many things written from the Great Sultan himself to this Baffa, with great store of Coin, which all fell to the Soldiers share; inasmuch, that by this so notable an Exploit so well performed, the publick State, together with the Soldiers private, was not a little bettered. There, amongst other things, were recovered three score and six pieces of Artillery, which were known to have been sometime the Emperours, and fed to be brought from Buda, with great store of flint and powder and other small pieces, and meal sufficient to have served 4000 men for a Year and a half, but of Wine (little used of the Turks) only four Vessels. In the Baffa's Palace was also found, with abundance of Cloth and Apparel, which was all given in spoil to the Soldiers. Thus Rab, one of the strongest Fortresses of Christendom, not full four years before besieged by Sinan Baffa with an 150000 men, by the space almost of three Months, and then at length, by the Treason of the Governor to him betrayed, was now in one night, by their immortal Glory, again restored to the Christian Commonwealth, the nineteenth day of March, in the Year 1598. Of which so notable a Victory the Christians rejoiced not a little both in Hungary and elsewhere; the great Sultan, with the Turks, no less grieving and storming, as well for the loss of the Town, before got with so small charge, as for the death of his People there slain, to the number of about six thousand and more, with the loss of scarce six hundred Christians.

Yet for all this, Mabomet the great Sultan ceased not to make great Provision for his Wars in Hungary, and that greater than before, and so with greater fury also to prosecute his wrathful Indignation to be revenged upon the Christians. Whereunto, order was given unto Ibrahim Baffa his Brother-in-law, and General of his Army, with all convenient speed to take the Field; which for all that fell out far otherwise; for that now thinking to have had all things in good forwardness, a great diffention rose betwixt the Janizaries and the Spahis; the Janizaries being the best Foot-men, and the Spahis the best Horse-men of the Turkish Empire; both the faithful Keepers of the Person of their Prince, and the greatest strength of his State, whereby it cometh to pass, that in fighting forward towards the Wars, these two sorts of valiant Soldiers, the one standing upon their Strength, and the other upon their Honour, and both jealous of their Reputation and Credit, have no good liking of one the other, but oftentimes, and especially of late in this corruption of their martial Discipline under their degenerate Emperours, fall at odds among themselves, as now they did to the great hindrance of their Affairs, and trouble of the General. Inasmuch, that to appease this Tumult he was glad to put to death certain of the insolent Janizaries, refusing to let forward as they were by their Aga commanded. But proceeding farther, and thinking to have executed some others of them also, to the further terror of the rest, he was by them and their Adherents put in such fear of his Life, that to avoid the present danger, he was glad to excuse himself by his Lieutenant, laying all the blame upon him as the cause thereof; who was therefore as a Sacrifice delivered unto the Fury of the Janizaries, by whom he was presently slain, with some others of the Baffa's Followers. So these Broils, with much ado, overpass, Ibrahim having taken a general review of his Army at Sophia, there stayed, expecting Order from the Great Sultan where to begin his Wars, in Hungary or in Transylvania, for as yet that was in question; which could not well be before the beginning of July, by reason of the scarcity of Victuals even then arising in the Camp; for the supplying whereof, Mabomet himself had no small care. But this long delay was the cause that a great number of the Janizaries coming from Hadrinople, and hearing by the way, that the General would not as yet set forward, not knowing the cause of his lay, and doubting to be deceived of their promised Entertainment, were about to have returned back again; which known at the Court, Commandment was presently sent thence unto the General, without longer stay to let forward toward Hungary, which the more hastened his Departure with his Army.

In this the Turks so long delay, the Christians had good leisure to prepare their new Forces, being now the latter end of Summer: for well they might think that the Enemy slept not, knowing what Provision he had made as well in Constantinople as in other places. Wherefore reasonably doubting that Summer well spent, and August now at hand, he would not so late turn his Forces into the lower Hungary, they thought it best to provide for the Safety of the upper Country; and to the end the Enemy approaching those Frontiers, might there find Forces ready to encounter him, the Lord George Baffa, a man of great Experience and Valour, was appointed Lieutenant-General for that Country, to the great Contentment of the Soldiers in general, all shewing themselves most ready at his Command. The Lord Swartzenburg in the mean time remaining in the lower Hungary at Rab, with eight thousand good Soldiers; and the Arch-duke Matthias at Vienna for the dispatch of George Baffa, and the halting of him forward for that the upper Hungary, to the great hurt thereof began now to feel the Incursions of the Turks and Tartars: besides that, he was afterwards to return himself to speak with the Emperour his Brother, fill expecting a Chais of the Turks by the Appointment of the Grand Seigneur, sent by the way of Poltia for Prague, to intimate with the Emperour concerning a Peace.

They

Buda besieged by the Christians.

They of Buda in the mean while seeing the delay of the Turks, of whom, no one band yet appeared in those Quarters; and on the other side perceiving the great Preparation of the Imperials, and the great Garrison at Rab in great hands; began now to doubt some new Resolution of the Christians: wherein they were no whit deceived; for no Army of the Turks being then in field in the lower Hungary, and the Country plain and open, the Lord Palfi, with a convenient Power, and certain pieces of Battery, let forward to attempt the Enterprize, and the 10th of October, with 16 pieces of Artillery began to beat down the new Resolution of the Christians, and discomfite of them within; having first taken the Fort S. Gerard, with hope to have gained the rest also. For which cause, the Men, the Women, and all that dwell in the City, most instantly befought the Baffa, not to endure the destruction of the same, with the Inhabitants and Wealth thereof altogether; but, being not able long to hold out against so furious a Battery, in time to hearken unto some reasonable composition, that to they might yet have many at least with life depart. Whereunto, the Baffa for all that would not hearken, but put them fill in hope that they should be presently relieved. However, the Battery fill continuing, and they not able longer to endure the force of the Imperials, nor any Relief yet coming, they were glad, at length to abandon the City with the loss of 2000 of the Janizaries, and but 300 of the Christians slain, and 800 hurt; the rest of the Turks at the same time retiring themselves into the Castle, where they might for a space defend themselves safe. So the Lord Palfi possessed of the City, with all his Forces laid Siege unto the Castle; which, altho it were in some places shaken with the continual fury of the Canon, yet were the Defendants fill ready to make good the same: inasmuch, that Palfi, upon good hope of Success, giving thereunto a general Assault, was by their Valour informed to fore, that he might in the mean time with great labour and industry repairing the Breaches and Gaols made by the Artillery. So that Palfi considering the difficulty of the Assault, thought it better, by undermining, to shake the Rock whereon the Castle stood, than by a new Assault to expose so many worthy men unto to manifest a danger: which his Purpose by the Enemy discovered, was by them also, by countermining, disappointed; yet for all that were the Christians fill in good hope, by another Mine not yet by the Enemy perceived, to fort to the full of their desire; and the more, for that they law not so much bravely or flew of Courage in the Defendants as before: who now kept themselves silent and quiet, as if they had been consulting about the yielding up of the Castle, as men bereft of all hope of Relief and Succour: the Christians being now possessed of a strong Abbey and Fortlets fast by, and having broken down all the Bridges over the River Danubius, in such sort, as that they besieged could not receive any relief either by Land or Water. But so far as the time of the year began now to grow tedious, and the Winter Weather sharp, the Christians thought it not best there long to protrude the time; and therefore resolved to present unto the Castle another general Assault, and at the same instant to blow up the Mine: but in giving this Assault, they were again repulsed with the loss of 200 men. At which time also, a number of the Turks falling out of the Castle, courageously encountered the Christians, but not with Success answerable to their Valour, being there almost all cut in pieces: neither did the Mine take the desired Effect, but being blown up did little or no harm at all. So that the Christians, weary of their long suffering of the Extremity of the Weather, and withal considering the great Courage of the Defendants, were even upon the point to have risen; yet willing to give a fresh attempt by the Mine, they began again to work in the same, and in hope to prevail, began to parley with the Defendants about the giving up of the Castle: but all to little or no purpose; for that the Mine having taken no effect, and the Soldiers could hardly be drawn on through the deep and muddy Ditches to give a new Assault. In fine, seeing no hope to prevail, and hearing also of the coming of a great Army of the Turks for the relief of the besieged, they raised their Siege, and at their departure burnt the Suburbs, carrying away with them a great Booty; and the retreating towards Wingonia, expressed further direction where to Winter. Where, shortly after, Order was taken, that the Forces disbanded should be dispersed, some into the Garrisons, and some into the Country thereabout, to the intent they might be in the more readiness with the first of the next Spring to take the Field, or as occasion should serve to be otherwise employed.

But Sigmund the Transylvanian Prince in the mean time repenting himself of the unequal Exchange he had made with the Emperour, in disguised Apparel halting in post out of Silefia came to Claufenburg in Transylvania; and there was joyfully received of his Subjects, and taking of them a new Oath of Obedience, by Messengers sent of purpose certified Maximilian the Arch-duke (appointed by the Emperour for the Government of Transylvania, and now upon his way as far as Cassovia) of the causes of his Return, persuading him rather to convert his Forces against the Turks for the recovery of Agria, than to trouble himself to come any farther for Transylvania, now again by him, to the great contentment of his Subjects, repulsed: as did also the Princess his Wife (Maximilian's Cousin-German) willing him to consider what hurt and dishonour should do unto the Emperour's Majesty. Himself, the Roman Empire, and the whole Christian Commonwealth in general, if in so dangerous a time he should attempt any thing against the Prince her Husband, and unto him so nearly allied.

Now the Turks great Army being come into the upper Hungary, lay incamped under the Walls of the strong City of Veradunum, where that worthy Captain George Baffa was Lieutenant-General for the Emperour; but not having such Strength, as without further help to go against so mighty an Enemy, or to relieve the besieged City, nor as then furnished with a sufficient Garrison, he gave knowledge thereof unto Maximilian the Arch-duke, who (as is aforesaid) with a convenient Power was but a little before come to Cassovia, to have gone into Transylvania, had he not there by the way stayed by Ambassadors from the Prince Sigmund, but lately before returned out of Silefia; and having again taken upon him the Government, by these his Ambassadors requested him no having to trouble himself with that Journey, offering to give him Aid against the Turks whensoever he should require it. The besieged nevertheless in the mean time notably defended themselves, and with certain brave Salles did the Enemy great harm; still expecting, that Baffa the Lieutenant, or the Transylvanian Prince, or Maximilian the Arch-duke, or they all, with their united Forces, should send them relief: unto whom they gave knowledge the Nineteenth of October, how that the Turks with all the Force and Fury they had used, had as yet little prevailed; being by their Valour still repulsed, and with many sharp Salles, to their great loss encountered, and some of their great Ordnance cloyed, in such sort, as that they were in good hope to protract the time until they might by them their Friends be relieved; yet not doubting, but that the Turks, according to their worst manner, would do what they might to subdue them. According to whole expectation, the Transilvanian Prince, with a great Power taking the Field to have relieved them, was letted so to do by the Tatars, to that purpose stirred up by the Turks: so that he could by no means join his Forces with Maximilian, for looking to the safety of his own People and Country. Yet in token of forwardness, he sent certain Companies of brave Soldiers unto the Lieutenant Bassa; who undertook that of 2000 good Soldiers in Garrison in the City at the beginning of the Siege, there were scarce 700 left alive, all the rest being, with continual Assaults, slain or mortally wounded, until a notable Stratagem to delude the Enemy withal: for having put his men in good order, and coming bravely on, as if he would even presently have joynted Battel (a thing which the Turks most desired) which they likewise with great fire were putting themselves in order of Battel, and wholly unsuspecting therein, he by another way the Turks least suspected cunningly thrust into the City eight hundred good Soldiers; and that done, presently retired again into his Trenches, wherein he strongly incamped, feared not all the Turks Forces: who thinking even then to have come to a day Battel, and fill in vain expecting the same, were turned deceived by this finess. And so they after (inforced by continual foul Weather) raised their Siege, not without great difficulty and danger (Relief lying so near at hand, and the Defendants strengthened with new Supplies) to have been longer maintained. So passed the Troubles of this Year, with no gain but great loss of the Turks, who, at their departure, left behind them, unfeathered of the Weather and fear together, with some great pieces of Artillery, being not able to convey the same by Water to Buda: and withal fearing greatly to be encountered by the Forces of Bassa, strengthened with new Supplies even then sent unto him from the Emperor.

The Arch-duke Matthias, Spancrzenburg, and the other Commanders of the Army in the lower Hungary, being twelve thousand strong, with the Garrison Soldiers of Rak, Strigounum, and Komara, in the mean time, because they would not stand idle, together with the Hungarian Horse-men, over-ran all the Country thereabout, even unto the Gates of Buda: in good hope also to have met with some advertised coming towards Pesth with Victuals for the relief of the Castle of Buda.

Whilst things thus passed in Hungary, Mahomet, to shew his Greatness, as also the more to keep the Christian Princes in suspense, sent Cecilia (as the Turks call him Cigala) Bassa his Admiral, with a great Fleet to Sicily: wherewith, being come upon the Coast of Sicily, he requested the Vicerey of that Kingdom to send him aboard his Fleet the Lady Lucretia his Mother, which dwelt in Messina, for that he greatly desired to see her, and to do her Honour; promising to quietly to depart without any harm doing. And the Vicerey again considering how that the angry Renegade for the like Courtship to him at another time before denied, had in his rage done great harm all along the Sea-Coast; covenanting with him to send her in safety back again; sent her honourably accompanied aboard the Admiral Gally: whom Cecilia her Son received with great joy and triumph. And so having kept her with him one day with all the Honour that might be, according to his Promise sent her back again to Messina; and so without any any harm done for her sake to any part of Christianity, peaceably returned back again with his Fleet.

Now in the mean time, Michael the Vayvod of Valachia, with good Forces of his own, because he would be doing something also, resolved to give an Attempt upon Nicopolis, a City of the Turks in Bulgaria: and so giving order to his People, caused a Bridge to be made over Danubius to pass that great River by. Wherewith the Bassas of Sistina and Badana understanding, thought it good with all their Power to disturb him in that work; and so coming, as the said Bridge was by the Vayvod's Soldiers laid over the River upon Boats, without farther stay attempted to have broken the same, to the intent that the Vayvod should not that way pass. Who halting thither with his Army, relented his Work, and enforced his Bassas to forsake the Exploit by them begun; where betwixt them for a space was fought a most hard Conflict, until at length the Turks were with a great Slaughter overthrown, and so glad, some here, some there, by flight as they might, to save their Lives. After which Victory, he, without less Power of the River with his whole Forces, came and incamped under the Walls of Nicopolis; where they of the City understanding of the late Slaughter of the Turks, and finding themselves not able to hold it out against the Force and Valour of the Valachians, now out of hope of any help or relief by time to come from the Turks, without any delay yielded themselves into the Power of the Vayvod; who having sacked the City and let it on fire, carried hence a great spoil and booty, with a number of the Bulgarians chusing out the best and most able Bodies amongst them to serve him in his Wars, and appointing the rest to inhabit and manure the wasted places of Valachia. And so from this Overthrow given unto the Turks by the Valachian, with the lacking of Nicopolis, running abroad, brought a general fear upon the Turks, even in the Imperial City of Constantinople. For the slaying wherof, Mahomet commanded the chief of his Bassas, with a great power of tumultuary Soldiers, taken up in haste, to go forthwith against the Vayvod, to slay the cause of his farther Proceedings, to the dismay of his People; himself thundring out most horrible Threats against him: who, encouraged with this late Victory, and well acquainted with the Turks manners, little regarded the same, as knowing that he was not with Words, but with Arms, to be vanquished.

Now Mahomet the Turkish Emperor, oppressed with Melancholy to see himself at once afflicted with the Plague then raging in Constantinople, the bloody Wars in Hungary, and the horrible mortality and loss of his People in both places; and withal not ignorant of the evil Success of his Army at Perastinum, and of the great harm done at Nicopolis by the Valachian; yet for all that, ceased not, in what he might, to provide for so many Evils, but gave order to Tam Bassa with all speed to set forward (as we have said) from Constantinople toward Valachia, as from whence he feared the greatest danger: who without delay, to make the Vayvod to understand how highly he esteemed him, was dispatched with him, put himself upon the way with six hundred Janizaries towards Hadrianople, with purpose there to winter until the Spring, and so to expect the coming of the rest of the Army, that so with the same, united unto the Forces of Mehemet Satergi (who the last year befelleged Veradinum) he might be able to fight with any terrible unto his Enemies. The Christian Emperor also, at the same time rested much discontented, that his People, in to fair a way for the winning ning of the Castle of Buda, had yet failed thereof: the Walachians with the lack of the Lords Satergi and Palfi, and the rest of the Commanders, that it was not won; for that when they, as valiant men, offered to have done therein the uttermost of their Devoir, their Leaders had made choice, by the Spade and Mattock, rather than by the Sword, to perform the same.

But Michael the Vayvod, seeing the Turks not a little dismayed with the lacking of Nicopolis, began afresh, to their greater terror and hurt, to make new Inroads upon them, in such sort, as that he was entered a hundred miles into their Territory: against whom, Mehemet Satergi (as yet the Turks General in Hungary) coming with his Forces, he again retired, carrying away with him the spoil of the Country by him wasted.

They of Buda in the mean time fearing some sudden Assault to be given upon them, and suffering within great want of Victuals, expected long to be relieved both with Victuals and other Necessaries; understanding yet withal, that the grand Seigneur had caused to be given unto the Polonians, that he was raising a great Power of his best and most expert Soldiers, and had therefore sent for unto the Court all his old men of War, such as had served in the Wars of Perfia, to be now again employed in Hungary. Where the Turks in the mean time providing to relieve the distressed City of Buda both with Men and many other Necessaries; certain Polish Hungarians understanding by their Espials, that one of the Turks Bassas with 3000 Soldiers was coming thither to increase the Garrison, laid themselves close in Ambush in a place whereby the Turks were to pass; where they had not long lay'd, but that the Turks, as men without fear, carelessly passing by, were taken with such force and surprise, that in a moment, when they least thought, they were overthrown and put to flight, with the loss of many of their Horses, much Money and Jewels, and many Captains there taken Prisoners, the Bassa himself, with much ado, hardly escaping into the City. But shortly after, 400 Christians frowning the Country about Buda, and having taken a good booty of Carrel and other Pillage, returning loaded with the Prey, were by the way assailed by the Turks, and enforced to forsake the same, and to fight for their Lives; whom, for all that, they notably repelled, with the slaughter of divers of them; and so again recovering their Booty, returned with Victory. And about this time, or not long after, in the upper Hungary, a great power of the Turks and Tatars having foraged a great part of that Country, and done the Christians great harm, came before Cosovia, making them as if they would even presently have besieged that City: which put the Inhabitants in such a fear, that many of them, without farther Deliberation, fled thitherwith as fast as they could into the Mountains, thinking themselves more safe there than in the City. Nevertheless, by the persuasion of George Bassa, the Emperor's Lieutenant in those Parts, 2000 valiant and expert Soldiers flaid there with him, expecting what the Turks would do; who approaching the Walls, demanded of them in the City a great Sum of Money by way of Contribution; threatening otherwise the utter Ruine and Destruction thereof. Which their proud Demand was by Bassa stoutly rejected, and they, with the loss of a great many of their Lives, enforced to get them farther off. Wherefore, seeing themselves not able to prevail against a City so well provided, they at last by night fled, and departed quite another way than that whereby they came, doing great harm still as they went. The free Haiducks of Valachia also, a warlike kind of People, living for the most part upon Prey, and willing to shew force token of their Hatred toward the Turks, by certain Bridges passing over the Danubius, encountered with the Bassa of Natolia with a great Power of his People, and the loss of his Brother there slain also; and so afterwards over-running the Country, did there exceeding harm, and took the same Bassa's Son Prisoner. Thus passed the Winter with many high Skirmishes and Incursions in divers parts of Hungary, and other frontier Counties; which had done great harm, had it not been before-hand well provided for by the Imperials; who in most places strengthened with new Supplies, flayed the fury of their barbarous Enemies. Maximilian the Arch-duke in the mean time coming from Prague to Vienna, found himself there to have in his Camp but four and twenty thousand Foot and ten thousand Horse, ready against the next Spring, (divers of the German Princes this year not sending thither any Aid at all, by reason of their Troubles nearer home with the Spaniards in the lower side of Germany) which made him the more to dread the Enemies coming, who he knew after his accustomed manner would that Summer appear in the Field with a far greater number. But to have holpen this want, the great Duke of Muscovy, about this time, by his Ambassadors, amongst other things, requested leave of the Polonian for forty thousand Horsemen to pass through his Country, which Habs-men he had determined (as he said) to send in aid of the Emperor against the Turk: which his Request the Polonian would by no means grant, as dangerous to his Estate. Wherefore the Muscovite, offended with the Polonian, sent other his Ambassadors unto the Emperor, by Sea; who embarked in an English Ship in the Port of Nicholas, and falling about the King's doms of Sweden, Norway, and Denmark, after long trouble at Sea, at length arrived at Stock, and so from thence by Land travelling to Hamborough, Lubeck, and Maidenborow, and in every place honourably entertained, came at last unto the Emperor into Bohemia, then lying at Pilsna, for that the Plague was then hot at Prague: where they having with great state delivered their Presents and Letters of Credence unto the Emperor, had Audience, and were by him most honourably used. Yet the Polonian, having thus denied the Muscovite Passage, suffered the Turks Ambassador, who called himself Gabriel, a Jew, to pass through his Country unto the Emperor, to treat with him of a Peace to be made betwixt him and the Turk. Which Gabriel coming to Prague, as Ambassador from the great Turk, and having no Letters of Credence to shew for his Negotiation (for that they were, as he said, upon the way taken from him by the Polonian Collacks, and certain of his Retinue slain) was there taken for a Spy, and so sent to Vienna; where, at his first Arrival he was well used in common law, but the night following being taken for a Spy in his Chamber by the Marital, was so clapt fast in Prison, with as many Irons upon him as he could bear, and all his Followers, with Gyves upon their Legs, compelled as Slaves daily to work in the Town-ditch.

About this time also, Siegmund the Transilvanian Prince, whom his Father had for the benefit of his Country and of the Christian Commonwealth, by a wonderful change gave a most manifest token of a divers and unconstant Nature, to the great wonder of the World: for having broken the Agreement made with the Emperor the last Year, and having secretly in Post returned out of Sicily into his Country, and again taken upon him the Government (as is before declared) and having with-

1599 al requested himself, and the Transilvanians his Country-men to be discharged of the Oath of Obedience and Loyalty before given unto the Emperor, and the City of Bradenburg, with the Country thereabout, to be again restored unto him; and the Emperor pausing thereupon, did now, (doubting of his own Ability for the keeping of that Country) in the beginning of this year 1599, by his Ambassadors, the Bishop of Alba-Julia, and Stephen Pafchati his Chancellor, sent of purpose unto the Emperor, request him to have the first Agreement again renewed, and the Principality of Trebisins in Muravia to be added unto the two Dukedoms of Opel and Rathor in Silisia, with fifty thousand Ducats to be yearly paid unto him out of the Chamber of the Empire; and a general Pardon to be given unto all the Transilvanians that following him had of late revolted from the Emperor, and their ancient Liberties to be again un- to every one of them confirmed. With all which Conditions obtained at the Emperor's hands (as of him that saw how needful it was for him by any means to keep that strong Country in his power) the same Ambassadors forth their dispatch returned from Prague the nineteenth of April.

But Stigliand, in the mean time, at home, was entered into new Concepts with certain of the Polonian Nobility, far differing from the former agreement with the Emperor; and having sent for one of the Turks Chieftains from Constantinople, and for his Cousin Adnan Batur, the proud Cardinal, out of Boronia, and to meeting with these present to wear unto him their Obedience and Fidelity; who shortly after, together with the Polonian Ambassador, sent one of his especial Favourites to Constantinople, to desire leave conduct for his Ambassadors to be sent thither to conclude of all matters with the Turk. Which Messengers he sent, together with the Polonian Ambassador, were both courteously received in the Turks Court, and, as with an especial favour, rewarded with right sumptuous Garments, and charge given them, That the Cardinal, within three Months next, should send thither a solemn Ambassador, with the old accustomed Tribute by the Turk demanded. Yet through the Inconquancy of the Prince, the Ambition of the proud Cardinal, and the foul Collusion of the Polonian, the Country of Transilvania (one of the strongest Fortresses of that side of Christendom) falling from the Obedience of the Emperor, and so in sort breaching the Christian Commonwealth, became again tributary unto the Turk; most good men desiring the Lightness of the one, the Ambition of the other, and the Slowness of the third.

Now the Turks of Buda, not able longer to endure the great Famine therein, had most earnestly requested relief from the other Turks their Friends in Hungary, who on all hands ran to have relieved them; but coming near thereto, could not put therein such Provision as they do by the Imperials; but about a League off diligently attended every motion of the Enemy; from whence the Lord Swartzenburg in the night secretly approaching one of the Gates with his Followers, thought with a Petard to have broken it open, and so to have entered. Which his Device taking no effect, as did that at Rab, the Gate being within strongly fortified by the Enemy, he was enforced to depart, being also discovered by the Turks from the Wall. Now shortly after, the Bassa of Buda with six hundred Horse, issuing out of the City to have met with Viduaks that were coming thither, fell into an Ambush of the Haiducks, who after their manner fiercely encountered him, and putting him to flight, took him Prisoner, his Horse in his Chafe falling under him, whom his Souldiers seeking to rescue, there began a new Skirmish, encreasing their former Overthrow with the loss of the greatest part of them that were left: Amongst whom was the Captain of the Company of the Janizaries there, lost their Lives all. Which Conflict thus ended, the Bassa was with safe Conduct brought to the Camp, and there with great Threats enforced to reveal the state of his City, with other the secret designs of the Turks. Whereupon, the Haiducks returned again towards Buda, seeking by all means to stop the coming of Viduaks thither, so in hope at length to have gained the distressed City. But whilst they thus lay upon the Passages, behold News was brought unto them, how that the Bassa of Bofnia, with the Sanzacks of Sigeth, Buquique, Scutellia, and Coppans, with 10000 Turks, were coming to oppress them, and to open the Passages by them holden. But they knowing their own Strength, and nothing fearing so small a Force, laid not for their coming, but went to meet them, and in a place of good advantage waiting for them, upon their first appearance, with great Assurance and Courage charged them, brake their Array, and slew the greatest part of them, together with the Bassa himself, yet with so much ado, as that had not the Lord Palfi in good time sent unto their Aid certain Companies of fresh men, it was not without cause doubted but that the Haiducks had been put to the world, about three hundred of them having there already lost their Lives. The Tatars yet nevertheless, in good number, he on their way towards Buda, with purpose to have over-run the Country, and so have withdrawn the Imperials from the City; but forasmuch as that base Nation was known to be good for nothing but to rob and spoil, the Lord Swartzenburg's Regiment only going against them, and encountering them, overthrew them in such sort, that part of them being there slain in fight, and part for fear driven into Danuby, the greater number of them there most miserably perished.

Bofnia, the Emperor's Lieutenant in the upper Hungary, at the same time lay at Cassovia, with eighteen thousand men, doubting lest the Enemy's Army, which he heard to be at hand, should come to besiege that City. In the mean time, Abraham Bassa, General of the Turks Forces, came to Solnoch with an Army of fifty thousand strong, among whom were ten thousand Janizaries; but for all that, understanding that Bofnia nothing dismayed awaited his coming at Cassovia, not thinking it good to go any farther (his Souldiers being already weary with long travel) neither yet late there to stay so near unto his strong Enemy, retired back again unto Belgrade, a place of more Strength and Security; expecting a great Fleet of Ships, which charged upon the Danubius, were to bring Viduaks for the Army, as also for the relief of Buda. Alba-Ragah, and other such distressed Places, with divers great pieces for Battery, and other less Artillery upon Carriages, with a number of Ladders and other Instruments of War, declaring their purpose for the performance of some notable Exploit, all guarded with five thousand Turks, which concluded it up the River. Of all which the Imperials understanding, the Lord Palfi dispatched his Lieutenant with a convenient Power, and the Captain of the Hussars with his Followers, all good and valiant Souldiers, to cut off this Convoy; who, to make the matter fitter, suddenly assailing them, and so coming to handy blows, cut in pieces the Convoy, and killed the most of the ships, of which the greater part were there sunk in the deep River; and so took an exceeding great booty, deemed to be worth a million of Gold: where, among other things of great value, there was found a-board 100000 Dollars, which were all divided amongst the Souldiers as a reward of their travel. This great overthrow once known at Buda, Alba-Ragah, as the Count the Bassa told them, brought them a great fear; yea the Army of Abraham grew thereby much discontented, as being at once disappointed both of their Viduaks and their Pay. Besides that, the Imperials over-ran all the Country thereabout, ransacking, facking, and destroying the Country Villages and Castles without Mercy, although the poor Inhabitants offered them large Contribution to have staid their Fury, which would not be accepted. Upon this notable overthrow also the Lord Swartzenburg was determined with all his Forces to come again to the siege of Buda, in hope in so great a discomfort and want of Viduaks to have had it delivered unto him; and for that purpose sent for certain great pieces of Artillery to Piemra. But whilst things went thus well in the lower Hungary, Colonel Kadash of S. Andrews, in the upper Country, took occasion also, upon this Overthrow of the Turks, with 500 Horse and 600 Foot, to seize himself with this small Company before Agria, having yet left the greatest part of his Forces at the Gates of the City; which his Company he led in Arms, and so falling out, began an hot and brave Skirmish; when suddenly the other Souldiers left in Ambush, starting out, and courageously assailing their Enemies, brake their order, and put them to flight, pursuing them at the end even to the Gates of the City: which had there been a greater force of Foot-men, it was verily thought, that the Turks (dismay'd with the flight, and altogether confounded) had abandoned the defence of the Place, and the Christians even then become Masters of the City, which had been the cause of their notable Overthrow in the Year 1596. Nevertheless, they, with great bravery and small loss retired, having slain a great number of the Turks, and carrying away with them an hundred Prisoners, with a Booty of five hundred Horse, and much other Cattel.

The free Haiducks also, strengthened with new Supplies, had done great harm in the Country about Buda, scouring freely all over it, finding none to oppose themselves against them: for which cause, the poor Christians, which yet dwelt in that Country, rose up against the Turks, promising their Obedience unto the Emperor: and moreover, to the intent they might be no more molested by the Imperials, offered to take up Arms themselves against the Enemy, and to the utmost of their Power to hinder his Passage both by Land and Water. These same Haiducks also had broken down all the Bridges which the Turks had made between Buda and Alba-Ragah, to the end they should not that way conveniently bring either Viduaks or Munition from the one place to the other: and the Lord Palfi and Nadash understanding, by their Espials, That the Tatars, divided into three Companies, had over-run a great part of the Country, and with a great Booty were retiring towards Buda, presently went out against them, and informed them to fight: which barbarous People, being incited to fight than to fight, there lost all their Lives, together with that they had before slain. After which Victory, these valiant men turning their Force against certain other places of the Turks there by, took two of their Castles with much rich Spoil; which Castles they lacked and burnt, together with the great Town of Zolna, breaking down also the Bridge upon the River Transilvania.

Now at this time the Turks at Buda held themselves male-content within the City, having no Governor, their Bassa being before taken by the Haiducks, and they themselves pinched also with great want of Viduaks: wherefore, doubting (some sudden Attempt of the Christians, as men dismayed by their former late victory retired themselves into the Castle, a short great strength, leaving the City unto the Imperials then ready to have besieged it: but doubting of the Turks great Army which, as they heard, was marching thitherwards, the advantage thereof being come to Moathly, where Sartar Bassa was also looked for; the Report being given out, that the Turks having relieved Buda, would go to besiege Cassovia or else Strigomum, they stayed to go any farther, as men in doubt what to resolve upon. So were sent certain Colonels and other Captains with their Souldiers, to fortify certain Passages whereby the Turks Army was to pass: the rest in the mean time retiring, for the puissant Enemy began now to approach; as also for that they knew the great desire that Abraham Bassa had to recover again Strigomum, and had therefore sent a great number of Tatars to forage and waste the Country, and so suddenly having relieved Buda and Agria, there to resolve whither to turn his Forces. The Imperials in the mean time incamping near unto Hatwan and Zolna, to hinder the Turks from victualing the City, as they desired, cut off five hundred of them at their first Arrival, who to that purpose were going towards Buda; and took also one of the Turks Chieftains Prisoner; who, sent from Abraham the General, was going to Agria to put them in hope of their speedy Relief. They also at the same time attempted to have surprised Zolna; where, a good number of them, with certain Petards, approaching the Gates, in hope to have broken them open, being discovered by the Watch, were enforced to retire, leaving forty behind them slain, and carrying away with them many more of their Fellows wounded: in revenge whereof, the rest shewed their fury upon the Country thereabout, destroying the Villages, and intercepting a great deal of Munition, which, together with other Viduaks, they met by the way as it was going to Buda and Agria.

Summer now almost spent, Abraham, the great Bassa, in the beginning of September, came to Buda with an Army of an hundred and thirty thousand strong, and from thence, in the Name of his Lord and Master, gave the Emperor to understand at Prague, That for the saving of further effusion of innocent Blood, and not for any fear or distrust of his own Strength and Power, he could be content to hearken unto any reasonable Conditions or Treaty of Peace. Whereunto, both these great Princes (having well wearied themselves with these long Wars, and exhausted their Treasures) seemed not now unwilling, expecting (as was thought) nothing more than for the Honour to be the first creators; and the rather, for that the old Sultans, Mahomet's Mother (who by the weakness of her Sons Government, such as never was in any the Ottoman Kings or Emperors before, did bear the greatest Sway in his Affairs) did what the might to further the same. Wherefore, in the latter end of September a place was agreed upon for a Parle for Peace, which was to be in an Island in the River of Danubius beneath Strigomum; where the Lord Swartzenburg, Nadash, Palfi, and the Bishop of Vacia, a Parle for Peace, came for the Emperor; and Amurath the Peace.

The Turks, for fear, forsake the City at Buda, and fly into the Castle.

The Christians, upon the approach of the Turks great Army, retire.

1522 Baffa of Buda, with the Lieutenant-General of the Tartars, and some others, for the Grand Seignior; The Turks at the first, after their unreasonable manner, demanded to have Rab, Strigomius, Fluk, Setchin, and all the rest of the Towns and Castles in five Years before taken from them by the Christians, to be now again surrendered unto them, with a certain yearly Tribute by the Emperor to be paid unto the Great Sultan at Constantinople; as also that with his Ambassador lieger continually attending upon the Turks Court: for which they offered to deliver again unto the Emperor the City of Agria only. All which their proud and unreasonable Demands being by the aforesaid Commissioners on the Emperor's behalf rejected, they were contented to come to some more reasonable talk, offering to leave unto the Emperor Rab and Agria (whereof Rab was his own already) only for Strigomius, exchanging as it were Strigomius for Agria. Which when it could neither be obtained, the Parle was broken off, and nothing concluded, and so the Wars again continued, without any memorable thing more this Year between them, either on the one side or on the other; the Christians contenting themselves to have distressed the chief Cities the Turks held in Hungary; and the Turks no less aysayed to have relieved the same.

But whilst things thus passed betwixt the Christians and the Turks in Hungary, Mahomet the Viceroy of Valachia, yet the Emperor's Friend and Confederate, and under his Protection, certainly informed his Life to be sought after in the Turks Court, by the ambitious Cardinal Bathor, his envious Neighbour, but lately become the Prince of Transilvania (as is before declared:) by Commandment from the Emperor, and to be recovered by so great a wrong, as also he desired to provide for his own Safety, with an Army of threecore thousand strong suddenly entered into Transilvania, in most horrible manner burning the Country, and killing the People before him as he went. Where, whilst the Cardinal (who was thought to have purposed to have served him in like sort, had he not been by him prevented) was making Head against him, he in the mean time had the City of Corona (commonly called Brafo) with the strong Castle of Fogaras, yielded unto him: from whence he marching toward Alba-Julia, the 26th of October, with all his Army, before divided into three parts, but now again united, came into the Plain near Tenitjon, about three Leagues from Hermantzar; where, understanding that his Lieutenant, corrupted by Ibrahim Baffa, had promised to kill him; and now well assured thereof, to rid himself of that danger, with his own hands presently cut his Throat, and so dispatched him. When by and after came unto him the Pope's Nuncio, sent by a friend of the Cardinal, accompanied with another Ambassador, the better to countenance out the matter; telling him, That the same Ambassador had Commission from the Emperor to will him forthwith to desist from Arms, and without farther delay to depart out of Transilvania. Which thing seeming unto the Vayvod very strange, and almost impossible, he desired to see the said Commission. Whereunto the Nuncio, before instructed, answered, That he had left it with the Cardinal. But I (said the Vayvod) have one here present from the Emperor of another purpose, which I purpose fully to put in execution; yet was he for that day intreated by the Nuncio to stay his Army. And for the mean time lying both ill and in great suspense, the Vayvod desired to know of the Nuncio, the cause why the Cardinal, forgetting himself, so troubled that Country, by intruding himself therein, to the great

1522 prejudice of them unto whom it of better Right belonged, not attending unto the Government of the Church, better befitting a Calling than the managing of Arms, to the disturbance of the Christian Peace. Whereunto he received no Answer. So the 28th of October, a day dedicated to the Commemoration of the Apostles Simon and Jude, these Messengers were sent back again unto the Cardinal, who presently returned them back unto the Vayvod with new Instructions, (being then busied with his young Son, in settling his men in order of Battle presently to go against the Cardinal) of whom they could get no other Answer, but that he was resolved forthwith to come unto the Trial of a Battle with him. So the two Armies lying incamped not past a quarter of a League the one from the other, and the same day meeting together, joyned a most terrible and cruel Battle, which for the space of five hours was with such desperate Obstinacy fought, as if they had every man vowed to overcome, as if they had every man vowed to have carried away the Victory over his Enemy, or there to have left themselves dead upon the ground; until the Cardinal's People, at length overcome in a long and bloody Fight, were utterly overthrown; amongst whom were 30000 Turks and Tartars, sent unto him from Ibrahim Baffa the Turks General. The Cardinal himself, seeing the discomfiture of his Army, was by some reported to have saved himself by flight; but by some others was said to have been drowned in passing a River, as he fled from the Valachians, that had him in chase. But the Truth was, That the Vayvod, now Master of the Field, sent out certain Troops of Horsemen divers ways fill to pursue him; and himself, with the rest of his Army, prosecuting the Victory, came to the Cardinals Camp, now by the Transilvians and Turks quite forsaken, wherein he found forty five pieces of Artillery, with great store of Coin and Wealth, beside a number of Tents and Houses, all which became unto him a Prey. From thence he marched unto Alba-Julia, where he was with great joy received of his Friends and Confederates there: for, though the greater part of the Transilvians, especially the Nobility, had, together with the Cardinal, submitted themselves unto the Turks Protection, and followed his Ensigns; yet were there divers others also, who still favoured the Emperor, and therefore rejoiced not a little of this Victory. The Vayvod after that sent his Lieutenant to Clusioptis, to see if they would yield also; which they willingly did, with many other Cities and Castles in divers parts of that Country, which having none to rest upon, now yielded also in such sort, that shortly after all Transilvania submitted it self again unto the Emperor's Obedience, and swore unto him Obedience; most of the Nobility of that Country being either slain in the Battle, or afterwards put to death by the Vayvod: amongst whom were five, which, corrupted by the Cardinal, had before undertaken to kill him. Now the fourteenth of November, after divers Reports of the Cardinal's Escape, his ungracious Head was for all that presented to the Vayvod: which, to the terror of others, being for a while let up in Alba-Julia, (where he but a little before had commanded as a Prince) was afterwards taken down, and sent for a Present from the Vayvod unto the Emperor and the Arch-dukes his Brethren; his headless Body being afterward, by the Commandment of the Vayvod, honourably buried in a Monastery at Alba-Julia, in the same Tomb he had before made for his Brother, beheaded by his Cousin Sigismund Bathor. The Cardinal's Treasure also fell into his hands, which was said to have been three millions of Gold. Thus the Country of Transilvania, lately before by the Cardinal yielded unto the the Obedience of the Turk, was again by this worthy Vayvod recovered and restored unto the Christian Empire; the proud Cardinal cast out and brought to Confusion, having not yet possessed these his new Honours full eight Months. His Cousin Sigismund, the late Transilvanian Prince, who most all this while had stayed at Brafo, and in disguised Apparel (seen Danike, and divers other the free Cities thereabouts; Now hearing News of the Cardinals overthrow, secretly got him away from thence into Polonia, to seek again his new Fortunes. The Lord Swartzenburg at the same time uniting his Forces in the lower Germany with the Strips, and now more than thousand strong, fought by all means to reduce to many places upon those Frontiers as he could, unto the Emperours Obedience, and so took in above 100 Villages; but afterward, thinking to have surprised the Itching Cape of Capilnar, and by Night secretly approaching one of the Gates with a Petard, which took not the expected effect, he was discovered by the Watch, and so by the Garrison Soldiers (now raised with the alarm) repulsed, and enforced to retire with the loss of about an hundred men, and divers others wounded, all men of good account; in revenge whereof, Swartzenburg afterwards sent out divers Troops of Horsemen, to scourge the Country over the Country as far as Siegh, burned it also, and so returning, carried away from them a great Booty.

Ibrahim Baffa, hearing of this overthrow of the Cardinal, with all the Forces he had sent him, much troubled therewith, sent News thereof in post to Constantinople; the News whereof brought a general fear upon the whole Army also, insomuch that Commission was forthwith sent unto him from the great Sultan, giving him Power (if it might be) to come to some honourable Peace with the Emperor, and to bring it with him to Constantinople; whither he was thursty to return, being now no longer time to keep the field with his Army, which, beside the cold season of the year, fasted great want of Bread, the Plague also then raging therein; with the death of many of his best Soldiers, both Horse and Foot, beside the wonderful Mortality of their Cattel also; in such sort that the Soldiers, not able longer to endure the famine and wants increasing, fell to robbing of one another, and so at length into mutiny; wherein, divers of them being slain and cut in pieces by their Fellows, the rest for the most part brake in funder of themselves, and so by divers ways returned home, not well trusting one another. So that nothing more was now done with the preparation of the Turks, their Army being discomfited with wants and the evil Success of their Affairs, as well in Hungary as in Transilvania. Neither did Ibrahim the great Baffa, for the relief of those Evils, at his return bring any conclusion of Peace unto his great Lord and Master, as was commonly expected.

Now beside these Troubles of Transilvania, and the other distressed Countries, Cosovia (as is before call'd Caffan) the Son of one of the Sultanesses, brought up in the Seraglio according to the manner thereof, and having long served in the Wars of Persia and Hungary, and so at length made Baffa of Caramania, a man of great Spirit, and not able to endure the Imperfections he daily saw in the Ottoman Empire, and the Covetousness of the great Seignior; upon the report of the evil Success of the Affairs of Hungary on the one side, and the desire he saw in the Persians to recover their lost Fortresses, on the other, and grieved also with more particular wrongs concerning himself; as a man altogether discontented, resolved to take up Arms; and calling unto him his Soldiers, and (as he was a well spoken man) laying before them the deformities of the present state, gallantly persuaded them, with the promise of Honour, Sovereignty, and rich Rewards, what an eating time it were to chase the great Seignior out of Asia, and to let themselves with all that part of the Empire at Liberty. And so even at the first having won unto him 3000 Harquebushers and 4000 Horsemen, and took the field, to the great hurt of the Turks, and trouble of the State. A strange matter in that tyrannical Empire. The News whereof coming in post to the Court, Commission was forthwith directed unto four of the Sanzacks of Asia, nearest unto him, for the speedy suppressing of that Rebellion, but even then starting, Cosovia understanding, and that they with ten thousand Horse and Foot were coming to suppress him; without further stay, went courageously to meet them, and so encountering of them, overthrow them with a great laughter, and took from them their Baggage with six pieces of Ordnance. And after with his People fell upon all the Castles thereabouts, giving whatsoever he desired therein for a Prey unto his Soldiers; who also much enriched themselves with the spoil of the Jews, as the People whom they most hated, and never rested until he had made almost all the Country of Caramania his own. After that, he laid siege to Agria, a City in the Confines of Natalia, which was forthwith yielded unto him. And yet not so contented, gave it out by open Proclamation, that for the reformation of the disordered state, he would ere long go to besiege the Imperial City of Constantinople; and that therefore all such as would follow him should of him be benefited as his Friends and Companions, threatening unto the rest most cruel Deaths and Destruction. Of which his Proceeding Mahomet (as then disposing himself in his Gardens of Pleasure in the Country all along the side of Propontis) understanding, and fearing to be there surprised, or that some sudden Innovation might be raised in the City, hastened with a few Companies, and from thence in all haste dispatched Mahomet, one of the Vicer Baffes, the Son of Sinaz, with all the Forces he could make to go against him. Who passing over into Asia with a great Power, and yet fearing to come to the trial of a Battle with him, whom he knew to be a man of himself desperately set, and not a little favoured also even of his own Soldiers; so secretly wrought by large Promises, that Cosovia's Footmen were even upon the point to have forsaken him. Which he quickly perceiving, fled forthwith through Sirva into the Country of Arabia with his Horsemen, and the Horsemen of Sinaz the Georgian, purposing the next Spring by the help of the Arabians and Persians, to appear in the field with greater Forces than before. After whom Mahomet the great Baffa following, came with his Army to Alippo, there to winter, and to expect the return of the Rebel together with the Spring. This so dangerous a Rebellion, with the Troubles of Transilvania and Valachia, were the cause that the great Sultan, seeing himself in so many places forsaken of his Subjects, was the readier to incline unto peace with the Emperor; whereunto for all that, the Emperor was not hasty to hearken, but upon honourable Conditions; as knowing that the Turk required the same not for any desire he had to live at quiet, but for that his troubled affairs both at home and elsewhere abroad so required; his Janizaries and other men of War in this his weak Government, being grown so insolent, as that they were hardly to be by him commanded; openly threatening in their discontented humours, not only the deposing of the principal Officers about him, but of himself also, and of the banishment of the Sultaness his Mother; saying, That he had bewitched him, to the end that 1599 might her self rule, which the indeed did in all his greatest Affairs. But the Rebel Cafabin, the next Year grown again very strong, was now come into the Field, and even ready to have given the Baſſa Batel: who, as he was a Man of great Wisdom and Experience, well considering with what a desperate Enemy he had to do, thought it best again to prove if his rebellious Followers might by fair means be drawn from him; and so coming near unto him, by open Proclamation promised a free and general Pardon to all such as had followed the Rebel in those Wars, if forsaking him, they should forthwith return to their dwellings, and so to the Obedience of their just and lawful Prince and Sovereign. Which general Pardon so proclaimed, was the Ruine of Cafabin; for that the greatest part of his Followers, now enriched with the great Booties they had gotten, and now also having free Pardon offered them, returned home into their own Countries, there at ease to live of their evil gotten Goods, leaving their Captain, with some few others which flaid with him, with little hope to be saved. So that within a few days after, Cafabin, thus forsaken of his Followers, was himself taken and brought to Constantinople, where shortly after he was with most exquisite Torments tortured to death.

1600 The Troubles of this Year thus past, Rodolph the Christian Emperor with the beginning of the next (which the ground yet covered with Snow, and the unseasonableness of the Weather would not suffer the Soldiers to keep the Field) caused a Diet of the Princes of the Empire to be called, to consider what help of such helps as were by them to be given against the next Spring, for the maintenance of the Wars which yet he had against the Turk; who all promised to lend their Soldiers, with their Pay, and such further Contribution as might serve for the maintenance of that defensive War against the common Enemy. At the same time, now Bishop of Rome (this year of Jubile) put to his helping hand, as he had divers times before, by lending thither such aid both of Men and Money as he had before promised: so that by this means great Preparation was made by the Christians for the taking of the Field with the first of the Spring. At which time the Turks began to stir; who, altho Ibrahim Bajla their General, by the appointment of his great Lord, was then in some Speech with the Emperor about a Peace, yet ceased not they in the mean time that this Treaty was from day to day prolonged, with their Companies scattering here and there, to do what harm they could upon the Frontiers of the Emperor's Territories; the cause why he with more speed called upon his Friends for their promised Aid. And for the better managing of this years War against the Turk, he appointed Duke Mercury (who had drawn a great number of French-men, both Horse and Foot, out of France) General of all his Forces, sending Reuant Gennegaz, a famous and famous Captain, who for his approved Valour and Experience in martial Affairs, he had sent for to Mantua) Governour into the upper Hungary. So the Soldiers, now day by day, by Companies resorting from divers parts into Asiria, were from thence sent unto such places as were by the Turks most molested, to go to resist their Incursions, as in many places they did. For eight thousand of the Turks going out upon the sudden to have surprised Pappa, were by the Garrison Soldiers of that place encountered and overthrown. And on the other side, whilst Ferdinand the Arch-duke was assembling his People in Croatia, for the defence of that Country against the Incursions of the Enemy, six thousand Turks, without resistance, entering the same as far as Bucacari, and burning the Country Villages as they went, had 1600 taken many Prisoners with a great Booty of Cattel, and so (to merry and out of fear) being about to have returned, were suddenly let upon by the Country Serins, in certain fit and troublesome Passages, where they least feared any such force, and overcharged also with their Prey, were (they easily by him for the most part overthrown, and the rest put to flight, and so the Prisoners, with all the rest of the Booty, again recovered. At which time also one of the Imperial Colonels, with fifteen hundred Horse, making an Inroad into the Country about Alba-Regalis, and meeting with the Turks and Tartars thereabouts, flew six hundred of them, and took divers of their Captains Prisoners. Six thousand other Tartars also at this time returning out of Hungary home towards their own Country, were by the Cossacks, near unto the black Sea, let upon with such force, that many of them being slain, the rest for fear ran into the Sea, leaving all the Prey they had got in Hungary unto their Enemies. In the heat of these Broils, the noble Lord Papp, Governour of Strigomium, a Man that all his Life long had done great Service for his Prince and Country, and whom we have so often in this History remembered, died the three and twentieth of March, in his Castle at Bienburg, to the great Grief of many, especially the Hungarians his Country-men. And for that Strigomium (so near unto the Enemy) required in his stead, to have a right valiant and courageous Governour, the Emperor appointed the Lord Swarsenberg to that Charge; the Fame still running, that Brabant Basse would come thither to lead a great Army he was in providing, if the Peace were not forward; which was now still less and less hoped for, by reason of his proud and insolent Demands.

But whilst these Troubles, with such others, too long to rehearse, thus passed in divers parts of this miserable Country of Hungary, 1600 French-men and Wallons in Garrison at Pappa (a strong frontier Town of the Emperor's in the lower Hungary) for want of Pay began to mutiny: for which cause, it was thought good to the chief Commanders, to have them thence removed, and others placed in their room. Which they perceiving, and wishing knowing themselves too strong for the rest of the Garrison all Hungarians and Almans, not Partakers of their Conspiracy; they first resolved to thrust their own Captains out of the Town, as lets unto their desires; and then laying hands upon Michael Maranti the Pay-master, and other the Hungarian and Dutch Commanders, with their Soldiers took from them their Weapons, and cast the said Maranti with the other Captains, and some of the better sort of their Soldiers, into Irons, exacting of the rest, as well Hungarians as Dutch, in number about 1000 Persons, 1000 Ducats; threatening otherwise to deliver them into the hands of the Turks; and that altho Maranti offered for his Liberty eighteen hundred Ducats, yet would they not be so contented, but spoiling both him and the rest of all they had, with their Apparel and Weapons furnished such Turks as were there Prisoners, and so sent them away to Alba-Regalis; and afterwards, rifling every man's House as if they had been Enemies, took from them all what they pleased themselves; and that which worst was, to increase these Outrages, compacted with the Turks of Alba-Regalis and Buda, for the Pay which they said the Emperor owed them, to deliver them the Town; certifying them withal, how that the Lord Swarsenberg within two days was coming with Money to give them Contentment; saying, if he came into the Town, to deliver him with the same into their hands; or, to be the more sure of him, they might, if they so pleased, intercept him

1600 him at the Passage Zefnegh, whereby he must needs come. For the more credit of which their wicked purpose, they sent an Ensign of the Emperours, as is taken unto the Turks at Alba-Regalis, who for all that, altogether believed them not, yet willing further to try them, sent them for Hollas, two Chiaus; from whence the Rebels sent also two others of the better sort of them to Alba-Regalis; with Conclusion, that the five and twentieth of June at the furthest, the Money should be paid, and the Town delivered. For the receiving whereof, and for fear of some hidden Treachery, the Turks and Tartars began to make themselves strong; the Imperials also doing what they might for the appeasing of so dangerous a Tumult. So the tenth of June, the Lord Swarsenberg, with two thousand Horse and Foot, came within two miles of the Town, and from thence sent twenty four Horse-men to dissuade the Rebels from yielding the Town unto the Turks, and to tell them that they should shortly receive their pay, who shamefully deriding them, sent them back again as wiles as they came; so that Swarsenberg, perceiving himself with so small forces to be able to do nothing against them, neither yet by fair means to persuade them, retired again to Rab, until some greater strength were come unto him. Immediately after, Doctor Peterson, Counsellor for the Wars, a man of great Authority, Gravity, and Wildom, was by Matthias the Arch-duke, with four hundred Horse, conducted to Pappa, to see if he by his Discretion could have dissuaded them from their so unskillful purpose, for the yielding of the Town unto the Enemy. But when he was only refused to hear, although he spake unto them most kindly, but also bent their Muskets and Harquebuses upon him, threatening to kill him if he did not forthwith depart. When shortly after, twenty of the Hungarians, imprisoned in a Cellar in the Town, brake out, and came out to Rab, crying in News thither, that the French-men and Wallons at Pappa, were at variance amongst themselves about the yielding up of the Town unto the Turks, (some better minded than the rest, not willing to consent thereto) inasmuch, that they in the Castle forth at them in the Town, and they again at them in the Castle; and that they had already received from the Turks twenty thousand Ducats, with some provision of Victuals, and were shortly after to receive from them the rest of the Money promised them, and so to deliver the Town. For preventing whereof, the Lord Swarsenberg, the two and twentieth of June, sent the Lord Sharpenstein with a French Colonel, 3000 Soldiers, certain Rebards, and a number of scaling Ladders towards Pappa; whom the false Rebels suffered peaceably to enter the Town the four and twentieth of June, still encouraging them to come on; calling them their Country-men and Brethren, and in token of Friendship shaking them by the hands, telling them, that altho Maranti offered for their Pay, they desired no more. But having now received in many of them as they thought good, and as they knew they were well able to deal with, shutting thereof out, they cut them all in pieces, and afterwards in despatch called upon the high Dutches to come on in like manner. Three hundred of these Rebels at the same time had laid themselves in ambush by a Mill fast without the Town, who, by the Wallons and Haiducks without discovered, were also by them charged; upon whom for all that, by reason of the short out of the Town, they could do no good; but having lost three hundred men, and amongst them Hambhal Kralcz, the Lord Sharpenstein's Lieutenant General, and one Del la Margole the chief Engineer, they retired; which loss the desperate Rebels (if it had been in their choice) had wished rather to have happened unto the Dutches than to the Wallons or 1600 Hungarians. About three days after, three of these Rebels being by chance taken Prisoners by the Imperials, and brought to Rab, were not only appalled, but also trimmed after the Turkish fashion, as men not desiring longer to be accounted Christians, the rest of their Fellows in the Town also imitating the Turks fashions, as well in their Apparel as in their manner of Service; yet for all that would not these metamorphosed Monstrous yield the Town unto the Turks, before they had the full sum by them agreed upon; the Baſſa of Bofnia being commanded from the Grand Signior in all haste to provide it for them, and so to receive of them the Town. Nevertheless, for their more strength and more credit with the Turks, they received into the Town one Ensign of the Turks, with certain Wagons of Victuals, brought thither with so strong a Convoy as that the Imperials durst not meddle therewith; in which Wagons (being Hungarians and Dutch Men, Women, and Children, Prisoners to Alba-Regalis; being all of them glad to be so sent away, in hope to find more Favour and Countenance at the hands of their Enemies than they had found with these renegade Christian-Messengers unto the Governour of Alba-Regalis; to know his full Resolution; which Messengers (conducted by certain Turks of great account) were upon the way by the free Haiducks all intercepted, and the Messengers taken, with an hundred Turks more. In the mean while, Michael Maranti, before imprisoned by the Rebels in Pappa, by Letters secretly advertised the Lord Swarsenberg of a certain place, whereby he might (as he himself held the Town, and the rather, for that the Rebels were at variance amongst themselves. Who thereupon, the twelfth of July, came to Pappa with nine thousand Horse and Foot; but disappointed of his purpose for entering the Town, hardly nevertheless delayed the time; upon whom the Mutineers many times desperately sallied out, and right valiantly encountered them, albeit that they were still, without any notable loss, by their Enemies (too strong for them) beaten back again into the Town. In one of which sallies it occurred one of their Captains to be taken, who, to the terror of the rest, was presently slain quick, and his Head and Skin upon a Pike set up before the Town, for his Fellows to behold. But the Lord Swarsenberg, still more and more prevailing upon them, they sent secretly for Aid to the Turks; whereof he for all that getting Intelligence, sent also to three Regiments of Soldiers more to come unto him to the Siege; by whose coming he well strengthened, and bringing his approaches nearer the Town, took from the Rebels the Mill, a strength which they very unwillingly lost, as in hope thereby to have the more easily received Aid from the Turks, who having made preparation to have relieved them, were let to do so by the rifling of the Water, which had spoiled all the Provision for day and relief at the Bridge of Eſſe, as also hindered them for marching forward. At length the Imperials were come with their Trenches even to the Town Ditches, out of which they had let out all the Water; where, some of the Townsmen escaping out of the Town, declared how that the mutinous Soldiers within laboured both day and night to fortify the Town, but to be in their work much letted by the continual sallies of the Imperials; as also, that they now had neither Bread nor Wine, nor other Victuals left, more than a little Salt, and therefore Horse, of which they had already begun to eat, as any that which they had left was not altogether so valiant, yet that they had resolved to die by the Hands

1600 of the Soldiers, as men expecting no other Mercy. Yet shortly after, viz. the ninth and twentieth of July, they desperately fell upon the Trenches of Malspergich, a Dutch Captain; of whose Soldiers they slew many, being drunk, and driving the rest out of their Trenches, raised a great Alarm. Which the Lord Sparsenburg hearing, halted thither to the Refuge; where, with an unlucky Musquet-shot he was struck in the Head and slain: whereof the Rebels got knowledge the same evening; and Del la Mata their General, in reward of that Service gave unto them that had made that Sally a thousand Dollars to be divided among them. The dead Body of that so worthy a man, as had done great Service for the Christian Commonwealth, was afterwards with great Solemnity brought to Rab, and there honourably interred. The like desperate Sally they made again the next day, and slew of the Imperialists an hundred and thirty, and took certain Prisoners: and in retiring back again into the Town, cried aloud, That when they lacked meat, rather than they would yield the Town, they would eat Christians, whereof Marotti should be the first.

The Lord Sparsenburg thus slain, the Government of the Army was by Matthias the Arch-duke committed to the Lord Kedern, a Noble man, both valiant and learned; who, although he were very sickly, came unto the Camp before Pappa the eighth of August; where, understanding that the Rebels now brought unto Extremity, had a purpose by night to fly away and to be gone, he caused a more vigilant and strong Watch to be kept, when lo, according to his Expectation, the next night after, about two hours before day they began to issue out; whereof the Watch giving knowledge to the General, they were indeed suffered to go out as unperceived, but presently after their heels were sent out the Lord Kedern, and the Earl of Thurn, with 200 Hussars, and after them the chief Colonel and County Solms, with part of their Horse-men also, who in three divers places overtaking them near unto a great Wood called Packem, flew most part of them; Del la Mata, their chief Captain or King-leader, being slain by the chief Colonel, because he would not yield, and his Head afterwards by him presented unto the General in the Camp; 200 Wallons, the Hussars under the leading of the Lord Nadassi, County Solms, and County Thurn, found out in the Woods; who albeit that they for a space made great resistance, yet in the end were inticed to yield, and to follow their Enemies were brought into the Camp. The Hussars also, upon another Passage light upon other 200 more of these rebellious Wallons, who, because they stood strongly upon their Guard, and were more desperately set than the rest, the General sent out other 200 of the Colonnels Horse-men upon them, by whom, and the Hussars, they were almost all slain; and of the rest of them also were slain in coming out of the Town, and in the Marishes thereabout. Their General's Lieutenant, with such other of their principal Commanders as were taken; were by the Lord Kedern Commandment delivered unto the Provost Martial; the rest of the rebellious Traitors he, at the request of the Soldiers, divided into divers parts of the Army, there, to the terror of others, to be executed, from whom the Soldiers could hardly be persuaded even for the present to hold their hands. But afterwards having brought them to Rab, and leave given them to do with them their Pleasure, they as far exceeded in the cruel manner of their Execution, as had they before in their outrageous Dealings, especially the Hungarians and Wallons, notwithstanding most of them were of the Wallon Countries. Some 1600 of them they impaled, some they broke upon the Wheel; some of their Skins they cut off their Bodies as it were into Thongs, and so poured into the Wounds Vinegar, Salt, and Pepper: from some others they cut off their Privities, some they rolled, and some they put into the Tenalia; upon some they dropped molten Pitch, and then calling Gun-powder upon them, so burnt them to death; other some they hanged upon iron Hooks, and some they put in the ground up to the Chin, and for their disposal, with iron Burrs, bowled at their Heads; on all which Torments, no sign of Compassion was to be seen, the Tormentors, to make their Pain the greater, doing nothing but deride them; the miserable Wretches, in the mean time, confessing the heinousness of their Offence, and craving for Death as a Favour. A most horrible thing it was to see, how whilst some were thus tortured, others were brought to see the misery they themselves were by and to endure. Amongst the rest of these exquisite Torments, one Peter Orly caused one of the Mutineers to be sewed up in the Belly of a Mare, with his Head hanging out; and to be rolled; in which miserable Torment, he lived three hours, and then died; after which, he caused the loathsome Body to be rolled, to be given to them that lay farving upon the Wheel, to eat. Thus was the dangerous Mutiny at Pappa, with much ado ended, and that strong Town, which to have been left, preferred: the Rebels themselves being become a dreadful example to all Posterity, for all them to look upon that shall attempt the like Villany.

Now at this same time also, though neither the Christians nor the Turks had as then any great Army in the Field, yet many an hot and bloody Skirmish passed daily betwixt them in one place or other of Hungary, all which to recount, as it would be much tedious to us, I desire to pass by; all over, were greatly to wrong those worthy Persons by whom they were not, without their great Adventure, done. Amongst the rest, one Nicholas Horbath, County Serinus's Lieutenant, with 150 Soldiers, and Andrew Thuffi, another great Commander, going forth to seek for Booby Thuffi hearing that the Turks were abroad for the surprising of certain Haiducks then gone out, flaid fast in a secret place until he might hear farther News, Horbath another way still going on. Now it appeared, that the Bassa of Siegh having been abroad, in returning home; by chance met with Horbath, and encountering with him overtook him, and slew most of his men, Horbath himself by flight hardly escaping. But Thuffi, hearing this Skirmish, as lying close not far off, and now halting thither to have been Partaker thereof, found the Bassa yet in the Field on foot, viewing the Bodies of the slain; upon whom he came so suddenly and with such Force, as that the Bassa, with his disordered men, had much ado to take Horse, and so with other great resistance to berate himself to flight; after whom the Hungarians fiercely following, flew many of the Turks; and amongst the rest the Bassa himself, whose Head, presently cut off, Horbath sent to the County Serinus, who shortly after, by Thuffi himself, sent to Matthias the Arch-duke. This Bassa was a man of great Strength and Courage, a most expert and adventurous Captain, about thirty six years old; and for his Valour, of a common Soldier; created a Bassa, by the Great Sultan. His Head being brought to Vienna, and shewed to the Bassa of Buda, then their Prisoner, and he demanded whether he knew it or not, fighting answered, that he knew it was so; and that it was the Head of the Bassa of Siegh, a braver man than whom the Sultan had none in all his Empire, earnestly wishing to know how he was was slain. But not long after, the Adventurers out of Komara, Strigomion, and other places thereabout, having made a great Party, and taken a great Booby from the Turks at a Fair at Comara, and by Tra and Ejfe, thinking to have passed Danubius in hope of a greater Booby, seven hundred of them being passed the River, were by the new Bassa of Siegh and others, with five thousand Turks, in six hot Skirmish overthrown; yet not without their great loss also: the Bassa himself, with two other Sanzacks and five hundred Turks, being there slain, and but fifty of the Christian Adventurers left dead in the place, the rest disordered retiring to their Boats, being for most part drowned in the Danubius. The free Haiducks also surprised Jula, and let iron fires, in which Confusion the Turks flying into the Castle, for haste thrust one another from the Bridge into the Castle ditch; wherein so many of them were drowned, that a man might have gone dry foot over upon the bodies of the dead. They took there also six hundred Prisoners, with much other Booby, and delivered two hundred Christians which were there Captives. And albeit that these Haiducks after this Exploit done, were hardly pursued by the Turks from other places, yet they in safety retired with such Booby as they had already gotten.

But now to leave these the Troubles of Hungary for a while, as the fore-runners of greater ere long to ensue, let us again look back into Transylvania and Polachia, to see how Micheis, to say now in the mean time behaved himself there. The Cardinal Barbor overthrown and slain, and the Country of Transylvania again brought under the Emperor's Obedience; the Vayvod by his Ambassadors gave him forthwith to understand of all his Proceedings, with the whole Success thereof, as also of a purpose he had to invade Moldavia; for that it was commonly reported, and also believed, That Sigismund the late Prince (not a little moved with the death of the Cardinal his Cousin, and the Revolt of his Country) aided by the Turks, the Tartars, the Polonians, and Moldavians, would now attempt some great matter for the recovery of Transylvania: all which, was shortly after the rather thought to be true, for that divers of his Spies being taken, some at Clusenburgh, some at Nessen, beside the Letters that were found about them from him unto the Nobility and States of Transylvania, (persuading them to revolt from the Vayvod unto him, and that his meaning was thereby to come with a great Army out of Polonia for the repelling of him) they also of themselves confessed. How that Sigismund, in disguised Apparel, had himself been in Transylvania, to confer with divers his secret Friends concerning that matter. Which his Ambassadors the Emperor honourably entertained, and by them confirmed unto the Vayvod the Government of Transylvania, sending also unto him divers honourable Presents, forbidding him nevertheless to invade Moldavia, for fear of raising a new and dangerous War against the Polonians also, under whose Protection and the Turks the Palatine thereof then rested. According unto which Commandment the Vayvod layed his intended Expedition; yet sending some good part of his Forces unto the Frontiers of Moldavia, for fear of Sigismund, whom he heard to be hatching some mischief in Polonia, and even then to lie upon the Frontiers of that Country. Some few months thus passing, Hosfain Aga (a grave reverend old man, and much employed by the Turkish Sultan) with five other Turks of good account, Ambassadors from the Great Sultan, and a great Retinue following him, came to Grontha in Transylvania, where the Vayvod then lay. Of whose coming the Vayvod hearing, with four thousand Horsemen most bravely mounted, went half a mile out of the City to meet them; the Foot-men in the mean time on both sides of the Street standing in good order, from the Gate of the City whereby they were to enter, even unto the Vayvod's Lodging, where stood also his Guard all in red and white Silk. So meeting in the field, they both alighted from their Horses, with great reverence saluting the one the other: when presently the Ambassador embracing the Vayvod, ungirt his Scimitar, and in the like Horses richly furnished, told them about him, so richly garnished with Gold and precious Stones, as that no part of the Scabbard was therefore to be seen: besides this, he presented him with a fair Plume of black Hears Feathers mixed with some white, (a right goodly Ornament, in form of a great bush) which the Vayvod would not in the Field put upon his Head, although he were thereunto by the Ambassador most earnestly requested, but caused it to be carried before him: he also presented him with two very fair red Ensigns, in token of the Turks favour and protection; the one for himself, and the other for his son Petrarfo; moreover, he gave unto him two exceeding fair Polonians, the Vayvod four others, and a most fair Faulcon. The Vayvod himself was most bravely mounted, and (after the manner of his Country) had ten very fair spare Horses led before him. At whole Entrance into the Town, all the great Ordinance was discharged, with great Volleys of small Shot; and to the Ambassadors followed on the left hand of the Vayvod, being brought to his Lodging, had six of his chief Followers every one of them presented with a rich Robe of Cloth of Gold: in requital whereof, the Ambassador rewarded an hundred of the Vayvod's Followers every one of them with good suit of Apparel: with this Ambassador of the Turks was also sent the Ambassador, whom the Vayvod in like manner honourably entertained. These Ambassadors (as was thought) did what they might to have drawn this worthy and renowned Man, together with the Counties of Transylvania and Valachia, from the Emperor unto the Turks Obedience: howbeit, he seldom or never spake with them, but that either before or after he had Conference with the Lords Ungnad and Zeekel (the Emperor's Commissioners) concerning their Requests; always protesting unto them, not to yield to any thing without the Emperor's Consent and good liking. Whereof Mahomet advertised, and that he was not by any thing yet said or done to be removed from the Emperor, gave him by the same Ambassadors to understand, How that he was in some Speech with the Emperor concerning Peace (as indeed he then was by Messengers from the Bassa at Presburg) which if it forced to effect, that then it should be well; but if not, that then it should be good for him, whilst yet he had time, wisely to consider of his own Estate, and to submit himself upon his Protection who was able to defend him, rather than for the vain praise of a certain foolish Constancy, to adventure himself, with all that he had, unto most certain Danger and Destruction: promising him in recompence of that his Loyalty, to give unto him for ever, the Counties of Transylvania, Valachia, and Moldavia; and at his need to furnish him both with Men and Money; offering moreover to make him a great Commander in his Army in Hungary, and the Bassa of Temeswar, as his Friend, to be at all times ready with fifty thousand Horse, and as need should be, to assist him against the Emperor, referring unto himself whatsoever he should more win for him: for all which Bounty and Kindness requiring only to have him unto him loyal. All which his 1600 large offers the Vayvod little regarding, declared the same unto the Emperours Commissioners: yet still protesting never to flart, but to stand fast for the Christian Emperour. Notwithstanding, as a man desirous to better his estate, he took hereupon occasion to requell of the Emperour the Countrey of Transilvania, by him so lately taken in, unto him and his Son, in Inheritance for ever; with such frontier Towns as in former time belonged unto Transilvania: and that whatsoever he should win from the Turks, might be his and his Sons. He also requested, that his Treasurers and Dignities, in former time granted by his Imperial Majesty, unto Sigismund the late Prince, might now be bestowed upon himself; and for his Service done, to be furnished with Money for the payment of his Souldiers: And that the Emperour, with the other Princes of the Empire, should assure him, That if he were taken by the Turks, they should ransom him; but in case he were by the great power of the Turk driven out of those Countreys, then, by the Emperours appointment, to have some convenient Place allotted for him in the upper Hungary to live in, with the yearly pension of an hundred thousand Dollars. All which his requests, if it would please him to grant, he promised this year to do so much against the Turks, as had not been done in an hundred years before; with vaunt, that if he had had the Employment of the Money which was spent in the time of this War, he would not have doubted but to have brought all the Countreys from the Euxine (or black Sea) to Buda, Alba-Rogatz, and Salnack, under the Emperours Dominion. A large promise indeed, but hardly to have been performed by a far greater Prince than he.

Thus whilst things stood in discourse after the Cardinals Death, Sigismund, the late Prince, in the mean time supported by the Polonians, with the Aid of the Turks, the Tartars, and the Moldavians, was ready to have indeed triumphed over the Tartars, (as the fore-runners of his great power) were already entered the Country, and had out of the Frontiers thereof carried away some booty. Whereof the Vayvod understanding, in great haste assembled his forces out of all places, which in short time was grown to some good hand, the Country People, together with the free Habsks (an adventurous and resolute kind of Souldiers) in great number daily resorting unto him. So being now eight thousand strong, and most of them brave and lusty men, he with them and twenty pieces of Artillery, removed to Gronath the four and twentieth day of April, sending part of his Army (which every day more and more increased) before him to Neszen, where all his forces being assembled to the number of almost fifty thousand Horse and Foot, he with great Ceremony paid the rough and high Mountains into Moldavia, without resistance, but yet not without some trouble, his Souldiers by the way being glad sometimes to cut the Leaves of the Trees, the Enemy having of purpose before carried away whatsoever he could that might have yielded him relief. Of whose speedy coming and great strength, Sigismund and Jeremias the Vayvod of Moldavia hearing, and upon the reasonable estimate of their own Forces, finding themselves too weak to encounter him, retired themselves out of Moldavia into the Frontiers of Polonia, there to gather greater strength, and so to meet him; for as yet Jeremias the Vayvod had not received from the Turk such Forces as were unto him promised, and as he still expected. Michael the Vayvod in the mean time (his Enemies thus fled) with Fire and Sword entering into Moldavia, took in the greatest part thereof, the fearful Country People still yielding unto him as he went; and the rather, for that Jeremias their Vayvod (placed by the Polonian, but tributary unto the Turk) had laid upon them a most grievous Imposition, as upon every man a Duckat a Month, for which they exceedingly hated him. But here in Moldavia, Michael the Vayvod (having still in his Company one of the Emperours Commissioners in Transilvania, most trusty Servants, who might faithfully report unto them the whole manner of his Proceedings) after the departure of Sigismund and Jeremias, his Enemies, flattered not long; but hearing that they were retired towards the Confines of Polonia, without longer delay made towards them, and the eighteenth day found them by the Castle Obino, near unto the River Nesler, being thirty thousand strong, Polonians, Moldavians, Turks and Tartars; with whom he joyntly a most fierce and cruel Battle, which begun about ten a Clock before Noon, was with great Courage, but greater Obstinacy on both sides, maintained until the Evening. At which time the Fortune of the Valachian prevailed, his Enemies at last betook themselves to flight, of whom there were slain eight thousand, beside many others of them drowned in the River Nesler: where, of the Valachians were lost two thousand onely. Concerning Sigismund and Jeremias, divers reports were after this overthrow given out; some saying that they were slain, and some, that they were flying drowned; howbeit the truth was, that they both by flight escaped, to the greater trouble of themselves, as of their afflicted Countreys also. Michael, after this so notable a Victory, taking in the rest of Moldavia, caused the People to swear their Obedience unto the Emperour, himself, and his Son, to the great offence of the Polonians: yet as (they took it) wronged therein; but especially of the great Chancellor, an old Enemy unto the House of Austria. Whereof ensued greater Troubles in those frontier Countreys than before, to the further effusion of more Christian Blood, much better to have been employed against that fatal Enemy, in defence of the Christian Commonwealth. Yet thus the three warlike and frontier Countreys of Transilvania, Valachia, and Moldavia, the sure Bulwarks of that side of Christendom, and most exposed unto the Fury of the common Enemy, were now once again united under the Obedience of the Emperour, to the great benefit (no doubt) of the Christian Common-weal, and hurt of the Turks; if they might have to continued, as God wot, they did not long.

Now the Vayvod, notwithstanding this so great a Victory, well considering that he of himself could hardly keep this new gained Province of Moldavia against the Power of the Turk, (prejudging that to him it belonged as his own to give to whom he pleased:) as also against the Polonians, (not more desirous to restore Jeremias again into Moldavia, than the Prince Sigismund into Transilvania) without the help of some other more mighty Prince whom he might rest upon; by his Ambassadors (sent for that purpose) offered the sovereignty of all those three Countreys unto the Emperour, with Condition, that he should appoint him perpetual Governour of the same under him. The Emperour also understood, how that Mahomet the great Turk had not long before again sent unto him another of his Chans, commanding him without delay to restore the Countrey of Transilvania unto the Prince Sigismund (unto whom he was by the Mediation of the King of Polonia now before reconciled) threatening otherwise, with Fire and Sword to destroy Valachia, and by force of Arms to deprive him both of Transilvania and his Life together. Wherefore the Emperour, doubting lest the Vayvod, either for fear, or for the better securing of his own estate, should to his Prejudice fall to some agreement with the Turk, yielded to that that his Ambassadors had of him requested; with Condition, that he should be bound, as need should require, to serve with his People against the Turk; and that in Transilvania, near unto his own Person, should be always resident one of the Emperours Commissioners, as Superintendent over the whole Countrey. Wherewith the Vayvod being contented, the Emperour sent thither Doctor Piszen with six thousand Souldiers, and a great Sum of Money to pay the Vayvod's Souldiers, as he had before requested; and to take of them an Oath, That they should from thenceforth become his Majesties Souldiers, as Superintendents over the Countrey by the Emperour sent, the Vayvod being with great Honour, as unto him of all others most welcome. Nevertheless, being again returned into Transilvania, it was not long but that (without regard of him) he began with new exactions to oppress the People of the Countrey, and in some sort to tyrannise over them; using great severity against the Nobility also, especially such as he knew to have taken part before with the Cardinal, or now to have with Sigismund his Cousin, or any way to have favoured his Quarrel. All which he did without the consent or good liking of Piszen, contrary to his Promise made. No more to imbrue his hands in the blood of the Nobility of Transilvania, without the Knowledge or Consent of his Imperial Majesty, or the Superintendent by him appointed; which for all that, if he had not done, he could not possibly have kept them (dissuading to be governed by him) under his Obedience. Nevertheless, the Transilvanians, taking it in evil part to be so oppressed, and the Nobility almost extinguished, yea and indeed to be as all ruled by him, by general Consent, as if it had been but one man, rise all up in Arms against him; inso much, that he finding himself with his Valachians and other his Favourites too weak for them, retired with all such as would follow him, into the Mountains; and from thence sent presently for Aid unto the Lord George Basta (a worthy Captain, and then the Emperours Lieutenant in the upper Hungary) for the subduing of these rebellious People, and the reducing of them to their former Obedience. Who, by Letters from Matthias the Arch-duke, at the instance of the Vayvod, commanded to do, with about 6000 Horse and Foot, and eight Field-pieces, removed from Cassovia in the upper Hungary the fourth of September. Where, by the way, came unto him Ambassadors also from the People of Transilvania, now up in Arms, and Confederate also against the Vayvod; who in like manner also requested his Aid, pretending themselves to be the Emperours most loyal Subjects, but not under the Government of such a Tyrant as was the Vayvod; alleging and exaggerating many his most cruel Actions, and clearly protesting, That for the present want of a good Governour, they were informed, for the safeguard of their Lives, to band themselves together: which if happily it might be (as any thing prejudicial unto the Emperours claim in any thing pertaining unto the Emperours Aid and interest) which he with great toil and cost had procured in that Province, it was against their Wills, as enforced by necessity to do that they did in defence of themselves. Which Ambassadors so sent from the People, Basta with all speed dispatched away back again, comforting them, without farther hit to expect his Arrival in Transilvania; as all yet covenanteding withal. That they should before conceive into writing the Oath of their Fidelity and Allegiance unto his Imperial Majesty. Now might many and important Considerations trouble the Mind of Basta in so doubtful a case. To give Aid unto the Vayvod against the People, was the express Order from Matthias the Arch-duke, the Emperours Lieutenant-General; but to aid the

People confederate against him, as they had requested, seemed now both more profitable and honest, especially having most certain Tokens of the small and doubtful Faith of the Vayvod; who, only by disputation intertended in that Province, was not so careful of another man's; neither seeming to have regard to Piszen, or of his own word given for no longer imbruing his hands in the Blood of the Nobility of Transilvania, without the Emperours knowledge and leave; upon which Promise was likewise grounded the Arch-dukes Order for giving of him Aid: so that such breach of his Faith, and contempt of Piszen, had kindled the Conspiracy of the People against him, detaching of all other Health than that which by force of Arms they could procure unto themselves. To stand doubtful himself, or to hold others in suspense, until that by Courtiers in this new case he might receive new Instructions from the Emperour or the Arch-duke, had in it too much danger, as giving leisure to each Party to make hides, and to increase thelander of the last Year. That he might so easily (and especially from the Valachians) have assured that Province to his Majesty, had been not been an heartless man of no Resolution, even such an one as durst not look upon a Cat, (as some had said) all which might not a little prick an honourable Mind. To take part with the People confederate against the Vayvod, if it should not happily fall out at the first Encounter, might betwixt the two Contentants give an entrance unto a third, either the Turk or the Polonian, in the favour of Bathor: but if it should turn to the quite contrary, and so himself to lose the day; then he saw himself void of all defence against the malicious, especially in that the world commonly measureth the Widom often in any Affairs according to the Success thereof, than which nothing can be more unfeasible, but above all others, in matters of War. In this so troubled a Tempest of contrary Winds, of power to have driven a right good Mariner out of his Course, Basta laid hand upon the Helm of good-meanning, and spread the Sails of discretion, as taught him in matters of War to be lawfull for a General to depart even from the Instructions of his Prince, not concerning the end, but the means leading to that end: especially when the present Occasion lo required, which the Prince could not with reason before comprehend, as depending on the most mighty Fortune of War, which sufficeth not so much delay as to expect Counsel from far. So in this Ambiguity Basta resolved to joyn himself unto the Confederates, most, in his Judgment, concerning his Imperial Majesty, as being the uttermost folly of his (so great cost and charge, to keep the Countrey of Transilvania at his Devotion, which consisted in the People, and not in the Woods or Mountains: the matter being not great by what means forever it were done, so that it were honourable and honest.

Upon this Desire Basta set forward, and the 14th day arrived at Torda, and there joynted himself unto the Confederates, to the great wonder of the Vayvod, in whose help he was sent: where, reporting himself one day, consulting and considering of their Forces, about 12000 strong, with four Field-pieces, besides eight of his own, with the six thousand Souldiers he brought with him, in all about eighteen thousand, he determined not to give leisure unto the Vayvod to call unto him farther help, having now with him about twenty thousand Foot and two thousand Horse, with seven and twenty Field-pieces; amongst whom were divers of the Siechi, in hope of their ancient Liberty. Men of good account and fort, with a mixture of the Coffacks, Valachians, Raficans, and Servians, People of Pref, serving only to spoil: whom whom Baſta knew to be far inferior in Courage to his twelve thousand Foot and fix thousand Horſe; not only for the Valour of his own Men, accuſtomed unto the frontier Service, but alſo for the Confederates, who engaged with their Goods, Lives, and Honour, and deſirous to be revenged of the Vayvod, were like enough to ſtand well by it. Wherefore he ſet forward the ſixteenth day, and in two days march came within fight of the Vayvod; who having ſent out certain great Troops of Horſe-men to take view of the Enemy, and ſeeing them repulſed, ſet out on Mirſia, a Village ſit by, out of which they had before drawn certain ſmall Field-pieces into the Camp.

Mirſia is a Village two Leagues on this ſide of Alba-Julia, directly upon the High-way, ſtretching from the ſide of Maracra navigable River, unto the foot of an Hill; along which the River runs, ſometimes nearer, and ſometimes farther off; together with the rifing of the Hill, maketh an unequal lift of ground, in ſome places half a mile broad and more, and in ſome other ſhut up as it were into a narrow Throat, as in the ſelf ſame place where the aforeſaid Village ſtandeth, and where the Vayvod lay incamped in a place of great Advantage, behind a great Trench drawn from the River, croſs that little place of ground betwixt the Mountain and the River. On this ſide, which from Mirſia the farther a man goeth, the farther the Plane enlargeth, Baſta incamping cloſe unto the Village, oppoſed againſt the coming of the Enemy three great Corps de gar, two of them Hungarians, towards the Hill, favoured with Church, and the third toward the River, of the Almain Foot-men, under the Charge of County Tomaſo Camilli of Breſcia, Serjeant-Major of the Field, with all the Artillery; who, as in a place near and very open unto the Enemy, there-increnched himſelf, approaching ſo cloſe to the Enemy both on the one ſide and the other. Towards the evening of the ſelf ſame ſeventeenth day, came to Baſta one Peter Armenia, with Letters from the Vayvod, containing, That having underſtood of his Arrival in the Camp of the Conſpirators, he now farther deſired to know whether it were by the Content and Commandment of the Emperor or not; and how it came to paſs that he would do, conſidering the divers chances of War, the Sword hanging as it were even over his Head if he ſhould chance to loſe the Battel? Whereunto Baſta answered, That the morrow following he would hear him the Authority he had from the Emperor (alluding to the Imperial Standard he carried with him), and that as concerning the Fortune and Danger to enſue, he referred that wholly unto the Will and Pleaſure of the Almighty, the juſt Judge of all Controverſies. But in the mean time he exhorted him to leave that Province he had ſo evil governed unto his Imperial Maſteſty, as he was in duty bound; promiſing him free Paſſage into Valachia, and giving him time to conſider, after which time it ſhould be free for every Man to do for himſelf what he could. Which Answer the Vayvod having read, inflamed with diſdain, with many proud Words, full of Threats and Diſgrace, although it was then night, preſently cauſed, by the Sound of the Drum and Trumpet, the Battel to be proclaimed againſt the next day.

On the other ſide, Baſta, after he had aſſured his Camp, having not only ſent, but gone himſelf to have the council of his own Eyes, for his better underſtanding how the Enemy lay; and finding no reaſonable means for him there to attempt any Exploit by, as well for the ſtrength of the Trench before the Front, and in part along the ſide of the Enemies Camp, as alſo for the danger of a riſing ground on the left hand, whereunto all the Plane betwixt the Enemies Camp and the Village was ſubject, thought it beſt to remove, and make a ſhort Retreat about the ſpace of an Italian mile; according to the commodiouſneſs of the place; thinking it no hard matter, of ſo proud an Emperor, not altogether ſo well acquainted with martial Stratagems, to gain a notable Victory. This his purpoſe propounded in Council, was greatly diſliked of the Captains of the Confederates; unto whom it ſeemed more ſafe to ſtand before the Vayvod, yet lying in his Strength, than to retire before the face of an Enemy ſo ſtrong and adventurous; for that ſuch a Retreat accounted to the manner of that Country, would be deemed no other than a plain flight; and to break his Order and aſſile, was (as they ſaid) but to diſcourage his own People, and to encourage his Enemies. But Baſta, the better to perſuade them, promiſed therefore to them a more cunning kind of flight than was yet unto them known; and declared the aſſurance that he in his own Perſon, with all the Almains, in the Retreat would give them in that Retreat, in ſuch fort, as that they ſhould not loſe to ſuch a man, much leſs they needed to fear to fall into any diſorder in ſo ſhort a place, his purpoſe being only to give the Plane unto the Enemy, wherein to ſlew himſelf in the open Field. The Retreat being agreed upon, the Morning following, being the 28th. of September, the three Corps de guard, (before ſpoke of) were betwixt called back, and the Baggage ſent away; after which following the Confederates and Hungarians, the Almains in the Retreat inclining the great Ordnance.

The Vayvod, aware of their Departure, ſent forthwith a great Troop of Horſe-men, eſpecially of the Cofacks, to take view of them, and to ſtir-miſh with them; which were ſo far kept off by the Company of Musketeers in the Retreat, as that they could not come ſo nigh as to do any harm; although that all the way they went they were by them ſtill charged, to the great Contentment of Baſta, to ſee ſo good a beginning of his Deſigns as might bring them all to their wiſhed Effect. But when he ſaw the great Artillery upon the Carriages to come out of the Village, a certain ſign that the Enemy ſet forward with all his Forces, he marched fair and ſoftly to give him hope to overtake him; and ſo retired as far as he thought good to the Village, having before thought of a convenient place wherein his People might, with room enough, upon advantage ſtay; whereas about half a mile from him, and as far from the Village, he might ſee the Enemy march with his People in order of Battel: then began he to march towards him alſo; and perceiving the Enemy to come on in one open, thick Front, by reaſon of the ſtrainneſs of the place, having on the right hand towards the River placed as it were all his Horſemen, and towards the Mountain his Foot-men alone, and 500 Foot placed aloſt without any Artillery, as it were, would have done, having planted ſome below at the foot of the Hill in the way, and in the midſt, even before the Front of the Battel, where the Horſe-men came after the Foot-men; he alſo placed his Squadron in one Front only, to the intent not to be incloſed by the Enemy on the flank of his Army. The body of his main Battel conſiſted of one great Squadron of about 3000 Almain Foot-men, flanked on each ſide with 150 Troops of Siſſia; before the Squadron toward the right hand he had ſet a looſe Wing of three hundred Musketeers; in the right Wing towards the Hill he placed a Company of Land ſoldiers, with two Squads of the Country-Footmen; and in the Wing towards the River one Squadron of Transilvania Foot-

Foot-men, and two of Launces, for that the Enemy was at that time very ſtrong in Horſe-men; the Cofacks, Archers, and Harquebutiers, he placed in the Rearward; of his great Artillery he would make no uſe, for that having not much, he would not ſtand upon the defence thereof, but deſired rather, with all speed, to come to the Sword with the Enemy, unacquainted with ſuch cloſe fight, foot to foot; and well the leſs fir, by reaſon of their light Armour. And therefore he thought it beſt fir to ſet forward his Squadron of Almains to give the charge, bending towards the right hand, and ſet forward the thickets of the Foot-men towards the Artillery at the foot of the Hill, as there whereas was the ſtrength of the Enemies Infantry. And doubting in the performing hereof, to be charged on the left ſide with a great Squadron of about 3000 Launces, which ſeemed to ſtand upon that Wing to give the firſt charge, he gave order unto Rodion, his Lieutenant, and Colonel of the Rutters, which had the leading of the left Wing, that he ſhould at a certain ſign given, ſet forward towards the left hand, for the charging of that great Squadron. So his People being fir in order, and the manner of proceeding fir down, he putting on his Helmet, with chearful Countenance ſaid, That at that time he truſted he ſhould ſlew unto the Vayvod, that his Truncheon could do more than his Scimitar; and himſelf ſetting forward betwixt the Squadron of the Almain Foot-men and the Wing of the Musketeers, about two hours after Noon, marched fair and ſoftly towards the Enemy; who without moving, expected the diſcharging of their Artillery, and ſaw the nearer that the Enemy came unto it, the leſs harm it did him, by ſhooting either over or ſhort in the Field, which eaſily aſcended. The Wing of Musketeers went directly to give a charge unto the Artillery; and the Squadron toward the foot of the Hill, where Baſta deſired forcibly to charge, that thereby they might be encouraged to ſpend their fir Volleys, and with ſome diſcouragement or diſorder to retire, preſently came in, all aſſont, juſt upon the ſign given; and ſo with his Almain Foot-men, and the Rutters on the right hand, enſloſed and compaſſed in behind the greateſt part of the Enemies Foot-men. As which very inſtant, the Rutters on the left hand alſo ſo courageouſly charged upon the three thouſand Launces, that better could not have been deſired of any band of moſt old and expert Soldiers. The Launces retiring without any hurt, and the fir Volley diſcharged, forced the Infantry, and ſo diſordered the reſt. Whereupon the Wings charging, there enſued preſently a great laughter and overthrow, on the ſorry of Baſta's men being ſlain, and as many hurt; where of the Enemies were loſt in the battel ten thouſand; and greater had the laughter been, if the Village and approach of the Night had not covered many of them that fled, and ſtaied the purſuit of the Victors that followed them. Which victory, by the remembrance of the great Victory that Scipio Africanus had againſt Antiochus, wherein were ſlain of the Romans, but three hundred (although that in the fight one of the Wings ſtood for a time doubtful) there being loſt of the Enemies above fifty thouſand. Howbeit there were afterwards found in all (as was by the Plans of the Country reported) twenty thouſand ſlain in this Battel. By this Victory Baſta recovered many Enſigns and much Armour, before ſent by the Emperor unto the Vayvod, together with all his Tents and Baggage. And preſently after the overthrow, there were many Troops of Horſe-men ſent out every way with Proclamation, to call the Lives of the Sieſis as ſhort as they could down their Arms; of whom, many were ſent Priſoners unto divers Places, eſpecially to Roga-

ras, a ſtrong Town towards Valachia. As for the Vayvod himſelf, he with certa in Cofacks eſcaped by flight.

The morrow following, Baſta diſpatched away the County Camilli to inform the Emperor of all the Particularities of the Succes of that Expedition; who ſeemed to be therewith pleaſed, yet neither gave Reward unto the County, neither commended Baſta in that he had done (foreſeeing perhaps what was to enſue thereof) although he had in Writing before approved his Reſolution and Motion made in favour of the Confederates. Saying that day in that quarter, Baſta gave order unto the Chiahi, to ſend out a Thouſand Horſemen to purſue the flying Vayvod; who, inſtead of ſo doing, joining themſelves with other their Conſorts, ſetled themſelves to raniſack Alba-Julia, under the Colour, that there was the Vayvod's Wealth and Subſtance; yet (as the manner of ſuch men is) ſparing neither Merchant nor Citizen; which wrought ſeemed unto Baſta a great wrong, for to ſee the innocent puniſhed, and the guilty to eſcape free. And albeit that he made what haſte he might thitherwards, with all his Camp, and ſo ſtayed one day not far from thence, to have given ſome redreſs unto the [po] that had happened; yet was all that his Labour loſt, for that ſo many of the greater fort and chiefſt amongſt them had their hands therein, with whom he thought it more Wiſdom as then to diſſemble, than to fall into any terms of Severity, with hope of doing any good. So he reſolv'd to have ſent ſome towards Rogara (whether he heard ſay the Vayvod was come with new Forces out of Valachia and Moldavia) and in fix days march came to Gibinina, where he received certain News, That the great Chanceller of Poſonia and Sigismund (ſometimes the Empereur of Polonia) were with a ſtrong Army upon the Frontier of Moldavia, having ſent before them Moſey the Scibulan, with about eight thouſand of the Sieſis (his Soldiers) to what purpoſe was eaſie to be ſeen. Which Advancement interrupted the Courſe of Baſta's Victory; for that it ſeemed not reaſonable to purſue the Enemy, and to leave behind him a doubt of ſo great Importance; and eſpecially, for that he thought he could not aſſure himſelf of the Aid of the Country-people, in caſe that Sigismund their old Prince were once ſent in Transilvania. Wherefore he thought good to ſtay where he was, to provide for all Events as he ſhould ſee need; and ſo reſolved to ſend the Chiahi, and one Leſtanus Pili, to Parley with Moſey, who made a ſhew of no great Moment of his good will towards the Confederates. In the mean time, came two Meſſengers from the Vayvod, offering in his Name, that he ſhould do whatever were in the behalf of the Emperor to be impoſed upon him. Unto whom theſe conditions were by Baſta and the chief of the Council propounded; Firſt, That he ſhould for ever reſign all the claim he had or might have into the Country of Transilvania; then, That he altogether with his Army, ſhould give his Oath of Fidelity unto his Imperial Maſteſty; alſo, That he ſhould forthwith towards Valachia go with his Army unto the Frontier of Alba-Julia, to ſlay the Polonians from farther entrance; and moreover, to give his Wife and little Son in Hoſtage for the performance of theſe things. With which Meſſengers was ſent one Sebaſtian Teſcheli, to receive the Oath and promiſed Hoſtages, unto whom was appointed for the place of their ſafe keeping, the Bishop of Alba-Julia, ſo that the Vayvod, having before requeſted, That they might be ſo kept in Transilvania; although three thousand five hundred of Suleika, now brought to 20000 could not be persuaded longer to stay without their Pay before hand, the Pay of their Country being already spent; and the rest drawn out of the Garrisons of the upper Hungary, or else there pressed, were at a certain time to return. Yet nevertheless he attempted in some sort to satisfy their Request, for not grieving of the Countess, by requelling of them to deliver unto him some strong Place, wherinto he putting his men into Garrison, they might to fly without any farther charge or trouble to the Country, living upon their own Wages. Which, when he could not obtain, and withal considering, that if those few of his People which yet remained could be persuaded to stay with him, the retaining of them might give occasion unto the devious of new Stirs, upon every the least disorder of the Souldiers, to alter the matter at their pleasure, (as had hapned unto the eight thousand Almains of Castalia, driven sometimes out of that Country under the colour of some Involence by them committed, also others had been the chief doers thereof, namely, about some twenty Polonians) he resolved of all these things to give notice to the Court, and so fair and softly to march with his Souldiers unto the Confines of that Country, and to save his eight pieces of Artillery, with his other Munition, in Savva Vinar Castle, a strong Fortress a good way from the Confines, which, together with the strong Castle of Kuray, Aga Leche, an Albanesse, and General of the Vayvod's Horse-men, delivered to Zaphel Captain of Zacemar, one of his Majesties Commissioners; who there provided for the Governour Bassa, his familiar Favourite; also the Transilvanians had with great Promises sought to have crossed their delivery of the aforesaid Castles, and to have had them in their own Power.

The Decree of the Court is not always to be deemed by the event of the thing done.

Wherefore Bassa, not deceived, but by necessity enforced, yielded that he could not hold, and gave that he could not fill, making a virtue of Necessity; deceived in the event of the matter which he had propounded unto himself from the beginning, for the assurance of that Country to the Emperor; by an excusable error, if it be true that some wife men lay, nothing to be more unreasonable than by the Event of Matters to judge of their Willom by whom they were managed; which consisteth not in divining before of the certainty of the Event, but in the reasonable Conjecture thereof, by the means leading thereunto, than which nothing is more deceitful, as not depending from our own Actions only, but from other mens also more grois and unreasonable; none knowing better how much the Willom of Man deceiveth it self, than those which are unto themselves true Witnesses of the event of their own Conclusions. Nevertheless the matter was afterward so well handled by Bassa, Peizen, and others the Emperor's great Favourites in Transilvania, that in a Diet holden by the Transilvanians, he was with a convenient Guard again by them received as the Emperor's Lieutenant, until further Order was by him taken for the Government and Alliance of that Country: the Chicks and his Complices faintly consenting thereto, as not greatly pleased therewith. Neither had Bassa much cause to be proud of such his Government, having thereof no longer assurance than pleased that fickle People to afford him; yet fish no better could be had, he must take it as he might, deeming it better in some sort for the present to hold it for the Emperor, than not at all; with which his weak State, amongst more Enemies than Friends, we will for a while leave him.

But whilst things thus passed (as we have said) in Transilvania and Hungary, (the Treaty for Peace betwixt the Emperor and the Turk being vani-

ed into Smoak,) Ibrahim Bassa the Turks General in Hungary, having all the last Winter made great preparation for the Invasion of the Emperor's Territories, and the doing of some notable Enterprise for the recovery of his Reputation, somewhat impaired by the evil success of the last Years Wars; and even in these his greatest Preparations of this Year, not a little troubled by the Mutiny of the Janizaries and Spahs for want of their Pay, at Constantinople, as also with the Rebellion in Caramania: now at length in the latter end of August (by order from the Grand Seigneur, his great Lord and Master) began to set forward with his Army from Belgrade, supposed to be above two hundred thousand men strong. And coming to Bahofa, a strong Fortress of the Christians in the north Hungary, lay down before it, and having planted his Artillery, furiously battered it, with purpose to have the next day assaulted it: but the Captain of the Castle, considering the weakness of his Garrison to withstand so puissant an Enemy, and that the Walls to be already fore shaken with the fury of the great Ordinance, came to a reasonable Composition with the Bassa, and so delivered unto him the place. Which Exploit done, and the Castle to him surrendered, he marched from thence to Caniffa, a strong Town in the Frontiers of Stiria, of which men before spoiled a Place impregnable; for that it was situated in a very high hill, and furnished with a strong Garrison of valiant Souldiers, part Hungarians and part Almains: after this strong Town Ibrahim the great Bassa especially longed, to so free those Frontiers of the Turks from the often Incurfions that the Garrison Souldiers of that place made therein; as also by the taking of that Town a Fortress from the Christians, to open a more safe and free Passage for the Turks into Austria, to the indangering of other places of the Empire also farther off. Wherefore incamping his great Army on the side of the Marsh which compassed the Isle round whereon the Town stood, he began with Faggots and Earth to fill up the Marsh, so to pass over his Army; they in the Town in the mean time not ceasing with their thundering Shot to disturb them, and to do them what harm they might: who for all that, proceeding in their Work, had brought it now almost close unto the Island, where, whilst they were about to have landed, they were by the Souldiers of the Garrison so encountered, that they slew a number of their men, as well Janizaries as others, with two of their best Captains also, they were by plain Valour enforced to retire. But preparing themselves against the next day with a greater force to have again returned unto the Assault of the Isle, they saw the Imperial Army now at their Backs, and come to near them, that with their Artillery they did them great harm; which put them in no small fear, seeing themselves inclosed betwixt the Town and the Camp, and both out of the one and the other to receive no small hurt, as well with the small Shot as the great; besides that, out of the Camp divers whole Bands sometimes failed, discharging great Volleys of Shot into their Trenches. In the Imperial Army were about two and forty thousand Horse and Foot, men of divers Nations, under the leading of Duke Mercurio, now General of the Emperor's Forces in Hungary; with whom were also the Lords Nadafli, Elphin, Bachman, and the Governour of Croatia, with divers other famous Captains, come thither for the relief of Caniffa, a place of so great Importance for the defence of that side of the Country, and to help that it fell not into the Power of the barbarous Enemy. But Ibrahim Bassa, understanding by his Espials the small number of the Christians; and well knowing how much he was too strong for them by reason of his great Multitude, went out against them, and finding them as ready as himself, joyned Battle with them, with great slaughter of men both on the one side and the other: which bloody Fight (the Victory yet standing doubtful, but in all mens Judgment more inclining unto the Christians than to the Turks) was at length, by the coming on of the night, broken off. At which time, the Christians retired themselves into their Trenches, the Turks stood all the night in the Field with their Weapons in their hands, as fearing to have been again in the night by their Enemies assailed. Mean while the Christian Captains in the Camp, at variance amongst themselves, and so not now to be commanded by Duke Mercurio their General; at such time as the Turks, presuming on their Multitude, dared them to Battle the next day, could by no means be persuaded to go out against them, or once to fit out of their Trenches. Insumuch that the General of the Tartars thereupon taking Courage, made an Inroad into the Country thereby, and meeting with two hundred Waggon laden with Victuals going unto the Christian Camp, slew the Convoy that guarded them, and so carried them quite away. Whereby such want arose in the Christian Camp, that having not what to eat, and out of hope of any new Supply of Relief in time to come, they were grown almost to disbelieve and despair, whilst they could not so secretly be done, but that it was by the Turks perceived, who presently following after them in the Tail of the Army, cut off about three thousand of them, with certain pieces of great Ordinance, and most part of the Baggage; the rest of the Army in the mean time retiring farther off into places of more safety. From this Victory the Turks returned again to the Siege of Caniffa, where, after a few days, the Garrison Souldiers, now out of hope to be in good time relieved, suddenly fell into Mutiny, refusing any longer to defend the Town, now hardly laid unto by the Turks; and the rather, for that divers of the Hungarians were already fled out of the Town unto the Bassa, having (as it was thought) revealed unto him the whole estate of the besieged: so that now there was no remedy but that the Town must be delivered unto the Enemy, although Paradisi, with some other of the Captains, did what they might (as they said afterwards) to have persuaded the contrary. Whereupon they came to Parle with the Bassa, and covenanting with him, that they might with Bag and Baggage depart, and with a safe Convoy be brought over the River Mur, promised to yield unto him the Town: all which the Bassa granted, fearing how to have been able to have kept the Field, if they should for any long time have holden out. Winter now fast approaching. So the two and twentieth of October the Town was unto the Bassa right cowardly delivered, and the Garrison Souldiers with their Baggage in a hundred Waggon lent them by the Turks, safely conducted over the Mur, as was unto them promised. After the Agreement made for the yielding up of the Town, the Bassa in a Courtsey sent unto Paradisi the Governour a very rich Gown of Cloth of Gold; which albeit that he refused, yet was it afterwards laid to his Charge as a Presumption of some treacherous Colusion betwixt him and the Bassa for the betraying of the Town, which it was thought he might much longer have kept. Ibrahim now thus satisfied, the Town he so much desired, fortified it more strongly than ever it was before; and for the more assurance thereof, put into it a strong Garrison of four thousand Foot and five hundred Horse, all old expert Souldiers. And immediately after, without resistance, foraged the Country round about Caniffa, burning all before him as he went; the poor Christian Inhabitants flitting as fast as thus with the Spoil of the Country well pleased his Souldiers, he, desirous to have the same again in time re-peopled, as thereby to yield unto the Turks the more Profit, laid their farther Outrage, upon great pain forbidding the same; by open Proclamations in every place set up, inviting the Christians, without fear of farther harm, to return again into the Country, where, submitting them unto the Great Sultans Obedience, they should under his Protection safely dwell, without any Tribute to be of them exacted for the space of three Years next following. Which Proclamations were in his Name thus published:

Ibrahim Bassa, to the Inhabitants of the Country about Caniffa, greeting.

WE Ibrahim Bassa, by the Grace of God, Vicer, and Conful unto the most puissant and invincible Sultan Mahomet, Emperour of the Turks, unto all the Inhabitants of the Marches about Caniffa, and the rest of the Country of Seitzmark, from the greatest unto the least, greeting: Whereas we have willingly heard, that some of you, willing to submit yourselves to the great Sultan, and to sever unto him Fidelity, are again returned unto your old Dwellings: We promise and assure you, upon the Faith of the laid Emperour, That whatsoever shall be found near unto the Fortresses of Caniffa, now belonging unto the great Sultan, with all Reverence submitting himself at his Subjects, under his Government, acknowledging him for his Sovereign, shall enjoy more Privileges than ever he did before, and also be protected in the same. And for that we know that your Houses are for the most part destroyed, as also your Possessions, you shall therefore for these three years next following be exempted and free from all Tributes and Charges whatsoever, to the intent you may the better recover your selves. Of which Grace if you shall willingly accept, we promise you, that neither you, your Wives, or Children, shall be in any thing wronged, or your Goods in any part impaired, but so much as you please may in safety return into your own old Dwellings, giving before knowledge thereof unto the Governour of this our Fortres. Given in our Camp after the Conquest of Caniffa.

Many of these poor Country People before fled for fear of the Turks, and not knowing where to bestow themselves, now upon this Proclamation returned again to their ancient dwelling Places, there to begin the World again under the Turkish Obedience. But for that County Serinus was the Man whom of all others in that Country the great Bassa sought after, as him whom he most feared after his Departure to trouble this his new Conquest, and to seek to be revenged; having in this to general a Calamity of Stiria, his Country, lost twenty Villages of his own, quite burnt by the Turks, and the People most dead or else taken Prisoners: the Bassa having many times before sought to have persuaded him to have yielded his Obedience unto the Turkish Sultan, and now in hope unto So great loss to bring him in, before he were come into the utter ruin of all his Fortunes, (now by the loss of Caniffa, and the entrance of the Turks into Stiria, not a little endangered) writ unto him as followeth:

WE Ibrahim Bassa, chief of the Vicer Basses; and Conful unto the most puissant Sultan Mahomet; to the County Serinus I sendeth greeting. We have oftentimes heretofore written unto thee concerning the matter thou knowest of: but what the cause is that

Ibrahim Bassa Viceroy of the Sultan.

Ibrahim Bassa Viceroy of the Sultan.

1600 that we received no Answer, we cannot tell. Yet could I not but write to the Duke again, That if yet thou couldst be content to begin the matter aright, and to submit thyself unto our Protection, we will be ready to receive thee. Thou seest, that what we foretold thee is now more than fulfilled both upon thee and thine, which thou wouldst never believe. Nevertheless, for the laying of the further effusion of the Blood as well of thy Subjects as of ours, and to come to some good determination, it is high time for thee to lay thine Hand upon thy Heart, and to consider how much more it concerneth thee than us, and that the benefit thereof redoundeth more unto thee than ours. What our Affection is towards thee, Hieronym the Vayvod can tell thee. Fare thee well. From our Camp after the Conquest of Canisla, the seventh of November, 1600.

Ibrahim
Bassa returneth with his Army to Belgrade.

But these Letters being also, as the rest, answered with Silence, the great Bassa having disposed of all as he thought best at Canisla, and in the County thereabout, returned with his Army to Belgrade, there to Winter: having before fully certified the great Sultan of his proceeding, and the Success of this War; vaunting after his vain manner, the next Spring to besiege Vienna also, if it should please him so to command. Of all which things Mahomet understanding, and not a little therewith pleased, caused great Triumphs to be made by the space of four days at Constantinople, and in token of Love and favour, sent a rich Robe of Cloak of Gold, with a leading staff, all set with Pearl and precious Stones, unto the Bassa, yet lying at Belgrade.

This loss of Canisla much troubled all that side of Christendom, especially them of the Territories belonging unto the House of Austria, in a fort dismay'd to see the Turks so easily potent at Town, before they thought almost invulnerable, and the strongest defence of all that Country against the furious Impetions of the Turks, to whom it was now become a most safe and sure Recapture, all men with one Voice blaming the discord of the Captains in the Imperial Army, for so retiring without any good doing, but above all detesting the Cowardise of Parsifor, who known to have in the Town a strong Garrison, with good store of Munition and Victuals (as was supposed) had so basely delivered the same unto the Enemy, not doing the utmost of his Devour as had becomen him for the defence thereof: whereas if he had done, happily in the mean time the City and its fortifications (which no other Relief had been) Winter being now come, might have enforced the Turks to have raised their Siege. Whereupon, he was for this so foul a Fact, by the Emperor's Commandment, apprehended and cast in Prison at Vienna, where after he had long lain, and his Cause oftentimes examined, he was the next year following committed of Felony and Cowardise, and on the 15th day of October executed, having first his Hand at four strokes of the Executioner struck off, and after that his Head; with him was also in like manner executed his Ensign-Beater; and after them his Lieutenant with the Mayor of the Town, who both found fault to a flake, had first their Tongues cut out, and afterwards their Heads chopp'd off.

Now the Rebellion being raised in Caramania by Cushbin Bassa (as is aforesaid) was not with his Death altogether appeased. Also Orfa, a great City of that Country (which having tasted the sweetness of Liberty in the time of Cushbin) yet still holding out against Mahomet, the great Bassa the Sultan's Lieutenant-General there. At which time also a Companion of Cushbin the late Rebel, called the Scrivano, and one of his greatest Favourites, seeing how hardly not only Cushbin himself, but the rest of his Followers, had been handled by the Turks, began to make Head, and to call unto him all such as loved their Liberty: unto the sweet Name whereof, so many were in short time come about him, as that out of them he formed such an Army, as made him now dreadful unto the Turks his Enemies. Against whom, Mahomet Bassa going with all his Power to have opposed him, found him with those his rebellious Followers so courageous (for the desire they all had to break out of the Ottoman Slavery, and to live in such Liberty as was promised them by their Captain and General) that joining Battel with them, he received of them a notable Overthrow; in which, that fearing to have lost his whole Army, he was fain to retire, and to send out Commissioners for the raising of greater Forces. Sultan Mahomet in the mean time, whether it was for fear of this new Rebellion, or for that he understood of the Ambassadors sent from the Perfian unto the Christian Princes, began to suspect lest that King should break the League he had with him, and so to his further trouble take up Arms also against him. Wherefore, upon a Turkish Ride, he sent an Ambassador unto Perfia, to give the King to understand, That for the more assurance of the League betwixt them, he demanded to have one of his Sons sent unto him in Hostage, as a Pledge of his Fathers Faith. Which to provide a Demand, the Perfian King took in such disdain, that he commanded in his Rage the Ambassador to be forthwith slain; but that his fury being by his grave Counsellors somewhat appeased, he remitted the Severity of this his rigorous Command, and sparing his Life, was contented, that in despite and contempt of him that had sent him, he should be put to the Bastinado only: and so grievously threatened, sent back again unto his Master. Who having received this shameful Answer, and in doubt of some farther matter from that angry King, commanded new and strong Garrisons to be put in all his strong holds confining upon the Perfian Kingdom.

This troublesome Year of Jubile thus past, the Emperor much troubled with the loss of Canisla, and in doubt of worse to come (albeit that Ibrahim Bassa, whom for all that he trusted not, did still treat with him concerning Peace) and feeling also to the great need he had of greater Aid to withstand the mighty Power of the Turk, with great intancy requested Aid of the Pope and of the other Princes of Italy: who, considering also how much it concerned the rest of the Christian Commonwealth, to have the Frontiers of Hungary defended, confederated unto the Emperor's Request; and so the Pope with the beginning of the Spring sent him eight thousand Soldiers in Pay, under the leading of Io Francesco Adorandino his Nephew their General, who with the like charge had now sent him over the Year 1599. King Philip also, at the instance of the Emperor, gave Order unto the County Fuemes to lend into Croatia certain Bands of Dutchies, who, by direction from him, were forthwith conducted to Millain. The great Duke of Florence also, sent unto him two thousand Soldiers, under the leading of Franco de Monte; with whom also, by his Appointment, went the Lord Jo. de Medicis, whom Ferdinand the Arch-duke forthwith requested for to be Master of his Camp: thither came also the Duke of Mantua with an honourable Company both of Horse and Foot, being forthwith by the Arch-duke made his Lieutenant-General. And so whilst these People assembled together into Croatia, the Emperor sent also another good Army into Hungary, drawn for most part out of Germany, which under the leading of the Arch-duke Matthias his Brother, and the Duke Mercury his Lieutenant-General, 1601 went into those Parts to withstand the Turk. A third Army he also made of the Imperialists, which, strengthened with the Forces of Duo Ferrant Guszaga, Governour of the upper Hungary, joined themselves with Bassa for the Recovery of Transilvania, out of which he had been of late driven, as shall hereafter be declared.

And so whilst these Armies were in preparing, many hot Skirmishes passed in Hungary betwixt the Christians and the Turks, the loss falling sometimes to the one side and sometime to the other. But the time now came that Soldiers might well take at Belgrade, whilst he was yet increasing of a difficulted Peace, and Hajfian, one of the Vice Ambassadors, by Mahomet appointed General in Hungary in his place, yet delaying his coming, the Peace for Peace laid aside (as never induced by the Turks intended, but only by them entertained to dally off the time to their own more advantage) Duke Mercury, General of the Emperor's Forces, taking to himself the fit and Opportunity, came with his Army from Komara (where he had lain expecting the Event of the Peace) and laid Siege to Abas Regalia, one of the chiefest and strongest Cities of Hungary; which, seated in the midst of a Marsh, was thought almost impregnable, being hardly to be approached but by the Suburbs; which, strengthened and defended by the Marsh, served the City instead of three walls, and within which stood also the City itself, well defended with a good Wall and a Ditch. This City, the Duke for certain days continually battered, as if he had purposed at length to have taken it by assault: but, in the mean time certainly informed by a Fugitive (but lately fled out of the City) that the broad Lake which encompassed the City over against the Place where he lay, was not to be surprised, but that it was to be passed, (contrary to the Opinion both of the Turks Captives, and of the natural Inhabitants, whom he had upon that Point examined) and that the Turks, presuming upon the strength thereof, and thinking themselves on that side safe, had turned almost all their Care and Forces unto that side of the City which was now by him battered, without regard of any great Peril to be from the other side feared; he appointed the Lord Ruffworm with his Soldiers to make Proof if the Siege Suburbs (for so they were called) on the aforesaid side of the City, so little regarded by the Turks, might be taken, and so to fill up those Suburbs being taken, the City could long hold out: for the undertaking of which Enterprize Ruffworm was, both by the captive Turks and Country People thereby dwelling, much discouraged, they all with one consent affirming, That albeit he should find no other Difficulties in the attempt thereof, yet the Lake itself was not possible to be passed: who nevertheless, altogether trusting them, sent certain of his Men secretly to try the matter; who having done so, brought him word, That the Lake was undoubtedly (though with much difficulty) to be passed.

Ibrahim Bassa's death at Belgrade.

Whereupon, he with 1200 select Soldiers, with every one of them a good Baggon on his Back behind his Arms, showed by Example how he did went on, they all following him. It is almost a thing incredible, to tell what these adventurous men endured, plunged in the deep Mud among the Flags and Bulrushes, going still up in Water and Mud unto the Waite, even where the Marsh was the thallowest; where also if one misstepped but a step, he was by and by over Head and Ears, and in danger to be drowned, if he were not by his Fellows presently holden; yet at length by God's help, having with the loss but of six or seven men, a little before day got over, the Duke by an appointed Sign advertised thereof, with greater Strife and Tumult than at any time before, assailed that side of the City where he lay, as if even then and there he had only meant to have engaged his whole Forces for the winning thereof. When in the mean time the Lord Ruffworm on the other side with his resolute Soldiers, with Ladders provided for the purpose, scaled the Walls of the Suburbs, and almost unperceived, recovered the top thereof, (the Turks being at the same time wholly bent for the defence of the other side of the City, where most fit and apparent danger was) and so being got into the Suburbs, with a great and terrible Cry assailed the Turks, who, surprised with an exceeding Fear, and not well knowing which way to turn themselves, without any great Resistance fled into the City, the Christians following them at the heels, and making of them a great slaughter. In which so great a confusion, even where was least feared, the Duke by other his Soldiers took the rest of the Suburbs, as he had before determined, the Turks there also for fear forsaking them, and retiring with all the haste they could unto their Fellows in the City, there to live or dye together. The Christians in these Suburbs, besides much other rich Prey, took also fourteen great pieces of Artillery, with good store of Shot and Powder. The Suburbs (the greatest Strength of the City) thus happily taken, the Duke again summoned the City, requiring to have it delivered unto him; whereunto the Turks gave no other Answer but by their Pieces, which they discharged upon the Christians for perwounding them to yield. Whereupon the Duke much displeased, sent them word, That he would find them other manner of Messengers to morrow, and by God's help sup with them in the City, altho he were not unto them welcome. Neither failed he of that his Promise; for the next day, having out of the Suburbs, by the fury of his Artillery, made two fair Breaches in the City, he by the Ruines thereof, with great slaughter of the Enemy, entered the City, albeit that the Turks did what they might to have defended the same, by casting down upon the Christians, as they entered, Darts, Wild-fire, and such like things, usually provided for such purpose. But feeling now no remedy, but that they must needs give place to the fortune of their Enemies, they fled again into their Houses, there to defend themselves, or else to die; many of which Houses they had before of purpose so undermined, as that they could easily overthrow them, and so overwhelm as many as should come within the danger of them. It is a strange a Relocation was by many of them as desperately perished; inasmuch, that the goodly Church, the Palace, with many other sumptuous Buildings, were left unto the Christians all rent and torn, not much better than rude heaps of Rubbish and Stones. However, the Bassa, upon promise of Life, yielded himself, and was by the Soldiers brought unto the Camp; the rest of the Soldiers being (as in such case it commonly happeneth) all or most of them put to the Sword. The greatest part of the Prey fell unto the Wallons, who by heaps breaking into the richest Houses, not only took what themselves light upon, but stripped the German also of such things as they had by chance gotten, to their great beating and grief: yet these ravenous and irreligious men not to contented, opened the Tombs of the Hungarian Kings,

Alba Regalia taken by the Christians.

1601 ple, and fill by them more and more followed; to maintain the reputation of his Credit, came now again this year with a great Power into the Field, to meet with Mabomet, the great Baſſa, and General of the Turks Army; who, with fifty thousand good Soldiers (a Power thought ſufficient to have rectified him) was ready to encounter him. With whom the ſerviano joining Batel, in a great Fight cut in under a great part of the Baſſa's Army, and ſo became Maſter of the Field, foraged all the Countries adjoining almoſt as far as Alpeſſo ſtill calling the People unto Liberty, and cauling them to be proclaimed the true Defender of the Mabometan Faith, and of the Liberty of thoſe Countries with him combined; in ſuch fort, as that it now flood the great Turk upon to fend another great Army to the Aid of Mabomet the diſcomfited Baſſa. With whom alſo, the ſerviano (preſuming of his former Fortune) coming to a day of Batel, and overcharged with the multitude of his Enemies, was at the firſt Encounter, with his People, put to the worſte: but forthwith by his good direction having repaired his diſordered Batel, and thereby given as it were new Courage to his fainting Soldiers, he with a great Slaughter diſordered alſo the Baſſa's Army. Yet having not any other firm place, they reſt left upon, more than the Favour and Reputation he held with theſe his rebellious Followers, of whom he had now loſt a great many, he thought it not beſt to adventure too far (not knowing how preſently to repair his Loſſes) but contenting himſelf with what he had already done, retired with his Army into the ſtrength of the Mountains, there to live upon the Spoil of the Countries adjoining, and the next Year to do more harm than ever he had done before.

The Janizaries in Murdery at Conſtantinople.

Befide all which former Troubles, the Plague alſo this year raged in Conſtantinople and many other Places of the Turkiſh Empire. At which time alſo, the Janizaries at Conſtantinople having received ſome Diligence by ſome of the Great Sultan's Favourites, and with great Inſolency requiring to have their Heads, cauſed their Aga, well accompanied, preſumptuouſly to enter into the Scraglio to prefer this their Requeſt; whom Mabomet, to the terror of the reſt, cauſed for his Preſumption to be taken into the miſſile of the Spahis, and by ſo them to be cut in pieces, which was no done without the great Slaughter of the Spahis themſelves alſo, ſlain by the Janizaries. Whereupon the other Janizaries ariſing up in Arms alſo, and even now ready to have revenged the Death of their Captain, were yet by the Wiſdom of Casala Baſſa, beſeeching amongſt them a great Sum of Money, again appeaſed, without farther harm done. Which their ſo great Inſolency Mabomet imputing unto their excheſive drinking of Wine, contrary to their Law of the great Prophet; by the perſuaſion of the Muſli, commanded all ſuch as had any Wine in their Houſes in the neceſſity of Conſtantinople and Pera, upon the pain of Death to bring it out and ſell it, except the Ambaſſadors of the Queen's Majesty of England, the French King, and of the State of Venice; ſo that as ſome report, Wine for a ſpace ran down the Channels of the Streets in Conſtantinople, as if it had been Water after a great thaw of Rain.

1602 Siſimouth, the Tranſilvanian Prince, now of late again poſſeſſed of Tranſilvania (as is before declared) could not yet well aſſure himſelf of the keeping thereof; for that he, with the Tranſilvanians of his Faction alone, was not able to withſtand the force of Baſſa; who ſtill ſtrengthened with new Supplies both of men and all things else neceſſary for the War, from the Emperor, was now with a great Power already entred into Tranſilvania;

1602 the Polonians buſied in the Wars of Suevia, and the Turks with their other greater Affairs, neither of them ſending him their promiſed Aid, the greateſt hope and ſtay of himſelf in that neweſs of his Eſtate. Wherefore ſeeing himſelf every day to loſe one place or other, and fearing alſo left his Soldiers for want of Pay ſhould in ſhew time quite forſake him, and go over to Baſſa, he thought it beſt, betimes and whiſt he had yet ſomething left, and was not yet altogether become deſperate, otherwiſe to provide for his Eſtate, eſpecially having ſmall Truſt in the Turks, to whom he had been before ſo great an Enemy. Wherefore he dealt with Baſſa for a Truce of Callation for ſix Months, until Ambaſſadors might be ſent unto the Emperor, to intreat with him for ſome good Attainment. Wherewith Baſſa being content, and the Ambaſſadors ſent, the matter was ſo handled with the Emperor, that Siſimouth, to make an end of all theſe Troubles, was contented to beſeek of his Imperial Maſtrey, to reſign unto Baſſa his Lieutenant all ſuch places as he yet held in Tranſilvania, upon ſuch like Conditions he had about three Years before made with him; and ſo in all, and for all, to ſubmit himſelf unto his Maſtrey. Which intended Surrender of the Prince's being breuted in Tranſilvania, Zachel Wiſſer his Lieutenant (and now in Field with him) (forces) not able to endure or to hear that that noble Province ſhould again fall into the hands of the Germans; encouraging his Soldiers, went upon the ſudden to aſſail Baſſa, in hope to have found him unprovided, and ſo diſcomfiting his Army, to have driven the Imperials quite out of Tranſilvania; but he an old and expert Commander, perceiving the firſt moving of the Tranſilvanians, with great Celerity put his Army in good order, and ſo joynted Batel with them; wherein he with the loſs of ſome five hundred men overthrow Maſſer, with his Army of Tranſilvanians, Turks, and Tartars, having ſlain above three thouſand of them, and put the reſt to flight; Maſſer himſelf with ſome few others being now glad to take their Refuge into the Frontiers of the Turks Territories towards Temeſwar. But when Siſimouth underſtood what his Lieutenant had, without his knowledge, done, he in token of his own Innocency went himſelf unto the Imperial Camp, accompanied only by certain of his Gentlemen, and thereunto Baſſa excuſed himſelf of that which was by his Lieutenant againſt his Will, and without his Privy doing, frankly offering to perform whatever was on his part to be performed, according to the Agreement made betwixt the Emperor and him. And ſo preſently calling his Garrisons out of all ſuch ſtrong Places as were yet for him holden, he ſurrendered them to Baſſa; and ſo forthwith, honourably accompanied, put himſelf upon his way towards the Emperor. After whole Departure out of Tranſilvania, all that Province voluntarily, and without more ado, yielded to Baſſa as to the Emperor's Lieutenant; who preſently called an Aſſembly of all the Nobility of the Country, taking of them an Oath for their Obedience and Loyalty unto the Emperor. Thus by the Wiſdom and Proweſs of this worthy Commander, is the Country of Tranſilvania once again brought under the Emperor's Obedience; a matter of far greater Importance than to have won the ſtrongest City the Turk holdeth in Hungary.

But whiſt theſe things paſſed in Tranſilvania, great troubles ariſe in Valachia (the Country next adjoining) for that the People of that Province not able longer to endure the great Inſolency of the Turks (who after the Death of Michael had by their Power made one Jeremias Tyrant there) by a general conſent took up Arms, and pro-

1601 proclaiming one Radull (a favorite of the Emperours) Vayvod, chafed Jeremias (before placed by the Turks) quite out of the Country; who flying unto Simon, Palatine of Moldavia, his Friend, by his means, and the help of the Turks, returning unto Valachia, drove out thence Radull again; who being now at this preſent with Baſſa, with about ten thouſand Valachians, his Followers, earneſtly requeſted of him (now that he was ſo quietly poſſeſſed of Tranſilvania) to help him with his Forces for the recovery of Valachia. And Baſſa well conſidering how much it concerned the quiet and ſure keeping of the poſſeſſion of Tranſilvania, for the Emperor to have that ſo near a Province to friend, eaſily yielded to his requeſt; and gave him a great Regiment of his old approved Soldiers, and ſo ſent him away to recover his Eſtate: with whom (at his entrance into Valachia) the Moldavians meeting with a great Power both of his own, and of the Turks, came thither in the favour of Hieremias, there was fought betwixt them a moſt terrible and bloody Batel, the glory whereof fell unto Radull, he carrying away the Victory. In which Batel, two of the Turks Baſſes were there ſlain, with a great number of others, both of the Moldavians and Turks. After which Victory Radull recovered again the Sovereignty of Valachia, for which he was beholding to Baſſa; and thoſtly after with the ſame Aid cut in pieces a great power of the Tartars, that were coming to have aided the Moldavians.

Troubles in Hungary.

Now in the mean time in Hungary alſo paſſed many an hot Skirmiſh betwixt the Chriſtians and the Turks, whole Garrisons at Buda, and in other places in the lower Hungary, attempting to have ſurprized Alba-Regalis, diſcomfited by the Chriſtians, were with great ſlaughter enforced to retire. At which time alſo, County Soroc underſtanding by his Eſpials, that the Turks with two hundred Waggon, with Munition and Victuals, were going to Caſſia, upon the ſudden ſet upon them, and having ſlain and put to flight the Convoy that guarded them, carried the Waggon, with all that was in them, away with him. And thoſtly after, the free Haiducks of Comara, in a great party going out towards Buda to ſeek after Booty, and having taken threeſcore Turks Priſoners, and ſo with them about to have returned home; underſtanding by the way, that Alba-Regalis the Baſſa of Buda, and now Governor of Poſſa, was with a ſmall retinue about to come down the River Danubius from Buda, towards Belgrade, there to meet the Viſer Baſſa, but then coming into Hungary, they flew all the Priſoners, and having got two ſmall Boats, about fifteen miles beneath Buda, lay in wait for the Baſſa; who, according to their Expectation, coming down the River, was by theſe Adventurers ſuddenly aſſailed, and of his thirty followers having fourteen ſlain, being himſelf alſo ſhot in two places of his Body, was there with a great Booty taken, and ſo brought to Comara, and thoſtly after preſented unto Matthias the Arch-duke at Pleſen, who amongſt other things, certainly enforcing that Haſſan Baſſa was with a great Army by the commandment of the great Sultan Mabomet, coming to beſiege Alba-Regalis, and that he was now upon his way as far as Belgrade; preſently ſent thither the County Tiſan, Governor thereof, who with much ado got into the City, the Turks having already taken all the Paſſages, to have hindered the Chriſtians from putting in either Men or Munition, more than was therein already. However, the County now got in there, and being no leſs good Engineer than a valiant Commander, cauſed all them in the City to labour upon the Rampiers; ſo that beſide the natural Situation thereof, which was very ſtrong, he had in ſhort

Ali Baſſa taken Priſoner.

1601 time ſo fortified it, as that in moſt men's Judgment it ſeemed a place almoſt impregnable. This Ali Baſſa was ſomeſtime the great Tis Butler, but after the taking of Agria, made Baſſa of Buda, which great place he held but three Months, being by the Envy and Ambition of ſome, but eſpecially of Amurath Baſſa, removed thence, and made Governor of Poſſa; from whence now going down the River to Belgrade, it was his Fortune to be thus taken by the Haiducks, unto whoſe he offered for his Ranſom three hundred thouſand Suldanies; and had with him when he was taken, ſeventy thouſand Duckats.

Mabomet the great Sultan not a little troubled with the loſs of Alba-Regalis (taken from him by the Chriſtians the laſt year) and now relieved for the recovery of the ſame, to engage, it ſhould need be, a great part of his Forces; had now the lead of an hundred and fifty thouſand troops, to meet at Hadiplane for that purpoſe, under the leading of Haſſan Baſſa, one of the chief Viſiers, to be ſent into Hungary. Who by the way of Belgrade coming to Buda, and from thence to Alba-Regalis, there the twentieth of Auguſt incamped (as he had oftentimes before threatened) with the multitude of his Tents covering all the Country round about, as if it had been a white Snow; where having well entrenched himſelf, and planted his Artillery, he began a moſt terrible and furious Battery, in ſuch fort as if he had not meant to have made a breach only, but to have beaten the City even from the face of the Earth, which ſeem now to tremble under his feet, and the Clouds to rend with the thundring of his great Ordnance; and for that the Maſſiſh and deep Ditches were a great let unto his Men for to come unto the aſſault, he cauſed them with the number of his Pioneers to be filled up (a work though almoſt impoſſible) and ſo brought on his Men to aſſault the Countercamp, which the Governor had cauſed to be made before the City for better defence thereof; which aſſault coſt him much Blood, by reaſon of the wonderful Valour of the defendants; yet in the end the great number of the Turks prevailing, the Chriſtians were infected to forſake it and retire into the City; but thoſtly after falling out again, they with ſuch force aſſailed the Turks now got within the Countercamp, that having ſlain moſt part of them that were entered, they forced the other out again; at the brute whereof, an alarm being raised throughout the Camp, infinite numbers of the barbarous Enemies came running thither with ſuch ſavage Fury, that without regard of their Lives, they as deſperate men preſſing till on, fell twice as many as before; ſo inſomuch that the Chriſtians weary of that long and bloody fight, and on every ſide charged, or rather overwhelmed with the Enemies force, were glad again, but not without great loſs, to abandon the place. With which ſcramiſhes, and divers others that they had, the number of the Defendants was greatly diminiſhed, to keep a weak City, ſhewing as yet the Ruins of the late Siege, when it was by the Chriſtians won; the breaches thereof being but civil repaired, and the Mines yet gapping, requiring great and ſtrong Fortification to ſold out and endure any long Siege againſt to ſuſtain an Enemy. Yet was not the Courage of the valiant County Tiſan the Italian Governor, any whither weakened, but by his Letters gave the Arch-duke Matthias, to underſtand in what caſe things flood with them in the City: requeſting him with all ſpeed to ſend him relief, for that otherwiſe the City, ſo weakly both manned and fortified, would be in danger to be loſt; many of the Garrison Soldiers being already ſlain in the defence thereof, and divers of the Hungarians forſaking the Walls, daily flying unto the Turks Camp; promiſing yet nevertheless himſelf to do the gained the Walls, the Turks yet dreaming of no such matter. But hereupon began a terrible Outcry, the Turks standing as men astonished, especially now feeling the Christians Weapons in their Bodies, before they knew they were got into the City. In this great Amaze, such of them as could, fled into the strongell Towers, the rest hid themselves in Cellars and other the most secret corners they could find, out of which they were afterwards by the Christians drawn and slain. They which were retired also into the Towers and other strong places of the City, feeling the great Ordnance bent upon them, and not at all in hope of Relief, offered to yield; requesting only, that they might with their Wives and Children with Life depart; promising for that favour so shewed them, to persuade them of Buda also in like manner to yield. Upon which Promise, that their Request was granted, and the Lord Nadasti with certain other Captains, sent with some of these Citizens of Pesth, with their Wives and Children, to Buda; who coming thither, according to their Promise most earnestly requested them of Buda to yield, for that they were not now to expect any further help, and that by their foolish Obstinacy they should be the cause of the death of them, their Friends, their Wives, and Children. Unto whom also, to move them the more, the Lord Nadasti promised in the Name of General, That they should all, excepting some of their chief Commanders, in safety depart. Howbeit, they of Buda would not hearken thereunto, but stood still upon their Guard. In this City of Pesth, well inhabited with Turkish Merchants, the Christians found great store of Wealth, which all became a Prey unto the Soldiers, with a thousand Horfes for Service, many great Pieces of Artillery, and much other warlike Provision.

The upper City and Castle of Buda besieged by the Christians.

Pesth thus won, and a strong Garrison left therein, they returned again over the River to besiege the Castle and upper City of Buda, which they attempted by undermining the same, as also by Battery, having placed some of their great Ordnance so high, that they could at their pleasure foot in to the middle of the Streets of the City; wherefore they much troubled the Turks, not a little before discouraged with the loss of Pesth; thundering also at the same time with their other Batteries in divers places of the Walls both of the Castle and of the City. Where understanding that the Turks Garrisons of the frontier Towns and Castles thereabouts (hearing of the Siege) were coming to the relief of their distressed Friends, they sent out their Horsemen, with some part of their Foot-men against them; who meeting with them, gave them a great Overthrow, and so with Victory returned again unto the rest of the Army lying at the Siege, being still in hope either by Force or Composition to become Masters of the City.

But whilst they lay in this hope, and having the twelfth of October brought their Approaches nearer unto the Walls, had their minds altered, notable pieces of Battery, with purpose the next day with all their Power to have assaulted the City; behold, the Vicer Bassa hearing (by the way as he was going to Belgrade, and so to Constantinople) that the City of Pesth was won, and Buda besieged, changing his Mind, returned in haste with such Forces as he had yet left, and so unlooked for, came and sat down before Pesth, being not then above five and twenty thousand strong, but those all for the most part old and expert Soldiers. But whilst the Bassa thus lay at the Siege of Pesth on the one side of the River, and the Imperials at the Siege of Buda on the other, divers brave Attempts were in both Places given both on the one side and the other. The Christians in Pesth besieged by the Turks, having amongst them divers brave Captains, and desirous of Honour, one day under their Conduct fell out of the City to skirmish with the Turks; and coming with them to the Sword, by plain Valour disordered them, and incited them to fly, and so allured with the sweetness of the Victory, pursued them even to the Trenches, from whence a great Squadron of the Turks Horse-men and Harquebushers at the same instant issuing out, and with their Multitude overcharging the Imperials, constrained them of force to retire: in which Retreat, County Mesudmian Martinsengo (one of these Adventurers) doing what he might, both with his Valour and Direction, to have stayed the disordered Retreat of the Christians, was with many others slain; whereupon the rest discouraged, took their Refuge towards the City. Which they of the Garrison beholding, sent out certain Companies to relieve them; by whose coming out, the fury of the Turks was not only repressed, but they also even unto their Trenches again repulsed. Shortly after which, the Lord Rusinsheim, with the other Christian Captains on the other side of the River, having with continual Battery made such a breach into the Castle, as that the same seemed to be now assailable, in good order came on with certain Companies of their Foot-men appointed for that Service, and so courageously assailed the Breach, where the Turks, who before had expected this Assault, having in best fort they could repaired the Breach, and on both sides thereof placed divers murdering Pieces, with great force of dangerous new-work; at such time as the first Companies of the Christians fought courageously to have entered the breach, overwhelmed them with their deadly Fire, and so rent them with their murdering shot, that they no faster entered, but that they were forthwith cut off and slain; with the fight whereof, they which were appointed to second them nothing discouraged, but seeking desperately to have entered, and with the taking of the Castle, and slaughter of the Turks, were themselves in like sort welcomed. So that now a thousand of them being lost, the Captains considering how much the loss of so many brave Soldiers concerned the whole Enterprize taken in hand, and that the breach could not be gained without the loss of the greatest part of them, they caused a Retreat to be sounded, and so the Assault for that time to be given over.

But long it was not that the Vicer Bassa (thus retired as aforesaid) had lain before Pesth, but that by reason of his sudden Return great Wounds began to arise in his Camp; his Soldiers for want of Food being glad to eat their dead Horfes, a pound of Bread being sold for two Hungarian Dukats, and a bullock of Oats for five, and yet hardly so to be gotten: which Wants in that so wasted a Country still more and more increasing, and many of his Soldiers secretly stealing away from him, he had much ado, by all the means he could use, to persuade them there to stay eight days longer. Which time expired, and nothing more done than some few weak Attempts given, and some light Skirmishes made, rather for Fashions sake than for any hope of prevailing, and the want of all things still increasing; he with the rest of the Commanders, fearing some sudden mischief to be done them by the hungry and discontented Soldiers, the 6. of November, causing his Baggage to be trussed up in the dead time of the dark and silent Night, stole with his Army, and so in haste retired directly to Belgrade, leaving behind him his Camp three hundred dead Horfes, not yet eaten by his hunger starved Soldiers. Immediately after whole departure, the Lord Nadasti, and some other other of the Commanders in the Army with 5000 Soldiers and certain great Pieces of Artillery, some by Land, some by Water, went down along the River to Adom, a fair well built Town upon the Bank of Danubius, about four Hungarian miles from Buda, and serving as it were for a Store-house for the Garrison there, which Town Nadasti summoned by his Hajdars sent before, requiring to have it delivered unto him: which they of the Town at the first refused to do; but afterwards feeling a far greater Power come, provided of great Ordnance and all things else requisite for a Siege, they with the rest of the Garrison, who had before also offered to yield the Town, so that they might with Bag and Baggage in safety depart; which they did, the Christians conducting them as far as Feldmar; which Castle was also at the first Summons, by the persuasion of them of Adom, delivered unto them; for they of the Castle, by them informed of the great Strength of the Imperials, and of the store of great Ordnance they had brought with them, and that they stood therewith but fast by, were easily persuaded to hearken to their Friends, and so yielded. Which done, the free Hajdicks the same night surprised also the Castle of Pasz; from whence the Christians still marching on along the River, took in also the City of Tobols.

But whilst Nadasti, with the rest, were thus busied in taking these Castles and Towns along the South-side of Danubius, they in the Camp at Buda were advertised of the new Designs of the Turks Lieutenants and Captains thereabout, for the relief of the Besieged; as that the Bassa of Bispha, with the Governor of Seged, and others, had assembled an Army of thirty thousand for the raising of the Siege. Wherefore the Christians doubting as they lay at the Siege disposed, to be by them oppressed; leaving their Tents in their Trenches, gathered themselves together in the Water-City; which the Turks out of the upper City quickly perceiving, as feeling themselves now at some more liberty, presently falling out, took both the Trenches and the Tents to fill, with no small laughter of such as were left for the keeping of them; and so possessed of the Trenches and the Tents, held them by the space of two hours, until they were by strong hand by the Christians beaten out, so with some loss enforced again to retire into the City. The Lord Nadasti also, with the rest that had taken the aforesaid Castles and Towns upon the side of Danubius, making a Road towards Alba Regalis, in their Return within a mile of Buda, light upon a thousand Turks there gathered together, most part of whom they flew; and having put the rest to flight, took some fifty of them Prisoners. At which time also another of the Imperial Colonells meeting with certain other Companies of the Turks coming to the relief of the besieged, not far from Buda, flew most part of them, took an hundred and threecore of them Prisoners, with a number of their other rich Booty, all which he afterwards brought into the Camp. Neither were they at the Siege in the mean time idle, their great Artillery still thundering against the Walls both of the Castle and the City: so that by the fury of the Cannon having beaten down a strong Tower next unto the Danubius, not far from the Kings Stable, they were a little before Night about to have there entered, when suddenly flew a Tempest of Wind and Rain arise, as that they could not possibly use their Pieces, or well any other Weapon; so that the Heavens as it were then fighting for the Enemy, they were enforced for that time to give over the Assault before. Which Storm was no sooner ended, but that two thousand of the Turks, both Horse and Foot, to keep the Christians otherwise busied, suddenly issuing out of the City, charged upon on the Sirian Horse-men; who presently relieved by the men at Arms, so welcomed them, that having lost an hundred and threecore of their men, they were glad with more speed to retire than they came out. But feeling some of the Christians that so busily pursued them, some slain, and some hurt from the Walls, talking heart again, the next day (being the Eleventh of November) they fell out again; where about that a great number of them were slain, yet fell they out again the third day also, and were again by the County Thorne, with great loss of their men, beaten back the City; where in pursuing of them, the Christians were by certain Janissaries (hid close for that purpose) suddenly assailed and dangerously galled, the County himself being hurt in his left Arm, and some other Captains slain. In all which Salies, although the Turks were still put to the worse, yet thereby they gained time in some good sort to repair again their Breaches.

Shortly after, the Imperials thus lying at the Siege, certainly informed that a world of the fierce and rude Tartars, by the Incitement of the Turk, (having made themselves way through Valachia) were coming as far as Temsevar to relieve Buda; thought it not best (especially now that Winter was come) to abide the coming of that so great a Northern Tempest, but betimes, whilst they had yet space, to raise their Siege and be gone; which they did the sixteenth of November, leaving the Water-City, with all that they had got about Buda, again unto the Enemy; only Pesth they furnished with Victuals and all things else necessary, for the defence thereof, and left the Garrison, for the defence thereof, against the barbarous Enemy. As for Adom, it was strengthened with a Garrison of Hungarians only, with their Wages offered to be paid before-hand; which for all that, they refused to accept; alledging, that for the great danger this Place was exposed to above others, they could not safely take their Oath for the defence thereof; yet offering wishal, to undertake the Charge, and to do what befamed valiant Soldiers, in such sort, as that all men should well understand, that nothing evil should happen thereunto their default or negligence.

The Siege of Buda, for fear of the Tartars, thus given over, and the Imperials departed and gone, the Turks forthwith came down out of the higher City into the lower, declaring their Joy for the recovery thereof, by the often thundering of their great Ordnance, with divers other Signs of Triumph. But whilst in their Jollity they spared not by the mouth of the Cannon to send commendation to them of Pesth, they themselves again received the like; but in such rude manner, that the Turks, wearied with such Greetings, requested them to spare their Shot and Powder, and quietly to live by them as became Neighbours for that Winter until the next Spring, at which time it was to be thought that this Strife should be ended by their Impetuous, the weaker yielding not the stronger either the one or the other City. Yet for all this their great Joy, their cheer in Buda was not great, Victuals by this Siege being come to scarce, that it was by the Turks feared, that if the Christians had there longer lain, they should for very want have been enforced to have yielded the City: of which their need their Friends were able for having made what Provision they were able for their Relief, were with a great Convoy bringing the same towards Buda; whereof the Garrisons of Komar and Strigonium having Intelligence, went presently out, and meeting with the Turks in the mid-way betwixt Alba Regalis and Buda, overthrew the Convoy, and carried away all that Provision of Victuals; like unbidden Guests making them selves merry with that which was never provided for them.

These doubtful Wars of Hungary, with the general Revolt of Transylvania, much troubled Mahomet the great Sultan; but nothing like unto the Wars he had in Asia against the Strians and the Rebels his Followers; the evil Success whereof (as most dangerous to his State) so much threatened his haughty mind, as that it would scarce suffer him to think of any thing else. For the Rebel, encouraged with the success of his last years Wars, and still growing stronger and stronger, by reason of the great number which, allured with the sweet name of Liberty, hope of Prey, or the good Entertainment by him given, daily more and more resorted unto his Camp) had this Year over-run a great part of the Turks Dominions in Asia, putting all to Fire and Sword that stood in his way, ransacking also divers walled and fenced Cities by the way as he went. Which he might the more easily do, for that the Janizaries of Aleppo and Damascus, with many other their Parakees and Favourites, which might greatly have hindered his Proceedings, were at the same time also up in Arms, and together by the Fists amongst themselves, to the great benefit of the Strians; who, in the midst of the course of these his desired Fortunes, fell sick of a natural Disease, and so died. By whose Death the Rebellion was no whit appeased, (as commonly in like case it falleth out, and was then of many expected) but in short time grew to be both far greater and more dangerous than before.

The Death of the Strians.

The Strians' youngest Brother takes upon him the leading of the Rebels in his Brother's stead.

Hajjan Bassa is slain and his Army overthrown by the Rebels.

Wars his Brother had before him taken in hand. Against whom Hajjan Bassa, by Commandment from the Grand Seignior, sent an Army, hoping to have oppressed him, and so to have quenched that fire at length met with him, that was easy enough to be found, and joyning Battle with him, was by him in a great and bloody Fight overthrown and slain, together with his whole Army, except such as by speedy flight saved themselves from the fury of their fierce Enemies. So that Mahomet the Great Sultan, now informed to employ his best Commanders and Soldiers into those parts for the subduing of him, for that cause called Mahomet the Vifier Bassa out of Hungary to serve against this new Rebel; who in the mean time following the course of his Victory made havock of all as he went, taking upon his own title all such Tributes as was in those Countries, and others also farther off, due unto the great Sultan; having at last exacted only of the City of Ancyra and the Country thereabout, 3000000 Ducats; so by exacting of great sums of Money from the Country People (such as he by his Enemies had upon great Treaties for the maintenance of his Wars.

Now, the Mahomet the Turkish Emperor had called home Mahomet the Vifier Bassa out of Hungary, to go against the Rebels in Asia, (as is aforesaid) yet had he before provided, that for the better advantage of his Towns and Territories in Hungary, the Tatar Han with a great number of his Cossacks should even against that time come down into that Country. Which rough and needy People, dwelling near unto the Fens of Meotis, for Pay or Prey always ready to do the Ottoman Empires Service, feting forward under the leading of their great Han himself, and of his two Sons, and by plain force breaking through the Turkish Army, and without great loss to their men (being fought with by the Palachians and free Haiducks a whole day) were now in the latter end of December with their huge Companies come into Hungary; the Han himself with forty thousand to Quisque Ecclia, and his Sons with twenty thousand more into Pellege (a fertile Country lying between the great Rivers Sauus and Dravus) where they spoiled all as well the Turks as the other poor Christians, pretending all that frontier Country, with the whole Command thereof, to be given unto them by Mahomet the Turkish Emperor, in reward of their good Service. But long they lay not there quiet, but that, to them for what they thought they owed the Christians thereabout to visual Canisla for the Turks; and so breaking into Stiria, not far from Caramant (the nearest Fortresses of the Christians towards Canisla) carried away above two thousand Christians Captives; and shortly after surpassing Reschmet, a great and populous Town, flew most part of the Inhabitants, and carried away the rest Prisoners. Other some of them also at the same time making an Inroad to Szarvar, and having burnt twenty Villages down to the ground, carried away thence about a thousand Souls into most miserable Captivity and Thralldom. They also at their first coming relieved them of Buda, the Lord Nadasti with his Hussars, who before kept them from Visuals, not being able for the great number of them, now longer to do. By them also the Turks encouraged, took and burnt certain places possessed by the Christians near unto Buda, putting them all to the Sword that they found therein. So that the poor puny of Hungary (never to be sufficiently pitied) with the rest of the Countries and Provinces belonging unto the House of Austria, and confining upon the Turk, were not so much ealed by the calling home of the Vifier Bassa with his Army, as they were now annoyed by the coming of these rough Tatars, a People wholly, even from their Infancy, given to the spoil. Against whom, at that time, the Christians, beside their ordinary Garrisons, began now, even in the depth of Winter, to oppose some other of their Forces also; the Palatine of Rhine sending ten Companies of Horse-men to Poffonim, from thence to be sent to Szarvar for the defence of Stiria; and Calanite (but lately knighted by the Emperor) for his part raising four hundred Horse, a thousand Hussars, and three thousand of the free Haiducks, for the repelling of those Tatars; the Duke of Branswick also at that time, for the same Service, sending thither a thousand Horse, with two thousand Foot, against those sworn Enemies of the Christian Religion.

The Troubles of this Year thus overpast, Alba Regali being by the Christians lost, Pelb with several other Places won, Transylvania recovered, Buda besieged, the Vifier Bassa returned, and the Tatars came into Hungary, January with a sharp Frost began to open the next Year; by force whereof, the Rivers in many places, but especially the more easterly Countries, were not only frozen over, but firmed rather even wholly turned into Ice; Danubius, that great River (for all his swift course) being then also (as it is often) so hard frozen, that Men and Carts might safely pass to and fro thereupon. Which so hard a Season for all that did no whit freeze, but rather encrease the hot desires of the greedy Turks, still breathing after the utter Spoil and Ruine of the Christians dwelling near unto them. For which purpose, they even in this dead time of the Year, and extremity of Nature (which commonly affordeth unto most mortal Enemies a Cessation from Arms) out of their Garrisons of Sigeth, Buda, Canisla, Alba Regali, Babors, and such other Places, raised an Army of eighteen thousand strong, to have foraged and over-run the Christians, with their Territories confining upon them; Quermany, with the Coun-

Country thereabout, being the Places by them assigned to have felt the first force of their Insults and rage. Of which their Designs, Calanite, Governour for the Emperor in those Parts, understanding; to prevent the fame, and to meet with their Forces, with all speed put into the Suburbs of Quermany a thousand Reitters, and two thousand Landknights; and in the Burroughs thereof laded the Regiment of the Country Reingrave, with six Companies of the Cossacks, four thousand Haiducks, four hundred Carabins, French, and Wallons, two hundred Horse of the Regiment of Calanite; with whom was Calanite himself, commanding over all these Troops a man for his Worth every way answerable unto his charge. Who, for the more assurance of this Country, over which the Enemy now hovered, commanded all the Inhabitants thereabout to take up Arms; and withal, with good and strong Barriadoes to strengthen the ways, and stop up the Passages into their Country, which they right cheerfully performed, with their Weapons in one hand, and their Spades and Shovels in the other. Of which their so great Resolution the Turks understanding, changed their purpose. For they considering the assured danger they were to undergo, in forcing of these Troops, standing upon the Walls of their Defence, and frong in their Resolution, changed their former design, for the invading of Quermany, (where they for the space of five Weeks together had by the Christians been expected) and upon a new Resolution marched along by Roguesburg, with purpose to have loaded themselves with the Spoil of the Country thereabout. Which their new Design, caused Calanite to gather together his Forces to crook and frustrate them therein; which he did by favour of the River, which both strengthened him against their Incursions, and was well to be defended. But the Turks, whose Purpose was not to fight, but to have robbed and spoiled the Country at their Pleasure, finding now, contrary to their Expectation, such strong Resistance, and their Designs disturbed, in fine, gave over the Enterprize, and so again retired; contenting themselves to gather a Convoy of Visuals to put into Canisla, which then lay in great extremity for want thereof. Which Visuals they drew out of the Villages thereabout, and so came to Babors, to march to Canisla, a Town most commodious for such an Assembly, and for the relieving of Canisla. Of this their purpose Calanite (who parted for no cost) by his Elipsals advertised, even he which before was appointed as a Prey unto his Enemies, began now to plot with himself, that they should become a Prey unto him: their Cowardice, by so many precedent Effects declared, had given him the means to adventure upon them, and the hope to overthrow them. A necessary Consideration in Martial Affairs, for Commanders to put in execution their Designs, at what price soever; for that it is better to lose in the performance of them, with the preservation of their Reputation, than otherwise to gain with the loss thereof; for that it preserved, still striketh a fear of their Valour into the minds of their Enemies, oftentimes overcome even with this their apprehension thereof; whereas otherwise they might happily overcome, in the assurance by them conceived of their Enemies Cowardice.

The Turcs for the first time cowardly retire.

Calanite lies in Ambush for the Turks.

Upon which Resolution, this brave Colonel, the four and twentieth of March with his Troops marched towards little Komara, about two Leagues from Canisla, and lay with them close in Ambush in the Woods near unto two Marbles, over which the Turks had made two Bridges to pass the great Artillery and Waggonage upon; the Turks being well near 20000 strong, and our men but 8200, whereof there were 2200 Horse-men, and 6000 Foot, a small number in comparison of their Enemies. But whilst that rion stood, he this close in Ambush, with a purpose to do some notable Exploit, let us in the mean time run to Pelb, to see what there in the mean time passed.

The Turks, after the loss of Pelb, much grieved to have this Impulse so near their Hearts, fought to break it to our hurt, employing all their Treachery to gain our Garrison, and with their Forces to dislodge them of Visuals. And this Christian Army was no sooner risen from before Buda, but that the Turks came down again into their base Town, which they found much ruined and in evil estate. But the joy of their Conquest buried in it all the object of their Sorrow, and the feeling of their Grief; the lesser Passions always giving place unto the greater, and Sorrow finding no place at all in the midst of their immoderate Joy. Whereof they gave a number of Testimonies, by the thundring of their great Ordnance, by Fires of Joy and Volleys of small Shot; all which their fury, they discharged upon them of Pelb; who with the like countenance required them, sending them back again Bullets for Bullets. Which now became a common Exercise among the Canoneers, passing the time in these Actions, more upon a bravery than to any purpose, small harm being done thereby either on the one side or on the other: in such sort, that in the end the Turks, better advised, requested our men to cease from such shooting, as they on their part would do like wise, and to expect the end of the Negotiation of Peace, of a certain begun (as they said) betwixt their Princes; but meaning indeed by this means to spare their Powder, Shot, and Pains, and to reserve them to their better use.

And yet for all this triumphant Joy, the Turks in Buda were in great want of Visuals, the late Siege having devoured all their Provisions, and no new supply thereof as yet come unto them; in which, that their greatness care was now how to come by Visuals, without which they must needs forsake their City. Of which their so great necessity, the other Garrisons in the places thereabout advertised, assembled themselves to take order therefore, and having provided 200 Waggones, loaded with all manner of necessary Provisions at Alba Regali, with a Convoy of 6000 Soldiers, put themselves upon the way toward Buda. Of all which their Proceedings the Garrison of Strigonia having got understanding, and joyning unto all having got the Garrison of Komara, met with them upon the way between Alba Regali and Buda, and charged them; and so with great confidence on both sides came to handy blows, the Turks being in number stronger, and our men in Valour and resolution; the Waggoners in the mean time standing still, as the motive of the Charge, and appointed for a Prey unto the Victors. But our Horse-men, being for the most part Hussars, well acquainted with such charge, with their divers Counters greatly troubled the Enemies, our Foot-men in the mean time charging them also with a number of the same Arms, and like Courage defending themselves, and many of them being slain, and the Waggoners gained from them, gave place unto their Valour, and so were almost all cut in pieces. The Waggoners thus surprised, were divided as a rich Booty among the Victors; forty whereof were sent unto the Garrison at Pelb; who were well content that the Enemies Travel and Wealth had been gathered for their good, and without their own Pains to place themselves with the fruit of their Enemies Labours. But what should we say? The most true Resolutions are sometimes by Chances crossed, and Tem-

pests otherwhilse overtake us, even in the entrance of the desired River. The Turks of Buda, understanding of the brute of this medley, and that it was for their Bread, posited in haste to have succoured their Troops, and arrived at the same time that our men victoriously led along by the River of Danubius the Waggon they had before gained. At the sight of which Object, they, animated with the hunger after the Viduals, and with desire to be revenged upon the men, charged them. But our men, who thought of nothing more, but that they were victorious, and Possessors of their Enemies Booty, seeing these new-come Enemies so furiously to charge them, daunted with the presence of all, and with the consideration thereof only posited, but thought themselves of nothing else, but how to save themselves, and to leave their Honour, Booty, and the Field, all as Spoils unto their Enemies. The furious Countenance of the Turks, and their number mounting ours by 1500, so bereft them of their resolution for to fight for their Lives and forsake them, accounting themselves happy enough if they might but save themselves. And the Turks without farther pushing of them, contented to have recovered their Viduals, left them, and so returned homeward, driving their Waggon along the Bank of Danubius. But see the Wind, which by and by changed, and having the River in sudden Tempest undertaken even at the entrance of the Port to swallow up both the one and the other, sent the Garrison of Pesth upon them of Buda, to slay them. Great changes of Fortune in one moment of time, which mocketh Men with fables, bringing forth effects quite contrary to their expectation. These Turks, slaying upon their Return by the coming of these new-come Adversaries, did even as ours had done before. For, not willing to prefer their Goods before their Life, and more greedy of Vidual than of Battel, they quitted their prize, and retired. For our men, in number two thousand, were seized of a Forest about the midst of the way whereby the Turks were to pass, and which they could by no means shun; and, divided into two Companies, kept themselves close there in Ambush, resolutely attending for the coming of their Enemies. Of which their Purpose the Turks not aware, and still pressing on forward, found themselves hardly charged, and recovered from them they were so hardly charged, one of our Companies charging them afront, and the other behind. So that the Turks, indolent betwixt them, and in so great and sudden a fear not knowing against whom to defend themselves, without any great Resistance betook themselves to flight, leaving their Waggon, and calling away the Arms; yea so, that a number of them were left dead upon the place, some others of them taken Prisoners, and the rest chased even unto the Gates of their City. But our men being Victors, with the Waggon, and a number of Prisoners, returned home, and by the mouth of their great Artillery gave a thousand Testimonies to their Victory unto the fortifical Cowards: who themselves also carried the heavy Nessus thereof unto the rest of their Fellows that up within the City of Buda.

But see again the change of Fortune, constant only in Unconstancy, as the Sequel shortly after shewed. Danubius, that great River, was then also (as is often) so hard frozen, that Men and Carts might now safely pass to and fro thereupon. In which so hard season, the Turks in Garrison at Buda, having once upon the frozen River braved the Christians in Pesth, and the two and twentieth of January in like bravery coming out the second time, were by the Garrison Soldiers of Pesth put to flight, and by two hundred of the most forward and valiant Soldiers hardly pursued; upon whom, not only they which fled, but others of the Turks also out of Buda in greater number returning, chased them likewise back again even to the Bridge, whereby they were to have passed into the City; which now drawn up for fear of great harm from such a number of Turks as were now come out, and were ready to have entered at the heels of the flying Soldiers, the poor Souls so flurried out, and too weak for such a multitude as then had them in chase, were there even in their Friends fight every man slain, the Turks themselves with little harm returning to Buda.

Neither long lasted the joy of this Victory; for within a few days after, one Lentow, a Captain of the Christian Garrison in Pesth, more grieved than the rest with the loss of so many valiant men, and some of them his Friends and Companions also; certainly understanding that certain of the chief of the Turks of Buda, with two of their greatest Commanders, and a great Train of gallant Gentlemen, were, for their Pleasure, the next day about to go unto the hot Baths near unto Buda, and taking with him threefold Musketeers, the Night before secretly upon the Ice passed over the River, and so not far from the Baths lay close in Ambush, expecting the coming of their desired Prey. In which Expectance they lay not long, but these Turks, who were then in the Baths, as if they could have willed, and in those pleasant Baths merrily bathed and laced themselves: Fools to seek after the Pleasures of Peace amidst the Gulf of the mileries of War, and evil advised to assure themselves of fair Weather in a Storm so near at hand. For in the midst of all their Delights these resolute men came suddenly upon them, not fearing any such danger, and slew all the men, sparing none but one Boy and the Gentlemen; who in the time of the Conflict, naked as they were, ran as fast as they could into the City, Fear having in them overcome the modesty of their Sex. Which Exploit done, the Captain, leaving the Turks slain in the Bath (now become red with their Blood) returned with his Soldiers, laden with the rich Booty, and merrily sporting at the naked Gentlemen: with whose fearful Cry they of Buda stirred up, sent out certain of their Garrison after them, but to no purpose; for why, they were in safety before got home. By continuance of this Frost, by reason whereof the Turks could not pass down the River, the Soldiers in Garrison at Pesth were driven to fight wants, as that Dogs and Cats were accounted good meat among them; the Turks their Enemies still roaming about in the Fields to keep them from Viduals, and to increase their Need.

Of these Necessities the Turks of Buda were Partakers also, hunger-starved as were the other, but yet every day in the field to seek relief. They knew right well, that Hunger was hard to be deceived, being still in Action and vigilant: and therefore they sought some means how to deceive our men, fill attending upon them, and so to assure themselves of Viduals. To which end they gave it out, and made these as if they would have besieged the Fort of Adom, distant about two Leagues from Buda: Under the colour whereof, they received into their City a Convoy of fifty Waggon laden with Viduals and Munition; which our men hindered not, for that they had no suspicion of any such purpose of theirs. With which Relief the Turks encouraged, gave knowledge thereof unto their overthwart Neighbours in Pesth by a thousand great Shot, which they in thundering manner sent over the River unto them, as from men of Courage, and devoid of fear. Howbeit, that this Action was more vain than profitable unto the Turks, who, for the dilpence of their Shot and Powder, gained not so much as the Life of one Soldier, nor one Stone out of the Walls of Pesth. Upon this Jollity, these false Garrison Soldiers of Buda shortly after thought to have upon the sudden surprised Palotta, a small Castle of the Christians, by Night, but being in good time discovered, were deceived of their hope, and were the Life of an hundred men, and their men, informed to retire; unto whom Gaspar Hornad, Captain of the Castle, by a Country Picant, before sworn to do the Errand, sent a little Pot full of Salt, and a Bottle of Wine, willing them (in derision) with that Salt to season the Venison they had taken in their late Conquest, and to empty that Bottle to quench their thirst, and to cheer them up after their late Laufeg.

This Jeer more provoked these Enemies, galled so to hear of their shame and loss in such sort, that in revenge thereof, they discharged a shower of thundering great shot and small Bullets upon the Garrison of Pesth, which in great abundance fell out of the Cloud of their Range. But all to small purpose; for that their Cannons being evil cased, overthrew the Town, carrying with their thundering Bullets more fear than they did hurt; yea, that woe was the Ruin made by their great Battery fell upon their own City. For while they were thus thundering, Fire, by Negligence of the Canoners, fell into one of the Towers of Palotta, which was a thing hold of another, and so running along, as if it had been by a Train of purpose laid, burnt out with such force, that it overthrew a long piece of the Wall of Buda, which in the fall thereof overwhelmed a great number of the Soldiers near unto it. The noise of this Thunder-clap was great, and the force thereof terrible, so that it revived them of Pesth with some good hope, by this Breach to force the Place, the Turks being from thence retired. Upon which Occasion, the Governour of Pesth resolved to give an assault unto the Place, and to make use of the means that Fortune, without his Pain or Travail, had put into his hand. Whereupon, taking with him a thousand Almaines, and three hundred Hungarians, he forthwith (in hope of good Success) marched toward the Breach; and happily had prevailed, but that by the way they by chance met with a Company of Turks, who gave an Alarm unto them of the upper Town, who upon that the approach, manned their Walls, and with great speed repaired the Breach. Now all that they of Pesth could do, was to revenge themselves upon these Turks whom they had met withal, upon which there all slain, except some few, whom they saved, and carried Prisoners to Pesth, to be by them instructed of the Enemies Affairs.

About this time, Radul Vayvod of Valachia advertised, that the Turks in Garrison at Silistria were gone abroad into the Country to seek after Booty and Viduals, with his Soldiers passed forthwith over the River Danubius upon the Ice, to surprise the Town, now barred of the Garrison; whose men, for the desire of the Riches of the place, and for fear left the Garrison Soldiers should return before they had gained the place, with redoubled Force and Courage so assailed the Town, that the Turks dismayed, and deeming the number of the Christians that so furiously assailed them to be greater than indeed it was, by reason of the greatness of the Enterprise by them taken in hand, after some small resistance, left the way open for them to enter; who forthwith over the dead Bodies of their Enemies thrust into the Town, took the whole spoil thereof (which was both great and rich, as being a Town well peopled) and so let fire upon it, to the intent that it should no more serve for a place for the Enemy to retire unto. This Vayvod thus victorious and rich, returned with his Soldiers laden with Spoils of their Enemies, before that the Turks could gather themselves together to hinder their retreat. About unto George Bajla, who was then in Transylvania in Arms against the Turks, for his part of the Booty he sent him thirteen of the Enemies Ensigns.

But our Troops are now too long in their Ambush, where the valiant Calovite holdeth them close, attending the coming of the Turks, and of their Convoy to Canisla; now we must draw them out of their Sentinels, and see what Effects their Designs shall bring forth. These brave Soldiers had now lain three days in their Ambushes without discovering of any Enemy, until that the fixth of March three Ensigns fell into their Hands, whom the Turks had sent forth before, to discover what the Enemies were then abroad in the field. But these faithful Infidels so taken, would not by any means discover any thing hurtful unto their Friends, or profitable for ours; So that in fine, the General, moved with their Obstinacy, commanded one of their Heads to be struck off, to terrify the other two, and by force to draw from them that which fair Intreaty and Persuasion could not. The other two that were yet alive dismayed with this Spectacle, and well beaten to tell the truth, were at last constrained to confess, that they were the Enemies sent forth to view the Country, to see if the Christians had any force there, able to let their Cannons and Wagons to enter into Canisla; which not appearing, and they reporting unto their Companions, that the Country was clear, that then within two days after the Convoy was to pass even by the same place where they then lay, to be put before day. Our men thus informed of the Enemies Designs, forced their hope to defeat them, and again retired themselves into their Ambushes, attending for their hoped Prey, in such sort, that our men in their Conceits held the Victory now as good as gained; howbeit, that it was yet but in hope and expectation. And that which more confirmed the matter was, that within two hours after the taking of these Spies, the Haiducks layed without the principal Ambushado, and hidden in the thickets and bushes, discovered a Corner of Horsemen, with five Ensigns of the Turks, come out of Canisla, marching to meet with the Convoy, in safety to conduct the same into the Town. At which overture the Hungarians awaked, gave knowledge unto the General of the arrival of the Enemy; to the end he might resolve what was best in that case to be done. Which Opportunity Calovite embracing, and making much of time, put his Horsemen in good order, to inclose the Turks between the Marsh and the Wood, and to cut them off in inclosed in pieces. The Turks having discovered nothing but the Marshes and the Woods, held on their way, and so as men having their Hands and Feet bound, fell into the Power of their Enemies. For being come into the danger, the Christian Carabins charged them into the head of their Companies as they marched, and disordered them; The Hungarians fell upon their flanks, which they opened; and the Horse-men pressed them at their backs. These poor miserable men so inclosed, not knowing against whom first to defend themselves, and seeing death upon every side of them, became as beasts to be sacrificed unto the fury of the Christians. The small resistance that they made delivered not the name of a fight, being all slain, and having themselves not slain one man; layed by heaps upon another, not having overthrowen so much as one of their Enemies; in such sort, that of six hundred men that were there 1603 there together, there were not four of them saved. Their Horsemen which followed them, seeing them surprised, instead of relieving them, shamefully fled; and thinking by flight to save themselves, whilst that their Companions were in mauling, preferred their Lives before their Honour: For it be a shame for Soldiers in flight to flee with the safety of their Friends, it must needs be an irreparable dishonour to flee and leave them to the slaughter. But our Carahins, taking the occasion for their Advantage, no more spared their Horses in the pursuit of these Infidels, than they had done their Hands in the defeating of their Fellows; but pursuing against their Fugitives, slew a number of such of them as were well mounted, and pursued the rest even to the Gates of Camissa. Those of the Town at this Tumult raised an Alarm, shot off their great Artillery, and discharged many Volleys of small shot against our men, as well to stay the pursuit of our men, and to save their own, as to give warning unto them that were to bring the Convoy, that our men were in the Field, ready to surprise them. But during this fight, three of the Turks Horsemen falling well mounted, and exceeding hardy, adventurous to pass by our Troops, and upon the four to men with them which were bringing of the Convoy, and to give them warning of the overthrow, and that they should again return to Babaz. Which they for brave an attempt Fortune favoured, as not willing to frustrate the defect of so well deserving Valour. And the Turks upon the way with the Convoy, now upon this Advertisement returned, and retired themselves again into the Castle from whence they came.

But our men, advertised of this their retreat, and as it were deceived of the hope by them conceived for the intercepting of the Convoy, undertook an exploit much more haughty, brave, and dangerous: for forthwith they made head toward Babaz, with a Resolution to carry the place; and though they were almost sixteen miles from it, yet they resolved to go thither, and to make themselves Masters thereof. And so marching cheerfully on, therein used such diligence, that about nine of the Clock at night they arrived at the place; whither they were no sooner come, but that they did what they might to damn their Enemies, to strike up their Drums, to remove their Artillery, to rattle with their Arms, to keep a fire with their Souldiers, and to make the noise, not of a small, but of a puissant and great Army. But the Turks, in number twice so many as were our men, and within a good and strong place, were not with such a brute to be carried away, but standing fast upon their Guard and Resolution, prepared themselves for fight, and how to receive our men, if they should attempt to assault them. Now whilst the Alarm thus sounded, our Companions advanced themselves, repeating oftentimes the name of Tejus, and making themselves ready for to fight. This Skirmish began with a thousand Cannon Thumps, which the Turks cast, and their Souldiers fill playing from the Curtain of their Walls, so that the Castle seemed as if it had been a Mountain of Fire. All which Terrors no whit stayed the hope of our resolute Foot-men, who passing thwart their flaming Thawes, marched along the counter-scarp of the Ditch toward the Gate of the Town, to have broken open and forced the same. The 1603 Turks at the same time were come forth out of the Town, making their assault as if they would have fallen forth upon our men, and have fought with them. But at the same instant that they charged the front of our Foot-men, they were by them fo encountered and beaten back, that having lost some of their men, they were glad again to retire into the Town; where they did their endeavour to defend themselves, not daring afterward to fight without the Favour of their Walls; within which it stood them upon to have both Courage and Power, being still furiously assailed by our men, who, planted upon the Town Ditch, with their Muskets and Harquebuses fo played the Turks upon their Walls, and in their holes, as that they durst not show themselves, or look out for the showers of Lead which they thundered upon them. And assuredly, if our men had then had Instruments wherewith to have opened the Gates or the Walls, as well as their Muskets and Harquebuses, had made a breach into the Resolution of the Turks, the Town had undoubtedly been ours; but this design being not before foreseen, neither intended, wanted the means to put it in Execution; so that, for want of Petards and of scaling Ladders, the place remained still the Turks, and saved it self out of our hands. In fine, our men having been four hours in fight before it, both doing and receiving harm, and finding no means to enter the place, were informed to found a retreat, and to leave it.

In which retreat, the Christians burnt certain Villages of the Enemies, rather to show that they had been there, than for any their Valour therein; seeing that things infensible, which follow the order of their Nature, are without offence, and they which hurt them without reason. This done, they of purpose retired to little Comara; for the long time they had kept the field, the divers Exploits by them done against the Enemies, and the common report of the vanquished, had stirred up the Enemies, so that they began now on every side by heaps to flock together to swallow them up, and even now pressed upon their retreat. So Colonnas, in despite of the Enemy, in safety brought back his Souldiers; and being entered into Comara, caused the Heads of the principal of the slain Enemies to be set upon the Pikes of the Palliades, and upon a great Pine-tree standing before the Town, for this purpose, had almost all the Branches lopped off. An action learned from the Cruelty of the Turks, and now done by the Christians, more to astonish and deter them from this their cruel Custom, than for any Glory or Profit ensuing thereby; seeing that to tyrannize upon a dead body, is but a sign of Cowardice, and an Action altogether unprofitable.

This done, our men departed from this Castle, as men worn, and almost spent with Travel and Weariness, but yet more with Famine. For why, they, thinking to have executed but that design which had put them in Arms, and that in so short a time also, had taken no Provision of Victuals, with them; so that they were all pined with Hunger, overcome with Watching, and half dead with Labour. Their Horses also in like sort languished, the Country being alike cruel both to the one and to the other. For beside that it was unfruitful for such as held the field (all the Fruits thereof being gathered together and carried into the Town by the Men of War) it was not possible for our men to forage, or to seek for Victual there, and to come to an happy end of their design, for that they had raised an alarm abroad in the Country, and fo perhaps might themselves have become a Prey unto them, whom they ought to prey upon. Which was the cause that our Souldiers had for the space

1603 of three days eaten nothing but Crabs and Acorns, which they found in the Woods which covered their Ambushes; so that being now come into this Castle, they devoured a world of Victuals, and requested every one of them to return again unto their Garrisons; their Bodies weakened with Hunger, being scarce able to bear their Arms. But that was not all; for departing from little Comara, they were advertised, that the Turks shut up the ways whereby they were to make their retreat home; in hope easily to overcome men already with hunger brought low, and to kill the Bodies which travel already had spent. However, the great Courage of our men frustrated this the Enemies Design, and saved themselves. But so far off was it that this Advertisement dismayed Colonnas, that even to the contrary it the more increased his Courage, as appointed for his Glory; being glad to have such an occasion offered him for the showing of his Valour, although it were through the midst of Danger, Death, and Slaughter. So that instead of flinching the Combat, whereas it was reported, that the Turks with great assurance marched near unto a Castle of the Christians, to make head upon a Passage whereby our men were to retire; he turned head toward the same place, with a firm Resolution, with true Valour upon the sudden to encounter the Enemy, which had thought to have surprised him by Cowardice. And the Souldiers, weakened with Hunger, although they well apprehended the Danger of this Design, yet, relying upon the great Resolution of their General, and considering that Necessity they had to go farther for their safety, upon a good Courage were content to follow whithersoever their General would; who led them directly unto the aforesaid Castle, where it was expected that the Turks should have charged them. But being come thither, there was no body to be seen; and yet our men, as hungry as they were, flayed there one day in ambush, expecting the coming of their Enemies; who, for all that, having no mind to meet them, appeared not, but gave them Time and Liberty in safety to retire themselves every man unto his own Garrison, to refresh themselves, and to recover their Strength.

But now whilst our Men of War, after these Troubles in Transilvania and Hungary, repose themselves; let us in the mean time take our Journey to Constantinople, and go unto the Marriage of Hassan Basha, one of the Vissers of the Grand Signiory, and last year General of the Turks Army in Hungary.

At such time as he departed from this great City, to go unto the Conquest of Alba-Regalis, Mabomet the Turkish Emperor, resolved to set all upon the regaining of this City, caused to be presented unto him a Crown and a Sword, the one in reward of his Valour, if he returned with Victory from this exploit; the other in Remission of his Cowardice, if he failed in the performance thereof; promising him indeed his Sister in Marriage, amongst other the glorious Rewards and Trophies of his Victory; and threatening him with Death, as a Punishment amongst the Grievs of his Dishonour. But it came to pass, that by the Cowardice of our men, he came unto the effect of his desire (as is aforesaid) and took the City, which promised unto him the glorious Triumph in Constantinople. And under the sweet influence of this Planet he returned to Constantinople, where he found all things in readiness for the satisfying of his Expectation, and the Advancement of his Glory. He is magnificently received of his Prince, greatly flattered by all the Nobility, and with devout reverence posthume honoured of the People. And as he had happily discharged his Charge, he found in like manner all things prepared and in readiness for the performance of the promise of the Grand Seigneur, his Lord and Master, who had caused them to be in most sumptuous manner provided for the solemnizing of the Marriage, and the contentment of the Basha. But nothing now wanting that he could have desired or wished, more than the very solemnizing of the Marriage it self, and that also every day of all men expected; the

Janizaries and Spahis, with the other Souldiers of the Court, to the number of five and twenty thousand, even upon the fudden, when as no such thing was feared, came, and in Arms presented themselves before the Palace, and the Tribunal, held the chief Administration of Justice in the Turkish Palace, the first four days in every week; and having set Guards at the Court Gates, the more fully to execute what they were before resolved upon, proudly demanded to have Audience for certain of the Spahis and Janizaries, of whom they had made choice, in the names of them all, to deliver unto the great Bashes their Grievances, and the Causes of their Assembly. Who, as soon as they were entered into the Divano before the Bashes, (of whom the most courageous of them was not without fear, as looking for nothing but for present death) they at the first demanded to have Hassan Basha delivered unto them; Who, thinking that his Head should have served for a Sacrifice to pacify their Fury; as a man altogether dismayed, wan and pale, passed through this numerous Multitude, to have gone unto the great Sultan, professing of his own Innocency, and calling upon his Prophet Mabomet, to discover unto them the truth of all things. But they, after a thousand Injuries and Reproaches by them heaped upon him, rudely demanded of him, whence it proceeded, that whilst he with a great part of the Forces of the Empire was buffed in Hungary, for the recovering of Alba-Regalis, there was in the mean time no good order taken for the suppressing of the Rebel in Alba; who by his difference was (as they said) now grown so proud, as with Ensigns displayed to come within three or four days Journey of Constantinople, the Imperial feet of the Ottoman Emperours. Whereunto he in so small fear answered,

That he for his part had done his Duty, as well whilst he had the charge of the Army in Alba, as now of late, whilst he had the charge against the Christians in Hungary; as even the Enemies themselves could witness. But seeing himself even ready to die, he yet requested them, that his guideless Death might be unto the State in general profitable; and in discharging of his Conscience, to declare unto them the Causes of this Conquest and Neglect for the suppressing of the Alban Rebel, which they were so desirous to know. It proceeded (as he said) only from the evil Government of the Grand Sultans Mother (who then all commanded) and from the negligent carelessness which with much skill to exors in the State, unto, yet hearing him to excuse himself, and to lay the blame there where they were well content it should rest; they gave him leave to go to the great Sultan, to request him that they might speak with him; and further to deal with him, that they might have the Head of them who had been the cause of this dishonourable Service, or otherwise cowardly behaved themselves in the managing of the Wars against the Rebels in Alba. Threatening him withall, That if he failed to perform this his charge, he should not fail to feel the heavy Effects of their just Fury. An heavy charge, yet glad was the Basha to undergo the lame, to rid himself out of their hands, where he saw himself in great danger, amongst them, most of whom had

Sometimes served under him, than amongst so many his most mortal Enemies; but what Remedy he must now do or die therefore; for which he was the more to be excused. So in great fear coming unto the great Sultan, almost as fearful as himingling unto him the great danger like even if he, the Sultan, himself as fearful as himingling unto him, by the Mutiny of his best Soldiers, and Guards of his Person; perceiving him, he came to appease their Fury, before they had embred themselves with Blood; for fear of further danger like enough to enlure, as they were his own Person, as unto the rest of his most faithful and truly Comfeller, from such furious headstrong men, up in tumult with their Arms in their Hands. And although that a Prince ought not for the Greatness of his Estate to do any thing as thereunto forced by his Subjects, left in to doing the increase their Involency; that yet nevertheless, in this Action, being altogether extraordinary, he was not to reft upon that point; for that these mutinous Soldiers turned not their Weapons (as they pretended) against his Imperial Power and Sovereignty, but rather to the contrary, against the Contemners thereof, seeking to be revenged upon them that had done him such evil Service for the maintenance of the innocent and disloyal. And the Punishment of the innocent and disloyal. And that therefore the Justice of the Cause requiring and covering the Malice of the Fact, he was of Opinion, That it were best for him to yield a little unto the Zeal of these his best Soldiers, and to satisfy their just desire, although they were very evil and unlawful means sought for the same. And therefore advised his Majesty, in some sort to satisfy the just Complaints of these men, armed for the Revenge of his Honour; and to chastise the chief Commanders of his Asian Forces, such as by whole Treachery or Cowardice his Service being neglected, had armed these men against him; with the same hand punishing such as had wronged his Majesty in Honour, and appeasing the discontented for the good of his Service. Mahomet thus by the Basha persuaded, as also to shew himself in his Majesty unto these his discontented Subjects, one part of their desire; the Necessity of the Cause requiring, in his Imperial Seat presented himself unto them, accompanied with the Mafis, (the great Mahometan Priest) and some few others of the Reverend Doctors of their Law; who, by the Sultan commanded to sit down, and the Balfas standing up (so great the respect is to men of that sort, even in a barbarous Nation of so small respect) the chief of the tedious stepping forth, demanded leave to speak both for himself and the rest. Which being granted, he boldly thus began;

Most happy and mighty Emperor, we the Spahies and Janizaries, thy obedient Slaves, full of Grief and Discontentment to lose a great part of thine Empire in danger to live, desire to know of thee the cause why thy Greatness didst not remedy it, and implore that the Rebels Coups in Asia are unto thee unknown, seeing they have been so hardy as to come in Arms so near unto thy Imperial City, the Place of thine abode, and that without any let or resistance. They desire to know if all this hath been made known unto thee, and whether thou wilt take upon thyself the care of the Government of thy great Monarchy, or no; which through the negligent carelessness and evil Government of some by thee put in trust, is like unto a body with great and well proportioned Members, but of little or no Strength or Power. Or else, that thou, void of care, canst be content that all should be dispersed, and so every man to take unto himself what he can lay hands of, as the Rebels do in Asia.

Now let no man marvel at this presumptuous rude Speech of a proud Janizary, unto his Sovereign; for why, they are the men which may most boldly speak in Turkey, they the chief of Turk's Empire, the Great Sultans Children acknowledging no other Father but them; nay rather, the Great Turk himself is their Creator; they raise him up and confirm him in the Empire; they are his greatest Strength, and unto them he is most beholden. If Mahomet were with so insolent a Speech much moved, he was not only to be excused, but blamed; howbeit, being belted with such a furious tumult with Weapons in their hands, and having no means to withstand their Fury, he wisely dissembled his inward Choler, and with a fair Countenance, and a Majesty full of Mildness, with the best and calmest words he could devise, sought to appease them; imputing the Disorder and evil Success of his Affairs unto the unfaithfulness of his Ministers, and the concealing of the Truth thereof from him. Saying moreover, That before this their Complaint he had resolved to reform these Matters, and to take from them all Occasions of Discontentment, or for them to use any such Speech as was not becoming them; whose Obedience and Respect of loyal Duty unto him their Sovereign, should have been an Example unto the rest of his Subjects. Upon which Speech, they fiercely demanded of Hasan Basha, Why he had not given an account unto his Majesty, of the Rebels proceeding in Asia. Who answered, That he had never failed of his Duty therein, but that he had been always hindered so to by the Capit-Aga's saying, That it was not needful to trouble him their Sovereign therewith, (having committed their Matters to others) but to reform and amend them as well as they might otherwise, without giving of him any such distaste concerning these Matters. And further, That the cause of all these Disorders proceeded from the Emperor's Mother, the Capit-Aga, and some few others, unto whom he had commended the managing of those his Affairs. With which his answer the Mutineers more moved, furiously said, That they were their assembled to demand the heads of such Offenders; being resolved to take another course, if he should refuse to grant it them; I meaning thereby to make a new Emperor. Whereunto for all that, the great Sultan answered, That it was no Reason, neither that he would for their Humours put such as they demanded innocently to death; but willed them to reft themselves contented, until it might by order of Justice be tyed whether they had deserved death or no, and that then he would give them even his own Son, if he were found culpable. But the Mutineers, constant in their Resolution, again replied, That he had not by Justice put his Brethren to death, but for the Preservation of the State; and that those whom they so demanded were so guilty of that wherewith they were charged, as that they should not have an orderly Tryal; That the Laws, how just soever, should be unprofitable, and Justice Injury, if they were not by them to be punished; and that therefore it must needs be so, or else that they would take therein a course themselves. As for the Emperor's Mother, they were contented that she should be confined unto some place farther off, and no more to meddle in Matters of State. A strange thing it was, to see so great a Prince so to be forced by the Sedition and Mutiny of his Subjects, to deliver to great an Officer of his Court as was the Capit-Aga, with such others as they required, to be used at their Discretion. But the violent Resolution of these most insolent men to stop the Mutiny, made the Sultan Mahomet wisely to yield to what they demanded; causing the Capit-Aga, and the others others to be brought forth; who presented themselves unto their fury as men already half dead. Mahomet did what he might to have saved them, but the Mutineers with a great and dreadful Clamour still cried out to have them dispatched; neither could they be appeased until they saw their Heads thrum from their Bodies. For the lots of whom, so dear unto him, Mahomet inwardly grieved; and to be in some part revenged, commanded the Executioner to be called, and to be sent unto some of the chief Balfas (whom he knew to be much beloved and respected of the Janizaries, and whom he could have been content to have been rid of) as he had done unto the Capit-Aga and the rest; but then the murmuring and mutiny of the Janizaries was in such sort increased, and as it were redoubled, as that Mahomet was so far from having patience to temper his Choler, and by giving way to appease them. The Emperor, the Sultan's Mother, for all that was not then confined, but referred to the farther troubling of the State.

With like Tyranny, and no less Injustice, Mahomet but a few days before had caused Capin, one of his great Balfas, to be beheaded; but whether it were for the desire he had of his Wealth and Riches, or for the envy of his Honour and Valour, was uncertain; howbeit, the former Cause seemed unto many to be the more probable, for that Mahomet, immediately after his death, took the whole Spoil of his Wealth, and seized upon all his Goods except 400000 Duckats, which Capin Basha, Father of the dead Basha, had and he carried off. While his purloining, Mahomet having discovered (as the eye of the covetous man is always fixed upon his Prey) demanded one day of the Basha, if it were true that he had retained unto himself those 400000 Duckats? Which Fact the Basha, partly for fear, and partly for Covetousness, cantly denied, and swore himself to be guilty of such Crimes, and wherewith, he was forthwith taken, and thinking by lying to have saved his Life, was for the Truth put to death, without any farther Examination of the matter, having his Head struck off. Such is the small assurance, even of the greatest that live in Tyranny Courts. Neither rested his greedy mind so contented with the Basha's Blood; for why, that served but for a few, it was his worldly work that cure, which was all forthwith laid upon, rifled, and carried away, to satisfy in effect the greedy Appetite of the hungry Tyrant, who changed the Dowry and Succellion of the Wife and Children of the dead Basha, into Bonds, Chains, Punsions, and Slavery.

Mahomet, another Basha, with these Cruelties dismayed, and perceiving the like evil hap and danger to hang over his own Head that had overwhelmed Capin and his Son, resolved to have provided for himself against this mischief, by flying unto the Rebels in Asia. But this his purpose discovered by certain Spies (with serve as means to open a way unto the Turks cruelty) and he, with one of the chief Followers of Capin Basha, taken by the Janizaries, were both by them cut in pieces.

But whilst these things thus passed at Constantinople, the Rebels with all diligence prosecuted their Rebellion in Asia, and bent their Forces against the great Town there. Their Arms were exceeding great, every man joining himself unto the first Forces which were in good Estate, being not as yet by any greater Power repressed, and rich with the Spoils that they had taken. These men had besieged Angora, a great and strong Town in Asia, and seemed resolutely set down for the carrying thereof. Whereof the Citizens being afraid, and out of hope of Relief, came to Parle, offering unto them a Sum of Money to redeem themselves and their City; and so in fine agreed to give them 200000 Duckats; upon the ready payment whereof, the Rebels, without more ado, presently retired.

Shortly after, the new Captains of Sultan Mahomet arrived there also, whom he had placed in the places of them whom he had before executed for the appeasing of the Soldiers of the Court, who would needs make it Treason, and put to Death the Citizens, for having given such Money as is aforesaid, unto the Rebels, who it were done for the Preservation of the Lives of the Citizens, to be respected in the horrors of the Law; or that Life were to become a Slave unto Riches, and Riches not made for the use of Man's Life. Well, needs they would for this supposed Treason (as they pretended) have put them to death, and lacked their City; but indeed all was in their greedy fury to have carried away that which the Rebels had in their Mercy left them. These poor Citizens, with this to cruel a Resolution dismayed, and out of all hope of finding favour at such merciless men's hands, resolved now to hazard all, and so upon the sudden taking up Arms, stood upon their own defence. Hereupon arose a great and cruel Fight between these Soldiers and the Citizens, both the Subjects of one Prince, and all of them of one and the same Superstition; but the one side, armed with Pride and Covetousness, and the other with Necessity and Despair; howbeit, at last the juster Cause prevailing, the Citizens overcame these new-come Soldiers, and having slain a great number of them, chased them out of the City. This evil Entrance into their Charges, given them by the Subjects themselves, increased the Rebels Courage, so that they, being in number forty thousand, under the leading of one of the Tartar Hosts Brethren, befieged Bursa, a great and rich City, being the Store-house for the warlike Provision of Asia, and the Place whereunto the Turks Custom-Taxes, and Subsidies of Asia were brought, and there kept. These men, after certain days befieged in the Siege, and great Resistance made by the befieged, at length by force carried the Place, slew the Inhabitants, and lacked the City. Which Exploit, grading their Fortune with Honour and Boory, increased also their Power and Reputation; so that re-doubled on all sides, and increased with Courage and Spoils, Mahomet dismayed, resolved by fair means to appease them, and to entreat with them of Peace. This good Fortune had drawn unto their part the Governor of Babylon, either weary of the Service of the Turk, or seduced by the Ruine of the State in general, to increase his own Power; whose Revolt greatly increased the Rebels Power, and diminished the Grand Seigneur's. Beside these Milaphs also, the great Shaugh of Persia (commonly called the Sophi) thrusting himself into the Disorders, to make for Gain, and to fish (as they say) in a troubled Water, had now taken Corbey, a strong Town upon the Borders of the Turks Empire, and was making himself ready for new Conquests. All which Temples arising as it were in one together, called Mahomet to strike Asia, and mangle his Imperial Dignity and Honour, to make for Peace, with which indeed could not be great in such weakness of his nature, neither brave in such his great want of Courage. For great Dignities and Honours, without Valour to maintain them, are but like rich Garments which cover Bodies almost rotten, but heal them not. Mahomet, desirous to come to some good agreement with his rebellious Subjects, as he might (but not without his great dishonour) obtained the same granting to them all their Demands, disarming them by yielding unto them, and not by Valour; and giving unto

1603 unto Zellah, one of their Chieftains, the most honourable place of the Baia of Bofra, to content his Army, and to bind him thenceforth to do his Service. The ready way by sufficiency to increase the difloyal Subjects Courage, instead of stopping their Fury by the severity of Justice; for to grace a Rebel with Offices of Authority, is but to arm him with lawful Power, for him the better to undertake whatsoever shall bid fit his Appetite and Desire, upon the hope of his own private and certain Profit or Advancement.

Mabomet their Captains and Men of War, seeing this dishonourable Peace of their Prince, and Prefecture of the Rebels, honoured with Honours and Dignities, instead of Pains and Punishments which they should of right have for their Rebellion induced; began to enter into great Murmuring and Discontentment against their great Sultan. They considered his unjust dealing and base fear, in advancing the Rebels unto such Honours and Dignities, as of right belonged unto his most faithful and loyal Officers and Servants; by such their unworthy Preferments making them Slaves unto his Enemies, and Vassals unto the Rebels; they, to their dishonour and loss, by their Infidelity and Treachery, enjoying the Honours and Preferehes of right due to their faithful and loyal Servants. What dangerous Perfidious transported them to far, from their Allegiance and Duty, as to undertake a greater and more perilous matter against his Crown and Dignity, than had the Rebels before by taking up of Arms in the Field against him, whereunto the assured knowledge they had of his Cowardice encouraged them also; so that this Resolution was thrust him out of his Imperial Seat, and he, as up to his eldest Son, called also Mabomet, in his Place. These are the ordinary Effects of Injustice and Cowardice, the overthrow of Princes; their Injustice through Cruelty aiming all Creatures against them; and their Cowardice through Contempt dispensing with every man for his Duty, so that he must be just, that will keep his Subjects in order; and valiant, that must hold them in awe.

Unto these Discontentments these Mutineers joynd also (as I said) the foolishness, effeminateness, and sufficiency of Mabomet, unfit to deal in matters of Estate, and altogether unable to manage Arms. He was too cowardly, as they thought, to repress their Valour by force; and too feeble, to frustrate their Designs by Wisdom; which not a little incouraged them in that their to deperate and dangerous a Resolution. They drew also into their Plot the Sultan's Mabomet, his chief Wife, and Mother to the young Prince, who, blinded with Ambition (of the base of great Spirit) had not the hap to reject their Perfidious, as dangerous unto her and her Son, but shutting her Eyes against the due Consideration of Loyalty and Duty, cast both her self and her Son headlong into the midst of most deperate Dangers.

This Project (of no less importance, than of the deposing of one of the greatest Monarchs of the World) resolved upon, some of these men, according to the manner of the Turks, joining Superstition unto their Designs, consulted with an Astrologer, concerning the Success of the Actions of the young Prince, whom they were about to install in his Fathers Imperial Throne. This man, to be executed in his Trumpeches, seeing that to deceive is the chief point of his Art, erected the figure of the Princes Nativty, consulted with his Spirits, considered the celestial Bodies, and in fine, arrived at the point of his Judgment, for the good and welfare of the Prince; and thereupon dispatched an Eunuch towards the Sultaness, with these pleasing Speeches, That the should be of good courage and in assured hope that the young Prince her Son, within a few days should have the Imperial Crown set upon his Head, and the Royal Scepter put into his hand; his Art (as he said) promising unto him these Honours, by the Favour of the Celestial Bodies, of whom he had learned these News; and by the Conference with Spirits, from whom he had this assurance. But O the vain and foolish Knowledge of Man against the Power of God, unto the second Cause, that which altogether belongeth unto his own Power; robbing him of his own Providence, which extendeth over all, to give the same unto Creatures, which neither have their own Being, neither are able of themselves to bring forth, or to work any Effects at all without it; and that more is, to give certain credit unto the Enemy of all Faith and Belief, even to the Father of leading, who taketh as much Glory in falsehood, as God himself doth in truth; as being the proper mark of his Power. For it chanced that these Letters, sent by the Eunuch to the Sultaness, were intercepted and brought unto Mabomet the Great Sultan, whom they most concerned; whereupon it so fell out, that he which took upon him to foretell the long Life and Empire to befall to another man, could not foresee the end of his own Life, which followed him fast, even at the heels, being himself by the Commandment of the great Sultan, with the young Prince, the Eunuchs, and fifty others of the Conspirators, and last at all, consenting unto the Conspiracy, most cruelly strangled, and the Sultaness her self drowned. Howbeit, some report this young Prince to have been strangled upon suspicion of conspiring against his Father, with the Rebels of Asia; which after his Death being found not to be the Cause, which put that Sulpicion into Mabomet's Head, to have been therefore worthily hanged. But with these Contentments taken from the Croffes of our Enemies, let us again return unto Hungary.

The last year ended with the great brute of the coming of the Tartar Han, with a great Army into Hungary, and now he had dispatched his Ambassadors towards the King of Polonia, to demand of him Tribute, and passage through his Country. Great and proud demands to be both at once required. But the King of Polonia required him again with the like, denying him both the one and the other, roughly answering of his Threats with a refusal, caused the proud Tartar to blune his intended course, and for fear of being defeated by the Polonians in passing through their Country, (as the Tartars had often been) before he could come into Hungary, took another way, and turned with his Army toward Valachia. Of whose coming, Radin the Vayvod was under standing, and that beside the foraging of his Country, they had a purpose to displace him, and to set up another Vayvod in his stead; with great diligence gathered together the greatest Power that he could, and so marched unto the Borders of his Country, there to attend the coming of these Tartars, and to stay them from passing. Which in effect fell out according to his desire, for the barbarous People being arrived, and attempting with all their force to have entered, were by this little Army encountered; which, commanding the Country, took all the advantages of the strait passages, and there notably repulsed the great Enemy. Two of the greatest Leaders fell out fortunately unto the Valachians, who thereupon slew about 10000 of the Tartars; whose advantage for all that still came on, and at the third encounter so long maintained the fight, that their whole Army was now come in, and hardly charged the Valachians, while 1603 whole Fortune furcharged, began then to change, the hardy being constrained to bow under the multitude, and valor forced to yield unto number. Which was not done without a long and cruel fight, both Armies encountering with great Courage and Fury, the one for the defence of their Country, and the other for an entrance unto their Conquests. Howbeit, the strong Enemy at length prevailed, and entering into Valachia, brought in with Ruine, Death, and Destruction.

The Tartars, having by force thus opened themselves a way through Valachia, and grievously spoiled the Country, were come with their Army to Quinque Ecclesie, a Town in Hungary, to join their Forces with Hafsan Bassa, now after his Marriage returned into this Country with a great Army to continue his Charge, who caused the Tartars to be mustered in his Presence, and found them to be forty thousand strong. Men of great Courage against the weak, but meer Cowards before the Courageous; who, instead of assaulting the Walls of any strong Town, fell upon the Cottages of poor Country Villages, ransacking and pillaging the poor Inhabitants, as well in the Villages of the Territories subject unto the Turks, as in the Territories of the Christians; constraining the poor People, contrary to their Conscience, and to the Prejudice of their Faith, to swear to serve the Turk; Besides that, they enforced them to furnish them with all warlike Provision, and Munition, which they put into Canisla, a burg, a while after that our men had defeated the Garrison there. Neither were they so contented, all the Neighbours being thereabout subjected to this Tempest; for they passed into Stiria with their Families, and over-ran a part of that Province, spoiling it of Men, Cattel, and Goods; leaving instead of them, Desolation, Misery, and Death; and carried away with them two thousand poor Christians for Slaves, whom they sold unto the Turks, and made great profit of them. From thence they went into the Country of Savary, embroiling themselves with the Blood of the Christians, rifting their Villages, and after that burning them, carrying away with them a thousand Christian Captives into most miserable Bondage and Slavery. Which cruel Outrages, afterward thrust the valiant Colonel Collo-nis into the Field, against these barbarous People, to flay their Incurtions, and to defeat them if he could.

This worthy Commander had but a few days before been troubled in appeasing the French Hostemen in Garrison in the Villages about Rouquesburg, risen up in Mutiny for their Pay; whose hot, and moved Spirits, he by his Wisdom so calmed, as that they were content again to be sworn to the Emperor, and so joynd themselves unto the Army of Collo-nis, which was then 10000 good men strong.

In the mean time, the Tartars, greedy of Prey, and still seeking after Booty, ransack'd and spoiled five and twenty Country Villages about Veradin, all which they afterward burned also, carrying away with them a great Booty both of Men and Cattel; no man resisting them. At which time, other Companies of them also invaded the Country Seranie's Iland as far as Rachenburg, made in it great spoil, as had their Fellows elsewhere; and beside other Booty, carried away with them two thousand Christian Captives. These outrages of the Tartars stirred the Country on the one side, and Collo-nis on the other; who courageously opposing themselves against these Barbarians, for a time stay'd their Incurtions, they not daring to abide the force of this little Army, sufficient enough, for the Valour thereof, to have overthrow that of their Enemies, for number dreadful. This made them to turn their course another way into Scalonia, being in number five and thirty thousand men, leaving nothing behind them there but Death and Detolation, for the number of Prisoners and great Booties which they carried thence. Amongst other their spoils, it was their Fortune by the way to meet with fix hundred of the Christian Soldiers, of whom not one escaped their hands, but were slain every Mothers Son. At length it so fortun'd, that certain of their Troops in roaming abroad, fell into the danger of the Country Serin, who with his Followers still hovered aloof off, for fear to be of their great Multitude overwhelmed; a part whereof now falling into his hands, were by his Soldiers overthrow and all cut in pieces, and a number of Christian Captives by them taken, delivered unto Chains, and set at Liberty. Which exploit, was greater for the fear it brought upon the Enemy, than for the slaughter there made. For the Tartars, still in doubt to meet again with the Christian Troops (who left not one of them behind that they could light on) were glad now to keep themselves closer together, and so did a great deal the less harm than when they, without fear roamed up and down at their Pleasure; so that even by this little Victory the Country received some Comfort, and the Earl great Honour; small helps being infinite Treasures in time of Need, which out of it would not be to be reckoned of.

The Garrison Soldiers of Canisla, of late defeated by Collo-nis, in going to meet the Convoy coming towards them with Viduals (as is before declared) the rest of the Tartars, desirous to be revenged were consulting of the means how to bring the same to pass. It fortun'd, that at the same time there was a fugitive Christian Soldier in the Town, who made news of a man male-content, desirous to turn Turk; of whom the Turks made much reckoning, for that he seem'd to know much of the Designs of the Christians, and the means how to cross them; whereof he so assured them, as if the matter had been now already done, promising to bring them even into the midst of the Christian Camp, and to deliver it into their Hands and Power. Howbeit, his meaning was nothing less; for seeing the Turks much busied with the coming in of the Viduals into the Castle, brought into the Town after the overthrow of their fellows before sent forth for the bringing in thereof, and wholly intensive to that Business; knowing the place in the Castle where the Powder and Munition lay, he at the same time, by a Train lay'd Fire thereunto, and afterward, amidst much tumult and fire of the Town, and came to the Wall, got himself up by a loop-hole in the Wall, in ambush, expecting the Opportunity to perform some notable exploit upon the Success of so dangerous an adventure, whereunto he had before been made privy. Neither laid the fire any thing of the accustomed violence thereof, but seemed rather to redouble the same, it had so suddenly consumed the Buildings, Munitions, and Persons. All the place felt the Fury thereof; the Cannons, Canoners, Soldiers, and whatsoever else, was subject unto this dreadful blast; it was shaken and rumbled up and down, yet the fire burst out of the Castle, and burnt the greatest part of the Town also. There was a Confusion of fear, mishap, and misery together, the Terror whereof caus'd many of the Turks to cast themselves over the Walls, in hope so to have saved their Lives; but whilst they thought for have escaped the Danger of the Fire, as they presently fell upon the edge of the Street, for meeting with the Soldiers of Colonnio, (who lying in ambush near thereby, awaited the opportunity in that to confound a Tumult, to have leaped upon the place) they were all either taken Prisoners, or slain. But few the hap, how one cross chance of Fortune overthrew this so notable a Design, as had it been well followed, might in one moment have recovered that strong Place, which had before for the space of many days endured the greatest Forces of the Othoman Emperor; neither was then so lost, but through the infamous Treachery of our own men.

You have heard before, how that Colonnio had by his Perfidiousness, rather than by his Effects, appeased the French-men and Wallians, up in mutiny for their Pay, so that by him persuaded, they had again given their Oath of Fidelity unto the Emperor, and to follow his Army. But now, when occasion served, and held out as it were both her Arms unto the Christians, for the regaining and conquest of Prague and Wallia, the greatest part of Colonnio's strength, injuriously refused her to join an Officer; and at such time as they should rather have fought naked, then have failed in their Duty, (it being to have gained a most great and rich Conquest) for want of Pay (as they pretended) turned their backs, and being by no great intreaty or persuasions to be moved, the Discouragement of the rest, who were better minded, and their own eternal Infamy, withdrew themselves from the Army. So that Colonnio, rather by the wicked unfaithfulness of his own dilatory Soldiers, than by the Valour of his Enemies, disappointed of his purpose, was to his great Discontentment, contrary to that he hoped, enforced to retire without any thing without.

While this Exploit, so well begun, but evil performed, was in hand, the Turks and Tartars assembled together, made a cruel spoil in the Country about Kab, even almost unto the Gates of the Town, carrying away with them a great number both of Men and Beasts. In fine, it chanced that the Hussars of the Lord Nadashi came that way, who understanding what had happened, with all speed made after these Robbers, overtook them in their retreat near unto Alba-Regalia, slew a great number of them, and enforced the rest to leave a great part of their Prey behind them. With which Booty, recovered even out of the Lyons Mouth, they returned to the City, where the poor Hungarians and Country People, with Tears standing in their Eyes, requested to have again their own Goods. But War, the enemy of Charity, and nurse of barbarous Cruelty, had so hardened the Hearts of these men of War, as that they were not to be moved to restore them their Cattel again, but that they must redeem them for present Money, which they did and so received them.

Now the Noble Colonnio, seeing himself so shamefully forsaken of his own Soldiers, and disappointed of his purpose, and the Turks and Tartars in great numbers coming to the relief and repairing of this so sore shaken a Town; and out of hope to do any good therein, full of Grief and Indignation returned towards Comara. And however, that evil hap had cruelly frustrated the glory of his Enterprize, yet the Heavens, in despite of Fortunes wrong, left not this noble and valiant Captain altogether without Honour, but as amorous of his Vertues and Valour, presented unto him in this Winter of Fortunes disservice, some Triumph of Glory. For upon the way, as he was returning home, he met with 2000 Turks, whom, after some small resistance he cut all in pieces; miserable Sacrifices, appointed unto the fury of his wrath. In this fight their Ensigns were all taken, and a number of Prisoners, the chief of whom, together with their Ensigns, he sent to Prague, as a Present for the Emperor, and a token of his good Service.

The report then was, That the Turks and Tartars, with their united Forces, had foraged Sclavonia, taken divers strong Holds, burnt a number of Villages, and carried away eight thousand Christians Prisoners, beside a great number slain with the Sword, or consumed with Fire, and all the Cattel of the Country driven away; and that being with this booty come to Quinque Ecclesie, they had there received Command with Mahomet Baffa, to besiege Comara, and that all the Commanders of the Turks Army were thereupon resolved. All which reports no whit dismayed the Valiant Colonnio, or any thing altered his Designs; but having fortified Comara, against the intended Siege of the Turks, and taken from thence four Culverins, according to a former purpose by himself intended, resolved now to take from the Turks the Castle of Logna and Boulowanar, the Garrisons whereof greatly annoyed the Territories of the Christians, and hindered the Defence of the rest of the Country. These two Castles are situate upon a great Marsh which separateth Hungary from Rascia, (it being to have gained Bounders of Hungary, and strong enough to be defended against a small Army.

Upon which Resolution he set forward with his small and valiant Power, and they arrived within the sight of Logna, a Castle well manned, and furnished with all things necessary for the defence thereof. The Army lodged, Colonnio with a Drum summoned the besieged to yield up the Place, with Promises of Countreife if they should now accept of the same whilst it was offered them; which they stoutly refused to do, fearing to the contrary. That they would die and live within those their Walls. Colonnio seeing them so resolved, first caused a Mill to be assailed, which placed over against the Castle, and well fortified, served it instead of a Bulwark, and seemed hard to be taken; howbeit his men, loth to have their good Fortune even in the beginning checked, gave thereunto no brave assault, that after the Enemy had done what he could for the defence thereof, they became Masters of the Place, carried it, and therein lodged; but finding it dangerous to be kept, and to stand them in small stead, they set it on fire, and afterward planted four Culverins in battery before the Castle. But as they were thus busied, the Turks courageously sallied out upon them, not doubting to adventure themselves for the hope they had to be in short time by their great Army relieved. In this fall they met affront with the Haiducks, whom they fiercely charged, and so gauged them, that having slain thirty of them, they retired without any loss; forthwith discharging so many thundering Shots and Arrows upon our men, as that they well knew not how to save themselves from the danger of them, in such sort, that all the ways to approach the place being stopped, they began to devise how to set the Castle on fire; which they by certain Fire-works attempted, but to small purpose, the fire being no sooner kindled, but that it was forthwith blown by the Turks quenched. This done, and our men disappointed of their hope, they devised to set fire upon the timber which joined the Palliade to the Castle stretched toward the Port. Which their attempt forced but to small effect also, the fire burning but flowly to do the Enemies any great harm. All which Devices failing, they resolved by plain force to assault the Castle, and to scale the same; which Enterprize resolved upon, the Haiducks carrying before them certain strong and thick Planks of Wood, instead of Targuets, to defend them from the small Shot and Arrows of their Enemies; by this Device gained the Palliade placed upon the Ditch; and being there in some safety, with their Muskets and Harquebuses to apply the besieged, and that they drove them from their Garrisons, and made that they durst no more show themselves upon the Walls. And immediately after, two Companies of the Haiducks placed ten Ladders against one of the Towers of the Castle, and so with their Ensigns in their hands courageously mounted the Ladders, in hope to have gained the Place; but the Turks, as men resolved to live and dye in their Castle, valiantly repulsed those Haiducks, and by force drew in unto them from off the Ladders, the two Ensign-bearers of the Haiducks, whose Heads they cut off, and cast them down unto their fellows, which were yet coming up the Ladders; and the two Ensigns so gained upon the Walls, they placed in the midst of them, as the Trophies of the Spoils of them who would have possessed them. With which so great Courage of the Enemies, and death of their fellows, our men not a little dismayed, kept themselves close at the foot of the Wall, as afraid any farther to force the Place, which to their loss they saw stored with such valiant men to defend it.

Colonnio, perceiving this discourtesy of these men, and well assured that the Castle was not but by Valour to be won, immediately drew out of every Company of the County Ringrave, certain of the best and most resolute Soldiers to renew the Assault: Which is honourable a Charge they cheerfully undertook. Which the Ladders they gan forthwith to mount the Ladders. Which the Haiducks beholding, again took courage, and partly ashamed of themselves, and partly to be partakers of the Spoil and Prey, if they should prevail, did what they might for the winning of the Place, striving now who should do best. Which Assault was with such fury and scale of men maintained, that the Turks not able longer to withstand so great Forces, were constrained to yield both themselves and their Castle unto the fury of their angry Enemies. Which Castle indeed cost much Christian Blood, but yet more of the Turks; for the Haiducks, armed with rage and revenge, slew almost all in the Castle, as well Rascians as Turks, and took the rest Prisoners. Among others, there was an Hungarian Renegade there taken, whom for haste they beheaded, being not able to impale him, the ordinary punishment for such faithless Mercenaries. But during this spoil, made by men chafed with fury, the Wind and Fire were on their part exercising of their rage also. For the Fire which they had cast upon the Palliade, and which they had before neglected, as of little or no force, now increased with the Wind, by little and little getting hold of one thing after another, having burnt the Palliade, got hold of the Castle also; whereunto the Soldiers (loaded with Prey and Booty, the things they most desired) had no regard at all; so that the Fire utterly consumed the Castle, with whatsoever else had escaped their greedy hands.

The Turks in Garrison at Boulowanar (a Fort built by a League distant from this burnt Castle) seeing these Flames of Fire, and doubting what might befall themselves, began to consult what course were best for them to take, as either to attend the coming of the Enemy, and so to abide the chance of War, or else betimes to provide for themselves by flight; the Consideration of their Honour and Duty persuaded them to stay, but the rutile of their Neighbours, as strong and valiant as themselves, persuaded them otherwise. In fine, the care of the Preservation of their Lives prevailed, and the Resolution was, that they should fly. And so putting all their Household stuff and Goods into certain Boats, there ready upon the Lake, they by the midst thereof fled; foolishly perceiving themselves, that our men coming thither, and finding nothing there, would not long there stay, but be gone as whole departure they might, as they thought, return again unto their wellings, and in the mean time hide themselves in the Marsh, until that the Enemy were past. But our men coming thither, and finding no man in the Castle, neither yet any thing else that could well be carried away, wondered to see that there were any men near unto the Castle, who might have been an Example to others to stand upon their Guard and defence, they fought out every Corner thereof, to find out whither the Turks were fled. At last, after much diligent search, they found certain Boats which the Turks had sunk in the Channel near unto the Castle Gate, which caused them to think that they were fled by Water, and happily were in some place not far off. These Boats were forthwith drawn up out of the Water, and found furnished with Oars and such other things as belonged unto them. Which done, Colonnio chose out certain of the most valiant and resolute of the Haiducks, whom he commanded in those Boats to follow after the Turks in the Lake. Who, accustomed to such Exploits, and not ignorant of the Places and Secrets of their Country, went aboard and did as they were commanded. Neither had they gone past two Leagues upon the Lake, but that they discovered a party of the fugitives hid in a little Island, awaiting the end of this Tempest. The Turks discerned with the sight of these men, and driven by necessity to stand upon their Guard, welcomed them with certain little faulcon shot, which they brought with them in their Boats, thinking to have hindered them from landing. But they were too well acquainted with such Musket to be moved therewith; besides that, the desire of the Booty, which was by the Turks brought out of the Castle into the Lake, exceedingly animated them for the gaining thereof; so that all fear of Danger set apart, they landed in the Isle. Whom lo landing, the Turks with great Courage received; so that betwixt them was fought a greater fight than is for so small a number on both sides to be believed. The Turks had not number holding the Balance of the Victory. But in the end, the chief of the Turks, and he which was their Governour in Boulowanar, slain, the rest discouraged, came to Parley, yielding themselves, with their Wives and Children, and all that they had, as a Prey unto the Victors. The Prisoners were brought back again unto the Castle, until the next day, that our men having taken a good and strong Garrison of four hundred Haiducks, and two hundred Hussars into Boulowanar, with their Prisoners and their Booty returned toward Comara; where they, notwithstanding divers Reports of the affinity of the Turks Garrisons for the surprising of them upon the way, in safety arrived with a rich Booty, and a number of Wagons loaded with the Spoils of their Enemies. The Emperor had for his part thirteen Ensigns, beside the Places won, which being nigh unto Camilla, much bridled the Spoilings and Incursions of that Garrison.

But leaving these endless Troubles of Hungary for a while, let us now again look into Transylvania, to see what they there do. Mojess the Rebel, by Baffa the Emperours Lieutenant (as we have before said) overthrow, and disappointed of his hope, betook himself unto a strong Castle of his own, own, called Solomfe, there in fear attending the final Success of his Affairs. Bajla in the mean time being as vile to make use of his Victory, as he was valiant to obtain the same, subdued the rest of the Country, repelled the Rebels, stopped the way of Sedition, and put Mosley in despair of all Safety. Who seeing himself brought unto such Extremity, offered to yield his Castle unto the Turks, and to without further acquainting of any man with his purpose, thrust himself, with his Wife and Family, and all the rest of his Substance, into Temeswar, a strong City of the Turks not far off from the Castle, where he was in good hope to make a Prey of the great Wealth of this new-come Fugitive; who had not there long stayed, but that he had persuaded the Captain of Givaflyar, a strong frontier Castle thereby, to deliver the same to the Turks, and that without the Privy of the Garrison, for that he doubted that they would get knowledge thereof, put their Captain in remembrance of his Duty, beseeching him not to draw such an Infamy both upon himself and them, by committing to foul a Fact. But afterward finding him reluctantly let down for the betraying of the Castle, they suddenly laid hands upon him, and struck off his Head; and to with the Blood of their traitorous Captain having averted the eminent danger, with great Honour held the Place.

Mosley's now, as he thought, in safety at Temeswar, yet still plotting how to trouble the State of Transylvania, and raise new Sins therein, and to that end sent a number of Spies with Letters of Credence unto the principal men of that Country, assuring them of great and sufficient Aid from the great Turk, if they would but take up Arms for their Liberty (as he termed it) and shew themselves in Field against the Imperials. Neither was Bajla in the mean time careless of him, or negligent in his to weigh Affairs; but knowing that he, as a notorious Rebel, had yielded his Castle unto the Turks, and was himself retired unto Temeswar, forthwith made choice of six thousand of the best Souldiers in his whole Army, and to set forwards there in Garrison desired, in hope to frustrate his Designs. For why, they thought that their Castle, seated upon a steep high Hill, fortified with good and strong Walls, environed with a broad and deep Ditch, and not subject unto Battery, could not, but with much labour, great danger, and long time be gained out of their hands, it being impossible (as they supposed) for their Enemies to make a breach, or find an entrance thereinto. And indeed our men seeing the Strength of the Place, and the difficulty to force it, stood at the first as men dismayed at the foot of the Hill where the Castle stood; yet more discouraged with the impracticability of the place, than with the Valour of the Defendants. But what cannot Industry and Valour do? In seeking about to find some means to make them of their Courage and Valour, they discovered a little sharp steep Hill over against the Castle, from the top whereof the Castle was to be battered, and the besieged distressed; but to bring the Cannon thither, and especially with Horles, was impossible, by reason of the steep roughness of the Ascent thereunto, with broken and hanging Rocks, over-grown with Trees and Bushes, as if it had been another Alps, not but with Fire and Vinegar to be opened: yet in a fine, our men resolving to gain the Place, did themselves not, and by force of hand drew their Cannon up to the top of the Hill; and having planted it over against the middle of their Enemies great Ordnance, began to batter the Castle: which done, they day and night made their Approaches, fortified their Forts and Trenches, brought on their warlike Munitions, and put all things in such order, that they would even by plain force have carried the Place. But the Turks more admitting the valourous Resolution of our men, than resolving themselves upon their Resistance, being not many in number within the place, and seeing themselves to have to do with men of invincible Courage, laying aside both their Hope and Weapons, craved to come to a Parley. Which granted, it was at length agreed, That they should deliver up the Castle, leaving behind them their great Ordnance, their Munition and Ensigns, and to with their Arms and Lives only saved, to depart. A great and glorious Conquest got with small charge; only by Religion gained by our men, without peril: those being indeed the true Victories, which neither draw Blood out of the Veins, nor Tears out of the Eyes.

This strong Place so gained, contrary to the common Opinion conceived thereof, led the whole Province as it were by the hand unto the Obedience of the Emperor; in such sort, that Bajla having called together all the principal men of Transylvania, declared unto them the Justice of his Cause, the Right of the Emperor, with the Malice and Treachery of the Turks and Rebels; how they might live in assurance with the one, and become miserable with the others; That the Emperor was always armed for their Defence and Health, desiring nothing but their Welfare and Preservation; whereas their Enemies to the contrary, fought altogether their Ruine and Decay: That as they were not to expect light flames of Fire out of the Sea, no more they were to look for Aid from those their mortal Enemies, whom they knew to have before desired to have put them all to death, and to have given their Country unto the Tartars their Enemies; That this Disaster had not now been to fall upon them, either ever have been by them perceived, without the Aid of the Emperor; who opposing himself against this Fire, had quenched it and put it out; preserving them with his great charge, and saving them even in the midst of their greatest Perils and Dangers: That they should therefore remember these his so great Benefits, to the intent to make him recompence according to the publick Faith, which bindeth us to the reward of good Deeds; and that all the recompence that the Emperor desired, was the new resistance, forbearance concerning their own good; inasmuch, that he desired nothing of them but their Obedience, for being bound to defend them and preserve them by his Power; whereby it should come to pass, that he should be satisfied for his Travels, and they preserved from their Enemies; the Prince and his Subjects together jointly working their mutual Health and Welfare; each of them according unto their Propriety, for that this mutual performance of Duty preserved the Scepter for the good government of their Estate. Whereunto their Answer was, That they beforesaid him that their Country might be relieved from the cruel and bloody of the men of War, and delivered from the intolerable Burthens of Tributes, which so heavily oppressed it; that these Objects and Inconveniences could not keep them constant in their Obedience, seeing that they both felt them, and received them from the hand of them, to whom they had yielded their Obedience, in hope to have been by them relieved; that the new feeling of the Wound did continually renew in them the hatred, and the Object of their Harms still kept both their Eyes and their Minds occupied upon them, who were the causes thereof; so that they could not well, either look upon them or make reckoning of them, them; That therefore it would please him to ease them of their Grievances, in recompence whereof they would pay him 15000 Hungarian Ducats yearly for to stay his men of War, and would furnish them with all Provisions necessary, it being a thing more honourable and profitable also unto a Prince moderately to use his Subjects means to keep his State in perpetuity, than through Covetousness to devour them in one day, in their loss to undo himself for ever. This their Offer was by Bajla accepted, and the mind of the Emperor, at this Contentment given them, kept in their faithful Allegiance and Loyalty unto the Emperor.

But whilst Bajla thus travelled for the quieting of Transylvania, Mosley the Rebel, in the mean time, was for his part no less busied for the disturbing thereof again; inasmuch, that having by the appointment of the Viceroy Bajla received ten thousand Tartars in his Aid, and assisted with a great number of Turks, he, with Ensigns displayed, entered into Transylvania, protesting there to dye, or to be revenged of Bajla, who had before chased him out thence. And the better to effect this troublesome Design, he now had made choice of a most fit time for the Performance thereof, Bajla upon the Trust he had of the publick Faith which he came to take of the Transylvanians, for their Allegiance unto the Emperor, which assured him from all Sins and Tumults in that Province, being with a small Power come from Clandopolis in Hungary, and there lying at Wifefburg, upon the Conquest of Hungary. Which his Journey, and necessity of his Presence in Hungary for the defence thereof, had caused the Transylvanians to believe, that he should for that Year lay in Hungary, as General of the Emperor's Army there. Upon which Persuasion he had his Absence, many of them began to hold up their heads, and to entertain high Concepts of new Sins, whereunto the high Births had prepared them, and now by his Presence not a little encouraged; inasmuch, that many, as well of the Nobility as others, joynted themselves unto him, and his increased Army, against the Imperials.

Mosley with his Power being come into the Province, first forced a Castle, about three Leagues distant from Wifefburg, and flew all the Garrison therein. Which Exploit encouraged him farther, full of hope in the absence of Bajla; and seeing himself now the absolute Master of the Field, which he had his his, he was the more resistance, foraged, robbed, and spoiled, with his men loaded with Booty, he besieged Wifefburg, a little Town upon the confines of Hungary and Transylvania, neither by Air nor by Nature strong, but exposed as a Prey unto him that it is in the Field strongest, if Succours be not at hand to relieve it. Howbeit, weak as it was, it held out three Weeks Siege, and having a breach made in the Walls, endured two Assaults against all the Forces of the Rebel. After which, he besieged, thinking themselves to have sufficiently discharged their Duty in holding out so long, and enduring so much, and out of hope to be relieved by the weak Forces of Bajla, came to parley with the Enemy, and their Lives and Goods saved, yielded unto him the Town, and so departed themselves to Varadin.

Now albeit that there were no great Forces of the Emperor's on foot in Transylvania, yet the hungry Haiducks for all that failed not to follow these Wars, even amidst the great Clouds of their Enemy, and were ever taking of some Prey or Booty from the Enemy, the chief and almost the only means whereby they live. In which doing, as they benefited themselves (the chief Motives of their Adventures) so they not a little eased the Country, by repelling the Excursions and Pillages of the Turks, whereof the Country had endured the fury. Where, amongst other Prisoners by them taken, it was their Fortune to light upon a Chieftain of the Turks come from Constantinople, going toward the Rebel Mosley from the great Sultan Mahomet. Who, by them examined, confessed, That Mosley was a man in great Grace and Reputation with his Lord and Master the great Seignior; and that he was sent to assure him thereof, as also of all the needful Assistance of his Prince, if he should faithfully and effectually serve him in Transylvania, and bring it under his Subjection and Power, as he had promised and sworn. In which doing, he should not want the credit of a noble and faithful Servant towards him, but should further obtain thereby the honour to be the Lieutenant General of his Army in this Province; the great Sultan (as he said) having means as easie as words to advance his faithful Servitors, who might draw more good Fortunes in one hour out of this infinite source of Felicity and Greatness, than they could in a thousand years out of the poverty of the Princes of Europe. He said also, That the great Sultan had on foot an Army of a hundred and fifty thousand men strong, for the Conquest of Peth and Sirigium, furnished with all things necessary, which had now already turned head toward Hungary, had it not been for the Rebellion of some of his dishonourable Subjects, whom for all that he would in short time chastise, and so turn his whole Forces upon the Emperor.

Mosley, proud of his late Conquest, and having found a great deal of great Ordnance in Wifefburg, resolved to prosecute his Victory, and to beseege Bajla in Somsonian, wherein he had thrust himself, with the rest of his small Forces: but Bajla, better acquainted with martial Affairs than he, and knowing that a General, departed from his Charge, and brought to the mercy of a Wall for his chief Defence, hath lost his Credit and Reputation with his Friends, and they also in hope of Safety from him thought it best first to take order for the strengthening of the Place, so to put Mosley out of hope of the winning thereof, and afterward, as he might to provide for the safety of himself and his. Wherefore he in good time advertised the Governor of Cassovia (who was nearest unto him) of Mosley's Designs, and of the necessity whereunto he was himself incited. Who forthwith conceiving the consequence of so great an Exploit, as concerned both the loss of the Place, and of so great a Commander as was Bajla, a loss irreparable; presently commanded five Companies of Horse-men to fence thereof. These Horse-men, either afraid of the Rebels Army, or else favouring his Proceedings, without respect of that they had in charge, or of their Honour (things dearer unto men of Worth than their Lives) without any Attempt at all given, returned again to Cassovia; having with their Pilferage and Quarries by the way much offended and provoked the Country of the Country People by him spoiled. But being now better advised, and repenting themselves of their Faults, and craving Pardon of their Governour, who was about with the rest of his Power to have cut them in pieces, they offered him for satisfaction six of the principal Authors of their Difloyalty; who were all forthwith executed, and their Quarters by the High ways side. But Bajla, by their Treachery, lay in the mean time without incour, forsaken by his Friends, and the Place wherein he lay in danger to be taken: when the Transylvanians, dwelling near thereby, moved to relieve him, as well for fear of the Turks Bondage, as for the Tyranny of Mosley; one of whose Secretaries, with Letters of down upon Resolutions so far different. For the Turks (as if the Emperor would have been glad of Peace upon any Condition) after their proud manner, unreasonably demanded to have Transilvania, Strigoniun, and Pesth returned unto them; for which they offered to deliver unto the Emperor, Agria and Cassifa, Peble for Pearls. So that upon Propositions so far different, being able to conclude nothing, they departed on both sides as they came, to try by Arms that which by Talk and Conference they could not agree upon. But as all the Turks Treaties of Peace with the Christians are indeed but false fives, so the Emperor's Propositions to him to now also it was known, that they in the mean time, whilst this Treaty of Peace was in hand, gathered together great force both of Men and Munition at Belgrade, wherewith to arm a great Convoy of Viduats, which they had thought during this Interparley for Peace to have put into Buda. But Mohomet understanding thereof, ceased further to intreat of Peace, which with the false threat thereof did but hurt and deceive the Christians, and betook himself again to his Arms (his and their safety and self refuge) resolving with the other Captains and Commanders of the Army to do what they might for the crossing and hindering of the Turkish purpose for the putting of Viduats into Buda; whereto there was now such want, that the Turks in Garrison there having already eaten all their Horses, and for Viduats rifled the Governours Houles, were resolved to abandon the City, if they should not be within five more days relieved.

Now upon this Resolution for the keeping of the Turks from the retreating of Buda, the Christians, for the more assurance of their purpose, prepared therefore both by Water and by Land, embarking their Foot-men upon the River, under the Conduct of Colonel Almeine and Sulze, the one Governour of Strigoniun, and the other of Pesth; whilst the Colonnels with the Janizaries, scouting along the Banks of the River of Danubius, took the charge by Land. And so it fortuned, that upon the two and twentieth day of August, he with his Horsemen, near unto the Village of Mohatich, (famous for the death of King Ledy) fell upon the head of the Turks Army, led by the Bassa Murat, consisting of six thousand Turks, two thousand of them being Janizaries, who altogether lay encamped upon an even plain, very commodious for our Horsemen, who let slip neither the Time nor the Opportunity of so great an advantage offered them, but forthwith charged them; where, after a number of notable Charges both given and received, which still abated both the Numbers and Courage of the Turks, they at last retired toward the Body of their Army, and that in such haste, as that they retreated little differed from a speedy flight. After whom Colonnels followed, with like heat as he had charged them; but evil followed by his Friends, who evil performed their charge, seeking after the Spoil instead of pursuing the Enemies; the Turks perceiving the small number that pursued them, turned upon them, and so began again not only to make strong resistance, but even right hardly to charge them. Who to by them pressed with no less Courage than Power, were now glad themselves to retire instead of pursuing the Victory; but yet so, as that the retreat was made without any great loss therein received. However, the Turks were a little encouraged with this change of Fortune, and perceiving themselves too strong for their Enemies that charged them, came on to fight and so courageously, as that in fine they had defeated the Christians, had not the Haiducks out of their Boats from the River in good time come refectively to their relief. Which Cloud the Turks perceiving, ready to pour forth a great Tempest upon their Heads, and not daring to abide the same, again retired, leaving the Christians Viduats both in the first and last charge; who, not content with the retreat of the Turks, furiously charged them, and pursued them even unto their great Camp, and so returned, carrying back with them both the Glory of the Field, and the Spoil of their Enemies.

In this Conflict, the red Corner of Murat Bassa, the Cognizance of his great Command, was taken, with two Field-pieces seven hundred Turks were dead upon the Place, and five hundred more taken Prisoners; amongst whom was Saxar Beg, who being a man of understanding, and who the Christians examined, confessed, That Hassan Bassa, the day before this Conflict, came into the Camp, and there honourably dined with the great Cham; with whom, after their great cheer, he entering into Discourse of many great Matters, and among the rest, concerning his return into his Country; was much against the same, until such time as they had new Viduats Buda, whereunto he was (as he said) both in Honour and in Duty bound to give his assistance, the loss of this good place being of so great importance unto the great Sultan. That otherwise his Aid had been to him in his last Charge, but that his People having devoured so much Viduats and performed nothing, if he should now at this time fail to do his Prince Service, who could never think either Valour or Fidelity to be in him, if he should fail in such Actions as wherein his Valour and Fidelity should appear; all things having no other Credit and Reputation, but according unto their Effects. And that therefore he should resolve to see the end of this Exploit, which required every mans helping hand for the Performance thereof, considering the Forces of the Enemy in readiness to hinder the same. Moreover, he assured them, that the Bassas purpose was to new fortify Hofburg, Pest, and Kaslo, for their Castles, and necessary for this Action, and to go to the siege of Pesth; and that done, to besiege Strigoniun; which for all that he doubted to win this year, as well by reason of the approach of Winter, as for that a great part of his Forces were far off, and not easily in a little time to be assembled together. That the Tartars were yet a great way from the Camp, where the Bassas of Asia and Caramania were within a few days expected; the one of them leading with him the reconciled Rebels of Asia, and the other six thousand Janizaries. Which his Confession, although it were not altogether true, yet it carried shew of some Probability, as time by proof afterward declared.

Some of our men were in this charge slain also, but few in comparison of the Turks, who there lost some of their best men. It was noted, that in this Conflict the Souldiers of Colonnels Sulze, had ill behaved themselves, refusing to pursue the Enemy being in flight, whether it were for that they saw some ambush laid for them, or for that they disdaind to follow the General Colonnels; the reasons perhaps for which the Colonnels slayed them from the pursuit of the Enemy, but to evil purpose; for being out of order at such a time as the Turks turning back, renewed the fight, they had been all slain and cut in pieces, had not the Haiducks in good time (as we said) come on to their rescue. As for Colonnels, he most bravely bare himself in this Conflict, so much as in him was, urging his good Fortune, for the obtaining of a full Victory; sometime performing the part of a good Captain, and sometime of a valiant Souldier; sometime forcing the charge, and again slaying his men in their retreat; insum, that oftentimes he lost, as amongst his Enemies, and again returning by Grace

Grace of God, he escaped Death, as it were by Miracle, and from being taken Prisoner, by chance. Into neither of which dangers he could have fallen without the danger of the whole Army which, next unto God, was for the Safety thereof beheld, into the Valour of him, their to brave a Leader. But God in his Wisdom createth not such worthy men, but by his Providence also to preserve them; wonder it were otherwise, that ever such worthy men should return from amongst the midst of so many desperate Dangers, Death as it were envying at their Lives, and their Enemies forbidding them the Victory, and their own Spills and Overthrow. And without doubt, had the rest of the Christians after his Example prosecuted their good Fortune, and done what good Souldiers should of Duty have done, their Enemies had been quite overthrown, and they themselves had been both victorious and rich; where now for lack of good Resolution, the Victory was almost equal. For beside the Spoils by them gotten, they might have carried away with them a whole Years Pay, due to the Garrison of Buda, which the Turks (put into a fear, and careful only of their Lives) had left in their Camp; which they afterward again recovered, upon the recovery of their Force and Courage of this Manner, with much more, was all appointed as a Prey unto the good Fortune of the Men, had their Valour had the Courage to have gone to fetch it; but failing of their endeavour in so glorious an Action, Fortune failed them also of her Bounty.

Now at length the Army of the Christians was met together, about the fourth of September, wherein the Lord Russinow commanded as General; who, desirous to understand of the Turks Affairs and Designs, sent forth two of his most trusty and expert Souldiers to perform that piece of Service; who in Turks Apparel being got into the Turks Army, were there eight days undiscovered and unsuspected of any. Where, after that, they roaming up and down, had taken a full view of the Turks Army, and in what they might discovered their Designs, they returning back, declared unto the General what they had both there heard and seen; as, That the Turks Army was very great, but yet not such as that which the last Year they besieged Pesth; That the Turks lay incamped at large, and not close together, which caused their Army to seem the greater, taking up for the lodgment thereof half a League, being well provided of Cannon and other Field-pieces; That Hassan Bassa commanded therein as General, having brought with him twelve thousand Janizaries, beside his Horsemen, and the reconciled Rebels of Asia, which were daily looked for, the Leader of whom was not known; some thinking it to be him who had always commanded them, being a most valiant Man, and expert Commander; but some other deeming him to be but one of his Captains that had forsaken him, (as right he was) a right valiant man also, but not of so great Experience as he: That the great Tartar Han, came to aid the Turks in their Wars in Hungary, was to the great discontentment of Hassan Bassa the Turks General) now already returned towards his own Country (with such Booby and Prisoners as he had got from the poor Christians) to suppress a Rebellion there raised by a young Tartar Prince, his Nephew, who, by his Uncle the great Han, given in Hostage unto Sultan Mohomet, and kept at Constantinople as in Prison, having found means to make an Escape, and to return into Tartary, was about to trouble his Uncles Affairs, in hope now in his Absence to mount unto the Throne of his Father; and that the Tartar, being come to the Bank of Danubius, and by the Turks denied Boats to pass over the River in, and with many railing and opprobrious Speeches, by them charged for his departure as a Coward, had found means to make a floating Bridge of great Faggots, whereby he passed his Foot-men over the River, his Horse-men swimming over the same; and it was by great Journeys returning home, boasting by the way as he went, that he had rejected and trodden under foot all the Prayers and Requests of Hassan Bassa, entreating him yet to stay a while in Hungary for the Service of the great Sultan his Master. Besides that, That they had seen six great Vessels upon the River of Danubius, with ten thousand following of them, manned with three thousand Souldiers well armed, and men of good foot, three hundred of them being Janizaries, appointed to safe Conduct the Munition to be brought up the River, and to serve for a Convoy unto the other Vessels that were to follow them with Viduats, if happily the Christians should attempt to do any thing against them in fine, That the Turks Army could not this Year possibly be great, by reason of many great Lets wherewith the great Sultan was this Year troubled; which much abated both the Courage and Hope of his Captains, who, hanging their Heads, came unwillingly to these Vassals, accounting themselves happy if they might in this Expedition take Pesth, Colonnels, that they might not return so much discouraged, as they came daunted and discouraged. With which News the Christians were so much encouraged to encounter with the Turks, as if they had been assured to fight with men already discouraged and out of Heart.

In the mean time, the Hussars of Strigoniun, always ready for Fight, by good fortune got forth, met with four hundred Turks seeking for Forrage; who encountering together, at the first made a most brave and gallant Fight, every one of them willing, That their private Success might be the beginning of their general Victory. But the Hussars, being both more numerous in that manner skirmishing and sudden Encounter, and also of greater Courage, at length brake the Turks Ranks, of whom, six score lay dead upon the ground, most of the rest were taken Prisoners, with an hundred and thirty good and servicable Horses, wherewith both the glory and the profit of their Victory was increased. Colonnels Sulze also, with three hundred men, marching out from the Camp, came to discover an hundred of those brave Horse-men which but newly came out of Asia with Zelally the Rebel; who having never seen the Army of the Christians, nor yet felt of their Forces, were, with three hundred Janizaries, upon a Bravery, come over the River of Danubius, to take a view of the Christian Camp; for the drawing on of whom, the pollicit Colonnels had sent forth fifty of his Horse-men a great way from the rest of his Troop, as it were to discover the Country thereabout. These Fore-runners failed not to meet with the Turks, as it if it had been by chance, and were by them forthwith charged, as thinking they had have had a great hand over that so small a number, when upon the sudden, Sulze, with the rest of his Company coming on, and hotly charging them, encouraged his own men, and discouraged the Turks; who, surprised with fear, thinking the Christians to be more in number than indeed they were, having left some fifty of their men dead upon the place, as men dismayed and void of Understanding, fled. In which Flight, such as were not by the Christians slain, were in the River of Danubius drowned, whereto, they for fear all headlong plunged themselves.

All these little Conflicts served but as Sparks to kindle the great Fire by the Bassa intended; his first Purpose being to put a Convoy of Viduats many more Prisoners, amongst whom were found above fourscore Italian Renegades, who brought into the Camp, were, as Enemies unto God, in a Martial Court all condemned to be hanged, and so accordingly executed, leaving the Captain himself, who, for the regard of his Place, was beheaded.

Shortly after, the great Basha ailing with his Army, came in the beginning of October and incamped near Buda, both for the Preservation of the Place, and the safety of his Army, now greatly diminished both in Number and Courage. For it was certainly known by divers Fugitives from the Turks, that in these many Conflicts they had lost a number of their best Soldiers, but especially of their Janizaries. So that the Basha, for the supplying of that Defect, was glad to make choice of 6000 of his best Souldiers, the proper Arms of the Janizaries, he entertained into the Rooms and pay of the Janizaries that were dead and slain; the rest of his Army for the most part consisting of bare and feeble, bafe raw Souldiers. Besides this, that all the Army was full of Mourning and Lamentation, the Souldiers in all Places bewailing the loss of their Brethren, their Friends and Companions; so that instead of their wonted Threats and bravery, nothing was to be heard but sighing and complaining. And moreover, that the general Opinion conceived of the greatness of the Christian Army, (imagined to be much greater and stronger than indeed it was) had struck such a fear into the minds of the Turks that they were reolved, Buda being once viallued, to return home, all their other proud Designs for this year set apart; which was the cause that they had dislodged with their Army, and drawn near unto the City, the better to attend to the new vialluing thereof, and so to be gone; accounting themselves right happy, if they might but perform that good piece of Service and save themselves.

The Christians with their Army follow
the Turk.

The Christians, before in doubt lest the Turks should have besieged Peth, as they had before given it forth they would, and seeing them now to be risen with their Army and incamped near unto Buda, resolved to follow them, and in what they might to cross their Designs; and thereupon leaving Peth, as now out of danger, they rose also, and came and incamped before the Fort in the Isle of Vicgrade, betwixt the said Fort and Vachia; where they layed four days, and then by a Bridge which they made upon the Danube, whereby to pass from the Isle where the Italians lay in Garrisons, unto the Fort of Saint Andrew, kept by the Lansquenets, they with the whole Army passed the River, and so came and incamped before the Fort of Saint Andrew, in the face of the Enemy. Now the field betwixt the heads of the two Armies was plain and open, without Woods, Bushes, or Rivers, to hinder the joining of a set Battle. In which to fit a Place, the Christians encouraged with the fear of their Enemies, and the diminishing of their Number and Courage (whereof they had got knowledge as well by their tumultuous rising, as by other Advancements) were desirous in so favourable Occasions to have given them Battle; and for the desire, five days after that the Christians were incamped on that side of the River. This Battle of the Turks came marching on, within half a Quarter of a League of the Christians;

which they would not have done, had upon the Confidence of a greater number followers of them, having behind them ten thousand men both Horse and Foot, laid as close as they possibly could a little out of the way. Now the Christians, thinking of no other Force ready to fight, but those which appeared in their sight, sent forth 12 hundred men against these five thousand Turks, to skirmish with them, until the whole Army were put into order, even for a general Battle that day to have been fought; if the Turks should accept thereof; whereunto the General, the Colonels, Captains, and Army with great Cheerfulness marching on foot at this loud alarm of their common defence, which had not failed to bring forth great change of effects, had the Turks been likewise disposed for the producing of the same. But they be the extraordinary favours of Fortune, when fit Occasions joyn themselves with brave Resolutions, and such Resolutions with means to effect the same. This is the lot of many most noble Trophies, which most commonly fail, either for lack of fit Occasion, or for lack of good Resolution for the performance of them. But as most men judge of other men Conceits by their own Inclination, so the Christians themselves, reolved to give Battle, thought the Turks their Enemies to have been of the same Resolution; and those five thousand men to have been the head of the avauit-guard, followed with the whole Army, coming to draw them out to skirmish until the coming on of the rest of their Force. Howbeit their design was quite contrary to this the Christians hope, for their purpose was only to train them out into their Ambushes, to withhold danger to cut them in pieces. Of which their purpose they gave sufficient Testimony, and cause of suspect; for that the Skirmish having continued three hours, with some loss on both sides, the Turkish Army appeared not; and these five thousand Turks now in Skirmish, by little and little raising, fought on to have drawn the Christians into the danger of their Ambush. Which their manner of fight caused the Christians to suspect the matter; for it was not like, that five thousand men should give ground to twelve hundred, if they had not had some secret meaning therein, which they sought to effect to their more advantage. Which caused the Christian Carabins which followed them, not to be too earnest in pursuing of them, and more closely to serve themselves together, the better to indure the flock of their Enemies, if they should charge them. Neither were they in that provident fear deceived; for the Turks, seeing their purpose discovered, and themselves now out of hope to effect the same, upon the sudden made a stand, and so presently coming on, hardly charged the foremost of our Carabins; who, as men half surprised, to see themselves so readily and resolutely charged, by men who but now made flew as if they would have fled, were not able so valiantly to receive the charge (considering the great number of them by whom they were charged); but that some few of them were overthrown and slain, with some of the Hungarians amongst them. Howbeit they made good resistance, and right valiantly repulled their Enemies, of whom they flew a good number also. The praise in this Conflict was great, every one charging to shew himself brave and courageous in the head of his own Army. But new Supplies still coming in, the Turks in fine thrunk back and retired, having left three hundred of their Fellows dead upon the Place, accompanied with an hundred of the Christians; the rest were slain likewise. Now upon the retreat on both sides, every man by his conceit appointed the next day for the general day of Battle; the brig-

ging Speeches of the Turks giving the Christians occasion to think; for why, they seldom or never refuse Battle, being offered them by the Christians, as well for the Confidence they commonly have in their multitude, as for the desire they have of the inevitable Predetermination of men to Life or Death; accounting it amongst them an eternal infamy, to refuse any Combat against the Christians; which, howsoever it fall out, should sort to their Advantage, by vanquishing, gaining the Fruits of their Victory; and by losing their Lives in Battle, to gain the glory of Heaven being vainly perswaded, no mens Souls do go more readily unto Heaven, than the Souls of such as dye in Battle against the Christians. Such Effects old superstitious Opinions are able to work in the Minds of men, even to the desperate adventuring and spending of their Lives. Howbeit, that this Effect for this time withstood, that their men, with all their Advantages, as much feared the danger as any other poor faint-hearted men; and that a strong apprehension of fear is able to prevail against all Customs and Perfections, they never to old, as also against all other Accidents whatsoever. For why, the Turks, contenting themselves with the great Brags and vain Threats, came not forth according to their Promise, neither could by any means be drawn to adventure themselves unto the hazard of a general Battle. The loss of their great and choicest men discouraged and deterred them from adventuring all to the hazard of to great a Peril. For (as I have said) almost all their Janizaries and most valiant Souldiers were dead or slain, and the rest, men of small Spirit or Courage, reolved that little which was in them, for the safeguard of themselves, and not for the gaining of any notable Victory. They had also in their often Conflicts lost all their Hacks, which were desperate and of whom they fought on Horseback, without saddle, having only a little piece of Tapstry upon their Horses Backs, and by the readiness of their Horses, do for a long time in one fort maintain their fight. They carry light Darts made of ftrait and fair Canes, excellently well made, and strongly armed; and their handy Weapons are good Sabres, or broad and sharp Cut-throats. These men a great while fought most valiantly in the last Combats, but in fine, were all slain, except some few which cast themselves into Danubius, and were there drowned. The loss of which men much discouraged the Turks; for why, their Service stood them in great need in receiving the Enemies Charges, and with their Bodies covering of the Turks Squadrons in their greatest Perils and Combats. Howbeit the Turks received not these Losses without returning of some part thereof to us again; for Collobate had a little before fallen into great danger of his Person, and lost some of his Followers in an Enterprize of great Moment, had the Effect answered unto the Project thereof. While the Turks yet lodged in the Isle of Vicgrade, he caused eight great field-pieces to be so placed, as that therewith he so much annoyed the Turks, that they were about to have forsaken the Place. And the more to force them to do, the second of October he embarked himself with six hundred Haidaks upon the Danubius, and so by Night with great silence landed near unto the Enemies, thinking to upon the sudden to have surprised them. Which for all that, could not so secretly be done, by reason of the coming on of the day, but that the Turks were thereof aware; who therewith upon great perswaded out of their Trenches, and with all their Force and Power charged him. Against whom he made head, rather upon a brave and constant Resolution, than upon any Confidence he had in his own Force, nor having men now to withstand the least part of his Enemies. Which his so great Resolution to abate the Turks Fury, as that they stood a good while in doubt to charge upon to relieve him. The Field-pieces which he had brought over with him into the Isle, he took with him to good purpose, beating them back with their murdering Bullets, who with their number thought to have overwhelmed him. Which good help, opposed against the number of the Enemies, for a time balanced the Victory, and wrought the death of many of our good souldiers. This manner of fight indured the space of two hours, maintained more by Resolution, than by Strength and Power. At length for all that, the Turks with their number prevailing, the Christians therewith rather oppressed than vanquished, forsaking their Field-pieces, disorderly retired toward their Boats. After whom the Turks eagerly following, in that push flew 400 of the Haidaks, the rest with much ado recovering their Boats, carrying with them their General, by them hardly defended from the Fury of their Enemy. Which loss happened not to unto the Christians, but that it was mingled with some loss of the Turks also; of whom, the most forward and courageous were in that fight slain, as was afterwards known by certain Prisoners of theirs afterward taken, who made report of the Losses by them there received. The Turks, by this so desperate and dangerous attempt warned, to prevent the like for the time to come, call up great Trenches in the Isle along the Bank of Danubius, therein placing certain Janizaries and other their best Souldiers, who there lay until the dislodgement of the Camp, to go to lie before Buda.

The Turks had before built a Bridge of Boats at Lamscin, which gave them Passage unto Stiria, where they did great harm; for the strengthening thereof, they had placed at both ends thereof a strong Fort, well furnished both with Men and Munition. This Bridge, so commodious for the Turks, and hurtful to the Christians, Tranquellus, Governour of Stiria, and a great Commander in those parts, with his Stirian Troops, and some good Aid brought unto him by the County Stiria, undertook to break. Upon which Resolution, he upon the sudden approached one of the aforesaid Forts, and so right furiously assailed the same, before they in the Fort were well aware of his coming. In which doing, he caused the greatest noise and stir that was possible to be made with Trummers, Drums, and clattering of Armour, as if it had been some great assault. Which Action, the more to terrify the besieged, Which so great and dreadful noise, joyned unto to brave attempt, with so great Courage begun, struck such a Terror into the Minds of the Turks, that they without any great resistance quitted the place, and fled over the Bridge to the other Fort. Of which forsaken Fort the Christians became Masters, and with all speed prosecuting their good Fortune, presently drew out thereof three Cannons, and therewith battered the other Fort. In which the Turks, having no other place of Refuge to fly unto, nor hope of safety but in their last Valour, so well belaboured themselves, as that the Christians had much ado to force them. Howbeit, a breach being made by the Fury of the Cannon, and scaling ladders let up, the Fort was on every side assaulted; which the Turks for the space of five hours so valiantly endured, as that it was hard to say who should prevail or have the better. In this Assault, there were many on both sides slain, the Turks not being able to overcome but with the loss both of their Lives and Honour; nor the Christians able to retire without 1603 losing the fruit of that their so great and rich an Enterprise; so that the assault was with great Resolution on both sides maintained, the Turks fighting for their Lives, and the Christians for their Honour; until that at last, the Turks, with much slaughter overcome, the Fort was by the Christians taken, and most of the Turks therein being slain, and the rest taken Prisoners, both the Forts were forthwith razed, and the Bridge broken, which before served for an outlet, the Turks for the Turks to forage, and spoil the Christian Territories by. The Boats whereof the Bridge was made were all burnt, and some great Ordnance therein found broken in pieces and cast into the River.

At the same time Lugase, a Place of great Importance to the Service of the Emperour, and so near unto the Turks, as that they could hardly attempt any thing thereabout, but that it might from thence be discovered and known, was by the Transilvanians delivered to Bassa, General for the Emperour in that Country. From which place, he sending out certain Scouts toward Belgrade, they brought it to him that certain Prisoners, who being examined, laid, that Hassan Bassa, the Turks General in Hungary, had writ to Giasfer Bassa, the Governour of Temeswar, That he should only attend to the Preservation of his own, without attempting any thing further against the Christians, the present estate of their Affairs so requiring; and that having received the answer, that he was for this year to return, in hope of some good Peace to be ere long concluded betwixt the great Sultan and the Emperour.

The two Armies of the Turks and the Christians lay still near the one of them unto the other, the Turks careful of the revictualling of Buda, and the Christians still endeavouring to the danger, and desirous in what they might to hinder and frustrate the same. Which, because they could no way better do, than by offering of them Battle; they thereupon generally resolved, upon a Friday, being the seventeenth of October, the day by them assigned for the Battle (having by the shooting off of three great Cannons, given warning unto the Soldiers throughout the Camp, for the preparing of themselves first toward God, and then to the Service of their Prince) after they had well refreshed themselves, in good order took the field, and so issued ready ranged there, either to give or accept of Battle. Before whom, the County Ragava was sent forth with his Regiment, about half the way betwixt the two Armies, to discover the moving of the Enemy, and to receive his first charge if occasion should so require. Whole Scouts before sent forth, about Noon discovered a Troop of Horse-men come out of the Turks Camp, about some hundred they had to do, but to them unknown; whom the Scouts supposing to have been the fore-runners of the Turks Army, and by them almost surpris'd, hastily retired back again, and by their hasty retreat put the whole Army in an alarm, which came bravely marching on, in hope now to have come to try the matter by true Valour, and by the Fortune of a general Battle to have made that day forever famous by their Victory and the overthrow of their proud Enemies. And in the heat of their so great Courage, like enough it was for them to have performed the same, had the Turks had but so much Courage in them as to have met them in the Field, as was well hoped they now would. But they, with their former Losses discouraged, and resolved only upon the safeguard of themselves, and the victualling of Buda, had no mind to enter into these honourable Lists, but kept themselves close within the covert of their Tent, 1603 and the strength of their Trenches. And so the Christians, with a false alarm moved, and having for the most part of the day in vain expected the coming forth of their Enemies, returned into their Camp deceived of their Expedition.

The same day there was an Allegiance taken, whom they which took 'him thought to have been a Turk, howbeit he was found to be one of their own men; by whom they were better informed for the Counting of the Turks, of their purpose for the flouting of Battle, and of their Resolution for the keeping of themselves within the safeguard of their Trenches; and that they so did, as well for the losses they had before received, as for divers other unlucky accidents, which caused them to misdoom some evil success in the end and winding up of this their Expedition. Nevertheless, the Christians, not greatly trusting to these Reports, still kept their Army in readiness, to give their Enemies Battle upon the least occasion offered them. Howbeit, that indeed they had no great cause of fear, the Turks having no desire at all to come to a general Battle, so that instead of great Effects there were expected, the time passed but in light Skirmishes and vain Alarms betwixt the two Armies, until that at length the Turks, having by the River sufficiently stored the City of Buda with Victuals, the great Bassa secretly by Night stole with his Army, and so retired toward Belgrade. Which for a while differed not from a cowardly flight, being with such silence made under the covert of the Night, as that the Christians had thereof no perceiving until they were quite departed and gone. This victualling of Buda, and some other few places of the Turks in Hungary, was all that the great Bassa did this year with his great Army; whereas at his first coming it was given out, that he would thenceforth take both Strigonia and Pozsh from the Croatians.

The next day, the hasty and sudden departure of the Enemy being perceived, the General of the Christians called together the Colonels and other great Commanders of the Army, to consult with them, what were best to be done in so unexpected an occurrence: Of whom, some were of Opinion, That it was best forthwith in all haste to pursue these fearful Enemies; others, for many Reasons dissuading the same, and others withal, propounding some other notable Exploits to be taken in hand. But in Conclusion, the safest point was resolved upon, which was, not to hazard any of their Troops in pursuing of their flying Enemies, who were hardly to be overtaken; but now immediately after their departure to attempt the taking in of some one of their strong holds; where, amongst others that were propounded, Harsan was thought to be the most necessary Place, being so seated, as that beside the great harm it did to the Christians thereabout, it much hindered both Advancements and Victuals to be brought unto Pozsh. Which Exploit resolved upon, they forthwith razed the Fort of St. Andrew, and the Fort by them built in the life of Viegrad, because they should not stand the Turks in any stead after their departure, and so with all their Power for forward toward Harsan. This Town is seated beyond the River of Danubius toward the North, about eight Leagues from Buda, crossing the way to Transilvania and Galicia, upon a fair and even Plain, near unto a great and deep Marish, and was sometime defended with good and strong Walls, with a Cattle, and three large and deep Ditches, for a long time in the Power of the Turks, and which was now a great while held out against the valiant Baron Teufsenbach, by whom it was most fraudly in vain besieged; until that afterward it was again besieged by Maximilian the Arch-duke, the Emperours

The Christians after the departure of the Turks, resolve to besiege Harsan.

Brother, then General of his Army in Hungary, in the year 1594, whom he was to have followed on tomorrow after it had for a certain space been by the Turks notably defended; who, considering the harm this place did unto the Emperours Territories, by reason of the situation thereof, wherein a great and strong Garrison of the Turks always lying, foraged all the Christian Territories as far as the River Vague, yea, and was wont to carry thence as far as Strigonia, and by spoiling of all that side of Hungary, caused the Country to pay Contribution as far as Ternavie, standing within four Leagues of the Mountains which separate Hungary and Moravia; all irreparable Losses to the Christians, and hardly to be avoided; for which Reasons he caused it to be dismantled, and to be made unserviceable for the Wars. After which time for all that, the Turks, for the commodiousness of the Place, had with great Labour again new fortified the same, with Walls made with great Piles of Wood and Paggots, with Earth rammed in betwixt them; a stronger kind of fortification, and better able to withstand the Fury of the Cannon, than are Walls of Stone; in which fort the Turks use most commonly to fortify such Places as they mean to defend, and which oftentimes cost much for the Christians to gain the same from them.

This Place thus fortified, and both with Men and Munition well furnished, and with all things needful stored, was able to endure a great long Siege; whereunto the Garrison therein was as resolutely set down, as were the Christians to attempt it; where now, at their first coming unto it, a part of the Italian Regiment, assisted with three hundred Lansquenets, under the leading of Count Szekes, and Grafid, General of the Italians, were appointed to go before the rest of the Army, and to begin to make the Approaches; which they did by forcing of a Water-mill, driven by the Water of the Marish, not past a Musquet shot from the Town. Wherein while they were busied, the Turks falling out of the Town, came to fight hand to hand with the Christians, and had with them a sharp Combat, the Turks fighting for the defending of the Place, and of their Lives, and the Christians for the gaining of the same, and for their Honour. Which for contrary a Resolution in that Conflict, cost the lives of many; amongst others, the life of Grafid, General of the Italians, there slain with a Harquebule shot, unto the great hurt of the whole Army, but especially of the Italians, now deprived of so great and expert a Commander. At last, for all that, the Turks were enforced confidently to retire again into the Town, having in this fallily lost a number of their men also. The Christians nevertheless, having driven the Turks back into the Town, went forward with their Business in making their Approaches, and placing their Gabions to cover their Cannon; wherein the Turks with their great and small shot did them great harm, but especially with their murthering pieces, charged with Nails and other small pieces of Iron. Howbeit, by the coming of the Lord Russworm with the rest of the Army, the Approaches were the next day brought on, and the Battery planted so near unto the Town, as that the Turks could not without most manifest danger and loss, any more fallily out to trouble the Christians in their Works. The first Inconvenience the besieged felt, was the want of Water, which through the diligence of our men was soon taken from them, the Cannon right furiously battering the Walls in the mean space. Wherewith the Turks discouraged, and now out of hope to be relieved, thought it not best for them to expect either whilst a Breach were made, or an Assault given, but by Parly to prevent these Dangers, it chose it to come to some easier Composition, while yet their Troops in their whole strength. And so Parly by the Turks demanded, and by the Christians granted, and Hostages for the fury thereof on both sides given, they sent two of the chief men amongst them to intreat of the same; who at the first demanded, that their Lives and Liberty should be secured, and that they should depart. Whereunto the Christians, who were given them, they should only with their Lives and Liberty be gone, with some few hundreds of their worth Horses, of Courtship given them, to carry them to such place as they meant to retire themselves unto, and to deliver into the hands of the Christians all such Renegades as were in Town.

Now the besieged Turks, carrying yet the marks of the Cruelty by the Wallons exercised upon them in the former Siege, when as the same Town was by force taken, and filled with dead Bodies of all Ages and Sexes, and doubting now this second Shipwreck, with like misery threatened unto them by the Christian General, if they should expect the dreadful event of a general assault, accepted of these hard Conditions, seeing no better could be obtained; and so covenanting, that they with their Families, their Lives and Liberties saved, might with a safe Convoy be conducted unto some place of safety within their own Territory, they promised to give unto the Turks, in full Agreement, on both sides resolved upon, that full of Sorow and Heaviness, with their Families departing out of the Town the 25th of November, were by Colonel Andass, with certain Hussars, safely conducted to Solot. The Christians entering the Town, found there a great store of Victuals and Munition, the Houses full of Corn, and gave the Wallons, and the Shops filled with Weapons, Shot, and Powder, with 24 pieces of great Ordnance ready mounted, which might have well sufficed for the defence of the place. But all these things are but Accessories unto one principal, that is to say, to Resolution, without which they are but of small force, and with which they are able to do much. Beside that, the place itself thus furnished well considered, seemed almost impossible to have been forced; but especially now that Winter was come on, which might have brought a thousand Storms and Difficulties, by the Christians not to have been endured; so that every man beholding the same, with his Eyes cast up towards heaven, gave God the Praise, for taking away the Turks Courages in their so great Advantages, and increasing of the Christians in their no less Difficulties; unto whom the glory of this Victory was wholly attributed, seeing that contrary to all appearance and mans forces, he had given to the Christians the Victory, who may able by their own forces to have been gained. But God, which in his Providence from Heaven beholdeth all things upon Earth, disposeth of the same as he pleaseth best for his Glory, and the welfare of his; so that in this Action he was the only Pilot which brought this our Ship into the Haven of Health; for the Hairs of our Heary are herein numbered, and even the least Creatures upon Earth are by him regarded.

Into this new gained Town the Christian General put a good and strong Garrison of a thousand Lansquenets, and 500 Hungarians, part Horse-men, and part Foot-men, for the keeping of the Place and of the Country thereabout; which done, he retired with his Army toward Pozsh, which he retook with Victuals, and strength again the Troops of the Colonels, Coltonis, Geisberg, and Rouer, who were there billeted to pass the Winter, and to preserve the place against the Devices and Enterprises of the Turks of Buda, who were still devising and practising for the regaining thereof.

many more Prisoners, amongst whom were found above fourscore Italian Renegades, who, brought into the Camp, were, as Enemies unto God, in a Martial Court all condemned to be hanged, and accordingly executed, leaving the Captain himself, who, for the regard of his Place, was beheaded.

Shortly after, the great Batta arising with his Army, came in the beginning of October and incamped near Buda, both for the Preservation of the Place, and the safety of his Army, now greatly diminished both in Number and Courage. For it was certainly known by divers Fugitives from the Turks, that in these many Conflicts they had lost a number of their best Soldiers, but especially of their Janizaries. So that the Batta, for the supplying of that Defect, was glad to make choice of 6000 of his best Soldiers, whom, armed with Muskets and Scimitars, the proper Arms of the Janizaries, he entertained into the Rooms and Pay of the Janizaries for the most part consisting of bare and feeble, bare raw Soldiers. Besides this, that all the Army was full of Mourning and Lamentation, the Soldiers in all Places bewailing the loss of their Brethren, their Friends and Companions; so that instead of their wonted Threats and bravery, nothing was to be heard but sighing and complaining. And moreover, that the general Opinion conceived of the greatness of the Christian Army, (imagined to be much greater and stronger than indeed it was) had struck such fear into the minds of the Turks, as that they were resolved, Buda being once victualled, to return home, all their other proud Designs for this year left apart; which was the cause that they had dislodged with their Army, and drawn near unto the City, the better to attend to the new victuals, and so to be gone; accounting themselves right happy, if they might but perform that good piece of Service and save themselves.

The Christians, before in doubt lest the Turks should have besieged Pesth, as they had before given it forth they would, and seeing them now to be risen with their Army and incamped near unto Buda, resolved to follow them, and in what they might to cross their Designs; and thereupon leaving Pesth, as now out of danger, they rose aloft, and came and incamped before the Fort in the Isle of Viegrad, between the said Pesth and Vachia; where they stayed four days, and then by a Bridge which they made upon the Danubius, whereby they passed from the Isle where the Italians lay in Garrison unto the Fort of Saint Andrew, kept by the Languesnets, they with the whole Army passed the River, and so came and incamped before the Fort of Saint Andrew, in the face of the Enemy. Now the field betwixt the heads of the two Armies was plain and open, without Woods, Bushes, or Rivers, to hinder the joining of a set Battle. In which to fit a Place, the Christians encouraged, with the fear of their Enemies, and the diminishing of their Number and Courage (whereof they had got knowledge as well by their tumultuous rising, as by other Advancements) were desirous in so favourable Occasions to have given them Battle; and for the desire they had thereof, were come thither to seek to it, which the Turks on the other side sought as much to shun, not daring to adventure themselves unto a Battle of a general Battle, for all the brags they had made. Nevertheless, very flame-arming them with some Resolution, they put forth into the field a Battalion of five thousand men, five days after that the Christians were incamped on that side of the River. This Battle of the Turks came marching on, within half a quarter of a League of the Christians;

which they would not have done but upon the Confidence of a greater number following of them, having behind them ten thousand men both Horse and Foot, laid as close as they possibly could a little out of the way. Now the Christians, thinking of no other Forces ready to fight, but those which appeared in their fighting, sent forth 12 hundred men against these five thousand Turks, who were into order, until the whole Army were into order, even for a general Battle that day to have been fought, if the Turks should accept thereof; whereunto the General, the Colonels, Captains, and Soldiers in general, were fully inclined, the whole Army with great Cheerfulness marching on foot at this loud alarm of their common desire. Which had not failed to bring forth great change of effects, had the Turks been likewise disposed for the producing of the same. But they be the extraordinary favours of Fortune, when fit Occasions join themselves with brave Resolutions, and such Resolutions with means to effect the same. This is the lot of many most noble Trophies, which most commonly fail, either for lack of fit Occasion, or for lack of good Resolution for the performance of them. But as most men judge of other men's Concepts by their own Inclination, so the Christians themselves, resolved to give Battle, thought the Turks their Enemies to have been of the same Resolution; and those five thousand men to have been the head of the avant-guard, followed with the whole Army, coming to draw them out to skirmish until the coming on of the rest of their Forces. Howbeit their design was quite contrary to this the Christians hope, for their purpose was only to train them out into their Ambushes, to withhold danger to cut them in pieces. Of which their purpose they gave sufficient Testimony, and cause of suspect; for that the Skirmish having continued three hours, with some loss on both sides, the Turks Army appeared not; and these five thousand Turks now in Skirmish, by little and little retiring, sought to have drawn the Christians into the danger of their Ambush. Which their manner of fight caused the Christians to suspect the matter; for it was not like, that five thousand men should give ground to twelve hundred, if they had not had some secret meaning therein, which they sought to effect to their more advantage. Which caused the Christian Carabins which followed them not to be too earnest in pursuing of them, and more closely to serve themselves together, the better to endure the shock of their Enemies, if they should charge them. Neither were they in that their provident fear deceived; for the Turks, seeing their purpose discovered, and themselves now out of hope to effect the same, upon the sudden made a stand, and so presently coming on, hardly charged the foremost of our Carabins, who, as men half surprised, to see themselves so readily and resolutely charged, by men who but now made show as if they would have fled, were not able to stand to receive the charge (considering the great number of them by whom they were charged) but that some few of them were overthrown and slain, with some of the Hungarians amongst them. Howbeit they made good resistance, and right valiantly repulsed their Enemies, of whom they slew a good number also. The praise in this Conflict was great, every one desiring to show himself brave and courageous in the head of his own Army. But new Supplies still coming in, the Turks in fine shrunk back and retired, having left three hundred of their Fellows dead upon the Place, accompanied with an hundred of the Christians there slain likewise. Now upon the return on both sides, every man in his conceit appointed the next day for the general day of Battle; the bragging Speeches of the Turks giving the Christians occasion so to do as for war, they seldom or neverstart Battle, being offered them by the Christians, as well for the Confidence they commonly have in their multitude, as for the foolish opinion they have of the inevitable Predetermination of men to Life or Death; accounting it amongst them an eternal infamy, to refuse any Combat against the Christians; which, howsoever it fall out, should fort to their Advantage, by vanquishing, gaining the Fruits of their Victory; and by losing of their Lives in Battle, to gain the Joys of Heaven; being vainly persuaded, no men's Souls do go more readily unto Heaven, than the Souls of such as dye in Battle against the Christians. Such Effects old superstitious Opinions are able to work in the Minds of men, even to the desperate adventuring and spending of their Lives. Howbeit, that this Effect for this time withstood, that these men, as these Advantages, as much feared the danger as any other poor faint-hearted men; and that a strong apprehension of fear is able to prevail against all Customs and Persuasions, be they never so old, as also against all other Accidents whatsoever. For why, the Turks, contenting themselves with their great Brags and vain Threats, came not forth according to their Promise, neither could by any means be drawn to adventure themselves into the hazard of a general Battle. The loss of their great and choicest men discouraged and deterred them from adventuring all to the hazard of so great a Peril. For (as I have said) almost all their Janizaries and most valiant Soldiers were dead or slain, and the rest, men of small Spirit or Courage, relieved that little which was in them, for the safeguard of themselves, and not for the gaining of any notable Victory. They had also in the last of the day, lost with great loss, a desperate kind of Soldiers fighting on Horseback, without Saddles, having only a little piece of Tapstry upon their Horses Backs, and by the readiness of their Horses, do for a long time in one sort maintain their fight. They carry light Darts made of ftrait and fair Canes, excellently well made, and strongly armed; and their handy Weapons are good Sabres, or broad and sharp Cut-throats. These men a great while fought most valiantly in the last Combats, but in fine, were all slain, except some few which cast themselves into Danubius, and were there drowned. The loss of which men much discouraged the Turks; for why, their Service stood them in great stead in receiving the Enemies Charges, and with their Bodies covering of the Turks Squadrons in their greatest Perils and Combats. Howbeit the Turks received not these Losses without coming to some part thereof to us again; for Calovinus had a little before fallen into great danger of his Person, and lost some of his Followers in an Enterprize of great Moment, had the Effect answered unto the Profit thereof. While the Turks yet lodged in the Isle of Viegrad, he caused eight great field-pieces to be so placed, as that therewith he so much annoyed the Turks, that they were about to have forsaken the Place. And the more to force them to do so, the second of October he embarked himself with six hundred Haidnicks upon the Danubius, and so by Night with great silence landed near unto the Enemies, thinking so upon the sudden to have surprised them. Which for all that, could not so secretly be done, by reason of the coming on of the day, but that the Turks were thereof aware; who therewith with great praise issued out of their Trenches, and with all their Force and Power charged him. Against whom he made head, rather upon a brave and constant Resolution, than upon any Confidence he had in his own Forces, nor having men enough to withstand the least part of his Enemies. Which his so great Resolution so abated the Turks Fury, as that they stood a good while in doubt to charge men so resolved. The Field-pieces which he had brought over with him into the Isle, then served him to good purpose, beating them back with their murthering Bullets, who with their number thought to have overwhelmed him. Which good help opposed against the number of the Enemies, for a time balanced the Victory, and wrought the death of many on both sides. This manner of fight endured the space of two hours, maintained more by Resolution, than by Strength and Power. At length for all that, the Turks with their number prevailing, the Christians therewith rather oppressed than vanquished, forsaking their field-pieces, disorderly retired toward their Boats. After which the Turks eagerly following, in that pursuit lost 400 of the Haidnicks, the rest with much ado recovering their Boats, carrying with them their General, by them hardly defended from the Fury of their Enemy. Which loss happened not so unto the Christians, but that it was mingled with some loss of the Turks also, of whom, the most forward and courageous were in that fight slain, as was afterwards known by certain Prisoners of the Turks afterwards taken, who made report of the Losses by them there received. The Turks, by this so desperate and dangerous an attempt warned, to prevent the like for the time to come, cast up great Trenches in the Isle along the Bank of Danubius, therein placing certain Janizaries and other their best Soldiers, who there lay until the dislodgement of the Camp, to go to lie before Buda.

The Turks had before built a Bridge of Boats at Amagias, which gave Passage into Stiria, where they did great harm; for the strengthening whereof, they had built at both ends thereof a strong Fort, well furnished both with Men and Munition. This Bridge, so commodious for the Turks, and hurtful to the Christians, Trammelforff, Governour of Stiria, and a great Commander in those parts, with his Stirian Troops, and some good Aid brought unto him by the Country Seign, undertook to break. Upon which Resolution on he upon the sudden approached one of the aforesaid Forts, and so right valiantly assailed the same, before they in the Fort were well aware of his coming. In which doing, he caused the greatest noise and stir that was possible to be made with Trumpets, Drums, and clattering of Armour, as if it had been some great Army employed in that Action, the more to terrify the besieged. Which so great and dreadful a noise, joined unto the brave attempt, with so great Courage begun, struck such a Terror into the Minds of the Turks, that they without any great resistance quitted the place, and fled over the Bridge to the other Fort. Of which forsaken Fort the Christians became Masters, and with all speed prosecuting their good Fortune, presently drew out thereof three Cannons, and therewith battered the other Fort. In which the Turks, having no other place of Refuge to fly unto, nor hope of safety by their last Valour, so well behaved themselves, as that the Christians had much ado to force them. Howbeit, a breach being made by the Fury of the Cannon, and scaling-ladders set up, the Fort was on every side assaulted; which the Turks for the space of five hours so valiantly endured, as that it was hard to say who should prevail or have the better. In this Assault were many on both sides slain, the Turks not being able to be overcome but with the loss both of their Lives and Honour; nor the Christians able to retire without loving the fruit of that their so great and rich an Enterprise; so that the assault was with great Resolution on both sides maintained, the Turks fighting for their Lives, and the Christians for their Honour; until that at last, the Turks, with much slaughter overcome, the Fort was by the Christians taken, and most of the Turks therein being slain, and the rest taken Prisoners, both the Forts were forthwith razed, and the Bridge broken, which before had served for an ordinary passage for the Turks to forage and spoil the Christian Territories by. The Boats whereof the Bridge was made were all burnt, and some great Ordnance therein found broken in pieces and cast into the River.

At the same time Lugase, a Place of great Importance for the Service of the Emperor, and so near unto the Turks, as that they could hardly attempt any thing thereabouts, but that it might from thence be discovered and known, was by the Transilvanians delivered to Balka, General for the Emperor in that Country. From which place, he sending out certain Scouts toward Belgrade, they brought in with them certain Prisoners; who being examined, said, that Hassan Bassa, the Turks General in Hungary, had writ to Gisler Bassa, the Governour of Temevar, That he should only attend to the Preservation of his own, without attempting any thing further against the Christians, the present Affairs of the Affairs to requiring; and that having revivified Buda, his purpose was for this year to return, in hope of some good Peace to be ere long concluded betwixt the great Sultan and the Emperor.

The two Armies of the Turks and the Christians lay still near the one of them unto the other, the Turks, careful for the revivification of Buda, and the Christians still intensive to their doings, and desirous in what they might to hinder and frustrate the same. Which because they could not way better do, but by offering of them Battle, they thereupon generally resolved, upon a Friday, being the seventeenth of October, the day by them assigned for the Battle (having by the shooting off of three great Cannons, given warning unto the Soldiers throughout the Camp, for the preparing of themselves first toward God, and then to the Service of their Prince) after they had well refreshed themselves, in good order took the field, and so stood ready ranged there, either to give or accept of Battle. Before whom, the County Rin-grave was sent forth with his Regiment, about half the way betwixt the two Armies, to discover the moving of the Enemy, and to receive his first charge if occasion should so require. Whole Scouts before sent forth, about Noon discovered a Troop of Horse-men come out of the Turks Camp, about some business they had to do, but to whom the unknown, the Scouts supposed to have been the fore-runners of the Turks Army, and by them almost surprised, hastily retired back again, and by their hasty retreat put the whole Army in an alarm, which came bravely marching on, in hope now to have come to try the matter by true Valour, and by the Fortune of a general Battle to have made that day for ever famous by their Victory and the overthrow of their proud Enemies. And in the heat of their so great Courage, like enough it was for them to have performed the fame, had the Turks had but so much Courage in them as to have met them in the Field, as was well hoped they now would. But they, with their former Losses discouraged, and resolved only upon the safeguard of themselves, and the victualing of Buda, had no mind to enter into these honourable Lifts, but kept themselves close within the covert of their Tents, and the strength of their Trenches. And so the Christians, with a false alarm moved, and having for the most part of the day in vain expected the coming forth of their Enemies, returned into their Camp deceived of their Expectation.

The same day there was an Espie taken, whom they which took him thought to have been a Turk, howbeit he was found to be one of their own men; by whom they were better informed of the Cowardice of the Turks, of their purpose for the shamming of Battle, and of their Resolution for the keeping of themselves within the safeguard of their Trenches; and that they so did, as well for the losses they had before received, as for divers other unlucky accidents, which canied them to mildoubt some evil success in the end and winding up of this their Expedition. Nevertheless, the Christians, not greatly trusting to these Reports, still kept their Army in readiness, to give their Enemies Battle upon the least occasion offered them. Howbeit, that indeed they had no great cause of fear, the Turks having no desire at all to come to a general Battle; so that instead of great Effects that were expected, the time passed but in light Skirmishes and vain Alarms betwixt the two Armies, until that at length the Turks, having by the River sufficiently stored the City of Buda with Victuals, the great Bassa secretly by Night rode with his Army, and so retired toward Belgrade. Which so late a retreat differed not from a cowardly flight, being with such silence made under the dark covert of the Night, as that the Christians had thereof no perceiving until they were quite departed and gone. This victualling of Buda, and some other few places of the Turks in Hungary, was all that the great Bassa did this year with his great Army; whereas at his first coming it was given out, that he would therewith take both Strigomium and Pesh from the Christians.

The next day, the daily and sudden departure of the Enemy being perceived, the General of the Christians called together the Colonels and other great Commanders of the Army, to consult with them, what were best to be done in so unexpected an occurrence; Of whom, some were of Opinion, That it was best forthwith in all haste to pursue these fearful Enemies; others, for many Reasons dissuading the fame, and others withal, propounding some other notable Exploits to be taken in hand. But in Consensus, the safest point was resolved upon, which was, not to hazard any of their Troops in pursuing of their flying Enemies, who were hardly to be overtaken; but now immediately after their departure to attempt the taking in of some one of their strong holds; where, amongst others that were propounded, Hatwan was thought to be the most necessary Place, being so seated, as that beside the great harm it did to the Christians therein, it much hindered both Advancements and Victuals to be brought unto Pesh. Whose Exploit resolved upon, they forthwith razed the Fort of St. Andrew, and the Fort by them built in the life of Veigrade, because they should not stand the Turks in any feed after their departure, and so with all their Power set forward toward Hatwan. This Town is seated beyond the River of Danubius toward the North, about eight Leagues from Buda, crossing the way to Transilvania and Callovnia, upon a fair and even Plain, near unto a great and deep Marsh, and was formerly defended with good and strong Walls, with a Cattle, and three large and deep Ditches, for a long time in the Power of the Turks, and which, without loss, a great while held out against the valiant Baron Tesfenbach, by whom it was most bravely in vain besieged; until that afterward it was again besieged by Maximilian the Arch-duke, the Emperours

Hassan taken and disinclined by Maximilian the Arch-duke, in the year 1594

Brother, then General of his Army in Hungary, in the year 1594, unto whom it was by Composition surrendered, after it had for a certain space been by the Turks notably defended; who, considering the harm this place did unto the Emperours Territories, by reason of the fortification thereof, which was a great and strong Garrison of the Turks always lying, foraged all the Christian Territories as far as the River Vagne, yea, and oftentimes took Booties as far as Strigomium, and by spoiling of all that side of Hungary, caused the Country to pay Contribution as far as Ternavie, standing within four Leagues of the Mountains which separate Hungary and Moravia; all irreparable Losses to the Christians, and hardly to be avoided; for which Reasons he caused it then to be dismantled, and to be made all serviceable for the Wars. After that time for all that, the Turks, for the commodiousness of the Place, had with great Labour again new fortified the same, with Walls made with great Piles of Wood and Faggots, with Earth rammed in betwixt them; a stronger kind of fortification, and better able to withstand the Fury of the Cannon, than are Walls of Stone; in which sort the Turks use most commonly to fortify such Places as they mean to defend, and with oftentimes cost much for the Christians to gain the same from them.

Hatwan again fortified by the Turks.

This Place thus fortified, and both with Men and Munition well furnished, and with all things needful stored, was able to endure a great and long Siege; whereunto the Garrison therein was as resolutely set down, as were the Christians to attempt it; where now, at their first coming unto it, a part of the Italian Regiment, assisted with three thousand Langens, under the leading of County Sabze, and Grafeld, General of the Italians, were appointed to go before the rest of the Army, and to begin to make the Approaches; which they did by forcing of a Water-mill, driven by the Water of the Marsh, not past a Mulequet shot from the Town. Wherein while they were busied, the Turks lallying out of the Town, came to fight hand to hand with the Christians, and had with them a sharp Combat, the Turks fighting for the defending of the Place, and of their Lives, and the Christians for the gaining of the same, and for their Honour. Which so contrary a Resolution in that Conflict, cost the Lives of many; and amongst others, the Life of Grafeld, General of the Italians, there slain with a Harquebuse shot, unto the great hurt of the whole Army, but especially of the Italians, now deprived of great and expert a Commander. At last, for all that, the Turks were enforced confidently to retire again into the Town, having in this lally shot a number of their men aloft. The Christians nevertheless, having driven the Turks back into the Town, went forward with their Business in making their Approaches, and placing their Gabions to cover their Cannon; wherein the Turks with their great and small shot did them great harm, but especially with their murdering pieces, which they shot the Turks and other small pieces of Iron. Howbeit, by the coming of the Lord Rossmurm with the rest of the Army, the Approaches were the next day brought on, and the Battery planted so near unto the Town, as that the Turks could not without most manifest danger and loss, any more fall out to trouble the Christians in their Works. The first Inconvenience the besieged felt, was the want of Water, which through the diligence of the men was soon taken from the Cannon right furiously battering the Walls in the mean space. Whereupon the Turks discouraged, and now out of hope to be relieved, thought it not best for them to expect either whilst a Breach were made, or an Affault given, but by Parly to prevent these Dangers, in hope it to come to some easier Composition, while yet they stood in their whole strength. And so Parly by the Turks demanded, and by the Christians granted, and Hollages for the surety thereof on both sides given, they sent two of the chief men amongst them to treat of the same; who at the first demanded, That their Lives and Liberty saved, they might with Bag and Baggage depart. Whereunto answer was given them, That they should only with their Lives and Liberty be gone, with some few hundreds of their worst Horses, of Courtly given them, to carry them to such place as they meant to retire themselves unto, and to deliver into the hands of the Christians all such Renegades as were in town.

The Turks in Hatwan were Parley.

Now the besieged Turks, carrying yet the marks of the Cruelty by the Wallons exercised upon them in the former Siege, when as the fame Town was by force taken, and filled with dead Bodies of all Ages and Sexes, and doubting now this second Shipwreck, with like misery threatened unto them by the Christian General, if they should expect the dreadful event of a general assault; accepted of these hard Conditions, seeing no better could be obtained; and so covenanted, that they with their Families, their Lives and Liberties saved, might with a safe Convoy be conducted unto some place of surety within their own Territory, they promised to give up the Town. Which Agreement, on both parties resolved upon, they full of Sorrow and Heaviness, with their Families departing out of the Town the 29th of November, were by Colonel Andul, with certain Hussars, safely conducted to Satm. The Christians entering the Town, found there great store of Victuals and Munition, the Houses full of Corn and other Necessaries, and the Shops stored with Weapons, Shot, and Powder, with 24 pieces of great Ordnance ready mounted, which might have well sufficed for the defence of the place. But all these things are but Accessories unto one principal, that is to say, to Resolution, without which they are but of small force, and with which they are able to do much. Beside that, the place it self thus furnished well considered, seemed almost impossible to have been forced; but especially now that Winter was come on, which might have brought a thousand Storms and Difficulties, by the Christians not to have been endured; so that every man beholding the same, with his Eyes cast up towards heaven, gave God the Praise, for taking away the Turks Courages in their so great Advantages, and increasing of the Christians in their no less Difficulties; unto whom the glory of this Victory was wholly attributed, seeing that contrary to all appearance and mans forces, he had given to the Christians the Victory, no way able by their own forces to have been gained. But God, which in his Providence from Heaven beholdeth all things upon Earth, disposeth of the same as he seeth best for his Glory, and the welfare of his; so that in this Addition he was the only Pilot which brought this our Ship into the Haven of Health; for the Nails and other small pieces of Iron. Howbeit, by the coming of the Lord Rossmurm with the rest of the Army, the Approaches were the next day brought on, and the Battery planted so near unto the Town, as that the Turks could not without most manifest danger and loss, any more fall out to trouble the Christians in their Works. The first Inconvenience the besieged felt, was the want of Water, which through the diligence of the men was soon taken from the Cannon right furiously battering the Walls in the mean space. Whereupon the Turks discouraged, and now out of hope to be relieved, thought it not best for them to expect either whilst a Breach were made, or an

The Lord Ruffworm breaks up his Army, and sends the Ensigns gained from the Turks for a present to the Archduke Mathias.

Inolent Soldiers justly punished.

The Soldiers of the Regiment of the Archduke are justly punished, by Extremities drive to provide for themselves.

The time of the Year for Soldiers any longer to keep the Field now past, and the great Army of the Turks risen and gone, the Lord Ruffworm breaking up his Army near unto Strigium, caused all the Ensigns by him this Year gained from the Turks, even sixty four in number, to be gathered together, all very brave and gallant; all which he sent with great Pomp and Triumph to Vienna, for a Present to the Archduke Mathias; who received them with great Thanks, given both unto the General that sent them, and the Soldiers that had gained them; and bountifully rewarding them that had brought them. They of Vienna at the same time highly commending the General, and not a little rejoicing to see those same Ensigns now in their Power within the City, which not long before had proudly been in the Field.

Now after the breaking up of the Christian Army, a great number of inolent and feditious Soldiers, especially of the Regiment of Colonel Almain, roaming up and down the Country to seek for Booty, most cruelly rifled and spoiled the Country Villages, with the Inhabitants therein, as well the Christians as the Turks, sparing no more the one than the other; whose Outrage not otherwise to be stayed, they were by Commandment from the Emperour, by force charged at Widdof; and two hundred and thirty of them being brought in Prisoners to Vienna, four and thirty of them were there for Example hanged, and the rest, as men not worthy of Entertainment, calihied.

The time of the Year having (as we said) broken up the Army of the Christians, the Regiment of the Country Reingrave was put in Garrison into the Villages of Chians and Ternau, always at hand with the Enemies, as fittest to repulse them. These Soldiers were always kept in doing, still fighting whilst others were at Peace, and managing their Arms, whilst others hanged theirs by the Walls. For, beside the Troubles he had with the Turks, their night, but bad Neighbours, the very Inhabitants of the Country (who held all that might hurt them for Enemies, they never so much their Friends) oftentimes, and that for little or no occasion at all, took up Arms, and right furiously charged them as their mortal Enemies. Of which Combats there was no end, the Country Peasants still striving to rid themselves of such Guests. So that these valiant men, still incited to buy their Bread with the price of their Blood, as men become desperate, used the Christians as they did the Turks, dividing all things with them by the Sword. But in these small and often Fights more men were slain and lost than would have been in a general Batel, some good number, either on the one side or the other being every day slain; which daily Inconveniences caused these Soldiers to resolve to go to seek their living elsewhere, rather than in the midst of the Graves of their Fellows. Whereunto they were rather induced, for that but a little before, the Troop of Captain Cinchamp, the best and bravest of the whole Regiment, was one night furiously assailed, and almost surprised by the Country Peasants. Wherefore they departed out of Hungary into Austria without Victuals, Apparel, or Money, their Pay due unto them for seventeen Months being kept from them. A Cruelty full of Covetousness, and a Covetousness full of Cruelty, by wrong and hard dealing to leave those men to the desperate extremity of Hunger, who for their own Safety had exposed themselves to all manner of danger. For the Prince (as he may of right) demand the Lives of his Subjects in his Service, as bound unto their Loyalty; they may also of Right require due Provision for their Maintenance: of which two Offices, where one faileth, the whole State must needs fall. For providing wherefore, great was the Wisdom of Augustus, who laid up the publick Revenue apart by itself, to defray the publick Charge; and that which was his own private, to serve his own private Uses.

These poor Soldiers thus resolved, craved leave of the Bishop of Freiburg to pass by the Suburbs of his Town, without doing therein any harm; which their Request he courteously granted; and so, according to their Word, they indeed passed, not so much as once wilting for that they durst not once touch. Which their so quiet Passage, caused the Bishop to furnish them with Boats, whereby to pass over the River which divideth Hungary from Austria. Which once known unto the Peasants of Austria, they assembled themselves together, to the number of 1500 men, and came up a Fort upon the Bank of the River, with three Faulconers in it, resolutely set down to keep them from coming over into their Country. Which their so forward a Resolution for a while flatly these men of War; who, to avoid farther trouble, courteously requested Passage of these men, promising all their good Behaviour in passing quietly through their Country; which the Cartes in most churlish manner refused to grant, with great Threats of the danger of their Lives, if they should by force attempt the Passage, and not with quietness return. With which Bravadoes of the Country Churles these Troops of martial men provoked, resolved by force to remove these lets, and by the Sword to open themselves a way; so turning the Head of their Baggage toward the Fort, as if they would have there passed; while the Peasants stood gazing upon them, Gangallard with his Troop of Horsemen, unperceived of them took the River a little higher up, and by swimming gained the farther Bank; after whom Captain Cinchamp with his Troops immediately followed also. In which Passage, they were much troubled with great flakes of Ice, with the great deepness of the River, with the steepness of the Banks where they were to land, and many other Difficulties: all which they regarded not, to be revenged of their Enemies. These valiant men being got over, upon the sudden surprising these rude Country Churles, and furiously charging of them, quickly overthrew them, and cut them in pieces; of whom, 300 were left dead upon the Place, as many more hurt, and the rest put to flight. Which was no sooner done, but that the rest of the Troops of the Regiment without let passed the River, and so joyined themselves unto their victorious Companions. Seven Weeks this Regiment stayed in Austria; and so long it tarried, but that upon the Complaint and Request of the Nobility and of the People of the Country, they having for seventeen Months Pay due unto them received nine Months Pay, were licenced to depart. Which was a great Oversight in them that had to do therewith, at once to disband so many good Men, as had not their like amongst all the rest of the Emperours Garrisons; and who, being flat with a little money, might with their good Service have flood the Emperour in great need; as by proof afterward appeared; when as the Emperour, by necessity forced to call them together again, could not of all that strong Regiment raise but three Companies; the rest being some of them returned into their own Countries, other some of them gone to serve in other places, or else otherwise dispersed.

Of which three Companies, the first was given to Gangallard, the second to Belassar Marade, a Spaniard, and the last to John Paul, an Italian: Which three Captains had before commanded in the Reingrave's Regiment, and done the Emperours good Service as they did afterward also.

Divers happy Examples of the Christians with the Turks and Tartars.

The rest of this year ended in Hungary, with divers other Encounters and Combats, Fortune therein still favouring the Christians. As three hundred Haiducks, going forth to seek for Booty, by good hap chanced to meet with a Company of the Turks, being very rich, and divers of them men of good account; amongst whom, the Governour of Mohatz was one; all whom these Haiducks cut in pieces: to be borne withal, for shewing no favour unto them, who most cruelly had before spoiled them of their Patens, Lands, and Goods. Besides that, they took the Governour of Copen with his Son, and twenty four other very rich Turks, with 170 Horses of Service, and eight fat Oxen prepared for their Provision. Which fat Booties drew forth other Soldiers also to seek out for the like; of whom, certain Troops of the Christians going forth toward Baffar, a Town of the Enemies, met the Governour of the Town and of the Territory thereabout, who with his Garrison against them; where bewixt them was made a right hot and sharp fight; wherein, at the first encounter the Turks seemed to have the better, but in the end the Christians taking Courage, overthrew them, and cut them in pieces. In this conflict divers Prisoners were taken, with three Ensigns, and many other rich Spoils. This happy Exploit was recorded with News agreeable thereunto out of Moldavia, where the Vayvod by a Currot sent purpose gave our men to understand of the great and general overthrow of the Tartars; who, having with all manner of Cruelty wasted the Country, had in the end made the Inhabitants so desperate, that repining more Comfort in a speedy death (the end of all Miserie) than in a lingering Life, turmoiled with so many intolerable Calamities, they generally arming themselves, joyning themselves with their Vayvod, to try their last Fortune. With which Resolution, they in Battel countenancing with the Tartars, gave them a great overthrow, a number of them being left dead upon the Field, and the rest put to flight, and chased out of the Country, the Moldavians notably revenging their former Losses, and in their own Territories burying their Enemies.

Neither were the Turks in this cold and hard time of the year on their part idle, but still plotting of their great and notable Devotions even through the midst of the Frost and Snow to have been performed. The Bafa Beged, hearing that the Lord Bafa lay with his Troops dispersed in the Country about Lippa, in great leaguer, by reason of the Extremity of the time, alaciously unfit for men to keep the field; and therefore imagining it to be no great matter, now amidst the Frost and the Snow to surmise him; acquainted three other of the Turks with Captains and Commanders thereabout with the matter; who liking well thereof, with five thousand men altogether set forward, in hope to have upon the sudden surprised him. But he an old expert Captain, and not so careless as they supposed, had his secret Spies still abroad among them; by whom, he advertised both of their purpose and of their coming, resolved in both to prevent them; and to that end having called together his Forces, and set forward to meet them in the mid way, and before they were aware to intercept them, neither failed he of his purpose; for, meeting with the Turks, fearing no such matter in place of disadvantage, and upon the sudden charging them round, they, deceived of their Expectation for the easiness of the Victory promised them, as men dismayed, after some small resistance fled; above eleven hundred of them being in this conflict slain, and the rest put in rout, and driven into the River Maras, there perishing; some few only by speedy flight with the Bafa escaping. Twenty of the Turks Captains were here taken, with some few other Prisoners, and a great and rich Booty.

Much about the same time George Barbel, one of the chief of the Rebels in Transilvania, acknowledging his fault, came to Claudianopolis, acknowledging his Allegiance unto the Emperour; by whose Example a great number of others moved, came in and submitted themselves also; and happily he, being a good and valiant Captain, had done much more for the Service of the Emperour, had he not been by death prevented; for shortly after he suddenly died. The other Rebels, moved neither by his Example, nor by the coming in of some others of their Companions, made choice of one Bethlin Habor (a most renowned Captain, and of great Reputation amongst the Soldiers) for their Chieftain; who, proud of such a choice, immediately after sent an Herald unto Baffa, to will him forthwith to deliver unto him all the Country of Transilvania, as to him that was of late chosen Prince thereof, and to denounce unto him most cruel War; and to tell him further, That if he refused to do so, he was in good hope by his own Forces, without any Aid from the Turk, to drive him out, being well assured of the faithful devoir of the Transilvanians. At whose proud Threats Baffa smiling, only shewed him his open Hand in sign that he accepted of his proud Threats, not vouchsafing him any other answer at all. This glorious Boaster bared himself the higher, for that he had married the Widow of Mofes the chief Rebel, whereby he had gained both great Riches, and much Credit and Reputation among the common People; both which he enjoyed but a while, for the fourth day after he was married, he died, and so was buried. Baffa nevertheless, for the better assuring of the strong Places of Transilvania, put into them Garrisons of his most faithful Germans, and dispatched Cranfench away toward the Emperour, to request him to supply of a thousand Horse-men, and four thousand Foot, without which he thought it impossible to preserve and keep the Province, troubled with so great Factions, and so earnestly fought after by the Turks; and further to certify him, That the little Forces he had left, was not sufficient for the keeping of the Places betwixt so many Enemies, and all lying as it were in their Hands. That the Province was swarmed with feditious People, one thrusting another forward in Murther and Rebellion, as the Ears of Wheat, driven with the Wind, do one another in the Field; that the Turks were always making of new Incursions, which he was not able to repels without greater Forces, which he expected from his Majesty with all speed possible; protesting, for want of such supply to be in time sent unto him, to lay the loss of the Province upon the Negligence of them which might and ought to have sent the same; acquitting himself for the loss thereof, seeing that he durst not to repole any Trust or Confidence in the Faith of the Citizens and Inhabitants of the Towns, although they were disarmed, for having so often falsified their Faith, and put their Province in danger of utter Ruine and Destruction. But leaving these Troubles of Transilvania and Hungary, let us a little step back to see what hapned among the Turks themselves, after the departure of the great Bafa with his Army out of Hungary.

Mahomet the great Sultan had (as is before declared) by great Promises made unto his Rebels, sought to appeale the Rebellion in Asia, and by that means drawn Zellaly, one of the chief Rebels, with twelve thousand good Soldiers, out of Asia into Europe, and so into his Wars in Hungary, upon an assured promise made unto him of the Government of Baffa; the hope wherof, as it had drawn him him into these late Wars, so had it also encouraged him with his gallant Troops of most brave Horse-men to do the best Service he could, so to show himself worthy of so honourable a Preference: which he might notably perform during all the time of the Baffas Abode in Hungary, by his own great Commendation, and the furthering of his Lord and Master's Service. But the Baffa with his weak Army retired out of Hungary, and the Baffa himself returned toward Constantinople; Zelly, with three thousand Horse, withdrew himself into his promised Government of Bafina, to possess himself thereof: and being come near to Bafina, the chief Town of that Province, he there encamped in a fair large Meadow, within five miles of the City. Now Zelly Baffa, then Governor of the Province, and not as yet thereof discharged, seeing this Rebel thus to increase upon his Charge, as if he would even by force intrude himself thereinto; with all speed called together his Garrisons and men of War (ever ready at his beck) and went forth against Zelly, with a purpose to have quickly, and without any great Trouble, cut him, with his so small a Company, all in pieces. But the old Rebel, not ignorant either of his own weakness, or of the Baffa's strength, having himself lost the best part of his Forces before in Hungary, as he was a man of no less Wisdom than Courage, resolved now to attempt by Policy that which he well knew he could not by force effect. Wherefore he, as a great Prince, upon some brave Resolution, began to incamp himself, as if he had meant there to have lain, when as immediately after, upon a fair Night, having caused divers great Fires to be made in his Tents, as if it had been to beguile the Enemy with, he suddenly rose and departed. Of whose Flight (for so it was like) the Baffa understood, and that he had forsaken his Camp, halted thither with all speed with his Soldiers to take and pillage the same; not making any other account of him that was so fled and gone, but as of a base and faint-hearted Coward, who for Fear, and want of Courage, had left both his Camp and Honour as a Prey into his Enemies the Spoil whereof, the Baffa (being possessed of the Camp) gave unto his Soldiers; who, glad of such a Morfel, greedily swallowed it up, which by and by after became their bane and utter destruction: for, whilst that they were charging themselves with Booties, and every man was thinking of his Prey, nothing careful of their common Safety, Zelly, with his three thousand Horse, all valiant and resolute men, suddenly the same Night returning, surprised the Turks being fast on sleep, as buried in Security, and cut them in pieces. Some, of greater Courage than the rest began to make head, and to give some show of their Valour; but, overcome with the general Fear, out of order, and not resolved what to do, they were quickly with the rest forced, overthrow, and slain. In this surprise there were of the Baffa's men six thousand found dead upon the Place; a very great slaughter to be made by so few men. But what cannot valiant Resolution do against carelessness, lulled asleep in the lap of Security? The Baffa himself escaped by Flight, with such as could get out of the Camp to follow him.

Now Zelly, well knowing how to use his Victory, marched in haste to all the chief places of the Province, and with his Forces, more feared for their Victory than their Number, caused all the Inhabitants of those Places, with most part of the rest of the People of the Country, to swear unto him their Obedience and Fidelity. In which doing, he gathered together great numbers of the best, with a great number of brave Horses for Service; all which he put into Bahadur, a strong Town, whereinto he in triumphant manner entered, with a Crown of Laurel upon his Head, and his Soldiers fing his Praises amidst the din of a thousand Pieces of great Ordnance, which he caused incessantly to be shot off for the space of two days together, giving it out withal (amongst all the joyful Feasts and Triumphs, made in his Majesty and setting forth of his Praises and Glory) that his Resolution was, to take part with the Christian Emperor, if the great Baffas, or other his Enemies in great place in Court, should seek to cross his Desires, or to formalize his Actions or Proceedings in this manner of the obtaining of his Government.

Now Mahomet, doubting what this Man, so well acquainted with Rebellion, would do, had by divers Messengers sent for him to Constantinople, after the breaking up of the Army in Hungary, there of his Imperial and Infinite Bounty, to receive the honourable Rewards of his good Service and Valour, the greatness whereof he had (as he said) already understood by Hassan Baffa the General; which to bound him to the Reward thereof, as that his Desire and Pleasure was, to grace him in Court with his own hands, for the greater Testimony of the Love he bare him, and of the esteem he had of him. But the crafty and misfrustrful Rebel, doubting that these fair Words were all but baits to draw him into his Power, to the endangering or assured loss both of his Life and Liberty, that his Ears against these so sweet Charms, and, as a Man well advised, and one which knew that the hand of a Prince justly offended, is always open for to punish his rebellious Subjects, being once in his Power, with as great Justice in punishing him, as he with wrong and Disloyalty had used and departed, with acceptance of the offer; but civilly answered, That he most humbly thanked the Great Sultan for his so great and honourable Offers, and that he was so mindful of him; but that he for his part desired not any greater reward for the Services by him done, more than the Government which his Majesty had before promised him, whereof (according to which Promise, which he could not think to be agreeable to his good liking) he was now possessed, with a resolution to hold and keep the same for his Majesties Service. Which was as much in effect, as for a disloyal Subject to talk with his angry Sovereign with his hand upon his Sword: but with this sly Answer, such as it was, Sultan Mahomet, for all his Greatness, must as yet content himself, for fear lest if he should have fought to have by force removed him, he might to have raised a more dangerous Rebellion in Europe, than was already in Asia. Zelly, for politick and subtle a man, and not to seek what to do in such matters, being possessed of so great a Government, and the Christian Emperor at hand ready to have backed him, if he should upon any Discontentment have revolted.

The Troubles of this Year 1603 thus overspilt, the beginning of the next was like unto a fair blooming Tree, which promising great store of Fruit, but afterward blasted with the Extremity of the Weather, proved in effect as barren, as it before seemed in hope fruitful; for, beginning with the sweet Western Winds of Peace, it ended with the stern Northern Blasts of War. The Turks had oftentimes the last Year made motion of Peace, but especially toward the end thereof; outwardly making shew of a great desire and forwardness in themselves thereunto. Which business the last Year began, was even with the beginning of this Year also effectually continued, that Commissioners were on both sides appointed to confer and conclude upon the same. Among these Commissioners, Colonel Athem was one; who, to perform his Charge, Commissioners appointed to confer upon a Peace to be made between the Christians and the Turks.

The Causes which moved the Turks to incline to Peace.

The Baffa of Buda, sent to meet the Christian Commissioners according to his Promise.

An evil Prejudice of the future Peace.

having taken with him the other Commissioners deputed with him for this purpose, with certain other Captains, embarked himself with them in thirteen Ships from Strigonia, and from thence falling down the River, landed with his Train in the Island between Buda and Pesth. Of whose Arrival there, the Turks of Buda advertised, and on their part ready, came forthwith thither also, with all the outward shews that might be of their most earnest desire for the concluding of Peace; whereas our Men, who by a thousand effects were assured of the unlikelihood of the Turks, and that Necessity, and not the desire of any Quietness, had drawn them to seek for Peace, to the contrary shewed themselves very backward in this Business. For why, they knew right well, that the Turks had not taken this matter in hand, but to overtake them, and by this time of Peace to gain a time of War more commodious and fit for their ambitious and cruel Designs. They had the year before made sufficient Proof of our Forces, accompanied with good Fortune, which caused them to despair by strong hand to vanquish and overcome us; besides that, they fill every hour in one place or other received a thousand Losses and Crosses from our Garrisons, who distressed and annoyed them both with their Forces, and with driving of them unto the extremity of Wants. Our men knew moreover also, that the Troubles of Asia, as well from the Rebels as from the Persians, which lay so heavy upon the Great Sultan, drew them to this necessity, to seek for a breathing time of Peace, wherein to repair the which was in their Forces and Strength by Wars impaired. And even yet also, the manner of the Turks demeaning of themselves in this Action, their Delays, their Excuses, and deferring from day to day to conclude upon some Point of this Treaty, gave our men good cause to suspect them of evil meaning, as men respecting their Profit more than their Faith; and more subtil and cruel in all their Actions, than honest and valiantous. The Fifth day of January was the day by our men expected for the Treaty; for as then the Baffa of Buda had appointed with the rest of the Commissioners to come into the Isle, to hear what our Commissioners should demand, and to treat of the Peace. But he was too true an Infidel to fail of his Infidelity, and so came not at all, but deceived our Men both of their Hope and Expectation. At length, instead of himself, Letters were brought from him to the Colonel Athem, whereby he excused himself for not coming, requesting him, with the rest of the Commissioners, to come upon the River to Buda; the more commodiously for them to confer together, and so the better to conclude their Negotiation. Now though Athem, for the Majesty of his Prince, and the Honour of the State, ought not at the Request of these his Enemies to have put himself into their Power, but to have stood fast upon the Terms of Honour, yet to the end that the Country of Hungary, so miserably spoiled with Wars, should not take occasion to complain of his negligence in this Negotiation of Peace, he resolved to go to Buda, as the Baffa had requested; deeming every Action tending to the hinderance of the common Good, to be but in shew honourable, and in deed hurtful. Upon which Resolution, he sent before the Gentleman of his Stable, and his Cook, with a Gentleman of the Turks, sent him the day before from the Baffa; which men going aboard together, were attended with such a cruel Tempest upon the River, that neither the Skill of the Water-men, nor Goodness of the Vessel, was able to resist the force thereof; so that the Boat was sunk, and the men drowned: an evil Prejudice of the Peace to be made, the raging Water as it were foretelling the Troubles to come. But this Tempest, by the sacrifice of about four drowned men, appeased, Athem and Galsberg, two of the chief Commissioners, embarked themselves, and so sailed upon the River to Buda. At whose Arrival, the Turks gave in shew a thousand Testimonies of their joy for their coming. Neither did the Germans refuse their kind offered Courtesies, but largely fed of the good cheer, and filled themselves with the good Wines, whereof the Turks had given them Plenty; and they again using them as kindly as if they had been their Brethren, and converting with them as with their own Countrymen. Amidst this carousing and Platters full of good cheer, the Proposition of Peace, which the Turks meant to demand, were served in also, and a Truce for twelve days demanded to consider of the matter; during which time, it should be lawful for every man, without let, freely to come and go whither they would; which was forthwith on both sides agreed upon. And for better Testimony of the Turks true meaning in this their Negotiation of Peace, the Baffa, in the presence of our Commissioners, dispatched a Courier toward the great Sultan, to advertise him of this business, and of the proceeding therein, according to the commandment by him before given. Which he did, to cause our men to believe, that the great Sultan himself was desirous of Peace, and that his Captains, well affected thereto, were willing to further the same. Which done, the Baffa presented unto Colonel Athem two Cakes full of Turkeys, of all manner of Fashions, very rich, and cunningly wrought, both carried by a Mule, with Furniture for an Horse, encased with Gold and Pearl, very sumptuous and rich, as Presents from the great Sultan, his Lord and Master, to the Emperour. And for the Archduke Matthias, he presented unto the Colonel, a Robe of purple Velvet, with Sleeves cunningly embroidered with Gold and Pearl, embossed with fine and curious Figures cunningly wrought with the Needle; for the richness thereof as admirable to behold, as for the richness thereof to have been desired; which was by every man wondered at, when as shortly after it was by Athem presented unto the Arch-duke, together with other Presents from the Turks. Besides that, the same Baffa, in token of Friendship, presented unto Athem himself another very fair and rich Robe; all the rest of the Commissioners receiving also from the Baffa other Robes of less Value, but yet all very rich and sumptuous.

This business for this time thus ended, and the Truce for twelve days concluded, the Christian Commissioners, loaded with Presents, took their leave of the Turks, with the shews of their good Wills, and so returned back again to Pesth. However, these the Enemies fair Presents little favoured of Enmity, being indeed but like to the Presents of Heber and Ajax, tending rather to War than to Peace.

Now the Death of the most valiant and renowned Lord Nadaghi, which at this time happened, was another evil Prejudice of the Success of this Treaty of Peace now at hand; for having of long been a bar unto the Turks Race in that part of Hungary where he dwelt, they now after his Death, with the violence of their Forces, as with an heady stream, bare down before them all our good Fortune in that Province. This worthy man, of great Fame and Desert, had spent both his Years and Fortune in the most honourable Wars against the Turks, wherein he was so skillful and expert, that he was by them counted as another Huniades, and of the Christians honoured 1604 rising in the midst, and flooping on each side; not much unlike to the Coffins of the ancient Tombs of the Saxon Kings, which are to be seen on the North side of the Quire of S. Paul's Church and in other Places of this Land; but that this Coffin of the Great Sultan is much greater, and more stately than are those of the Saxon Kings; it being above five foot high at the end thereof, and by little and little falling toward the feet, covered with a rich Hearse of Cloth of Gold down to the ground; his Turbant (standing at his Head, and two exceeding great Candles of white Wax, about three or four Yards long, standing in great bras or silver Candlesticks gilded, the one at his Head, the other at his Feet, which never burn, but there stand for show only: all the Floor of the Chapel being covered with Mats, and fair Turkey Carpets upon them. And round about this his Tomb, even in the same Chapel, are the like Tombs for his Wives and Children, but nothing so great and fair. Into this Chapel, or any other the Turks Churches or Chapels, it is not lawful for either Turk or Christian to enter, but first he must put off his Shoes, leaving them at the Church or Chapel Gate, or carrying them in his hand. Near unto this Chapel, and the great Temple of Sophia, are divers other Chapels of the other great Turks; as of Sultan Selim, this Man's Grand father, with his seven and thirty Children about him; of Sultan Ammurat, this Man's Father, with his five and forty Children entombed about him. And in other Places, not far from them, are the Chapels and Sepulchres of the rest of the Great Sultans; as of Sultan Mahomet the Great, of Sultan Bajazet, Sultan Selim the first, Sultan Solyman; all by these great Mahometan Emperours built, whose Names they bear. And being all of almost one form and fashion, have every one of them a fair Hospital adjoining unto them, wherein a great multitude of poor People are daily still relieved.

Some others of the great Bassaes have their Chapels and Sepulchres, with their great and stately Alms-houses also, not much inferior unto those of the great Sultans; as namely, Ibrahim Bassa, of all the Bassaes that ever were amongst the Turks the most magnificent, hath his stately Chapel, Sepulchre, and Alms-Houses, near, both in Place and Beauty unto that of Solyman's. The Turks bury not at all within their Churches, neither are any at all buried within the Walls of the City, but the great Turkish Emperours themselves, with their Wives and Children about them, and some few other of their great Bassaes, and those only in Chapels by themselves built for that purpose. All the rest of the Turks are buried in the Fields; some of the better sort in Tombs of Marble, but the rest with Tomb-stones laid upon them, or with two great Stones, the one set up at the head, and the other at the feet of every Grave; the greatest part of them being of white Marble, brought from the Isle of Marmora. They will not bury any man where another hath been buried, accounting it Impiety to dig up another man's Bones: by reason whereof, they cover all the best Ground about the City with such great white Stones; which, for the infinite number of them, are thought sufficient to make another Wall about the City. But not to stand longer upon the manner of the Turks Burials, leaving this great Sultan to rest with his Ancestors, let us now prosecute the course of our History.

The Turks bury not in their Churches, neither within the Walls of their Cities, but in the Fields.

THE LIFE OF ACHMAT,

The First of that Name, Eighth Emperour of the Turky.

1604 Achmat, by excessive bounty procured the favour of his great Courtiers and men of War.

Mahomet, the late Sultan, in the midst of his excessive Pleasures, by untimely Death taken away, Achmat, the elder of his two Sons yet living, who was to succeed him in the Empire, to prevent the usual and insolent Tumults of the Janizaries, and other Souldiers of the Court at the change of the Emperours, and to take from them all Occasions of discontentment; by the Council of the great Bassaes (before he took upon him the Government) caused an exceeding great sum of Money (viz. two millions and an half) as a token of his Bounty, to be distributed amongst them; the Spahi and Sidhars, his chief Horse-men, receiving thereof ten Crowns a man, with five Alpers a day more to increase their Pay; and the Janizaries thirty Crowns a man, and one Alper a day more of ordinary pay; they of the Court, but especially the chief Officers, tasting of this bounteous Liberality also. With which to great a large all men well contented, he, in a most rich and stately Chariot, so placed as that all men might well see him, was in great Majesty carried through all the chief Streets of Constantinople, the People on every side gazing upon him, and still as he passed by them, prosecuting him with their most joyful and happy Acclamations. Some willing, that he being but young, might as another Solyman begin his Reign with the Conquest of Malta, as had the other with the Conquest of the Rhodes; and other some as heartily praying, that with glorious and victorious Conquests he might be like unto Mahomet the Great, whom he was then reported much to resemble. In to great a publick Magnificence, he, being about fifteen years old, was with all the accustomed Solemnities openly crowned, every man wishing unto him a most long and happy Reign. And albeit that no great fruit was for the present from so young and tender a Plant to be expected, yet nevertheless, by his Authority, and in his Name, many good Orders were taken for the relief of his Subjects, with most heavy Grievances generally oppressed, during the loose and careless Reign of his Father. His Grandmother also, a most proud, ambitious, and imperious Woman, and withal exceeding rich, who, with great Authority, as her Pleasure, over-ruled all in the time of the Reign of her Son Mahomet, he now removed from the State, as not fit for her to have to do therein, and so deprived her of all her former Power and Command. The Perfian Ambassador, whom his Father in his displeasure had close shut up, he set at liberty, and with him fetched the Bassa of Aleppo, to intreat of Peace with the great Shaugh of Perfia, who not long before (as was reported) had recovered the great City of Tours, and was then preparing himself for new Conquests. Which Report for the motion of Peace with the Perfian, discovered in his Subjects their divers opinions concerning himself; some condemning his Patience, as not becoming the Othoman Emperours, unto whom Fury and Rage had always made them a way unto their great and dreadful Conquests, even against the most puissant Armies, and strongest Towns and Fortresses of their Enemies; and some others to the contrary praising therein his Wisdom, in seeking by fair means (now in the beginning of his Reign) to disarm his Enemies when they might most hurt him; at his better opportunity, in his settled estate, to oppress them for ever. So the Actions of Princes are like unto strange Lights appearing by Night in the Air, which hold mens Eyes busied with the intensive beholding of them, some thereof divining well, and some others evil, according to the diversity of the beholders conceits and humours.

The Treaty for Peace also in Hungary, was notwithstanding the death of Mahomet, by the Bassa of Buda still continued, who (as he said) by the new Sultan authorized, by Letters incited the Governour of Strigoniom to repair unto some such convenient Place, as wherein the matter might be safely concluded. Upon which motion, the Governour, with the rest of the Commissioners, departing from Strigoniom, the fourth of February came to Colontie's Camp, from whence they were by the Souldiers most bravely conducted along the Banks of Danubius, unto the Ships which lay ready for them, to carry them down the River to Pesth; during which time of their Passage, nothing was to be seen or heard, but Fire and Smoke, and the thundering of the great Artillery both from Pesth and Buda, the Christians and the Turks both striving to excel each other in these their shews of Joy and Triumph. The Governour, with the rest of his Company, being happily arrived at Pesth, met there with a number of the better sort of the Turks, sent thither by the Bassa to meet him, and in his Name to greet him; who, with a thousand Honours again received and saluted them. All shews of Kindness, and signs of the happy success of the Negotiation begun. And now the Christians, desirous to excell the Turks, as well in Courtship as in Valour, appointed a number of them the next day to go to Buda, to invite certain of the chieftest and most honourable men amongst the Turks, unto a Banquet at Pesth; who willingly accepted of the offer, and so came fix hundred of the better sort of them over the Danubius to Pesth, where the feast was most sumptuously and magnificently prepared for them. There were ten fair and rich Pavilions, set up for the Entertainment of them a little distant from Pelsh, in a fair place, and fit for this purpose. In the hall whereof were placed three very proud and stately Tables. At the first of which Tables, on the right hand, were set the Commissioners for the Emperor, with the two Baffaes, and one Muffi or Arch-Priest, with a Mire upon his Head, a long furred Gown upon his Back, and under that, a Robe of most fine and exceeding rich Silk. Upon the left hand, at the same Table, were placed certain of the Turks Lords, and other great men. At the other two Tables were set other of the best fort of the Turks mingled with the Christians: and so at all the other Tables in like order were set a Christian and a Turk, until that the six hundred Turks were placed, with as many Christians among them; who, by their good Countenance and Behaviour one of them to another, might have seemed to have been all of one and the same Belief, Nation, and Country. The Turks, after the manner of their Superstition, would not sit down before the setting of the Sun; which being set, they with a thousand Ceremonies, to the imitation of their Arch-priest, set themselves down at the Tables in order, as if they had been met merely to repose themselves until nine of the Clock at night. At which time, the Tables with great reverence taken away, the Turks, as men well contented, and full of Joy, returned to Buda, the Instruments of Musick, Trumpets, and Drums, on every side sounding about them with much glee, and as it were witnessing unto Heaven and Earth the great Contentment they had received. And yet was all this fair show nothing, else but a Diffimulation mixt with most foul Treachery; for, a little before their departure, they of Pelsh were advertised, That the Turks in great number well appointed, were come out from Buda to surprise Pelsh, during the time of the Feast; being in hope, that the Christians, all busied in this Action, had left the Walls of the Town unfurnished of defence. But they, too well acquainted with their Treacheries to put any trust or confidence in their fair shews, had as well provided for the Defence and Safety of the Town, as for the Magnificence of the Feast abroad. By which means the Turks disappointed of their intended purpose, were in the attempting thereof repulsed, and so glad to return as they came, back again to Buda.

The next day after, the Commissioners for the Emperor complained unto the Baffa and the rest of the Turks Commissioners of this so treacherous dealing; who excused themselves as altogether ignorant thereof, disavowing the Action for want of Success, which had it been effected, they would to the uttermost have shamefully maintained. An ordinary course among the Great, with Speech and Countenance in shew to condemn that for want of effect, which they in Heart and Mind could far better have wished to have been performed.

Nevertheless, the Turks the next day (as if no such thing had been meant) requested the Christian Commissioners to come to Buda, as they had done to Pelsh; but they, as well by Proof as by Report, perceiving the evil meaning of the Turks, excusing themselves, returned to Strigonium, as loth any more to adventure themselves into the Power of their late Enemies, yet left they Geisberg at Pelsh, with Commission to continue the Negotiation for Peace with the Baffa of Buda, if he should find him therunto disposed, or any hope of bringing the Treaty to good effect or issue.

Mahomet the late Sultan, had a little before his Death (as is before declared) let at Liberty the County Tolan (carried away Prisoner to Constantinople after the taking of Alba-Regalia) and sent him with Letters of Credence to intreat of a Peace to be made with the Emperor; with promise to yield himself again Prisoner, if he failed to obtain the same; for whom, the French Ambassador became Pledge. He having now delivered his Letters of Credence unto the Emperor, and commanded to say what he had farther in charge, declared, That the Great Sultan offered to deliver unto his Majesty the strong Towns of Buda, Alba-Regalia, and Canisja, in exchange of Transylvania and Valachia, whereunto he laid claim, promising on his part to make a most firm and sure Peace with the Emperor for the time to come, and to give thereof such assurance as should of his reasonably be demanded. The Baffa of Buda also, amongst other the fair Remonstrances of Peace, had offered unto the Emperor's Commissioners to restore Canisja and Agria for Pelsh, Harwan, and Vacia, together with the Remission of all such Payments and Tributes as were by the Emperor due unto the Great Sultan for the Kingdom of Hungary. All which fair Shews and Offers, though much unreasonable, were nothing but windy Words, to delay the time, and subtil Baits to deceive the Christians: for the Event and Issue, which giveth life to all Actions, with a form unto them agreeable, hath by Experience taught the Christians, That all the glorious and glozing Proceedings of the Turks in this business of the Peace, so much wished and expected of the Christians, were but Nets and Snares wherewith to entangle them with the vain hope thereof, until that in the mean time might perfite their Towns with new Supplies of Men, Munition, Viduals, and whatsoever else was needful, the more easily afterward to annoy them at their Pleasure, and so to laugh at their Simplicity and light belief: For Mahomet being dead, and Achmat his Son (yet by reason of his Minority under the Tutelage of his Mother and other the great Baffaes) succeeding in his Place, the Turks aggravated the Conditions of the Peace, and propounded them so far from reason, as that any man might fear them now to have no more desire or regard of Peace, after that they had dispatched that for which they seemed before desirous thereof; inso much, that they sent a Messenger in Post from Constantinople unto the Baffa of Buda, to forbid him, upon the pain of his Head, any farther to continue the Treaty of Peace, but forthwith to renew the War. So this Peace, so much expected, and now the People generally holden for as good as concluded, suddenly vanished into Smoak, nothing remaining of that Body, composed of so many Witnes, more than a vain Expectation, now dispersed with the Wind of the Turkish Treachery. And yet during the time of this Negotiation for Peace fought for by the Turks both by open Letters and Messengers, many a solemn Bath had passed both from the Sultan Mahomet, and from the Visier Baffa, for their faithful and sincere dealing in the Treaty thereof; as, By the God of Heaven and Earth; By the Books of Moses; By the Psalms of David; and, By the Holy Evangelists; Oaths much used of Turks, and reserved for their greatest Solemnities, and strongest Assurances of their Leagues and Promises; all which, for all that, having served but as Baits and Traps to beguile the Faithful and well-meaning men, lay now neglected and unregarded: such is the faith and assurance which men have from faithless and untruthful men.

The Treaty of Peace thus broken off, it was forthwith by some bruited, That Achmat the Great Sultan, under the Conduct of the Visier Baffa, his Governour, was himself in Person, with a most a most huge Army about to come into Hungary; some others in the mean time reporting, that he was letted lo to do by reason of the Persian Wars, whereunto he was of necessity to send the greatest part of his Forces; so that he would but only send one of his great Baffaes, with the remainder of his great Army, against the Christians in Hungary; being before sworn never to return again unto Constantinople, until he had brought the Counties of Transylvania and Valachia, with the remainder of Hungary, under the Obedience of the great Sultan, together with the County of Austria, and especially the strong City of Vienna, the end of the Turkish Emperours Conquests; and that to this purpose the Grand Seignior had with great rigour in all places levied great numbers of Men upon his Subjects for the maintenance of his so great an Army. It was by others reported also, That only the Preparations for so great an Army should be made this year, the Turks being resolved to do much therewith the next year, and therefore willing to bestow much, in hope with so great and puissant an Army as they were about to raise, to make an end of the Wars in Hungary, and so to return until they had conquered all the rest of that Kingdom, in the rent religions whereof the Fortune of the Ottoman Emperours had stayed; so that all Handy-crafts men were let to work by Day and Night, not only to forge Weapons, to cast great Ordnance, and to make Powder, but to prepare all other things necessary also for so great an Exploit.

All these great Preparations were made for the service of the Visier Baffa for the War in Hungary, and of Cicada Baffa in Perfia, where he was appointed General, having before presumptuously promised, utterly to ruinate the Persian Estate, and with so great a Power even to swallow him up. And indeed, these Eastern Wars greatly troubled the Turks; News coming first concerning the Conquests of the Persian upon his Territories; and that even the late Persian King prosecuting his Victories, had taken Babylon, with all the Country thereabout; and that divers other Towns and Cities, more moved with fear than with the Faith wherewith they had bound themselves unto the Turks, now yielded themselves unto the Persian, as weary of the Turks Servitude, and desirous of their ancient Liberty. And yet for all that, the Turks (as they are wise to dissemble their Loffes, and to feign a tear into their Enemies eyes) did give out, as if they had said, That the Persian King was near unto Babylon discomfited, all his Army overthrown, and he himself taken Prisoner; so that the Turks Forces, before distracted, should now wholly joyn together, to the utter Ruine and Destruction of the Christians in Hungary. And the more to confirm this evil News, it was reported, That the Beglerbeg of Grecia had rallied a great Power to joyn with the Visier Baffa, for to the intent to leave nothing unconquered in Hungary. For the better effecting whereof, it was also said, That the Visier Baffa had caused a great number of Vessels loaded with Powder and other warlike Provision, to be brought by Water out of Egypt to Belgrade, to ruinate the Estate of the Christians. All which Reports, were by the Turks given out, to cover their own Mistake, and to terrifie their Enemies; as knowing right well, that they were depending upon Rumors, and that a false brute belied, worketh oftentimes the Effect of a thing indeed done. Howsoever it was, those lo dreadful Reports might well have served to have stirred up the Spirits of the Christians to have provided for their own Defence, and to have stood upon their Guard; for, he that faitheth to provide against the Preparations of his Enemy, well deserveth either Bondage or Death, whichsoever shall befall him, for having by his Negligence betrayed his own Ability and Power to have withstood him.

The great Report of the Turks Preparations and Forces, had now daid'd the Talk of Peace at Constantinople, and the hot fire of Ambition had quite leached the new Flowers appearing upon the overture of the late hope of the common People; some perfwading the Great Sultan, that he was able with his Power at the same time, both to subdue the Persian King, and to confound the Forces of the Christian Emperour, having so many Kingdoms within his Empire, to many Armies stored for his Service, and such store of Treasure for his Delights, promising unto him most happy and easy Success both in the time and the other Expedition, even at one and the self same time; so that he might vanquish the Persian by Cicada, Chietain of his Army in Perfia, and conquer the remainder of Hungary, with the Counties of Transylvania and Valachia, by the Visier Baffa, General of his Forces against the Christians; it being (as they said) a thing both honourable and profitable for a Prince to bestow both Men and Money, thereby to gain Men, Honour, and Empire; so that things which, with great charge might be done all at once, were more profitable than were those which with less charge were done at divers times; for that things to be done at once, yielded present profit, as being in our Power, and recompensing our Charge; the other in long time putting us to great charge, and yielding little or no profit at all. And indeed men stand in great fear of this the Turks young Emperour, being by Nature fierce, haughty, vigilant, cruel, ambitious, and proud; and who, in his Behaviour and Actions, much resembled Mahomet the second, which took from the Christians so many Kingdoms, Towns, and Cities, and amongst the rest the Imperial City of Constantinople. He like unto a young Alexander, occupieth himself in all the Exercises of War, hath Idleness, his Fathers greatest Pleasure; he causeth Arms to be made, Cannons to be cast, Ships and Gallies to be built, and taketh a Pleasure to discourse, how the same are to be employed against his Enemies; so that it is greatly to be feared, that he being but a Child in Constantinople, will prove a man grown in Christendome, in bringing the same under his Power and Obedience. He spareth no Person nor Means which may serve to further his desire. So that Strangers are to be in small Countenance at his hands, when as they see him to use such bloody Cruelty against his Noblemen and domestical Servants, of the chiefest of whom since he was Emperour, he hath already put divers to death, with one of his Baffaes also, who was the Governour of Pelsh, when as our men were in it. But as Justice and Clemency unto good Princes are the surest Bonds to keep their Subjects fast bound unto them in their Obedience, so the Cruelty and Cruelty Rage Briddles wherewith the Turkish Emperours keep their Subjects in awe and subjection unto them, and themselves in their Estate.

But leaving the Turks busie about their Preparations for the accomplishing of their young Emperours high Designs, let us return into Hungary, taking Transylvania in our way, the woful Miracles of which Country may more abhorrently think upon, and my Pen thereof to write, as this Province, sometime much renowned for the great Victories obtained against the Turks by the Inhabitants thereof, under the leading of their Prince Sigmund Bator, and others, abounding with plenty of all things, was now, not by any invasion of the Turks, but by civil Discord amongst themselves,

The miserable state of the Country of Transilvania.

An horrible famine.

An Assembly of the States of Transilvania for the appeasing of the Troubles there.

The Troubles of Transilvania severely maintained by the Nobility of the Country.

elves, and Rebellion against the Emperour, now their Sovereign, so waited and spoiled by the Souldiers on all sides, that many of the poor Inhabitants, for want of food, fell down dead, as they went in the Streets and Fields: miserable Wretches, always howling, but never repaying; always labouring, but nothing profiting; the mercerles and greedy Souldier still spoiling or devouring all. By long continuance of which daily Outrages, the Fields at length lay now untill'd, the Pastures were furred and neglected, and all things else unmanured and quite out of courfe; by means whereof, the Famine fo increased, that the poor Peasants of the Country, having eaten up for great Dainties all the Dogs and Cats, Mice and Rats, that they could get, fell to eating of dead Horses, and the loathsome Carrion of other hunger-starved Beasts. It is reported also, That one man should eat another; and that at Hermanstadt, a Woman having six Children, did eat up one of another, until they were at length all six devoured; and to the contrary, that two men did eat their own Mother; yea, Thieves and other Malefactors, hanged for their Villanies, were by the poor and miserable hungry People cut down from the Gallows, and devoured, the People generally living upon nothing but upon the Roots of Weeds, green Herbs, and the leaves of Trees. For remedy of which to extremity Miseries, it was on all Parts agreed, That a General Assembly of the States of the whole Province should be holden at Deva; wherein it was accorded, That all Hostility set apart, the Gentlemen of Transilvania, having by their Rebellion forfeited both their Lives and Lands, should be pardoned their Lives, with three fourth Parts of their Lands referred unto them, and that for ready Money they might of the Emperour redeem the fourth part also. But concerning the Nobles, who were to meet with certain of these Troubles, and already confiscated unto the Emperour, they should for remain; and that they should pay their Dimes, or tenth part of their Wine and Fruits, unto the Emperour. And farther, That there should be no farther exercise of Religion permitted unto them, but only the Romish Religion; and that the Towns of Crostadt and Clanfenburg should within the space of three Weeks, pay, the one twenty thousand Dollars, and the other eight thousand; and the Magistrates of those Towns should deliver the Keys of their Towns, with all their Power, into the hands of the Emperour's Lieutenant; and that the Gentlemen of these Towns which would not be accounted in the number of the Rebels, should, for the safety of their Persons, take Letters of Pardon for their Rebellion, of the General of the Army. This Pacification gave some little time of breathing unto this poor distressed Country, which, bared of all strength, and as it were upon the Graves brink, had now but even the last Gasp to give; and the Country People began again to give themselves unto their wonted Labours, in hope at length to reap the profit thereof; but alas, all in vain: for why, the ravening Souldiers, inured to Prey, after their wonted manner made havoc and spoil of all things, leaving nothing unto the poor Countryman, but his labour for his Pain, and time enough to bewail his manifold and remediless Miseries: the Causes whereof were the Nobility and Gentlemen themselves; who, not liking to be governed, or rather (as they took it) oppressed by the Germans, and having, not upon any desire that they had of Peace, but rather by necessity enforced, yielded unto the Pacification aforesaid, ceased not still under-hand to incite the Souldiers against enough of themselves to do mischief) and in what they might to trouble the Government of the State by the Germans, being unto them, (as they accounted of them) but Strangers. And which their doings Baffa, the Emperour's Lieutenant, well perceiving, caused three of the greatest of the Gentlemen of the Country, and whom he most suspected to be the Authors of these Troubles, to be apprehended, and fast shured up betwixt two strong Walls in an old ruinous Monastery; whither their Friends afterwards came to have visit of them, and finding them starved to death, were themselves much amazed, as were also other their Complices, as soon as they heard thereof. But leaving them to work themselves further Troubles, let us again return unto the Turks Affairs.

Now was all the hope of Peace betwixt the Christians and the Turks become desperate, the Turks making thereof no more account, seeing that according to their Desire they had provided Alba-Regalia, Agria, and Buda, of their necessary Provisions. They had in four Waggones put into Agria the Pay due unto their Christians; so that their Affairs being now in good effect, and their Courages revived, they began to scoff and jeer at our Credulity, to believe that they had had any purpose to conclude upon any thing that was not agreeing with their Profit, how far loever it were differing from their Honour or from their Faith: so that now these faithless men began again to renew their wonted Incurfions and Pillages upon the Christians, with all other kind of Hostility, and that in more cruel manner than ever before; and our Hussars on the other side well requited them with the like, being as well contented as they with these manner of doings, their whole Fortune depending upon the points of their Weapons, and ever ready to the Service of their Prince for their Pay. Now it fortuned, that fourscore of the Turks going forth to seek for Booty, chanced to meet with certain of these Christians, who finding themselves too weak to encounter with them, and bethinking themselves to flight, were certain of them taken Prisoners, and so brought unto the General; unto whom, they upon Examination confessed, That the Turks much marvelled at the Simplicity and Foolishness of the Christians, to believe that they were desirous of Peace, and not to have discovered their so manifest Intentions to the contrary, tending only to the pleasuring of themselves, and the annoying of them their Enemies, to the strengthening of themselves, and destruction of the Christians, as by Proof it appeared, so soon as their Desires were accomplished, unto the prejudice of their Enemies; and that their young Emperour was always against this Treaty of Peace, whatsoever then he had made to the contrary, constrained thereunto by the Victories and Conquests of the Persian King; all his Wishes and Desires aiming at no other mark, than as to the general Ruine of Christendom. Our Garrisons also, seeing themselves charged by the Turks, took up Arms likewise, and required them with like Outrages, as they did. They of Pappa and Vesprimium were the first which began these Broils after the Treaty of the Peace; who, having joyned their Forces together, and making head towards Alba-Regalia, met with a number of Turks driving of Sheep and Cattel thither, whom they surprised, and together with their Cattel carried them away with them Prisoners. Which good hap was seconded with the Liberty of twenty Christian Prisoners from Buda, who one night seeing their Keepers oppressed with Sleep and with Wine, cut their Throats, and so happily escaped over the River to Pesth.

Now while these Troubles, betwixt the Christians and the Turks (after the Treaty of Peace broken off) thus began again in Hungary, the Turks, beside the Rebellion in Asia, were together by the Ears in the Province of Bofna, Zelly, having by force joyned with Policy driven Zeffir Baffa (as is aforesaid) out of Bofna, and possessed himself of that Province, thought himself now secure enough within the strength of his Government, although he being by the great Sultan sent for to Constantinople, had refused to come, as knowing himself right well to hold that so great a Government much against his Will and Pleasure. But Zeffir Baffa, now supported with the Authority of the Great Sultan, and desirous to be revenged of the great dishonour and loss he had before received from Zelly, his Enemy, with a great Army suddenly entered into Bofna, and so coming unto Zelly, fearing as then no such matter, overthrew him with all his Power, and never left pursuing of him, until he had chased him quite out of the Province, and so again recovered the Government thereof. But short was the Joy the Baffa received of this so pleasing a Victory; for within few days after he dyed, comforting himself only in this, that he did not convert. Of all which things, the great Baffas of the Court understanding, and loath to lose so great a Souldier as was Zelly, (who as a man distressed, was now making shift for himself) or by using him hardly, to deter the other Asian Rebels from coming in, and yet not willing to trust him with so great a Government as was the Province of Bofna; they, to provide for all events, appointed him to be Governor of Temeswar; and Begedes Baffa (before Governor thereof) so to succeed Zeffir Baffa, the Government of Bofna, so continuing all Parties, to keep their Forces whole and intire against the Christians.

But as the Turks were troubled with their Affairs in Bofna, so the Christians were no less, but rather more buifed with theirs both in Transilvania and Hungary. The Estates of Hungary had appointed a general meeting at Poffonion, wherein the Arch-duke Matthias was to sit as President, there to consult of the means for the maintenance of this years Wars against the Turks. But as the Arch-duke was about to have entered into the City in the midst of his Souldiers, such a Fire upon the sudden arose in the City, as consumed the greatest part thereof; an evil preface of the Action then in hand, and a woful spectacle to behold, with the Terror whereof all mens Minds possessed, turned them from the magnificent entertaining of the Arch-duke, (as was before determined) to the quenching of the raging fire, as more necessary and concerning them than the other. Besides that, the Miseries then to be seen in the other parts of Hungary yet holden by the Christians, were both great and lamentable; for beside the harms therein done by the Turks, the Regiment of Colonnell Althem had made much spoil and havoc all over the Country where it lay, that the Towns and People in general so grievously complained thereof unto the Emperour, that he, moved with their just Complaints, caused the Authors of these so great Outrages to be apprehended and brought Prisoners to Vienna, where some of them were beheaded, and some others of them hanged; beside whom so condemned and executed, there were some other Captains and Lieutenants, of whom, some denying the Fact, and otherwise standing upon the justifying of that they had done, as thereunto by extreme Necessity enforced, were for their further trial sent Prisoners unto Prague, where they were committed unto Prison in the Castle, until their Causes might be heard. Among which Captains and Lieutenants, and other such great Officers, was one Gendero, Colonnell Althem's Antient, who most wickedly but a little before had slain Nudero, a Gentleman of good fort, and his Fellow-companion in Arms; for which murder he was committed Prisoner unto a very high and strong Tower within the Castle (wherein Country Paradise, who sold Cannia unto the Turks, lay sometime Prisoner) until his Trial might within a few days after be made. The horror of which criminal place, together with the guilt of Confession, so troubled and wounded the Mind of Gendero, as that all the hope now to save his Life, was by making an escape, and so to avoid the stroke of Justice. Which he happily brought to pass by the help of one of his Lacquies, who had found means to bring unto him a long Cord, where, by straining himself out at a little window (whereby it was thought almost impossible for any man to have got out) he in safety got down to the Ground, and there having two good Horses ready for him, he with his man fled again, and so escaped, his Keepers drunken over Night, being in the Morning found yet sleeping, without perceiving of any thing, whose Drunkenness and Favour toward the Prisoner had given him means to escape. The rest of the Captains and Lieutenants in Prison at Prague, were some of them beheaded, and some of them hanged, and the rest, at the Intercession of the Nobility of Austria, and other great men pardoned; yet with Condition, That they should pay the fines let upon them, and serve the Emperour in his Wars three Months of their own charge without Pay; some few of the common Souldiers, to the Terror of others, had two of the fore-fingers of their right hands cut off, and afterward nailed unto Gibbets let up by the high ways side.

In like manner also the Regiment of Colonnell Meyersberg led in Mutiny for their Pay, and came and incamped at Sneeke, about a League from Vienna; threatening to destroy the Country, and to kill the chief men therein, if they were not paid their Pay. Which rebellious Mutiny the Captains did what they might to appease; they besought them, but in vain; they intreated them, but to no purpose; they promised them pay, but prevailed not; yea, the Colonnell himself thrust himself into the midst of them, with most earnest Prayers, and his hands cast up, putting them in mind of their Duty, and laying before them the danger of most assured Death and Dishonour, if they continued further to proceed in that their Disloyalty, whereunto their head-strong Fury so disorderly led them. But they in men enraged, carried headlong with their Rage, breathing nothing but Threats and Destruction, and by no Prayers or Persuasion to be moved, presently made choice of another Chieftain, under whose conduct and leading they resolved to rife the Suburbs of Vienna, and with the spoil of them to pay themselves. Upon which Resolution they marched on, and so drew near unto the City; with which they so great and dangerous an Infoleny, the Governours of the City moved, (the suffrance whereof they accounted to be unto themselves both dishonourable and harmful) they on the other side resolved by plain force to repress them, and by just Arms to chastise them, who were not otherwise to be reclaimed. But such be the miserable Calamities of War, where violent Remedies must purge out of the body of the Common-weal the good Humours together with the bad, so to recover the health thereof; which Remedies, not but upon Necessity to be used, are so quick and violent in their working, as that they afford not leisure to discern the while and source from the sick and infected, to save the one, and to spill the other; but that they must altogether run the self-same way. For albeit that the whole Regiment was in this this mutinous Adion, and so all in like danger, yet were they not thereof all alike guilty, many of them being even against their Wills, and good liking carried away head-long, as with the violent course of an angry River.

Now the Captains of the Town, with their Troops and Companies, strengthened with some other Supply from other Places, were to set forward against these rebellious Mutineers, and to frustrate their Designs, for the greater strengthening of whom, divers of the Burgesses of the Town were enforced to enter into this Adion also: a amongst whom, there were two, accounted very honest religious men, who by all means sought to excuse themselves from going, labouring both by lively Reasons, and by the Word of God, to prove, that they neither might nor ought of Right to enter into Arms against their Christian Brethren, enforced with Extremities, for want of their due Pay, to forget their Duty, and to do that befemed them not. But what availeth it to allege either Reason or Law amongst the clattering of Arms; the noise whereof is so great, as that Reason and Law cannot there be heard. These two men seeing themselves enforced to go, and much grieved in Conscience to do that they were enjoined to do, and to help to shed the guiltless Blood of their innocent Brethren (as they accounted them) entered both of them into a most strange and woful Resolution, which was, to dye themselves, rather than to embroil their hands with the Blood of the guiltless; whereupon, one of them, having oftentimes called upon the Name of Jesus, with his own Sword thrust himself through the Body, and so died; the other, upon the like Resolution, threw himself into the River, and so perished also. Men worthy to be pitied for their Conscience sake, and to be commended for their weak and desperate Resolution. In fine, the rebellious Mutineers seeing in what Peril they were, being even now ready to be charged, and wistful considering the weakness of their Power in comparison of them that came against them, thought it best, upon the sight of so great a Tempest, to strike Sail; and so changing their former Determination, and laying down their Arms, craved Pardon of the Arch-duke, who graciously granted it them, and so took them to his Mercy; yet with Condition, that they should again return unto their Garrisons, and deliver in to his hands the Ring-leaders and chief Authors of that Mutiny, to be punished according to their Deserts, as afterwards they were: the ordinary end of such insolent and disordered Actions, which have nothing assured unto them but Death, (which all things else failing) attendeth only upon them.

The Turks in vain seek to surprise Lipa.

But while the Christians, thus divided, were at variance amongst themselves, the Turks were ready enough to take advantage of such their dangerous Difcord. And first of all, Zellaty, the old Rebel, but now Governour of Temeswar, having in his crafty Head plotted the taking of the City of Lippa by surprise, and to that purpose gathering the greatest Power that he was able to make, in the Evening set forward from Temeswar, and so travelling by Night, came to Lippa; unto the Walls whereof he planted scaling Ladders, and at the same time labourd to have forced the Gates, in hope so to have gained the Town; which was done with such a terrible Noise and Outcry as was possible by the Turks to be made, after that they were once discovered, thereby to have dismayed the Christians within the Town; who, well acquainted with such Stratagems of their Enemies, and now therewith awaked, came readily to the Walls, and there so well defended themselves and their Town, that the Turks repulsed, were glad to give over the Assault, and having lost a number of their men, with all spent to retire; upon whom, the Christians following out, slew many of them in that their disordered Retreat, little differing from plain flight, and took many more of them Prisoners; yea Zellaty, who not many hours before had thought to have surprised Lippa, was now glad himself to have recovered the Walls of Temeswar. Some of the Turks that were there taken Prisoners being examined, reported, That the Army that was to come to come into Hungary, was like to be very great, and that a part thereof was now come to Belgrade, expecting there the coming of the Tartars, who were together with them to enter into Hungary; and that by reason of the Wars with the Perfians, which devoured almost all the Soldiers in Constantinople, and yet could not be therewith satisfied, the Great Sultan had commanded, That all such as were able to bear Arms, as well in Bosnia, as in that part of Hungary which was subject unto him, and in the other Provinces thereunto adjoining, should be ready to join with his Army in Hungary, for the furthering of his Conquests there: and that the Perfian King, prosecuting the course of his Victories, had overthrown Cezila Bassa with his Army, and taken his Son Prisoner, almost slain all his Troops, and entered into Confederacy with Carracoff, chief of the Rebels in Asia, a Man of many Wars, who had slain of him a great number of valiant Men; all resolutely set down for the troubling of the Great Sultan's Estate.

About the same time, the Governour of Caloffia (a great and strong City in the upper part of Hungary) going forth, with some good part of his Garrison, to appease the Soldiers lying a part in the Country (but now up in Mutiny for their Pay) and the spending some few days about this Business, in shewing them great regard of their Involency, and persuading them, by the evil success and end of such-like Actions, to return again unto their Duties; and they again to the contrary obstinately urging the Payment of their Pay, or else to have leave to depart, as being not able longer to continue without the one or the other; and so the time passing, it fortuned that certain Turks, then Prisoners in Caloffia, encouraged by the Absence of the Governour and of the Garrison Soldiers, to attempt the gaining of their Liberty, brake their Irons, and flew their Keepers, in hope so to have escaped: but being in the doing thereof discovered, and so again surprised before they could do any further harm, and upon Torture examined, By what means they thought to have escaped out of the City, the Walls thereof being kept with continual sentinels: they confessed, That their Purpose was the same, which was to have set fire upon divers Places of the City (so to have drawn the People to the quenching thereof) and at the same time to have slain the Sentinels upon the Walls, and so to have made their Escape: for which their so mischievous a Fact and Purpose, they were some of them executed, and the rest again committed to Prison, and more strictly kept and looked unto than before.

Now as Caloffia had, by the Providence of God, escaped so great an intended Mischief, Caloffia at the same time alone felt the evil hap by the Turks intended both to Caloffia and Lippa; for a Soldier of the Garrison, in the Citadel there, having, through Negligence or Mithap, cast Fire into the Powder, provided for the flore of the Castle; the Powder taking fire, blew up the Citadel, the Towers, the Houses, and the Walls; and, to be brief, made this place like unto another Rome burnt by Nero. So that had any of the the Christian Forces been then near unto the place, it had been an easy matter to have won the same, as well for the small resistance that was therein to have been found in so great an affrontment of the Men, and Destruction of the Place. But such accidents have no certain hours limited to their Beginnings, nor assurance of their coming, so that they oftentimes chance, without any man to make use of them; and again fly away, when men make their greatest Preparations to obtain them.

The Turks of Buda overthrown by the Christians of Pesh.

At the same time, the Turks of Buda sent two hundred of the Soldiers of their Garrison to fetch in Forrage a little from Pesh, who, as they were in the doing thereof too presumptuous, so were they well punished for their Pride; for the Christians in Pesh, having discovered them in this Adion, sallied out upon them and charged them; against whom they lay for a while right valiantly defended themselves but at length, oppressed with number, and overthrown, they were most of them slain, and the rest taken Prisoners; wherewith the Bassa of Buda, was so much offended, that in Revenge thereof, he in his Rage threatened with Fire and Sword to do what harm he might unto the Christians. But, as the common Proverb hath, Men warned, are half armed; and Enemies Threats bring this Comfort with them, That in receiving so threatened a challenge, we are in hope to be revenged thereof, as therefore before provided.

Unto their woful Troubles of Hungary, proceeding as well from the Involencies of the Christian Soldiers themselves, as from the Fury of the Turks, who were their ancient and mortal Enemies, were joined the like, or rather worse Calamities in Transilvania, extreme Famine and want of all things for raging in both Countries; so hardly with any Mischief or Extremity been so often or so real of, even in Countries by the just and heavy Judgments of the Almighty God appointed to Destruction, which were not in those two Countries to be found, and of many felt. For remedy whereof, George Bassa, the Emperours Lieutenant in Transilvania, had there done what he might for the appeasing of the Tumults and Troubles of that Province, and now of late brought the same into some good terms, as was thought, and as it before declared. Howbeit, that in proof it fell out far otherwise, and that the more he therein laboured, the farther he was off from his intent and purpose; for the Nobility of that Province, who were generally inclined unto Rebellion, and desisting the Germans, together with their Government, rejected the Decrees and Orders which were agreed upon in their late meeting together for the concluding of Peace; and so much, that advised by the Turks, they had taken certain Castles and strong Places in that Province; and the better to support their Rebellion and Involency, they had appointed a certain Place to meet at, where the Turks and they might confer together of the means which they intended for the effecting of their Designs. Whereof Bassa having by secret means got understanding, to remedy this pretended Mischief, he sent away a great number of Haiducks, to lie in wait to surprise them upon the way. Which men, who were skilful in the Passages of the Country, failed not in this Action, but lay close in ambush, very conveniently for the surprising of their Enemies; who, proceeding in their intended purpose, and thinking of nothing less than of that which was intended against them, were suddenly, before they were aware, Turks and Transilvanians, altogether surprised and slain. Which Exploit being performed, these Haiducks and other Soldiers, destitute of their Pay, and enraged with 1604 The miserable estate of Transilvania.

Fury, fell upon the Province, using therein all Hostility, as if they had been mortal Enemies unto it; punishing the guiltless for the guilty, and seizing upon all mens Goods in common, to pay themselves that which was by some few in private kept from them. All the whole Province was subject unto the Rage and Fury of those and other such merciless men of War, who, without any remorse at all, indifferently flew and massacred all of them that came in their way; but especially the poor and weak innocent People, who called upon the Almighty God for Remedy, and Redress of their Evils which they sustained, and cried out unto him for Revenge of their so great and cruel Wrongs. The high ways were every where full of Thieves, that no man could travel from Place to Place, but that he was in great danger to be let upon, and spoiled. For the Haiducks (being men that live together by Prey, and roaming up and down the Country) made good Prey and Booty of whatsoever came in their way, sparing neither Turks nor Christians; insomuch, that they hearing, how that the Zeczers with a good Convey were bringing a number of Waggon laden with Victuals, and a great many of Oxen and other Cattel to Claudianople, although they were of the same Party, Belief, and Nation, yet they lay in wait for them to surprise them; against whom the Zeczers seeking to defend themselves, were by their Beeves and other Cattel, Waggon, with their Beeves and other Cattel, all carried quite away. But what should we say? Hunger breaketh even the stone Walls, and forceth men unto all Extremities; and now the Famine in that Province was such, as that the People were for the most part glad to live by feeding upon the Roots of Herbs and Weeds, and such other unwholesome things, whereof great Mortality afterward ensued amongst them; which was the cause that Forwart, Captain of these Haiducks, being reproved for the Outrages by them committed, and charged to take order, that no more such like should afterward be done; answered, That it was not possible to keep Soldiers in any order amidst the extremity of Famine; for that the Belly was an inexorable Ulcer, which took pity upon nothing, but with great Rage exacting that which it thought due for the Nourishment of itself.

Amidst these Troubles of Transilvania and Hungary, there were two of the Turks Spies of Buda discovered and taken; who at Vienna had observed all the Actions and Proceedings of the Christians, and to the utmost of their Power had informed themselves of their Designs, as also of their Preparations and Forces to be raised and levied for this years War; of which two Spies, the one was employed, and the other kept in close and straight Prison, until that further matter might be drawn out from him.

The Forces of the Christians were now beginning to gather themselves together, and to make an head in Hungary; a ripe report at that time going, That they would forthwith take the field, whereof the Bassa of Buda understanding, and desirous in what he might to hinder that their forwardness (whereof he doubted the Effects) thought it best to beate himself to his old and cunning Practice, for the treaty, and concluding of a Peace with the Christians, whereof he now made flew himself, together with the rest of the Turks, to be very desirous; so by putting the Christians in hope thereof, to make them the more remiss and negligent in their doings, and to gain time of them, until that the Turks great Army (then in preparing) might be brought down into Hungary. To which purpose, he in most friendly manner thus writ unto the Governour of Strigomium.

The Letters of the Baffa of Buda to the Governour of Strigomium.

WE know right well (Noble Governour) that you are not ignorant, how that your Brother, the Governour of Strigomium before you, hath most earnestly embraced the Negotiation of Peace, in such sort, as that we cannot so much yield unto our ordinary Quarrels and Diffention, but that we must give you to understand the Causes which have crossed and hindered the concluding of so great a good the last year now passed. The first Let came by reason of the time, chosen too late to be employed in that Treaty for Peace, when as now both the Armies were already on foot, and even in readines to joy Battel, and could not then stay by that Intreaty, nor be sent back again without frowne expose doing, as each had refused upon their proper Designs, and even chosen their Ground for Battel, and were then hardly to be turned from that whereupon they were before resolved. And albeit, that during this last Winter, the Treaty for the Peace was again begun, and that the men of War on both sides in hope thereof stood unarmed, and free from all Hostility, a most fit time to have begun and ended this Treaty of Peace, which hath been so much wished for of our Sovereign Emperor, desire of his Subjects, and requested by those of your Emperours, with whom no dread Sovereign would confirm and contrail a firm and continual Peace, yet for all that, since the departure of the Governour from Strigomium, we see three Months to have been passed without any Letters at all, or Message by word of Mouth brought unto us concerning this matter, so that we have not any thing whereby to certify our Sovereign Emperor. And forasmuch as the course of time hath brought these two contrary Armies, one unto the point of Battel, and that they are marching one to meet to encounter with the other, and so enter into the lists of Honour, we have thought good before to desire to know of you, what we are to expect concerning the Peace. We therefore request you as our very good Brother and Friend, in what we may to stay the coming of our Armies into this Kingdom, and to attend to that which may produce the conclusion of this Treaty, being on our part most ready to send both our care and desire to whatsoever shall be just and men in this Treaty and necessary for the common good; beseeching you to believe us in this business, and not to doubt of our good Will, more affected to your good, than is yours to our welfare; whereof we in good time advertise you, for that our Army which is now before Belgrade, being once arrived here, and marching in Field, we cannot possibly cause it to return without something doing, considering the great harms, which under the assistance of your Emperours, we have received from your People during the time of the Truce, which they have many ways violated. Which their evil dealing hath greatly incensed us against your men in Captivity with us, and caused our Soldiers to shew great rigour against their Slaves; we therefore attend your Answer, and the return of your Brother, to the end we may together resolve according unto Reason and Equity, of that which shall be needful to be done for the common good and welfare.

Now for all this fair glossing, it was no hard matter to guess at the Baffas secret meaning; for how desirous forever he seemed to be of Peace, and willing to the furtherance thereof, yet nevertheless, true it is, that during the time of all these fair shews, the Turks, having assembled their Garrisons on all sides, had by Night surprised the Castle of Sirmion upon the Christians, slain part of the Soldiers therein, carried away the rest Prisoners, and most cruelly afterwards burnt the place; so manifesting by their foul deeds the evil meaning of their fair and deceitful Words. But now leaving the Baffa for a while unto his crafty Devices, and passing over many small Skirmishes which happened in Hungary and Transilvania, as not becoming the Gravity of an History, let us now out of Europe look over into Asia, to know the Great Turks Affairs there in the mean time went.

The Rebellion in Asia was, by the coming over of Zezally and his Followers, for a time somewhat weakened, but not suppressed, that pestilent Humour of Disloyalty having before infected the Minds of so many, as that in short time after the Rebels were much stronger, and the Rebellion much more dangerous than before; for the appealing and repelling whereof, Cicala Baffa, the old Rengade, a man of great Experience and Service, was as General sent over with a great and mighty Army into Asia, where he needed not long to seek for his Enemies, they being as ready as he, either to give or to accept of Battel; so that for men to on both sides resolved, it was no hard matter to bring them to the Tryal of Battel; which they with like desire and equal good joyning, there made a great and terrible fight, the Baffa fighting for his Honour, and the Rebel for his Life. However, that at length the Baffa, after much bloodshed and great number on both sides slain, being put to the worse, fled with his Army altogether disordered, and in rout, having in that so dangerous a confusion of his People much ado to save himself. With which so shameful an overthrow given him by the Rebel, the Baffa, who was more ashamed than discouraged, again repaired his Army, joyning thereto great and mighty Supplies, and so strengthened, came again the second time to revenge himself of the great dishonour which he had before received, and utterly to suppress the Rebels; who, now finding themselves too weak to encounter with so great and mighty a Power, wisely betime retired, praying Aid of the Persian King, who sent unto them his own Son with a great Army of good and valiant Soldiers; which might have given the Baffa cause enough to have stayed his haste, and to have been well advised how he joynt Battel with such desperate and resolute Enemies, and now back'd with such strong Supplies; but he, being blinded with the Fury of his former loss, and too much desirous to be thereof revenged, with more haste than good speed came on, and joynt Battel with these his Enemies, now in readines and well provided to receive him. The two Armies were in number equal, but the Rebels of the more, more resolute and careful of themselves and of their welfare, as they which had reposd all their Hope and Confidence in their own Arms and Valour, so that the Battel was with great Outcries and Fury begun both on the one side and on the other; in the beginning whereof the Turks right furiously charged the Rebels, and seemed somewhat to prevail upon them, until that the Persian Kings Son with certain Troops of his most brave Horsemen charging them in the Rearward, and some other of the Rebels with like Fury assailing them upon their Flanks, their whole Army was so disordered, that Cicala doing what he could to have put his men again in order, and so to have restored the battel, nothing therein prevailed, but was glad together with the rest of his Army, now all in rout, to betake himself to flight. In this Battel were 40000 Men on the one side and the other slain, whereby thirty thousand were of the Baffas Army, and the rest of the Rebels; who by this their great Victory, gained no less Honour and Respect, than had the old Baffa got of Contempt and Disgrace. The Success of the Persian King.

Persian King also after this discomfure of the Turks, continuing his Conquests, took in the Country of Sirvan (a matter of great importance) being now destitute of all relief by the overthrow of Cicala Baffa, who, had he prevailed against the Rebels, should have marched thither against the Persian King, to have stayed the course of his Victories; who now victorious and out of all fear, made head toward Adria, a very great strong Town, near whereunto the River Tigris discharge it self into the great River Euphrates, which City he at last won, with all the Places and Countries thereunto adjoining; and hath since, as a most happy and victorious Prince, again recovered from the Turks whatsoever they had since the time of Sultan Solymán by force of Arms taken from the Persian Kings his Predecessors, two of three strong Places only excepted. Of which most notable Wars betwixt these two of the most mighty Eastern Princes, viz. the great Turk and the Persian King, I can rather with than hope to be better informed, and that, not so much for Curiosity (although that the Knowledge of such matters yield unto such as be desirous thereof much Pleasure, with no less Contentment) as for that they (though far off) in some sort much concern the good and quiet of the Christian Commonwealth, the Persians being the only means whereby the fury of the Great Turkish Sultan hath been, and yet is, for a time averted from the Christians in Europe upon the Persians in Asia; as it is greatly to be feared, that some one or other (if not more) of the Christian Princes hereafter unto him, shall to their great cost and harm feel, so soon as these two great Mahometan Princes shall be at Peace between themselves. But leave we the Baffa to guess at the issue of these overtures, and the Persian King to triumph of these Victories, and see what the Great Sultan himself in the mean time doth.

Sultan Achmat sick of the small Pox.

This young Prince Achmat, now one of the greatest Monarchs of the World, had not many Months reigned, but that he fell sick of the small Pox, wherewith, he having a grofs and full Body was so foully tormented for the space of fourteen days, that oftentimes fainting, it was generally thought he would thereof have died the year, divers of the great Baffas were in speech concerning his younger Brother to be taken out of the Seraglio to succeed him; which was thought would have cost the younger Brother his Life, after that the Sultan his elder Brother was again recovered; as no doubt it had, but that he was the only Heir that was then left of the Ottoman Family; if that his Brother the Sultan should have failed. But he again recovered, and his foul and childish Discase, to shew unto the Janizaries and others (who doubted thereof) that he was so recovered, proudly mounted upon a goodly Horse, most sumptuously furnished, and in great State and Magnificence tid up and down through most of the chief Streets of the Imperial City, the People (as their accustomed manner is) in every Place as he went rejoicing to see him, and profecting him with their most joyful Acclamations, wishing unto him a most long and happy Reign. Neither is it to be marvelled, seeing that the Almighty God hath even in the Faces and Countenances of Princes ingraven some resemblance of his own, if they become respectful and admirable in the Eyes and sight of the common People, who cannot but honour them with their Voices, whom God hath blessed with his Power, and other his extraordinary worldly Blessings.

This young Prince, so recovered of his Sickness, and having shewed himself unto his Subjects, began forthwith to give himself (according unto the heat of his youthful Spirit) immediately unto the Pleasures of the Field, and other such violent Exercises, being in their moderate use wholesome, but in their violences much hurtful, but especially upon the new recovery of his late Sickness, the Griefs whereof came in haste, but were to leave him at leisure. Whereupon two of the Baffas, careful of his Health, were so bold, as out of their Love to reprove him for such his violent and immoderate Exercises (the day not being long enough for them) and by effectual Reasons to dissuade him from the same. But so far off was he from hearkening unto their wholesome Persuasions, as that to the contrary, he therewith enraged, thrust them both out of their Places. So dangerous a thing it is, even in Zeal and Love to presume to controul great Princes in their loving them at all, but only for their own profit attending upon their idle Appetites, enjoying the Preferments due unto their more faithful and loyal Subjects, and yet secretly in themselves smiling at the Vanity of such as by whom they be so unworthily honoured and promoted.

But as in the immoderate use of all things there is a faculty which breedeth a disliking and dismore commended, thus by their novelty and seldom use) for this young Sultan Achmat, having glided himself with his Pleasures, began now to cast his Eyes upon his other more necessary Affairs of State, but especially upon his Wars both with the Christian Emperor and the Mahometan Persian King. Now he was not ignorant of the great Valour and Sufficiency of Hassan, the Vicer Baffa, for the managing of his Wars in Hungary, wherein he had of long time been exercised, and so therein best experienced. This old Captain pleased him best, whom, as an old, expert, and politic General, he resolved to continue in his charge as Lieutenant General of his Wars in Hungary, and by the continuation of him in so great and honourable a place, to bind him to all loyal Services in those Wars, even to the uttermost of his Power. This Great Baffa was then at Belgrade, upon the frontier of his Government, in doubtful suspense expecting the Resolution of his Prince concerning this business, and yet in hope, longing after a second charge; whose longed desire Achmat quickly satisfied, by sending unto him both a Commission for the continuation of his Charge and Dignity, and certain honourable Presents, in token of his extraordinary Favour towards him; which were, a Generals Ensign with a Hungarian Mace of pure Gold. Now whether these Presents, joynt unto the continuation of his Charge, were welcome unto him, or not, ambitious Minds (such as was his) can easily tell; and he, to shew his Contentment therewith, gave thereof good Testimony by the public Actions of Joy, causing all the great Ordinance of the Place in thundering way to be oftentimes discharged, and the Trumpets and Drums to be most joyfully sounded.

In the mean time, News was brought, unto the Persian King, how that the Persian King, having lost the besieging and taking of Veradunum, a strong City in the upper Hungary, not by a Messenger sent in haste, commanded the same Baffa, all other businesses let apart, with all the power that he could make, forthwith to return to Constantinople, there with him and the rest of the Bassas to consult and resolve upon the most necessary War and of the readiest means for the continuing of the same. For albeit that the Turks were most desirous to have Wars with the Christians, and so (if it were possible) to have conquered the remainders of Hungary; yet the danger of the Persian Wars and of the Rebellion in Asia daily more and more increasing, suffered them not wholly to attend unto the Wars against the Christians in Hungary, but drew them now into a doubtful Consultation, which way first to turn their Forces. But the Bassa being come to Constantinople, the said Seigneur took the pains and did him the Honour to come unto his House; whither, the Council for the State being assembled, it was there most proudly resolved upon, even forthwith at one and the self same time with equal Forces to make War both upon the Christian Emperour in Hungary, and the Persian King in Asia, accounting themselves strong enough to subdue and bring under foot, both the one and the other, no Power upon Earth being, in their proud conceit of themselves, able to encounter or to withstand theirs. So for the managing of these Wars, and of their so proud a Resolution to be performed in so remote Parts of the World, Haljan Bassa was continued in his charge, as General of the Army in Hungary; and Cicala Bassa was appointed to have the command of the Army to be sent against the Persians; two most expert Captains, being to fight against their hereditary Enemies, Haljan against the Christians, and Cicala against the Persians, by whom he had not long before been evil used. An ordinary Policy of the Ottoman Emperours, not to commit the charge of their Armies against the Christians, unto Renegades; for fear lest they, touched with some remorse of Conscience, might betray the same, or otherwise deal unfaithfully in their charge; but still to employ them against the Persians, of whom they have no further Knowledge, but as of their Enemies in the Field. But Cicala Bassa, well acquainted both with the difficulty and the danger of the Persian War, (the fears whereof he yet bare about with him) made them as if he had been unwilling to take upon him the charge thereof; and so began to excuse himself, until that at length, upon promise made unto him, for the furnishing of him with a sufficient Army, and all things else necessary for so great a War, with a large and most honourable Entertainment for himself, and all the Persian Prisoners being also given unto him in reward; he therewith contented, accepted of the honourable charge, whereof in his ambitious mind he was indeed most desirous. And so receiving the Generals Ensign, with the other Marks and Cognizances of his Honour, causing the Drums to be stricken up, and the Trumpets to be joyfully sounded, he cheerfully prepared himself for that his so great an Expedition; expecting the coming of him in Person, who the request of the Persians, was gone forth with a fleet of Gallies, to scour the Levant Seas of the Pyrats, who then exceedingly troubled the Traffick of the Venetian Merchants.

Amidst which the Turks so great Designs, the Tartar Cham, bound for his pay to leave the Great Turk in his Wars against the Christians; by his Ambassadors excused himself unto the Great Sultan, for this he could not stir him in Person come this year with his Forces into Hungary, by reason that he was otherwise necessarily busied with the most urgent Affairs of his own Estate; yet promising withdrawal, instead of himself, to send his Son with a good power of men. Now whereas many men marvel, why the Tartar Cham, being so great a Prince, and not much in danger unto the Turk (being separated from him by the black or Evrose Sea) should be still foready at the Turks call, to do him service in his wars; the Causes thereof are divers, and those not far to seek. First, Their near Affinity (as both descended from the same beginning) by often Marriages (still confirmed); then, their likeness of Manners and Condition, no small Bonds of Love and Friendship; And thirdly, For that the Turkish Empire, for want of Heirs males of the Ottoman Family, is assured, and as it were, entailed unto the Tartar Cham; but most of all, for the yearly pension and great pay which he, being a brave Prince, receiveth from the Turks; his rude and needy People being all ever ready, in hope of the spoil, to follow him into these Wars. But this his excuse for not coming himself this year into Hungary, being by the Great Sultan accepted of, Haljan Bassa, resolved upon his Expedition for Hungary, made great preparation for the good success of the War there, gave great hope thereof unto the Great Sultan, and caused himself to be proclaimed Lieutenant General of all the Great Sultans Forces against the Christians; every man affording unto these good hopes a thousand Wishes for his Health and Welfare; but especially the Mahometan Priests assured him of their help, so that he would not fail to do the utmost of his Endeavour against the Christians their Enemies. For why, the Turks do account him the best and most zealous man, who can do the Christians most harm. And so with this so great a Confidence of Joy and Honour, Haljan, the Great Bassa, set forward with his Army from Constantinople toward Hungary.

The Christian Emperour, not ignorant of all these the Turks great Preparations and haughty Designs, fought by all means how to rectify them, spurring nothing that might any way serve or stand him in stead to that purpose. Experience had assured him of the Popes readines in contributing to this Action, what in his power was; having before received so many Testimonies of his good Will. Which caused him now to dispatch all his Brother Maximilian the Arch-duke, a good and devout Prince, unto him, with express charge in the Emperours Name to yield all Submission unto his Holiness, to move him to relieve the woful Estate of his distressed Affairs. Maximilian, setting forward about this business, arrived at Venice, where he was by that State right honourably entertained. From Venice he travelling towards Rome, and with a great retinue approaching the City, was there met by a great number of Noblemen, with their Followers, sent from the Pope, and so by them with great Honour was brought into the Vaticane Palace, to the intent that he might the oftener and with more ease have access unto the Pope, who then lay there sick of the gout. The next day, he being brought into the Popes Presence, and after usual Reverence done, having audience given him, in the Presence of all the Cardinals he began to deliver unto him the Causes of his coming; which (as he said) were two; First, to put his Holiness in remembrance of the manifest peril and danger which hung over the heads of the Christians in general, from the Turk, but especially over them of Italy, being lo near unto the Turkish Empire, and a great gap laid open for the Turks thence to enter, by the way of Italy, into the Christian Country. And then in the Emperours behalf to request him to stretch forth his helping hand against this his mortal Enemy, who was now drawing all his Power together into one head, to destroy him; having certain understanding of the great Prepara-ration by him made throughout all his Dominions, to thrust him out of his, if in these Extremities he were not relieved by such Princes as could not in the end themselves avoid the last Violences of these hands, whereof he felt the first Affliction. Which his Holiness considering, in the zeal of his Devotion, and by the increasing of the danger, he was in hope to find of it the like Assistance in this his second need, that he had before received in his former Affairs; the precious balm of his devout Charity being of greater Virtue than to serve but for one time, and all times of Necessity. And that therefore he bellowed his Holiness to apply the same upon the profane Wound, feeling that without his help he was more like to perish than to live. Whereunto the Pope answered, That his former Actions already passed, spake enough for him in this Action to manifest his devout meaning; so that it was needless for him to use farther Words to express the same: that the great Supplies both of Men and Money which he had sent forth for the good of the Christian Commonwealth, were the sure Testimonies of his carefulness for the same. And albeit that these evil Hags had so far prevailed in Hungary, yet that he for his part nevertheless had still done what he might for the remedying of those so great Evils. And that now by the Advice of his honourable Counsellors there present, he had appointed an hundred and fifty thousand Crowns to be paid toward the maintenance of the Christian Army in Hungary this Year; in hope to do more than that afterward for the Emperour in his Wars against the Turks; whom God had as he said) suffered to prevail upon the Christians, not for any Goodness that was in them, but for the chastising of the Wickedness of the Christians themselves.

Which sum of an hundred and fifty thousand Crowns was afterward, according to a Decree made by the Pope and Cardinals, levied and paid of the Tenth of the Clergy throughout all Italy. And so Maximilian the Arch-duke, most magnificently entertained and feasted by the Pope, and by him rewarded with four thousand Crowns, having well dispatched the Business he came for, returned again unto the Emperour his Brother.

But as the Christian Emperour was thus careful about his Provisions for the withstanding of the Turks, they were not any whit behind him in augmenting of their Forces for the invading of him. And now the Tartars in great number being about to come unto their Aid into Hungary, being denied Passage by the Polesians, had turned head towards Valachia, with a purpose by force and strong hand to get that of these weak People which the Power of the stronger had embarrated them of. And so, presuming upon their number, they entered into the same Province, which they all over rifled and spoiled at their Pleasure. Where, of the Country-people as could escape their Fury, fled into the Towns, leaving their Goods behind them unto their necessity; Rage, nor with any thing to be satisfied. Rodolph, the Vayvod himself, as a man with Fury dimayed, fled to Cronstat to George Basta; where, he considering the danger he was now in, and that he was still to expect the like so often as the Tartars were for the Service of the Turk to come into Hungary; before Basta took a new Oath of Allegiance unto the Emperour, solemnly professing to dye and live in his Masters Nobility; now enforcing him to acknowledge his Duty, and seek for the Remedy of his Harms, which he had before oftentimes most proudly rejected. Upon which his humble Submission, Basta received him and his Country into his Protection.

The Turks surprised by the Haiducks.

The Haiducks what manner of men they be, and their outrageous insolency.

In the mean time, two Traitors were brought to Claudinople, who, having by wonderful Craft surprised a strong Cattle belonging unto a certain great Lady, a Widow, near unto a Burrough called Caraghebe, and rifled and sacked the same, traitorously afterward sold it unto the Turks, to the great hurt of the Emperours Subjects near unto the place, and to the no less advantage of the Turks. Whereof the Haiducks having gotten understanding, and cunning in such matters, upon the sudden surprised the Turks by the way, as they were coming to have taken Possession of the Place; who seeing themselves too weak to withstand their Enemies, and out of hope to save themselves by flight, were there, as men dismayed and appointed to the Slaughter, most of them by the Haiducks cut in pieces, and the rest taken Prisoners. The two Traitors being, according to their Defects, for their shameful Treachery, most cruelly put to Death, to the terror of others.

The Haiducks, having no Houses but the Fields, nor other Trade but their Arms, spoiled of the one by the Turks, and armed with the other by Necessity, are always in readines for Service. In hope of Profit, it is to them a Pleasure to pass over the Mountains of Ice, to travel through the Storms of Thunder and Lightning, to swim over the deep Rivers, and to thrust themselves into a thousand Dangers; which, as it is no commendable kind of Life, so is the practice of it unjust. For as in this, so in other their Actions, they spare neither Friend nor Foe, all that comes in their way being subject, and as it were appointed to their Fury; but especially when they want their Pay, which affords them unto them a thousand Excuses for the robbing and spoiling of all men, without respect. With which manner of fury they were even at this time enraged for want of their Pay, in such sort, as that if their right-hands spoiled the Turks, their left-hands robbed the Christians; as upon one and the self-same day they took from the Turks of Agria a number of Beasts and Cattel, and rifled divers Villages of the Christians. And not content with these Outrages, meeting with an hundred, or six score Waggons, laden with great store of Victuals, going toward Aden Julia, conducted by the Zeciors, let upon them, flew them that drove them, and carried away the Waggons with them. But these Wrongs, by Christians done unto Christians, even the mortal Enemies of the Christians, the Turks themselves revenged. For the Turks of Tensavar having been abroad toward Lippa, and found good store of Booty, meeting with these Shakers, were by them charged, not so much for that they were their Enemies, or for the Zeal of Christianity, or for the desire of Honour, as for to have been taken from them their Booty. But the Turks, being in number twice as many as they, and withal well acquainted with such Business, were not so easily spoiled; but knowing their own strength, with their Number oppressed their Enemies, most of whom they flew, and took the rest Prisoners. God being as just in his Punishments, as he is in Works powerful, punishing the Wicked by the Weapons of others as wicked, or rather worse than they.

The Turks in the mean time, whilst things thus passed, began again to fall to their old Practice, for the soliciting of a Peace; but such Fantasies were too false and common for them any more to deceive the Christians with: howbeit that they yet gave some ear thereunto, to discover in their Policy the Commodities and Inconveniences of the Peace by them in flow offered, with a thousand Protections in their Words, but far differing from their Thoughts and Deeds; who, during the time of the Parle, laboured in what they might to

The Turks in their Hearts meaning War, make them as if they were desirous of Peace.

1604 to benefit themselves, and to hurt us. For even in that same year the fortified their Towns and Castles with Men and Victuals, but especially the City of Buda, whereinto, by a Convoy of three thousand Turks come from Belgrade, they put an exceeding quantity of all sorts of necessary Provision, sufficient to serve the same for a whole Year. Besides that, it was certainly known, by certain Turks taken Prisoners and brought to Peſth, that this same Parle and Treaty of Peace was but of purpose feigned to put the Christians in security; for that the Baſſa of Buda, who was the chief Publisher of the same, had no such Commission from the Great Sultan for the concluding of any Peace in the Absence of the Visier Balka, unto whom the Grand Signior had given Charge, not to make any Peace with the Emperor, but upon Condition, That he should first deliver unto him the City of Strigomium: which if he would not yield, that then he should besiege it, and by force take it from them; and after the winning thereof, to refuse all other Treaty of Peace, it being the only Cause for which the Turks desired Peace. Of all which their double dealing and crafty Designs the Emperor understanding, and wholly resolved for War, presently sent Count Sultra with Commission to Vienna, and appointed George Balſa Lieutenant-General of his Army in Hungary; advising them carefully to look to their Charge, and not too much to trust unto the glowing and flattering Speeches of the Turks.

The Haiducks in the mean time always in Arms, as having no other Inheritance whereon to live, ceased not still to look abroad to find that was never lost. Now it returned them, in roaming abroad toward Belgrade, to light upon Reovin, a strong and fair Castle of the Turks, wherein eight hundred of the Turks Souldiers, and other of their Country people, had their Abode, together with the greater part of their Substance. In the Strength of which Castle the Turks trusting, and there lying in Security, without farther care of their Safety, were upon the sudden, before they were aware, by these adventurous men surprised; who for haste thrusting one another forward, at length carried the Place, flew the greatest part of the Turks, and taking the rest Prisoners, with a great and rich Booty returned to Lippa. The like Exploit they of the Garrison of Lippa attempted upon the Castle and Burrough of Lamberg, which they took and spoiled, and afterwards for it on fire; the Flame whereof served for a Signal unto the Troops of County Serin, which, piling that way, and lighting upon the Turks over-loaded with the Spoils they had there taken, cut them in pieces, and so recovered from them the Booty.

About this time, certain of the Garrison Souldiers of Perinia, having secretly conspired with the Turks (by whom they were before corrupted) to deliver unto them that strong Castle, and being about to have betrayed the same, by a Mine which they were in making under a Stable near unto a Store-house wherein the Powder for the Store of the Castle lay, with a purpose by firing of the same to have given the Turks entrance by the Ruines thereof, who lay close hidden in a Wood near unto the Place; it furnished this wicked Purpose to be prevented by certain Offenders then kept Prisoners in the same Stable near unto the Mine: who having discovered the Traitors whole Purpose, and in fear to be burned or blown up by the fury of the Mine so near unto them, discovered the same unto the Goaler, who made the Governour therewith acquainted; by whose Commandment they were forthwith apprehended; and being convicted of their foul a Treason, were with exemplary Punishment executed.

Now as the Turks had oftentimes made them as if they had been desirous of Peace, so ceased they not yet with great earnestness to solicit the same; so that the Emperor, although he knew it to be a thing rather to be wished than hoped for, yet, left he should seem careless of the common Quiet of his Subjects and People, and to refuse to grant a good oftentimes offered him; now once again appointed certain Personages of great Place and Authority to attend the Propositions of Peace to be on the Turks behalf proposed. Of which Commissioners, Cesar Gallen, Sheriff of Strigomium, an Italian, and a Man of great experience in matters of State, was one. When the Governour of Strigomium had of purpose sent to Peſth, to consider of some good means for the concluding of the Peace, whereof he himself in Person had laid the first Foundation; and understood the Turks Demands and Pretensions, not much differing from those which they had many times before demanded. Whereof the first was, That the Emperor should for the time to come, well and truly pay unto the Great Sultan and his Successors, all such Tribute as he was wont to pay unto the Turkish Emperours, his Predecessors, during the time of his Leagues with them, and that without any Demand to be thereof made. The second, That the Emperor should always have his Ambassador Lier at the Great Sultan's Court, with honourable Presents, there to solicit the Continuation of his Love and Friendship toward the Emperor's self. The third, That the Emperor should deliver unto the Turks all the Towns and Castles which he had taken from them either by Force or by Surprise, during the time of this War, together with the Countries of Transylvania and Valachia. Upon which Demands granted, they promised to send a Messenger unto the Great Sultan, in their Names to entreat him to surrender Caniſa unto the Emperor, but not Agria, which (as they said) they might in no wise deliver, except they were thereunto by force of Arms constrained.

Unto which their so proud and unreasonable Demands, the Commissioners for the Emperor answered, That the Emperor long before this time had made Peace with Sultan Seym, the Second of that Name, and with Sultan Anwarat the Third, this Sultan Achmat's Predecessors: An assured Peace, sworn unto and confirmed by all the same man desired; and for the more assurance thereof, into writing conceived, and with the most authentic Seals of their Majesties confirmed whereby both Parties were most severely and frantically forbidden, one of them to attempt any thing against the other, or to incoach the one of them upon the other, during the time of such their League: And if so be that contrary to the Temor thereof, either party should undertake to surprise any Place belonging to the other, and so become Masters thereof, that upon the Request of the Party so wronged, the Places surprised should be again forthwith restored, as usurped upon, contrary to the Publick Faith; and the Usurpers to be severely for the same punished. And that yet the Turks notwithstanding, thrusting by heaps, beyond the Bars of this so strong and holy a League, had violated and broken the same, by surprising the number of Places both in the higher and lower Countries of Hungary, never giving ear unto any Speech or Request that could be made unto them for the Restitution thereof. And yet not so contented, had also taken a number of Places from the Emperor in Scavonia, between the Rivers of Culpe and Unna; which Places he had oftentimes as just Right re-demanded, as they were by unjust unjust Forces usurped, before the beginning of these Wars. Demands esteemed just and reasonable even by the Turks themselves, and yet for all that altogether rejected by the Great Sultans themselves; of which their so great Injustice the Emperor had oftentimes most justly complained, and so did even at this day, at the feeling of such his Hurts and Harms. And that the Emperor having by so many perfidious dealings made proof of the Untrustfulness of the Grand Signior's Predecessors, what Assurance then can be conceive of his Fidelity: or upon what foundation of Faith can he build the sure building of Peace, so much desired of him? And yet if he might hope so much of the Faith of another Man, as he is assured of his own just meaning, which he knew to be never answerable unto his, that he for his part could be well content to embrace the Peace; provided always, That he might have Caniſa and Agria delivered unto him; or, That if they would needs still hold those Places, that he might likewise in Peace hold the Places that he had before won in that War, the Reasons being on both sides alike. And that as concerning Transylvania, he could not deliver that without betraying of his own Right, and the Welfare of that Province; having obtained the same as well by Agreements and Covenants between him and the Son of the late Duke, Johs, as by the free and voluntary Recommendation which Sigismund Bathor, the late and immediate Prince thereof, had not long before made unto him: for the defence of which his Rights, he had spent many Men, and great Sums of Money, and all for the keeping of that Province by force of Arms, which by so good Right belonged unto him. And that for Valachia, he could be content to yield some part of his Right unto that Province, so that the Turks should cease from thenceforth to demand of him any yearly Tribute, or that he should, as of ordinary Duty, send his Ambassadors with yearly Presents to the Grand Signior, not being able, without need, to content unto such a needless Servitude; seeing that every Prince ought to be at liberty, as his own choice to send his Ambassadors, and not at the appointment of another Man.

Which Answer of the Emperor's Commissioners, served to no other purpose, but for the Turks to laugh and sport at, how just and reasonable however they were: Still pressing them to yield unto their unreasonable Demands; or else threatening to advertise the Great Sultan thereof, who by force would take that from them, to their farther loss, which they refused to grant him by fair means, to their own good. And so the Treaty was for that time broken off, without any thing concluded: which caused the Governour of Strigomium to retire himself back again unto his Charge; yet for all that, leaving Cesar Gallen behind him, to entertain it in such small hope as was thereof yet left; who afterwards seeing it almost desperate, making a great Feint unto certain of the chief of the Turks of Buda, and having in that Merriment drawn from them a Promise to live as Friends with them of the Garrison of Peſth, and of other Places which lay near unto that Town, he retired himself afterwards unto Strigomium also.

Shortly after whose Departure, Jagenreuter, Governour of Peſth, notwithstanding the late Promises of the Turks of Buda, for their living by him in Peace and Amity; and the assured Promise of Cesar Gallen, at his late Departure, for the speedy furnishing of the Town both with Men and all things else necessary for the Defence thereof, which he ought with great Assurance to have expected, yet, dismayed with the brute of the coming of

The shameful Covardice of Jagenreuter, Governour of Peſth.

Hassan Balſa, the Turks General, with his great Army, and that by the strict Commandment of the great Sultan, he was to begin his Conquests in Hungary with the winning of Peſth; as a Man afraid of his own shadow, thought good better to provide for himself; and upon that Resolution, having yet seen no Enemy at all to force him, trusting on his Baggage, the fifth of September took the Town, with five Companies of Footmen, and six Troops of Horse-men, following him; a sufficient number to have for a time defended the Town, and endured a Siege, especially in so strong a Place, and so well provided both of Victuals and Munition. All which, this most cowardly Governour (but unworthy that Name) left together with his Honour, for a Prey unto his Enemies; having yet before his Departure out of the Town, caused the principal Buildings thereof to be undermined, and Barrels of Gun-powder to be laid under them, wherewith they were shortly after all overthrown, and most part of the Town burnt. But being gone not past half a League from the Place, he met with four hundred Haiducks, all well armed, whom the Governour of Strigomium had sent for the relief of Peſth, with a number of Boats loaded with Corn, Munition, and other Necessaries, all of sorts, for the better assistance of the Place, and the performing of the Promise before to that end made by the Governour of Strigomium: which Hungarian Haiducks meeting with these dismayed Cowards upon the way, thought it not best to go any farther, as thinking themselves not able to do that with their so small a number, which the other durst not to undertake with their far greater; and so joining themselves with the other fearful Fugitives, they with them resumed to Strigomium, leaving their Vessels and Munitions unto their Enemies, who immediately after seized upon them.

The next day after, the Mines having taken their effect, the Turks wondering to see so great and terrible a Fire in Peſth, which still more and more increased, there being none that went about to quench it, adventured to come over the River from Buda, and to draw near unto the Town, now all on a light fire. Which they finding abandoned and forsaken by the Christians, they with great diligence quenched, repaired the Ruines of the Town, and so without any loss became Masters of the same.

Jagenreuter, the cowardly late Governour, with his fearful Troops, in the mean time coming to Strigomium, and by the Governour there examined of the Causes of his Flight, and of the so shameful leaving of his Charge, and being able to alledge no other Cause, Reason, but the great brute and report of the Visier Balka's coming with his Army to besiege the Town, was therefore committed to Prison, and there referred to be afterwards justly punished for his Disloyalty and Cowardice.

The Baſſa of Buda, by the Cowardice of the Governour, thus possessed of Peſth, by Letters executed himself unto the Governour of Strigomium, for the taking thereof, the Treaty of Peace being as yet quite broken off; alledging for himself (as the truth was) That he had taken it as a Place by the Christians upon a vain fear, forsaken, and desperately set on fire, without any such cause given them to do by the Turks, or on his behalf. And farther, offered unto the Governour, if he so pleased, to deal with him for the exchange of Prisoners on both sides taken, offering to exchange one of them for another. And as for the concluding of the Peace so oftentimes treated of, and even yet in hand, that he for his part was wonderful desirous that it might be fully concluded and ended millioners, to hear what they would say. Howbeit, the Commissioners on both sides being met at the Place aforesaid, all their Conference was but vain and to no purpose; the Turks still urging the yielding up of Strigoniun, and the Imperials as earnestly refusing the same. So that the Treaty for Peace being broken off, and the Commissioners departing, the Siege was more cruelly by the Turks continued than before.

Now there were in the Turks Army lying at the Siege, certain Companies of Coffacks, Men for their Pay indifferent to any Prince, of what Religion soever. Which ferocious Men, in Number seven hundred, had agreed together the 28th of September, by night to forsake the Turks Camp, and to come unto the Christians. Of which their Purpose and Design, the Visier Bassa having, by some untutty amongst them, got knowledge, caused the Foot-men of these Companies to be apprehended and slain; the Horse-men in the mean time making themselves way over the Belles, such as would have flayed them, fled and escaped, some of them to Konara, and some to Dobu. Threefold of these Coffacks being by the Turks hardly pursued, adventured to swim over Dambina, and so all naked came to Colonia, by whom they were courteously entertained and apparelled. And within three days after, two hundred Horse-men more of the same Coffacks came unto Colonia also; who, marching in good order unto the head of the Christian Camp, were there sworn untruly, there discharged their Pistols thrice. Which Horse-men Colonia divided among the rest of his Troops, as having before time had good experience of the Courage and good Service of divers such others of their Fellows.

By these fugitive Souldiers it was understood, that the Janizaries, in great number up in Mutiny against the Visier Bassa, would have forced him to leave raised the Siege, and so to have departed. The cause of their so great Discontentment (as they pretended) was the manifest and assured danger of their Lives, with little or no hope at all for the gaining of the Place; they themselves being still expoled to the Dangers both of the Siege and of the Field, having the besieged on head of them armed with an assured Resolution, and the Christian Army at their Backs, of known Valour and Experience. Besides that, the Black-bell was (as they said) impregnable, being at all times to be relieved, by reason that it commanded over the Dunby, which might always relieve it both with Men and Victuals; and that therefore, after that they had satisfied their Honour, by giving of an Assault or two unto the Fort of St. Thomas, they had resolved to arise, and to be gone. And much about this time, viz. the Nine and twentieth of September, in the night time, was a most dreadful fiery Inundation seen in fashion much like a Rain-bow, of a fiery red colour; which beginning over Cockera, and rising higher over Strigoniun, at length vanished away over the Fort of St. Thomas. The sight whereof most troubled the Beholders thereof, as well the Christians as the Turks; such strange Meteors and Apparitions being oftentimes the Prefaces of the ruine of them to whom they appear.

In the mean time, whilst the Turks thus lay before Strigoniun, the Siege of Saint Thomas's Fort, the Lord Bajaz, Lieutenant-General of the Emperor's Forces, to give the Turks to understand, How that he was always in readiness to attend upon their doings, and to take hold of all such Opportunities as should by them be offered, and so to keep them in Impulse, came with seven thousand brave Horse-men, and shewed himself in the plain Field in order of Battel; so, as it were, braving the Turks even unto their own Trenches; where, having discharged their Pistols thrice, they returned as victorious, always keeping themselves in order, as men ready either to give or to accept of Battel. Howbeit, the Turks for the present keeping themselves clove within their Trenches, moved not; but afterwards, being desirous to counter-brave this the Christians Presumption, the third day of October they came forth of their Trenches, and gave a second Assault unto St. Thomas Fort, employing the utmost of their Power in this Action, whereupon they well knew a great part both of their Honour and of their Safety to depend. But in affailing the Fort, they met with them as resolutely set down for the Defence thereof, and for the Maintenance of their Honour, as were they for the winning of the same. So the Assault was begun with great Fury and Adventure, as was the other before; howbeit, that it endured not long, for that the Turks fought rather for the discharge of their Duty, and to have home just cause, to raise their Siege, than for any hope they had to prevail, or to carry the Place. For it befell them according as they had expected, so that after that the Fight had endured little more than half an hour, amidst the Tempests of Arms and Fury, in fine, the Turks, out of hope to prevail, gave over the Siege, and retired, having in that Conflict lost five hundred of their best Souldiers.

The Governor of Strigoniun had in the City under his charge fix thousand Haiducks, who, attainted with Treason and Fear, all forsook the Place excepting five hundred, preferring their Lives, unworthy the saving, before their Duty, and the Life and Honour of their General. With which shameful Treason, and the Resolution of the Great Bajaz for forcing of the Place, the Germanians left, feeling themselves disinclined, gathered themselves together, promising to their own Valour to supply what wanted by reason of the Treachery of the others; offering themselves to be sworn again unto the Service of the Emperor, and rather to dye all in the Place, than to yield it up unto the Turks, or to leave it unto their Enemies: where, by their general Consent, a solemn Decree was made, That whatsoever he were which should speak or once mention of yielding in the Town, should forthwith therefore be hanged upon a Gibbet. The Turks, although they had now in two Assaults been twice repulsed, came yet forth once again the fifth day of October, and assaulted Saint Thomas Fort the third time; wherein, they failed not to do what they might, but were by the Christians therein so received, that despairing of the winning thereof, they with great Loss and Shame retired. Which Disgrace caused them to return to their old Practices, for the taking of Places by Policy. For having in many Places undermined the Walls, and filled them with Gun-powder, they were in hope by that means to have opened themselves away unto their Conquest. Of which their hope, for all that, they were deceived; for the Christians, having perceived their meaning, did, by countermineing, not only frustrate their Endeavour, but carried away the Powder also, which they had before layd in the Mines, referring it to their own farther necessity and use. Wherefore the Turks seeing themselves of their hope deceived, returned again unto their old Practices, to come to a Parle for Peace. Of which their Motion the Christians notwithstanding disliked. But the Commissioners on both sides being met together for that purpose, in a little field beneath Strigoniun, when as the Turks had offered unto the Christians the City of Agria for Strigoniun; or if so be that that exchange pleased them not, but that they would needs keep the City of Strigoniun still, that then in consideration of the Peace, they should deliver unto them the strong Towns of Felack, Saint Sepherin, Pallank, and Novigrade; both of which demands were very unreasonable; the Commissioners thereupon again departed without concluding of any thing.

Now the Army of the Turks was in it self diversely divided with quite contrary desires, the Visier Bassa, with some other of the Commanders, stood stiffly for the taking of the place, as men willing either to return from thence with Victory, or else there to end their days; but the Janizaries to the contrary, were as earnest to be gone, and to raise the Siege, deeming it impossible as then to prevail against a place so strong, so well manned, and so easily to be still relieved. With which their Resolution to contrary unto his, the Bassa enraged, and yet propoling before his departure to prove the utmost of his Forces against the Fort, now already by him thrice before assaulted, the tenth of October gave thereunto fix great assaults, but with little success as before, finding there still the same Defendants, no whit discouraged, but armed with their accustomed Resolution. For the Defendants, encouraged by their most valiant Commanders, with such fury repulsed the Turks, that they were glad to give over assault upon assault, and with great loss of their men to retire. Their often retreats also being unto them no less hurtful than were their assaults, the deadly Bullets being out of the Fort discharged upon them like showers of hail. So that the Bassa now, after so many assaults, out of all hope to gain the Fort, and still pressed by the Janizaries for the raising of the Siege, immediately after rose with his Army, quitted his Trenches, and retired with his Camp near unto a Castle about a League distant from Strigoniun. From whence the Turks, the better to cover their dishonour, and to hinder the Christians from pursuing of them in their retreat, the next day after came into the Field with a good part of his Army, and shewed themselves before the Raskian Town, and there skirmished with the Christian Haiducks. Which manner of skirmishing for all that, was more in show than in effect, neither Party therein receiving any great loss or hurt. In the mean time, the besieged which were in Strigoniun, having gotten certain knowledge, that the Enemy had already removed his Cannon and other Provision for the Siege back again into Buda, in token of Joy discharged all their great Ordnance out of the City and the Fort; by the report thereof giving Knowledge unto the other Towns and Castles of the Christians, of their deliverance. Of which so common a Joy every one of them were Partakers, as delivered from some part of the fear which the Siege of so great a City as was Strigoniun, had brought upon them. And so the Siege of Strigoniun, begun the eighteenth day of September, was by the Turks given over the thirteenth of October; the Janizaries insolently threatening to have slain the great Bassa their General, if he had there any longer stayed.

Bajaz, the Emperor's Lieutenant, in the mean time awaiting all Opportunities, failed not to take hold of so fit an Occasion, but with his Horsemen following after the Turks Army, slew of them a great number, and took some other of them Prisoners. And afterward returning unto their Camp, certain pieces of great Ordnance, which the Turks had left there, having not time to remove the same to Buda. Upon this rising of the Turks Army, the Commanders thereof were diversely affected unto the service that was further to be done, as they had before been in the time of the Siege. Such of them as lay in Hungary, or near therunto, desiring still to hold the field, in hope of the spoil of the Country; but they which dwelt farther off, especially such as were come out of Asia, desiring as much to be discharged, their Horses being almost all dead with faintness and travel, and they themselves weary of the service.

Shortly after the rising of the Turks Army from Strigoniun, two Fugitives of the Turks, most bravely mounted, came unto Bajaz, the Emperor's Lieutenant, and presenting to him with a Ring of great value, and a most fair Turkish Kutug, told him, most part of the Turks Army to lyve then incamped in the Country near unto Pesth, and the great Cham, a young Prince of about twenty years old, to be come thither with a great Power of Tartars, to aid the Bassa; and that the Turks, by their coming encouraged, were determined yet to make a great attempt for the spoiling of the Country. All which shortly after was certainly known to be true, the plain Country of the upper Hungary about Pallanka, Satfabin, and the Villicamp, being by them, but especially by these new come Tartars, all spoiled and burnt. For remedy whereof, Sigefride Colman opposing himself insolent Foragers, daunted them, that ceasing further to spoil the Country, they departed, carrying away with them such few Prisoners and Spoil as they had there taken, and leaving behind them a strong Garrison of three thousand good Souldiers, for the repairing and keeping of Pesth, but a little before cowardly (as we said) forsaken by the Christians. But within some few days after, viz. the tenth and twentieth of October, the Visier Bassa, with his Letters written unto Count Althem, Governor of Strigoniun, desired a mention for a Treaty of Peace to be had for the settling of the distressed People of that spoiled Country, solemnly protesting, most religiously on his part to keep the same, if it should be once concluded; and yet in the mean time with Fire and Sword spoiling all the Country by the way as he departed out of Hungary.

Now, as this poor Country began to feel Relief by the departure of the great Bassa with his Army out thereof, so the Country of Transylvania joyning therewith, was at the same time more troubled with Rebellion and Discord distracted. Belshin Habor the Rebel, with his Bassa overthrowing and driven out of Transylvania (as is aforesaid) the Lord Bajaz, Bajaz's Lieutenant in this Province, thinking all things now at quiet, was making himself ready with his Troops, to have gone to aid the Plains of Strigoniun, to hinder the Turks Designs for the taking of this Town. But as he was about to have done, behold, even at the same time when he least feared, a second Rebel there started up, far worse than the first, namely, the Lord Ishwan, (otherwise surnamed Bajaz, or more truly Bajaz) who, accompanied with great Troops of Men of War under the Protection of the Prince of Transylvania, entered that Province, miserably burnt and spoiled the same. For the repressing of which so sudden a Rebellion, Bajaz with a thousand Horse, under the leading of Rokowitz and Peter Laffa, marched toward Veradin, and with his Troop coming to Ador, a Country Village about a League distant from Veradin, and meaning thither to assemble to gather his Army, he sent to Pesth Governor of Veradin, to put him in mind of his Duty, and to crave his Aid. Which valiant Captain, always preft and ready to do his Prince Service, failed not now of his Duty, calling together six Companies of Footmen out of Romolia, and joining unto them four Companies out of Veradin, together with the Silifian Horse-men of Schuet-Kenur's Regiment (whom by reason of his Sickness he was not able to lead) and with them the Haiducks of County Tambier, came unto the Place of the Rendezvous, bringing with him all warlike Provision in token of his Fidelity. With this Army Belgiosa marched against the Rebels, who, as resolute men, attended his coming; for why, Batfay knowing the Haiducks of County Tambier lecherly to favour him and his Rebellion more than they did Belgiosa and his just Quarrels, stood in no fear of them, but affured himself of them as of his Friends; who failed not of his hope and expectation, but even at the first joining of the Battel turned themselves to his part; with the going over of whom, the number of the Rebels was much increased, and Belgiosa's Power both in Force and Courage much weakened, seeing themselves at once exposed both unto the force of their Enemies, and to the Treachery of their Fellows, who now with conjoynt Forces most fiercely assailed them; who finding themselves now on all sides invironed with so great a multitude, and not able, with so small a number as was left, to withstand the violence of their Enemies, and the Treason of their Companions; after they had to the utmost of their Power performed all the parts of valiant and courageous men, were there almost all cut in pieces, and there buried in the Field of their Loyalty, honoured with their own Blood, and altogether embred with the Blood of their Enemies. In this unlucky and difloyal Fight were divers good and faithful Captains slain; Peffe, Governour of Veradin, and Pallas Lippe, both great Captains, and grievously wounded, were taken Prisoners. The Lieutenant of Peffe also, having retired himself with some of his Troops into a place of good Strength, there so valiantly defended themselves, that Batfay, out of hope to overcome them by force, to get them into his Power, promised them by his Oath, if they would yield themselves, to suffer them in safety to depart. But what Trust or Credit is to be given to him who hath before broken his Faith and Loyalty to his Prince, this Rebel well shewed, by the Death of these valiant and warlike men, who, after that they had upon his Faith and Promise yielded themselves, were by his appointment cruelly slain and cut in pieces. The Silifian Horsemen were there also all overthrown, and buried in the midst of their Enemies; and as for Belgiosa himself, he strangely elaped out of the Battel, and saved himself by flying to Veradin. The victorious Rebel after the Battel, instead of praising God, sacrificed to the Devil, by sending a great part of the Ensigns by him gained unto the Vifler Bassa, with a thousand Praises of his Glory, for supporting of him in his Rebellion; and vaunting much of this his Victory, gave him withal to understand, that he had slain above six thousand of his Enemies.

Batfay dratches unsafely with such as his faith given them yielded unto him.

Batfay in his Rebellion counteracted by the Great Sultan, and killed by the Prince of Transilvania.

This Victory gotten, together with the humble Submission of Batfay, obtained of the Great Sultan. That from thenceforth he should be styled by the Name of the Prince of Transilvania, with a farther Charge from him, to do the utmost of his endeavour for the subduing unto his Obedience the rest of Transilvania; promising, plentifully to supply his Wants both with Men and Money, and out of hand to send him three thousand Tartars to his Aid. And indeed, this was a very great and bloody Battel, fought from the first break of the Day, until eleven a clock at Noon; but, whether to many were slain there or no, it cannot certainly be told, for that divers of them who were said to be slain, and so accounted among the dead, had hid themselves in the Wood there by, and some others of them by some other means escaped Death also. Peffe himself had with him when he was taken, two Monks, whom the Soldiers in delight cut into many pieces, and carried him fast bound in Chains to Derrissa, to be there cured of the dangerous Wounds by him in the Battel received.

But as for Pallas Lippe, who, being wounded, was taken Prisoner with Peffe, he was afterwards by Batfay appointed his Lieutenant General, and so by his Commandment was publicly proclaimed; as he which was desirous to take upon him the defence of the reformed Religion, and of such as were willing to profess the same; who forthwith made a general Proclamation, That all they which were deficiant of the liberty of Conscience, and to live free from the Superstitions of the Roman Church, should repair unto him, as unto their Head and Chiefest, ready to entertain them, and to allow to every one of them five Dollars a Month for their Pay. Upon which Proclamation made, a great Multitude of Men upon the sudden resorted unto him; so that in a short time he had following of him ten thousand Haiducks, beside a number of other of the common rascal People; yea, almost all the Gentlemen of the Country repairing unto him, bound themselves by oath to him, and one of them to another, That as they would not take up Arms to fight against the Christian Emperor, so they would not submit themselves unto the Turk, but only stand upon the defence of their Religion, and the liberty of Conscience.

The Rebel Batfay thus wonderfully increased in Strength and Number, beset almost all the Passages of the Country, and with the Sword of Rebellion in his hand, and his Soldiers following him, commanded the Cities still as he went to yield unto him: but, hearing that Belgiosa was after the late Overthrow gone from Veradin to Caffovia, where his Wife lay; and being come thither, to have been by the Citizens rejected, who would not only not receive him into their City, but turned his Wife also out of the City unto him; he with a great Army coming thither, took the City without resistance, the Citizens for the most part ending unto him, of which City being possessed, he forthwith changed both the Religion and Civil Government thereof, flew part of such as were of the Romish Religion, and thrust the rest out of the City, with all the Church-men; took the Bishop and the Emperor's Treasurer Prisoners, and so changed the whole Government of the Town up-side down. The only man he stood in fear of, was Belgiosa, for whom he laid wait by all means he could to have taken him, with a purpose to have shed him most hardly if he had fallen into his hands.

These things thus done in Transilvania and in Hungary, the Vifler Bassa being about to return to Constantinople, to grace that little which he had done this Year in Hungary, and to avoid the suspicion of his evil Success in that Province, borrowed of Batfay the rest of the Ensigns, together with Peffe and other the noble Christian Captives which he had taken in the late Battel with Belgiosa; which Ensigns and Prisoners he confidently afterwards caused to be presented unto the Great Sultan Achmat, as taken by himself; and in recompence thereof, left three thousand Turks and Tartars with the Rebel, to aid him in his Wars both in Transilvania and Hungary.

An impudent fruit of the Victory for the favouring of his Credit with the Great Sultan.

Bassa,

1604
Batfay goeth with his Army against the Rebels in the upper Hungary.

Belgiosa in the Castle of Zips, besieged by the Rebels.

The Priests and Jesuits for fear of the Haiducks fly from Presburg to Vienne.

Batfay, the Emperor's Lieutenant in Hungary, and Governour of Transilvania, hearing of the Stir and Troubles of late raised in both those Countries by Batfay and his rebellious Followers, and having as he thought left for all things in order again at Strigonia, marched thence with his Army, being fourteen thousand strong, towards Caffovia, with a purpose to have suppressed the Rebellion in the upper Hungary, before it should have spread farther, to the endangering of the whole State of both those Countries, as afterward it did. However, before he could come thither, the Rebels, after the taking of Caffovia, being wonderfully increased both in Strength and Number, had taken in most of the strong Towns and Places in the upper Hungary, the People almost generally now favouring their Quarrel, carrying with it the Face of Religion, with the suppressing of the German Government, both things unto them much pleasing. And now hearing that Belgiosa (a man of them most hated, being, as we said, shut out of Caffovia) was fled into the Castle of Zips, they by Letters required of Turk, Captain of the Castle, to have him delivered unto them, to be according to his Deserts punished; promising withal, to do Turk himself no harm, so that he would take part with them in the defence of their Religion, and of the liberty of Conscience; which if he should refuse to do, yet that they would give him free liberty to depart whither he would, out of his Castle, and in safety to conduct him thither, so that he would forthwith solve what course he would take; but if he should of this Commandment like also, then they threatened to spoil his Country, to kill his People, to raze his Castle, and to make himself an Example unto others. Where-with, for all that, he nothing moved, refused to deliver unto them Belgiosa, the Man whom they so often defired, or yet to accept of any of their other Offers. Whereupon the Rebels with great labour repairing the broken way betwixt Caffovia and the Castle, and bringing certain Pieces of great Ordnance from Caffovia, in great number came and frantically besieged the Castle. With whole Attempts the valiant Captain nothing moved, with his thundering Shot out of the Castle so welcomed them, that having thereby received great harm, they thought it not their best course to stay any longer there with so great a Power, but with the greatest part thereof to go to Presburg, to reform that City and some other Places by the way, persuading themselves, that the Captain of this Castle to that up, and on every side betwixt his Enemies, would at length of himself yield up the Castle.

But while the Rebels thus lay at the Siege of this Castle, certain Companies of them went to have taken the Spoil of a Religious House there by; but coming thither, and breaking open the Doors, and searching every secret Corner of the House, they found therein nothing worth the reckoning of, but to return almost empty handed; for the Priests had for fear of them before carried away with them all the best of their Goods and Substance into the besieged Castle. And so likewise the rife Report of their coming to Presburg flying abroad, almost all the Priests and Jesuits in Presburg and the Country thereabout, leaving their Churches and Colleges, fled with their Substance to Vienne, scarcely accounting themselves safe there, until that the Garrison of that strong City was increased with a new supply of fix hundred good Soldiers.

And now the Rebels, their Number still more and more increasing, and having let all the upper part of Hungary on a Broil, were besieging divers other Castles and strong Places, yet holden for the Emperor; when as Batfay, in the mean time coming from the Siege of Strigonia, came, and with his Army incamped about three miles from Fidek. Of which coming the Rebels hearing, and thereupon retiring, he forthwith followed after them toward Budaco, which Belgiosa also left, and so toward Kamfambur, the place of their Rendezvous, gathered together in great number, with an intent to have given Batfay Battel: whereof Batfay having knowledge, to spare the effusion of more Christian blood, by an Herald sent unto them in friendly and courteous manner, advised them to change their Minds, and to return again unto their former Allegiance: but finding them obstinately set down in their former purpose, for the maintaining of their Rebellion, and the giving of him Battel, he marching forward with his Army, with great Force charged certain Companies of the Rebels, appointed to keep the Passage of Fidek; who at the first fight valiantly received the Charge, and defended the Passage, until that at length with number oppressed, and the above four hundred of them slain, they were put to the worse, and informed to fly; in which flight, amongst others there taken Prisoners, Blaf Nem, their Captain was taken also, whom Batfay caused to be hanged up by the heels, with the Ensigns set up about him which he had taken from the Rebels in the late Fight; and after he had for a time so hung, made him to be taken down, and his Head to be struck off from his Shoulders. In this Conflict fifty of Batfay's Men were slain also, and many more hurt, and amongst them Colman, hurt in his Shoulder and his Foot with a small Shot.

Batfay, after this Victory, marching on with his Army, by the way met with certain other Companies of the rebellious Haiducks, as he was going to St. Peters, with whom he had many an hot Skirmish for the space of three days together, being by them still put to the worse; insumuch, that having burnt many of his Carriages, Tents, and other Luggage, he was of nothing more careful, than how well to get out of their hands. Nevertheless, seeing no other remedy, he with great Courage not only endured the often and fierce Assaults of his Enemies, still more and more increasing upon him, but the fourth day, after so many unfortunate Skirmishes, (being the eighth and twentieth of November) putting his Men in order of Battel, right valiantly again charged the Rebels; who, by reason of the darkness of the Weather, being then a very thick Mist, being not able to perceive where the Enemies Attempts were most to be feared, or what way to turn their own Forces; as men dismayed, were easily by them overthrown and put to flight; whom so flying, Batfay with his Soldiers fiercely pursuing, made of them a great Slaughter; so that in the space of less than three hours, fifteen hundred of them were in this thick and dark Mist slain, with some few also of Batfay's Soldiers, and amongst them Frederick Earl of Solway, and the County of Erbach wounded. Upon the report of which Overthrow, the Rebels which yet lay at the Siege of the Castle of Zips, in hope there at length to have taken Belgiosa, forthwith rose and retired themselves to Leutia. But Batfay, after this Victory, removing to St. Andrews, and having recovered that Town from the Rebels, and thereto put a new Garrison, and so by this means somewhat daunted and repressed the Insolency of the Haiducks in those Quarrels, and being not well able longer to keep the Field with his Army in so unreasonable a time of the Year, and to maintain War as it were both against his Enemies, and the extremities of Nature, sought by Letters to have in Hungary; and that the States of that Kingdom understanding thereof, and solemnly protesting against the same, under the Seal of the Lord Palatine, had publicly affirmed with just Arms to defend themselves, if they should for their Religion be called into question, or troubled; and had again repeated the same their Protestation at Galsatz. Yet Bosnia nevertheless in the mean time by cunning sedition upon the reformed Churches at Cassovia, would not suffer the Citizens of the reformed Religion there to have any Sermons in their own private Houses, or so much as to read on the holy Bible. Neither any white moved with the former Protestations of the Nobility and States, had taken unto himself all the Lands and Goods of them of their Religion in Cassovia, not suffering them to bury the Bodies of their dead within the City, near unto the Monasteries. And regarding to have borrowed of Bosnia certain thousands of Cr. wiss, and thereof by him denied, caused his Soldiers to ransack two of his Castles, and to push them for all the Wealth and Treasure he had therein. For which Indignities and Injuries Bosnia straight, caused open Proclamation to be made, That he would give unto every Haiduck that would serve him, four Crowns a Month pay, with all the booty that they could get. Whereupon fix thousand Haiducks, which he had levied under Bosnia, forthwith revolted unto Bosnia, their number increasing daily. But after that unto this extraordinary pay, Pallas Lippa, his Lieutenant, had also joyined the Protection of the reformed Religion, it is wonderful to say, how the Haiducks by hears revolted unto him, and how the People in all parts of Hungary generally favoured him and his Quarrel, being in all places whereas he came, ready to join hands with him against the Imperials. The Turks and Tartars also, both with Men and Money, followed him in all his doings, whole help he refused not. Whereof proceeded all the aforeaid Miseries both in Hungary and Transilvania, with many other worse than they, which, together with the beginning of this year, took their beginning and encrease also. Unto which so great Troubles, still more and more encreasing, Bosnia, not able by force to give remedy, sought by Lenity and fair Persuasions to have calmed the same; by Letters oftentimes advising even Bosnia, the chief Rebel himself, to change his Mind, to lay down Arms, to disband his Forces, and to perwade with the rest of his seditious followers, to submit themselves unto the Emperour, and to return again unto their wonted Obedience. Whereunto he at length answered, That if the Government of all Transilvania might be left unto himself alone; if a natural Hungarian born might be left chosen Lieutenant General in Hungary, if none but such as were Hungarians born should have the government and command of all the Garrisons in Hungary; if the Wallon and French Soldiers might be shut out of Hungary, if the natural Hungarians born, might from thenceforth be regarded and provided of their pay, if it might be lawful for every man to have the free Exercise of his Religion; if the Authorities of these Troubles might be delivered unto the Hungarians to be punished, if the Emperour himself in Person should come and be present at the Parliament at Presburg, if the German Garrison Soldiers should still remain themselves within the Places whereunto they were appointed, without making of any Excurstions into the Towns or Villages near unto them, or hurting of the poor Country-men; he would then be content to come to such a good Agreement for Peace. With which offer he sent two of the Rebels, his Followers, unto Bosnia, who not liking thereof, returned them back again, without concluding of any thing.

But while things were thus in talk, some of the Haiducks in the mean time, with a number of Tartars joyined unto them, in seeking after Booty, surprised Gokara, a Town over against Strigonium; where, having slain certain Germans which had the keeping of the Place, and rifled the Town, as they were about to let it on fire, by the coming over of the Governour of Strigonium with his Garrison, they were informed to forsake the place, and again to retire. This loss received at Gokara, was again by our men required by the taking of Palantwar, a good Fortres of the Turks, after a long and cruel fight taken by Captain Bathian, (Commander of the Imperial Troops on this side of the River of Danubius) whereinto a number of the Turks being retired, were there together with the Garrison Souldiers slain flat, and amongst them divers men of great account, who but some few days before were come thither. Which Fortres the Captain caused to be forthwith razed, because it should no more stand the Turks in stead for the annoying of the Christians.

The Turks about this time had a purpose to besiege Vacia, a City not far from Piegrad, on the other side of Danubius, a Place which still did great harm; and flood the Christians in great fear. The Garrison of what the Turks call German, and part Hungarians, as the rest of all the Garrisons in the Imperial Towns of Hungary were. Of which the Turks purpose for the siege, the treacherous Haiducks there in Garrison having got understanding, conspired to deliver unto them the Place; and yet not so contented, to joyne therewith a Treason more bloody and treacherous than was the betraying of the Town; for finding themselves by part too strong for the German Money function, they first of all sent them fell upon them, fearing no such matter, and slew most part of them, the rest having themselves by speedy flight to Strigonium; and so afterward, according to their former pretended Treason, delivered the Town unto the Turks, joyning with them and the Tartars, and directing them for the more easie spoiling of the Christians and the Country thereabout.

The taking of this City of Vacia, had in short time called together great numbers of the Turks and Tartars out of all Places of the Realm; who, together with the Haiducks, made a great and puissant Army, to the Terror of the Christians, not then able to hold the field against them, and the encouraging of the Turks, thus holpen even by the Christians themselves, to the destroying of one another. With this Army they turned from Vacia to Gokara, with a purpose from thence to have passed over the Danubius upon the Ice, and to have surprised Strigonium. In which exploit they had once before attempted against the bare Town, being then by the Christians repulled and beaten back with their great and small shot out of the Town, as now they were again. Howbeit, that seeing the number of their Enemies daily more and more to increase, they in Strigonium stood more in doubt of a second siege, than they had done of the first, whereof we have before spoken.

The Report of these so great Troubles, and of the general revolt of the discontented Haiducks in Hungary, much troubled and grieved the Christian Emperour; who, both in respect of his Honour, and of the safety of his Estate, raised what Power he might out of his Provinces thereabout, and levied great sums of Money from his Subjects, taking a Ducket upon every House in Austria, being then in great fear of these Miseries and Mischies so fast spreading, and still more and more increasing and approaching that way. Unto whole Forces already on foot, had the Aid promised from the King of Spain, the Pope, the Princes of Italy and Germany, with six thousand Footmen, and two thousand Horse out of Bohemia, been in time joyined, they might have made a sufficient Army under the Conduct of Bosnia, the Emperours Lieutenant, to have repulled both the attempts of the Enemy, and the Inolency of the rebellious Haiducks. All or most part of which Aid this year failing, and Bosnia with his small Forces much weakened with Wants and the Extremity of Winter, and not able to keep the Field, the Enemies still increasing both in number and strength, and without fear of any to encounter them, at their Pleasure roaming up and down, began now to draw near unto Piegrad (a good and strong Town of Hungary standing upon the side of Danubius, about the mid way betwixt Buda and Strigonium) with a purpose to have besieged the Castle. Of whose coming the German there in Garrison hearing, and warned by the Treachery of the Haiducks of Vacia, what to fear from the Haiducks in Garrison with them in Piegrad, betime retired themselves out of the Town into the Castle. In which doing they were well advised, being otherwise like enough to have run the same Fortune that the German there in Strigonium had run at Gokara, if the Turks with the rebellious Haiducks were no sooner come thither, but that the Haiducks in the Town, without more ado, opened the Gates of the Town unto them, as unto their Friends, directing them in bell fort they could, both for the besieging and winning of the Castle. Which while the Turks hardly besieged, and German therein notably defended, Bosnia the Vicer Baisa, together with Beges Baisa, to perwade them to yield up the Castle, writ unto them in this sort.

Right worthy and valiant Friends, it is not to your unknown, the Castle of Piegrad, of right to belong unto our most mighty and dread Sovereign, the Great Sultan. And therefore seeing that the Reason that ever man should use, that which of right belongeth unto him; we advertise and request you to yield up the same Castle unto our most mighty Emperour, and the honourable Lord Stephen Baisa, Prince of Hungary; and with all your Substance to depart thence. Promising you upon our Faith and Honour, to suffer you quietly and in safety with your Wives and Children, Bag and Baggage, to depart thence; and to provide you sufficient Shipping for the carrying away of your things to Strigonium. And if it shall please you to take part with us, we promise you the same pay from our Emperour, that you had from your own; and the same kind Entertainment which the Wallons have before had with us. But if that you upon an oblique Resolution shall refuse this our friendly Motion and Grace offered you, blame us not, if we shall by our right hand and force of Arms seek to obtain our Rights. In kindnes we offer you Friendship, and so with speed expect your Answer.

But the German, hearkening not unto these Letters, as then resolved, valiantly stood upon the defence of themselves, and of the Place, until that by extreme Necessity forced thereunto, they yielded the same by Composition.

Bosnia in the mean time, with his Forces much diminished; lying at Eperia, and in the Country thereabout, seeing the general revolt of the Haiducks, of late the Emperours greatest strength in Hungary, and Bosnia the Rebel strength daily to increase more and more, with no possibility for himself with such small Forces as he then had, to repulse the Rebel Infolency, or to remedy these so far spreading Evils, but for want of great Strength he must lie still as it were a man besieged, was there- with exceedingly grieved, and as it were almost overwhelmed with the heavy burden of so many great Miseries at once befalling him. To threaten without Power he knew to be but Folly; and to speak fair, to be but vain. Nevertheless having procured from the Emperour a general Pardon for all such as having taken part with the Rebels, were willing to return again to their allegiance; he, to assure all them whom it might concern of the Emperours gracious Favour, and to put them all out of fear, caused Letters of general Pardon to be published, for all men to take knowledge of, the purport whereof was this.

WE George Baisa, Count of Hapt and Mar-mer, Lord Sala, Knight, Counsellor given out by Bosnia for the appeasing of the Rebellion in Hungary, to his Imperial Majesty, Governor of the Realm of Transilvania, and Lieutenant of the Christian Armies of the Emperour, to all faithful, love and greeting. Whereas in this troublesome a State of things, some, as well of the Nobility as others, in these upper parts of Hungary, partly of their own accord, and partly for fear, have revolted from his Imperial Majesty, and taken part with the traitorous Haiducks in their Rebellion, to the great prejudice of the Emperours Service, and the staining of their Faith; We, in the name of his Imperial and Royal Majesty, whom we know to be greatly inclined, and ready to pardon his Subjects, even of his own natural Goodness and Clemency, have by virtue of the full Power and Authority, by his said Imperial Majesty granted unto us, given free Grace and Pardon to all them which have withdrawn themselves from his Obedience, or forsaken the same, of what order, quality, or condition soever they be, whom we will receive into our Protection, as void of all Crime; and request them, as much as in us is possible, to make their Profit of this Grace, and to return unto their former Duty and Obedience, under all assurance of Impunity for their forepassed Faults; and without any search or inquiry to be of the same hereafter made, as well for matters of Religion, as of State; assuring them of their Lives, Goods, Fortunes, Dignities, Franchises, Privileges, and Immunities whatsoever, as is more largely declared by his Majesties Letters Patents, which remain with us. And if any, letted either with their urgent Affairs, or with Sicknes, cannot repair unto us within the day in the same Letters Patents nominated, we will accept of their just Excuses. But if any, contrary to our hope, shall upon any indurate mind, or obdurate Conscience, fail to repent, and to make their appearance before us within the day limited, we denounce them to be Rebels, subject unto the Pain of Rebellion, and stained with the note of Infamy; pronouncing their Lives, their Goods, and Dignities to be confiscate and devolved unto the Emperours Coffers; for which they shall by Us the Chieftains, and Captains of his Armies, with Rigour and Extremity be prosecuted. Protesting before the Majesty of God, before the Majesty of the Emperour, and before all Christians, us not to be in any sort culpable of the Evils, Calamities, and Miseries, which shall ensue of the Wars and Distresses which such their Rebellion shall cause; but to be therefrom exempt and acquitted, the only Authors of these Disorders having deserved these Imprecations and Calamities; upon the heads of whom we justly from benevolence lay them, as upon the miserable Authors thereof, by their wickedness having refused to great Grace from the Emperour and us; unto all men made known by their Presents.

This Proclamation solemnly by Bosnia published with the found of many Drums and Trumpets, the sixteenth of January, and ten days Liberty given for such as would come in, and again submit themselves; divers Gentlemen of the Country near unto Eperia, where Bosfa with his Army lay, for fear of being spoiled thereby, and accepted of the Grace offered; either of the feditious, dwelling farther off, little or nothing at all regarding the same. Infomuch, that the Rebels in number daily increasing, and the Rebellion still farther and farther spreading, Bosfa was now grown so strong, that he dismissed from him most part of the Turks, whose service he had in all these troubles hitherto used; relieving yet certain Janizaries, whom he mingled with the Garrison of Haiducks, which he had put into Cassiova.

Falla Lippa, before by Bosfa taken Prisoner, and upon his Revolt from the Emperor, by Bosfa made his Lieutenant-General, and a great man amongst the Rebels (as is before declared) was now of many thought to be a most fortunate and happy man. But in the midst of such his Happpiness, and the greatness of his Command, he was, by the malice of some, envying his estate, accused to Bosfa, as if he had a purpose to have made him away; and delivering the strong City of Cassiova unto Bosfa, to have gone over again unto the Emperor, and to have followed his Ensigns. Upon which suspicion, he was by the commandment of Bosfa beheaded, with five other men more, of good place, suspected to have been partakers of the Conspiracy with Lippa. In whole Treasure, after that he was executed, was found an hundred thousand Hungarian Duckets, with eleven hundred Chains of Gold; all which he had scraped together in that small time wherein he had been Bosfa's Lieutenant amongst the Rebels. With which money, Bosfa in his Rebellion confirmed, became therein more obdurate and furious than before, not admitting any talk with Bosfa, concerning Peace, but upon such unreasonable Conditions as fell flood with his own good liking.

Now long and tedious it were to recount the particular events, with the divers woful events thereof, during this so great and dangerous a Rebellion in Hungary; which how heavy forever they were for the poor Christians there dwelling to endure, as tending all to the ruine and Destruction both of themselves and of their Country, (some time one of the most flourishing Kingdoms of Christendom, but now become as it were a large Theatre, for all the World to behold many cruel Tragédies and bloody Maffacres acted in) yet for all that, unto none nothing is pleading but what is written of the greatest Actions; as, of great and bloody Battels, of the Conquests of whole Kingdoms, and the ruine of most mighty and famous Princes; all other things else being unto them tedious. In some part to ease them of such weariness, and to please their Appetites, I will briefly run over again (being not paid threefold more ven left in it) and destitute also of their necessary Provision, covenanting to have their Lives spared, at length yielded unto them. But in going thence, meeting with certain other Companies of Haiducks near unto Tokay, they were by them most part of them slain, some few of them by speedy flight escaping. The same Haiducks which had taken Sacmar, immediately after attempted to have surprised the Town and Castle of Tokay also, but the Government of the Place, in good time advertised of their intent and purpose, caused the Ice wherewith the River was hard frozen, to be broken forty Paces away near unto the Town, so that the same to be lightly covered over with Straw. Whither the Haiducks coming by night, and finding the Ice on the other side the River whereunto they first came strong enough to bear them, by heaps thrumming one another forward, to have scaled the Castle, the Ice breaking under them, they thert together by heaps most miserably perished, many of the rest which escaped that danger, being with thort out of the Castle slain also. In this Castle was no great store of Victuals: wherof Bosfa understanding, with his Army marched from Eperia toward Bodac, a Town holden by the Rebels, in hope with the spoil thereof to have relieved Tokay. But the Rebels hearing of his coming, having themselves burnt the Town, had got themselves, with that they had, into the Castle; and from thence with their great Ordnance lo welcomed Bosfa at his coming; that, disappointed of his purpose, and having lost some of his men, he was glad to speed (not having stayed above four hours) to return again to Eperia: certain of the Nobility of that Country, which took part with the Rebels, being reported, in his absence, to have made a Road towards Eperia, to the endangering of that City. In which his Return towards Eperia, the Troops of County Turan, and of Charles Odobowitz, by chance fighting upon two Haiducks in a Country Village, set the same on fire, and therein burnt most of the laid Rebels, and slew the rest of them that remained; in seeking by flight to have saved themselves.

In the mean time, one of the great men amongst the Turks came to Cassiova, bringing with him a great flock of money; which being divided amongst the Rebels there, much confirmed them both in their Rebellion and Devotion towards the Turks: which Rebellion they spared not for any cost by all means to maintain; as more prevailing thereby than by the greatest Forces they could use for the conquering of Hungary.

But Bosfa was no sooner with his Army returned again to Eperia, but that the Soldiers generally exclaiming, and calling upon him for their Pay, were about in a Mutiny to have forsaken him. For the appeasing of which Tumult, he was glad presently to make what shift he could for Money, wherewith he in some measure gave them contentment, and to wish most ardently that they should for six weeks service longer; thereby delivering the Citizens of Eperia from a great fear, wherein they were, for being spoiled by those malicious Soldiers, of whom they stood in no less doubt than they did of their Enemies.

And now the feditious Haiducks, after their wonted manner still roaming up and down the upper part of Hungary, the 2d day of March, about seven of the clock in the morning, came to Nemzoll, a Fair in that Country, and there by many Reasons persuading the Citizens to revolt, and to take part with them, had Parley with them until it was full twelve of the clock; but drawing fill nearer and nearer unto the Town: infomuch, that Turbulus, Governour of the Place, perceiving a yielding Inclination in the Citizens, and doubting without their help to be able to defend so great a City against the Haiducks with so weak a Garrison as he then had therein, he with his Cofacks, for his more safety, retired himself into the Castle. Which done, the Haiducks forthwith breaking into the City with fix Companies, summoned the Castle, requiring to have it delivered unto them. Of whom Turbulus flew divers with thort out of the Castle; and the same day, in the Evening, courageously falling out of the Castle, with certain Companies of Harquebushiers, drove the Haiducks again out of the City; which he afterward better fortified against their like Attempts. And the next day understanding by a Country-man, That certain Companies of Haiducks and Turks together, were coming to Turkey, a Town not off carry- ing with them a great number of Cattel, Women and Children, which they had got out of the Country Towns and Villages thereabout; he presently lent forth his Lieutenant against them, with his Cofacks (a desperate kind of Horsemen) who meeting with these Haiducks and Turks, slew of them about an hundred and fifty, and recovered from them all the Captives, the Cattel, with two hundred Hories, and a Mule loaded with four thousand Hungarian Duckets.

Now had Filek (a most beautiful Castle, and as it were the Key of that part of the upper Hungary, which the Christian Emperor yet held against the Turks) for certain Months been hardly besieged by the Haiducks; which although it was so well floted with Victuals, and other necessary Provision, as that it might have holden out three Months longer siege, yet the Soldiers there in Garrison, for want of Water were enforced now at length to yield the same. For the keeping of which Castle Redeus Ferentius, Captain of the Haiducks which had woon it, placed therein a Garrison, part Haiducks, part Turks, as not daring to trust either of them alone; the Haiducks for fear of their Treachery, nor the Turks, for that he knew them to be detestful of the place, for the commodious Situation thereof, as giving them a way to enter further into the Territories of the Christians, which Redeus, though a Rebel, would not yet in any sort grant them.

This Castle of Filek so (as is before said) besieged, the valiant Collonitz had oftentimes in vain sought to have relieved; all the ways being lo bight, and as it were, fortified with the infinite number of the Turks, Tartars, and Rebels, as that there was no coming unto it; a most part of his own Soldiers being Haiducks also, to whom he durst not well trust for fear of being betrayed by them. Concerning which Matters, he shortly after writing to a certain Nobleman, after that he had written unto him, That he desired nothing more of the Emperor, than to be discharged of his Service, he thus breaketh forth.

I cannot (saith he) any more perform faithful service unto the Emperor for being attended upon with very Traitors. I am enforced to hear even mine honest Requeſt. I would willingly serve your German Hofmen; and I could also wish, three thousand Collocks, and two thousand Polonian Huf-fles to be again raised; who would do notable service in pursuing of the Enemy; but every Month they must needs have their Wages paid them. The number of the Enemy increaseth daily; and their strength still more and more; so that things cannot be in worse state than now they are. All Devices are directed to the hurt of the Emperor, neither is there any place quiet. What Courage am I of, which have lost all my Wealth and Substance, is easie for any man to judge; all which, for all that, I could conceal and defendible, so that I might faithfully, and according to my desire, serve the Emperor; which for all that, is not possible for me to do without a sufficient strength of German Soldiers. But this of all doth most comfort me, for that I soon may have done my Duty for my service; this Mischief had spread further, I have been in hope that I would rather have resolved from the Emperor, than have lost my Goods; and some there were, which doubted not to say so of me. The Enemies are now in my Dukedom of Cleve, and there made spoil of all. Sechen, Jametta, Tregla, Palanca, Samolchin, Blavstein, Rabenstein, Vacia, Regiment, Dillena, Pungatta, Tabra, Libetna,

Sinna, Dibina, Sacmaria, Sendra, Onoth, Dilgiora, Zatat, Calo, Scharopotac, Budnoc, Nagibana, Filek, and almost all Transilvania, are now subject to the Rebels; so that what will ensue thereby, except they speedily be confronted, every man may right easily ghesf.

Now if Collonitz, one of the greatest and best Commanders of the Emperours Forces against the Turks in Hungary, was thus beted, and spoiled of his Substance, by the Rebels, as he in these his Letters complaineth, and as indeed he was, having at one time received from them so great harm as was deemed to have amounted to an hundred thousand Duckets; and not daring to trust his own Hungarian Soldiers, whose Hearts he knew to be with the Rebels; In what State may be the rest of the People of that distressed Province, he thought to have been, being at the same time exposed unto the same Rebels as a Prey and Spoil, and their Country lay'd open for the Turks and Tartars to forrage and over-run at their Pleasure.

But in brief, to run along with the Haiducks, who in four thousand of them attempting to have surprised Wiglaf, were so from thence repulsed, as that many of them being slain, five and thirty Wagons were scarce sufficient to carry the rest of the wounded over the Mountains, of whom an hundred died by the way. But going from thence, they brake into Turkey's Country, where, they having rifled all the Towns and Villages, commanded all the States of the Country, within three days and next after, to submit themselves to Bosfa, and to swear unto him Fealty, or otherwise to expect all Extremities; who with fear dismayed, all promised to submit themselves unto Redeus, Bosfa's Lieutenant.

Now for Remedy of these Evils, Napragius and Forgatus, two grave Counsellors, were sent, in the Emperours Name, to treat of the Peace with Bosfa; who, the seventh and twentieth of March, departing from Eperia with fourscore Harquebushiers, towards Cassiova, before they came thert, sent before him an Herald, to advertise Bosfa of their coming. Which Messenger, so soon as he was come into Cassiova, the Turks so frantly kept, as that no man might speak with him but Bosfa himself; and not he also, but in open place, and that in the hearing of the Turks.

Who at his first meeting with him told him, That if the Ambassadors from whence he came, were sent from the Nobility and States of Hungary, they should be right welcome unto him, and I ave Audience; but if they came from the Emperor, as had Rogatus and Claccius before sent from Bosfa, they should then spare their Labour, and come no farther; for that all matters had with him been often enough talked upon; it being now more than time, that things so often consulted upon, should be no more talked of, but indeed performed. Which Messenger returning unto the Ambassadors, told them what Bosfa had said, and that the Haiducks had in Cassiova built a Bulwark of a wonderful height, beted the Gates with strong Guards, and so filled the Trenches with Soldiers, that a man could hardly enter into the City; howbeit that every man might safely come and go thither about his Trade and Business. He told them also, how Bosfa's Lieutenant had called together all the Governors of the Places thereabout, and advised them, for the space of fourteen days to beware of the Executions of the Haiducks, and in the mean time, for their more safety, to bring their Wives and Children, with such other things as they made most reckoning of, into the City, for that he could not do as yet (as he said) re-

in Hungary.

But to proceed with these Troubles according to the course of the time of the Year, about the twenty fourth of May the Turks and Tartars joining their Forces with the Rebels, burnt fourteen Country Villages about the Lake of Neuhäuf, and as many more in other Places also towards Neuhäuf, leaving behind them most lamentable Remembrances and Testimonies of their barbarous and inhumane Cruelty, having put most of the Women and Children to the Sword, and impaled divers upon Stakes, carrying the Men away with them as Captives, and the Beasts and Cattel as a Prey; and to leaving the Country as they went almost desolate, scarce any thing therein left to bewail the Misery thereof. And about the end of this same Month the Rebels surpris'd Simega, Grotta, and Capernacini, and a little while after, Ginsium: all which Places they rifled and spoiled, as they did also Hogengau, a great Town of the Lord Lichtenburg, and Niederfrunga, a Town of Collonitzers, which they first rifled, and afterward burnt; and with the terror of this their dealing enforced all the Country thereabout, both far and near, to yield unto them: only Alfeld and Chrenitz, who continued in their Loyalty, and standing fast for the Emperor, did the Rebels much harm.

About the beginning of June, certain Companies of Turks and Haiducks mingled together, came again, as they had before done, to Presburg: of whose coming the Governour of the City having Advertisement, with three Troops of Wallon Horse-men, and certain Companies of Harcquiers, breaking out of the City, caught them forth with to retire; which the Wallon Horse-men seeing, to prevent them in their Retreat, fetching a Compa's about, met with them when they thought themselves past all danger; and falling upon them, slew of them five hundred, and drove the rest into Danubius; so that of all those Turks and Haiducks none escaped but only fourteen, amongst whom three Turks and one fugitive Citizen of Presburg, were found: whom, together with a great Spoil, the Garrison Soldiers carried back with them into the City.

At the self-same time the Citizens of Vesprimium favouring the Proceedings of the Haiducks, rose themselves in Rebellion also, and taking the Captain of the Castle, together with his Lieutenant and the Keys of the Castle, caused them to be carried to Redeins, Boisfay's Lieutenant; yielding themselves into his Protection. Of which Revolt of the City the Turks took exceeding Pleasure, and forthwith sent News thereof unto the Sultan, wishing him to haste the coming of his Army, for that the Passages were now laid open unto his farther Conquest; and farther advising him still more and more to encourage Boisfay in his Rebellion.

And now was Hungary too little, or else too bare, to contain and satisfy the still increasing Rebels, who in great number breaking into Stria (as they had before done on the other side of Hungary into Moravia) did therein great harm, wasting and spoiling all before them as they went; inasmuch that County Serin, the Lord Nadafitz, and Budian, all right worthy men, and such as heretofore had done great things against the Turks for the Christian Commonwealth, seeing themselves, and all that they had, in danger to be spoiled, being themselves not able to withstand the Rebels, nor any other way wherewith to relieve themselves, retired unto Boisfay, as did many other Noblemen of that Country also. Out of Stria the Rebels made head into Austria, and there roaming up and down the Country, did like harm.

Thus was the State of Austria and Hungary at this time most miserable, which for that it is so well set down in certain Letters by a grave and understanding Citizen of Vienna, who was himself an eye-witness of most part thereof, that it cannot well better be expell'd; I have thought it good to refer the Report thereof unto the Letters themselves.

ALL Austria (saith he) is full of Misery and Calamity. From out of the Castle and Bulwarks here at Vienna, a man may sometime at once behold fifteen Towns and Villages all on fire in the Country hereabout, kindled partly by the Rebels and Turks, and partly by our own mutinous Soldiers. Odenburg is yet beleagued, and the Haiducks have foraged the Country as far as Hinberg, whom had not the Regiment of Munitz repelled, these out Suburbs of Vienna had now been taken, ranfack'd, and burnt. Neuhäuf is on every side beleagued by the Enemy; all the Villages about Vienna, as far as Dreskirch, are with Fire destroyed; they of Neuhäuf went about to have cut off some part of the Enemies Forces, but with evil Success, having lost above fifty of their own men. Brumma and Eysenndorfe are also with Fire consumed. The Wallons by incamping at Miedling, most miserably spoiling the Country. People of all that that they had: The Haiducks having by night surpris'd the great Town of Altenburg, and from thence carrying a great Prey, have burnt it; The Castle had endured the like Fortune, had not an hundred Harquebusers, that were by chance come thither, holpen to defend it. Six thousand of the Enemies lie about Pesseldorf, but whether the Wallons will attempt any thing against them or no, it is greatly doubted. Presburg is also in great danger; for the Garrison Soldiers there do threaten the cruel Spoil of the Citizens, and all Extremities, if by a certain Day they receive not their Pay; who if they shall depart thence, there is no doubt but that the Haiducks will forthwith succeed them in their Places. These men indeed do pretend Religion; but what Lovers they be thereof, the late Example of a Minister by them most cruelly tormented, not far from Coblenz, doth manifestly shew. The Report is, That the Vayvod of Palachia doth favour neither party; unto which Province a great number of Tartars are come in the Aid of Boisfay. All the Market-Places and Streets here in this City, lie full of poor fugitive Creatures of all Sex and Ages; a most miserable Sight to behold. Our own mutinous Soldiers believeth all the ways to the City, and exclude us from all manner of Viſual; and not to use many words, in Cruelty and Hostility almost exceed the very Enemies. The Hungarian Rebels, who of late foraged Austria, have carried away with them above eight thousand Head of Cattel, which, together with the Prisoners by them taken, they have sent into Turkey. The little Boys and Children, which cannot by reason of their tender Years go, they carry along with them upon Horses, whole pitiful Mourning and Lamentation might move even the very Stones; and yet are they (inhumane men) no whit moved: yea, many of these poor Souls are here and there by the way found dashed against the Ground, with their Brains beaten out. And these Rebels in their Behaviour shew such Cruelty, as whereas the very Turks themselves were amazed. All things about Neuhäuf are by the Rebels and carried away. They of Neuhäuf, besieged by twenty thousand of their Enemies, have hitherto yielded the Men, and of late repulld the second Assault, with much slaughter of their Enemies. They say, That two thousand Tartars, as many Rebels, and thirteen thousand Turks, are to be yet expected to come unto the Camp at Neuhäuf; who, if they shall chance to come, it can scarce be, that they of Neuhäuf can long well hold out against them, especially being not well appointed of necessary provision. The report is, that having taken Neuhäuf, they will remove to Strigonium. It is said also, twelve thousand Turks to have now pass'd over the Bridge at Elſſes; and great Supplies both of men and money to come to Boisfay, who lieth encamped about Eperia, and is said to have made a Covenant with the Great Sultan, That what place soever either of them should first take, he should hold the same wholly unto himself. Tanher, who of late was Governour of Biak, is now (as the report goeth) of Counsel with Boisfay. Gernich hath put in three months Viſual unto Häuf in Transilvania. God in his mercy behold our poor afflicted and distressed Country.

Thus far he: Whereby the Reader (as I suppose) may easily gather the miserable estate of both the Countries of Hungary and Austria, the Christians themselves being the chief Authors thereof.

Odenburg

by Balſa
relieved.

The rebellious Haiducks had hitherto most straightly besieged the City of Odenburg, having assaulted it in five sundry places at once: upon whom, Tranſilvania's General of the Garrison there, causing part of his Horse-men to fall upon, skirmish'd with them from eleven of the clock in the forenoon, untill two of the clock in the afternoon; at which times the Haiducks beginning to prevail, the Governour, with the rest of his Horse-men, certain Ensigns of Foot-men, with some of the Citizens, with three field-pieces, upon the sudden breaking out of the Gate, difcomfited the Haiducks, put them to flight, and slew many of them, having taken from them twelve Ensigns, some of which they carried with them into the City: of which overthrow the Haiducks desirous to be revenged, with their renewed Forces shortly after returned again unto the City, burnt the Suburbs of the same, and spoiled the Villages thereabout. But whilst they thus lay about Odenburg, Balſa, but with a small power, drawing near unto them, they presently rose, and passing over the River Draua, carried away with them two thousand head of Cattel, with a great number of Christian Captives.

The Turks

Boisfay.

The Turks being not to learn to make use of the discord of the Christians amongst themselves, had oftentimes been in hand with Boisfay, to deliver Caffa wholly into their hands: of which strong City, being the best that the Christians now held in the upper Hungary, the Turks were most desirous, both for the commodious situation thereof, and also for that they deemed themselves partly thereof already possessed, some good part of the Garrison therein being Turks, as well Janizaries as others. The full possession of which strong City the better to obtain from Boisfay, and to get it into their own hands, they sent unto him three Waggon's loaded with money and other rich Commodities, for a Present, and to supply his wants, by a good Convoy of four hundred Haiducks, and four Turks joined unto them. Which Haiducks, as they were by the way to Caffa to pass by Tockay, a strong Town holden by the Christians, gave secret knowledge unto the Governour of the place, of their coming that way, and that if he would receive them into the Town, and so into his Protection, they would, with some small help from him, deliver into his hands that so rich a booty, and so continue with him as his faithful and trusty Soldiers. Of whose offer the Governour well assured, forthwith sent forth four hundred of the Soldiers of his own selection to meet them; who, joining with the aforelaid Haiducks which came with the Convoy, set upon the Turks which came with them, and slew every Mothers Son; and so with the rich Booty were by the Governour received into the Town, and by him courteously entertained: where they had not long lain, but that after their wonted manner looking abroad into the Country, they chanced to meet with certain Companies of Boisfay's men; with whom they encountering, and having slain of them near about five hundred, took from them seven Waggon's loaded with good Provision, and thirty Horses, besides much other rich spoil.

But the Rebels, notwithstanding these and such other losses, encreasing both in number and power, fill more and more in all places prevailed, but especially in the upper part of Hungary, the Towns there, one after another, daily revolting unto them, as amongst the rest the strong Town of Torſta did; whereunto the Rebels entering, sent from thence part of the great Ordnance, together with Reinger, a German Captain, Governour of the Towns, and certain other German Soldiers there taken, unto Redeins, Boisfay's Lieutenant, then lying with a great Army of thirty thousand Hungarian Rebels and Turks, at the Siege of the strong Town and Castle of Neuhäuf: which, as he had oftentimes by him been sharply assaulted, it was by the Soldiers therein most notably defended, protesting, never to yield the same, but to hold it out even unto the last man therein to the left alive; which caused Redeins, for the encouraging of his Soldiers, (who had now lain there certain months at the Siege thereof) to promise unto them the whole spoil of the Town, and of all that therein was: And yet for all that, oft times kept back the Turks from assaulting the same, for fear lest if they should by force have taken it, they would be forced to leave it open unto themselves, as a Place for them most commodious for the conquering of that which remained of the upper part of Hungary: which he, though one of the greatest Rebels, was yet loth to have it to fall into their hands; and yet himself, with the Haiducks, the Hungarian Rebels, afterward, viz. the 25th of July, gave thereunto a most furious Assault, inasmuch that having advanced ten of their Ensigns unto the top of the Rampiers, they were in great hope even presently to have taken it, but yet were by the resolute Valour of the Defendants notably repulld, and inforced again to retire, leaving behind them above seven hundred of their most forward men dead in the Trenches: unto which Siege the Balſa of Agria came also afterward with three thousand Horse-men and a Number of Janizaries; so that the besiegeds, partly with Mines, partly with Shot and often Assaults distressed, were so wasted and wounded, that there were scarcely two hundred whole and found men left in the whole Garrison; besides that, both Viſuals and Powder begun now to grow scarce also, so that they were brought unto such extremity, as that well they could not be in a worse case: and yet armed with a constant Resolution, they seemed not to be any thing therewith daunted or discouraged, but still valiantly held it out.

The Hungarians, dwelling in the Isle of Shur in the River of Danubius, having before submitted themselves unto the Rebels, did with their help much trouble the Passages unto the Towns of Rab and Comara, and the City of Strigonium; by whom certain Messengers were sent on the Emperor's behalf, to persuade them to forsake the Rebels, and to return again unto their ancient Obedi-

1605 Obedience. Who fo well used the matter with them, that taking a Truce for eight days they in the mean time sent five of the chief men amongst them by Ship to Presburg, offering unto the Governour there, That if they might be secured of their Goods and Safety, and that the Haiducks that were with them might be entertained in Pay, they would be ready again to take the Oath of Allegiance, and faithfully to serve them, as became his loyal Subjects and valiant Soldiers; and for the assurance thereof, to leave their Wives and Children as Pledges at Presburg. Which their Offer, was unto the Governour very acceptable and welcome, who yielding unto their Request, in friendly sort dismissed them. But they being returned home, and having declared to the rest of their Fellows what they had done, it was by general consent agreed, That four thousand of them should join themselves unto the Emperours Power under the Regiment of Colonias, who to be known from others, wore in their Crests certain special Feathers; their Wives and Children being carried to Presburg as Pledges of their Faith: but this Agreement by them made with the Governour of Presburg being once known, the rest of the Rebels in the Country thereabout together assembled with the Turks, invaded the Isle, in hope upon the sudden have furnished them; but, deceived of their Expectation, were by the Inhabitants of the Isle, and by the help of certain German Troops, overthrow and put to flight, and three thousand of them there slain.

About the beginning of July, certain Commissioners were sent on the Emperours behalf to Calfovia, to treat with Bosfay concerning a Pacification to be made, who being by him there honorably entertained, and having with him stayed almost a whole month, were at length, the nine and twentieth of the same month, again dismissed. Now the Articles which Bosfay propounded unto these Commissioners to be considered of for the making of a Peace, and which for the most part were agreed upon in the Peace afterward concluded betwixt the great Sultan and the Emperour, were these:

Articles by Bosfay propounded unto the Emperours Commissioners for the appeasing of the Tumults in the upper Hungary.

First, that it should be lawful, for all such as would, to have the free exercise of the reformed Religion. For although (as he said) he was not ignorant that there was an ancient Decree amongst the Hungarians, whereby all that professed not the Catholic Religion, or that revolted from the same, were to be burnt, and that he desired not to have that Article repealed; yet that his Request was, That the Emperour, having regard unto the Trouble of the present time, would procure an affiate. That from thenceforth no man should be troubled for his Religion, or called in question for his Confidence and Belief. Besides that, he requested to have the Principality of Transilvania during his Life; yet with this Condition, That after his death it should again return unto the Emperour, so that the Emperour in his Absence should appoint a natural Hungarian to govern the same, as also to have the chief Government in Hungary. That there should no more Bishops sit in Council but one, and that he, if it should be so thought meet, should bear the Office of the Chancellor. That the Liberties and Privileges of that Kingdom should be kept whole and inviolate. That it should be lawful for him only to make choice of the chief Palatine of the Kingdom. That Goods confiscated for any offence committed, should not be dispersed or sold, but given to men of desert. That all Offenders against the State from thenceforth should be judged by the Council of Hungary. That none should be preferred to Bishopsricks in Hungary, but such as were of the noble Hungari-

1605 an Blood. That all Injuries heretofore done, should be absolutely pardoned, forgiven and forgotten. All which things, if they might be granted, he promised to labour to the uttermost of his power, upon the best Conditions he might, to procure a Peace betwixt the Great Sultan and the Emperour. Last of all he requested, That the Charters of Peace, containing these Articles thus agreed upon, might be subscribed and confirmed by the Bishop of Rome, the Emperour, the King of Polonia, and all the Imperial Kingdoms and Provinces.

The Turkish Sultan understanding of this Treaty of Peace betwixt the Emperour and Bosfay, by a Messenger sent in haste to Bosfay, fought by great Offers and Promises to hinder the same; putting him in remembrance, That a little before this Treaty made, he had not only by Words, but by Letters also, subscribed with his own hand, promised unto Bosfay's Ambassadors sent to Constantinople, That he would bring to pass, that Bosfay, rewarded with such Privileges as King John in former time enjoyed, should in short time be proclaimed and crowned King of Hungary, and that to that purpose he was even now ready to send a Scepter and a Crown, the Ornaments of a King, to Alba Regalia. But for the present, he by these Messengers sent unto Bosfay two goodly Horses, with Furniture of Gold, glittering with precious Stones. He sent him also a rich Scimitar, a pair of golden Spurs, and a long Horsemans Coat garnished with Gold and precious Stones of great price; persuading him valiantly to persist in his former course and purpose. Which he failed not to do: for immediately after he with a gallant Train went from Calfovia into Transilvania there to take of the Nobility of that Province the Oath of their Fidelity unto him; accounting no pains or labour great, which he took to turn the People from their Obedience unto the Emperour, and to strengthen himself. At which time he also sent Redeius his Chancellor, with some others, into Polonia, to renew the Confederation which was sometime betwixt the Polonians and the Hungarians: who, being admitted unto the King's Presence, and Audience given him, first declared the Causes of the Discord and Civil War that then was in Hungary, which he imputed chiefly unto the Oppression of Religion, the free exercise thereof being forbidden them; and to the Insolency of the Germans, who there at their pleasure commanded over them. Upon which two Points he stood much, labouring with many Words to persuade the King thereof, and afterwards requesting him of his gracious Goodwill, and of the care which he, together with other Christian Princes, had for the common quiet of the Christian Commonwealth in general, and especially of those two distressed Countries, lying as it were even in the Enemies Mouth, to enter into Consultation how the same Evils might be remedied, and those too great Troubles again appeased, and to the effecting of so good a work to put to his helping hand. Wherunto the King answered, That the friendship wherein Bosfay offered to join with him being but the renewing of the ancient Amity betwixt the Countries of Polonia and Hungary, to be unto him pleasing; howbeit, he could not for all that, (as he said) well like of Bosfay's Revolt from that House and Family, whereunto he was himself so near adjoined in Affinity; promising yet nevertheless, that he would propound the matter unto his Nobility, to be farther considered, which when he had indeed done, it was by common consent agreed, That no Aid should be given out of Polonia unto Bosfay or the Rebels; and that whosoever should from thence afford him any Aid, should should therefore lose his Head. With which answer the Ambassadors returned to Bosfay much discontented, being now with a great Power again returned out of Transilvania to Calfovia.

About this Time the Lord Ruffworm (sometimes General of the Emperours Army against the Turks in Hungary, a Man of great Note and Valour, and of whom we have before much spoken) at Prague falling into words, and from words to blows, with Francis Count Belosio his Brother, and their Men taking their parts on both sides, it followed the said Francis, the Earls Brother, being grievously wounded, to be there slain, Belosio himself being also in five places dangerously hurt; who so hardly prosecuted the Death of his Brother against the Lord Ruffworm, that within a while after he was there by the Emperours commanded, and at Prague beheaded; and divers of his Men hanged, with such Weapons hanging at their heels, as wherewith they had slain the said Francis, the Earls Brother.

The Turks Troubles against his Rebels and the Persians and the Perfians in the East, an ease unto the Christians in the West.

Now was the time of the year come, when as the Turks their great Armies were wont to be even in the heart of Hungary; howbeit, such were their Troubles in Asia, both with the Persians and their own Rebels, that they were not at leisure now to send such great forces as they had before used, in to Hungary; neither could the Christian Emperour on the other side now raise such a Power as he had in former times done to oppose against them, and to hinder their proceedings. The Hungarians themselves (his greatest strength in those Wars) were now generally revolted from him, and for most part followed the Ensigns of the Rebel Bosfay. The Princes wont to lend him aid both out of Italy and out of Germany, now afforded him little or none at all; and his necessary Soldiers for want of pay were now almost every where up in Mutiny ready to forsake his Service, and to pay themselves with the spoil of his Countries, even unto the Gates of Vienna. So that had not the Turks been so busied in the East, but at leisure to have turned their whole Power into Hungary, as oftentimes they had before done, it is hardly to be imagined what should have ensued them to have over-run, not only that which remained of Hungary, but even all Asia; with some good part of Germany also; the Emperours Preparations being then so small, and his Forces so weak, as that they were not able to hold the field against his own rebellious Subjects, much less against so puissant and dreadful an Enemy. But God, which with his Word hath set bounds unto the raging Sea, beyond which it cannot pass, and by whose Power Kings do reign, and Princes bear rule, had by other means averted the greater part of the Turks Forces Eastwards; so that Serdar Bassa, Sultan Achmat's Lieutenant General for his Wars against the Christians, came this year but with a right small Army (in comparison of those which the Turkish Sultans were wont to send) into Hungary. Howbeit, with such Forces as he brought, and with rich Supplies of the Rebels in Hungary as came unto him, he being recovered from his wound, and out of fear of the Emperours Forces, came the nine and twentieth day of August to Strigoniom, and with his Army (part Turks, part Tatars, and part dissolay Christians) encamped in the self same place where the Turks Army had but the year before lodged; having brought with him forty great pieces of Batter, with all things else necessary for the Siege. Neither were the Turks loomer encamped, but that the Tatars, which came with them, were so greedy of their wonted manner, which when he had indeed done, it was by common consent agreed, That no Aid should be given out of Polonia unto Bosfay or the Rebels; and that whosoever should from thence afford him any Aid, should

The Turks in the mean time to deprive the besieged of all relief to be sent unto them down the River of Danubius, made a great Bridge of Boats over the River, well fortified at both ends thereof, on each side the River with a strong Corps de guard for the defence thereof, so that nothing could that way pass to or from the besieged City. Which things much dismayed them in the City, seeing no Preparation to be made on the other side for their Defence or Relief; yet Sulaim himself, General of such small Forces as the Emperour had then, seeing the Enemy so strong, and himself so weak, began greatly to doubt of the Event of this Siege; and yet nevertheless resolutely set down to employ both his Valour and his Wisdom for the safeguard of the Place, he during the time of the Siege, failed not to the uttermost of his Power to shew the Effects both of the one and of the other.

And now the Turks, assisted with the Hungarian Rebels, had performed an Exploit upon the Isle of Strigoniom, as well to take the same from the Imperials, as for the spoil and pillage thereof. The Inhabitants there had still remained faithful unto the Service of the Emperour, whom the Rebels for all that had oftentimes fought both by force and by persuasion to have removed from this their Loyalty and just devoir. Within this Isle were 200 Haiducks, retained against the Emperours Service, who were foynted unto the Islanders, for the better defence both of them and of the Island; But the Rebels knowing well the Passages and Entrances into the Isle, upon the sudden furnished the same, and in it these poor Haiducks, whom they set all in pieces; which loss caused Bosfa to resolve to send the Wallons he had in his Army into the Isle for the defence thereof. Which they of the Island understanding, made request unto the General, That he would not any way let it be known, that they greatly feared lest the Wallons, being Men already given to the spoil, not finding the Rebels to prey upon, should after their wonted manner prey upon them; the Emperours faithful Subjects. At whose instance, the fittest purpose for the sending of the Wallons being changed, Colonnus himself was appointed unto that Service; with whom Montfieur de Laual, a Noble young Gentleman of France (who but a few days before was newly come unto the Camp, for the honourable desire he had to see Service, and to serve himself with his Troop of Horsemen whom he had brought with him out of France) went over into the Island also; Whereinto when as the Rebels shortly after again entered, they were by Colonnus overthrow and driven out of the Isle, two hundred and fifty men being slain, and above fifty more of them taken Prisoners. In which Conflict the noble young Gentleman Laual so bravely behaved himself, as that he gained unto himself much Honour and Renown, every man much being full of his Praises, and wondering to see so great Courage in so young years; he being then scarce nineteen years old. With which loss the Rebels rather enraged than discouraged, shortly after returned again, in greater number, and better resolved; where, between them, and them that were left for the defence of the Isle, there was fought a more sharp and bloody fight than was the former; yet so, as that the Rebels were enforced again with loss to retire. In which so hot and bloody a Skirmish, Montfieur Laual, having most valiantly born himself against the Enemies, and done enough for his Honour, but not so contented, but carried away with the heat of Youth, and the desire of Glory, went out otherwise to be perished, but still adventurous pressing on to the retreating Enemy, was there with a small shot slain, all they which knew him much lamenting his untimely Death.

1605 in an Action wherein they ought to show themselves most valorous; and by their Cowardice become subject unto them, whom at other times they had accounted unworthy to be compared with them in Valour. That they should lay their Hands upon their Hearts, and remember the Estate and Faith; bound unto the first by their Honour, and to the second by their Duty. That they were Men of War, living by their Pay, which bound them to the Service of him from whom they received it, even unto Death; having before obliged their Lives unto their Pay; and that they were Christian Subjects, bound to keep their Promise given by Oath before God. That forgetting either the one or the other of these things, they deprived themselves of the Pay promised them which performed their Service, and losing their Renown in this World for their Cowardice, and in the World to come for breaking their Faith. That therefore they should continue constant in the performance of their Duty, resolving themselves rather to endure an honourable Death, unto which belonged the recompence of an eternal Fame for their Valour and Fidelity, than to prolong a miserable Life with perpetual Infamy for their Cowardice; whereof for all that, they could no more assure themselves by the yielding up of the place, than by the defending thereof, for as much as the Turks were oftentimes even as cruel upon them that yielded, as those that resisted; keeping no Faith with the Christians, but as best stood with their Profit and their Pleasure. And that therefore for his part he was resolved, rather to die with Honour in the Place, than to be beheld to his Enemies for an infamous and miserable Life. And that therefore he be sought them to follow him in this last Action of their devoir, which carried with it all the Trophies of their precedent Actions, wherein they had oftentimes assisted him in many Actions of less worth, and of much greater Peril.

This Discourse grounded upon so good Reasons, and proceeding from so great Valour, might have prevailed with any other generous Minds, except with these degenerate Soldiers, who by their Cowardice had hardened themselves against all the points of Honour which might any way move them; in such sort, that they stood as fast in their base Cowardice, as did their General in his valourous and constant Resolution. They stood with their Hands behind them, without any Weapons in them; as was their Minds without any Courage at all; and as Men appointed to be sacrificed upon the Altar of Death, attending without moving, but the Hands of them that should sacrifice them. Great and shameful Cowardice, not daring by resistance to withstand the Violence of their Enemies, far less of hindering them in their desires, being indeed such as had vowed their Death to satisfy their own Fury. Mean while, some of these Soldiers seeing their Speeches to be but vain, and not able to move their Government to satisfy their desire, conceived the same their Requests, with the Reasons thereof, into Writing, which they sent unto him. Which the Government having read, in their fight rose their Letters in pieces, and trod the same under his Feet; rejecting as well their Demands by Letters, as he had done their Requests by Words. In brief, having forgotten nothing of the Duty of a worthy General, and valiant Captain, joyed now thereunto the Office of a simple Soldier, going himself unto the breach, with some few, to defend the same. But the more the Count stood upon this his great Resolution, the more these cowardly and malicious Villains proceeded in their base Obstinacy, in so much that they fell from Prayers to Fury and Rage, threatening to deliver him their Government, together

1605 with the Place, unto the Enemy, to save their Lives, if he himself would not: by Treaty gave them from the imminent Perils. If these base Cowards were before dead unto the just Remembrance of their Government, which might have preserved them from Death and Infamy, he was also as deaf as they, to conceive their Requests, or to be moved with their Threats; knowing that he had more Reason on his side, by constant Valour to withstand the wicked and shameful Refutation of his Soldiers, than they had with Dishonour to enforce him, or to offer him Violence, to their eternal Shame and Infamy.

In the mean time, these obstinate and enraged Cowards proceeded from Words to Deeds, and sent Requests to Violence, as did oftentimes the disloyal Soldiers of Rome, in slaying the good Emperors. For they in cruel manner, without Reverence, by force layed Hands upon the Government, put him in Prison, and afterwards craving Parley, fell in Treaty with the Great Baffa about the delivery up of the Place. Wherewith the Baffa well contented, sent in unto them Haly Baffa, to conclude the matter. Whereafter some little Talk it was agreed, That they should deliver up the Place (which was not indeed theirs to dispose of) and that the Baffa should therefore promise and suffer them with Bag and Baggage in safety to depart whither they would, with their Engines filled up and Fire in their Matches; leaving behind them their great Ordnance, with all their other Munition and Warlike Provision. Which only Composition by the perfidious Soldiers made in the absence and in durance of their General, was by the Turks faithfully kept, amongst a thousand others like before by them broken; whether it were in respect of the ease Conquest of the City, (being one of the chief and principal Places of all Hungary) or for that they being overjoyed with the gaining of that which they had so long desired, and now to little hoped for, they forgot their wonted cruelty and breach of Faith, is doubted.

This City thus yielded the Third of October, and the Turks forgetting their wonted Cruelty, according to their Faith and Promise before given, in safety conducted these cowardly Soldiers with by a League of Comara, helping them by the way to carry their sick and wounded Men, together with their Families, which the Turks oftentimes carried upon their own Shoulders. These Cowards, which thus went out, with their Government sent out also with them, were amongst a thousand whole and found Men, fitted, whilst they were in the City, with all things necessary for their Honour and Defence of the Place; but themselves destitute and void of all Honour and Courage. A thousand, which all together were not worth their Government alone, seeing that in him alone there remained more Valour, than in all that whole Multitude. Many of the Inhabitants which had there long dwelt, would not forsake the Place, but by the leave of the Turks were retained still; the rest which would not, having leave in safety to depart whither they would.

Thus this famous City of Strigoniun, one of the strongest Bulwarks of Christendom against the Turks, which the Christians had now holden by the space of ten Years and one Month, after that it was by Count Charles Mansfeld won from the Turks, when as it had long time before been in the Turks Possession, won from them by Count Solyman, now again (as it before said) fell into the Power of the Turks, with threefold and ten pieces of great Ordnance, and a wonderful deal of other Warlike Provision.

These

Most horrible Infamy of these perfidious Soldiers against their Government.

The Conditions whereupon Strigoniun was to be delivered unto the Turks.

The extraordinary Courtesy of the Turks toward the Garrison of Strigoniun at their departure thence.

The Captains and chief authors of the Mutiny, and yielding up of Strigoniun, imprisoned, condemned, and most shamefully, but unworthily executed.

These base and cowardly Soldiers, together with the Count their Government, being come to Comara, were justly deplored both of their Honour and of their Arms, and sent back again to Presburg, where, cursed and detested of all the World, and especially of the Hungarians themselves; (who, although they were revolted from their Allegiance to make the Emperor, yet could they not but much detest their so shameful and notable Cowardice) were there the chief of them committed to Prison, where after they had for a certain time lain, and being brought to Judgement, and convicted of Treason, in delivering up the City of Strigoniun unto the Turks, and in so doing, to have greatly damned the Christian Commonwealth, they were therefore Condemned, and according to the quality of their offences, diversely, in this manner Executed: Captain Leonard Frederick Schloker had his Judgement, first to have his right Hand cut off, and his Tongue drawn out behind his Neck, and both of them nailed to the Gallows, and afterwards to be hanged; howbeit, through the Intercession of many of his Friends, he was not hanged, but beheaded: John Michael Schorer, John Hopf, Adam Lindamar, Philip Dar, and Caesar Liebharter, all Captains, were adjudged to have their right Hands first cut off and nailed to the Gallows, and afterward hanged, but through the Intercession of Count Mansfeld, they were hanged, and their Hands not cut off: John Lautenberger, was condemned to be quartered alive, but was at the Intercession of Count Mansfeld, first beheaded, and afterward quartered: John Diebisch, with eleven others, were only hanged: Lawrence Marfath, was enjoined to serve two Years against the Turks, as a common Soldier, without Pay, but through the Intercession of Count Mansfeld had one Year pardon of him: Jeremy Srelin, with divers others, which were either dead, or else remained still in Strigoniun, were judged, their Names to be set upon the Gallows; and being afterwards caught, some of them to be quartered, and others their Hands to be cut off, and nailed upon the Gallows, and afterward hanged. And thus these disloyal Captains, by flouting of an honourable Death in defence of Strigoniun, and performing of their Duty; by neglecting the same, procured unto themselves a most shameful Death, attended upon with perpetual Infamy and Dishonour.

But, as the loss of this strong Place was unto the Christians heavy and grievous, so was it unto the Turks no less pleasing and joyful; it being the Place they had of long above all others desired, and whereas they had ever since the loss thereof, with their great Armies in Hungary, for the space of ten Years filled aimed. Howbeit, this their Joy endured not long, their Prosperity being too hot to hold out without some cooling blast of adversity Fortune. For the same report of Fame, which with the right hand presented unto the Great Sultan, at Constantinople, the pleasing news of the winning of Strigoniun in Hungary; even with the left hand delivered likewise unto him the melancholy report of the Overthrow of his great Armies in Asia, with the loss of Damafco, the greatest City of Syria.

For, to begin with the greatest first: The King of Perfia, invaded by Cicala Baffa, Sultan Achmat's great Lieutenant in Asia; and hearing that the Baffa of Caramania had express charge, with all speed to come unto him with a great supply of Soldiers, to be taken up in Caramania, and the Countries thereabout; he then having a puissant Army on foot, before prepared for all events, presently set forward against Cicala, with the hope upon him, before he was ready to fight, by his unexpected coming, and sudden charge, overthrew his Army, and took from him all his great

Ordnance; Cicala himself, with three hundred Soldiers, with much ado escaping, and retiring himself to Adena; which City, the Perfia King, pursuing Cicala, shortly after fruitly besieged. With which unlucky news, Sultan Achmat much troubled, forthwith writ unto the Baffa of Trebizond, with all speed to lend aid unto Cicala; who, pursuing unto him some other of the Turks Commanders, with a great Army set forward on his Journey. Of whose coming Cicala hearing, the better to direct the Baffa in his proceeding, caused himself, with ten of his Soldiers whom he best trusted, secretly by Night to be laid down over the Walls of the City: And to coming to the Baffa, together with him kept on his way to join Batel with the King, as near unto the City as he could, for that he had taken order before he came out of the City, that so soon as they should perceive the Batel to be journeyed, they should forthwith fall out upon the backs of the Perfians, and so by holding of them with a doubtful Batel, to further the Victory: All which, the Perfia King hearing of the Baffa's coming, wisely doubting, and not willing to forsake the Siege, divided his Army, and leaving one part thereof to continue the Siege, went himself with the other to meet the Baffa; wherein he used such Expedition and Speed, that with all his Power falling upon him before he could put his men in order, or raise his Batel, he made of the Turks (now confusedly, and without all order, fighting more for the safeguard of their Lives, than for any hope they had of Victory) such an exceeding great Slaughter, that few of them escaped, but were there almost all slain; Cicala himself, but with two or three more, having made ado, by getting into a little Boat, and so by sailing over the River, to escape the danger. After which Victory he easily gained the King returning again to the Siege, after many sharp and great Assaults thereunto given, and many Men on both sides slain, had the same at length yielded unto his mercy.

Now with this news of the loss of his Armies, and of the Victories of the Perfia King, Sultan Achmat enraged, caused Cicala Baffa's House, at Constantinople, full of Treasure and Wealth, to be rifled; after the manner of the World, deeming of the doings of him to great a Captain, according to the event and evil success thereof, though not in his power to have been remedied; nevertheless, shortly after, he caused great sums of Money to be delivered out of his Treasures, and new Forces raised, for the renewing of the War against the Perfia King. Unto which Service, (now become unprofitable to the Turks dreadful) when as many of the Jaziziers were to be appointed, they, after their proud and insolent manner, all arising up in Mutiny, laid flatly, That they would not fight one foot out of Constantinople, except they were both before hand payed, and assured also to have their Wages increased; complaining grievously withal, of the Baffa of Damafco, the Great Sultan's high Treasurer, that he, converting the Sultan's Treasures to his own use, did not pay the Soldiers their wages due. For the appeasing of which Mutiny and Tumults the Sultan caused the same Baffa to be apprehended, and his Head stricken off, and so with the price of his Blood again appeased them.

But leaving the Perfia King triumphing in his Victories, and the Great Sultan grieving at his Losses, let us turn aside into Syria, to see the Troubles the Turks had even amongst themselves, to the weakening of their State, and the increasing of the Great Sultan's Cares and Grief. The two Baffas of Damafco and Allepo, had (as is before declared) been at great variance, and so by their untwist themselves, and the Baffa of Allepo in field over-

1605 overthrown, and in his City besieged, glad to make Peace with the other Baffa, by yielding unto all such things as it pleased him to demand. Which two Baffas for all that being diversely affected unto the State, long agreed not, he of Damafco continuing faithful in his Allegiance towards the Great Sultan, and the other of Altop secretly inclining unto Rebellion. Which the Baffa of Damafco perceiving, and joyning unto him the Baffas of Tripolis and Gazare, with their united Forces went against the Baffa of Altop, leading with them 60000 good Men, with purpose to have besieged the Baffa of Altop, his Enemy, in his City. But he becoming advertised of this his Design, and not unprovided for his coming, quickly called together his Forces, and had in very short time raised an Army of thirty thousand valiant men, whom he encouraging, and finding them willing to follow him whithersoever he would lead them, marched directly towards his Enemies; with whom he meeting, readily joyntly fought with them, which was fought with such fury and hideous noise, as if it had been two thunder-claps opposing each other in one Cloud, striving of themselves which should burst out first, being like People, like Arms, and like order of fight. The medley for a great time continued harsh and furious, the number of the one side countervailing the valour of the other, and he of Altop by balancing the others great number; howbeit in the end the one Baffa overcame the other three, and the smaller number the greater, and putting them to flight, remained sole Victors of the Field. Now the victorious Baffa, as will to use the Victory, as he was valiant to obtain the fame, so eagerly pursued the others, that he gave them no leave to breathe, he besieged Tripolis, the Baffa whereof at his coming abandoned the camp, and carrying with him all his Treasure, fled into Cyprus; which made the taking of the Place unto the victorious Baffa easy, who rifled and ransacked the same; and not content with this Conquest, forthwith besieged the great and strong City of Damafco, resolved to die in the Plains thereof, or to become victorious within the Walls of the same. During which Siege, the Baffa of Tripolis had out of the Provinces and Countries of the Turks thereabouts, raised another great Army, and was coming to raise the Siege, and to rescue the City. Whereof the Baffa of Altop hearing, to have the greatest part of his Army, and meeting with him, gave him battle, and therein the second time overthrew him and put him to flight. Which misfortune so dimmed the Minds of the besieged, that despairing of all Succour and Relief, they, by consent of their Governour, left to Parley with the Enemies, and to upon certain Capitulations yielded unto him the Place. Whereunto the Baffa entering, found therein great Treasures, raised of the Turks Tributes, whereupon he seized, and by the means thereof resolved to make himself master of all Syria, the chief City whereof he had now in his own Power; whereunto he gave free Access and Traffick unto all the Merchants of Perfia, and of the Indies.

Now in the time of this his Prosperity, News was brought him, That the Beglerbeg of Natala had sent his Lieutenant with a great Army against him; who, knowing that Diligence was the Spirit of Conquest, and that to conquer was his chief purpose, without a vigilant care for the Preservation thereof, rest not upon his former good Fortune, but marched directly towards his Enemies: Wherein his Success was answerable unto his Design, for within the space of two days he had taken all the Passages which might give way unto his Enemies to distress him; and in the Straights of the Mountains, whereby the Enemy was to pass, layd a great Ambush of two thousand Hargabuffers, and three thousand Horse, who the Enemies being passed, and he charging them a head, set upon them in the Reteward, and brought such a fear upon them, that having made a great fight, in fine, they having lost a number of Men, were glad to flee, and to leave the Victory to the Baffa. And to the increasing of his good hap, he intercepted a Ship, call'd by Weather upon that Coast, laden with great Treasure, bound from Alexandria to Constantinople, with the Tributes of Egypt, belonging to the Great Sultan. Of all which things the Perfian King advertised, sought to join with him to Syria, highly commending his valiant Aids, and sending unto him honourable Prefers to wit, a Pistol, an Helmet, and a Targuet, all set with precious Stones, esteemed to be worth fifty thousand Crowns. This Flame of Rebellion spread abroad out of Syria into Caramania, and so farther and farther into the lesser Asia. Which was the cause that the Great Sultan sent with all speed unto the Vilier Baffa, then in Hungary, commanding him, now that Strigoniun was taken, which before had hindered the concluding of Peace, he should now upon reasonable Conditions conclude the same, to the end, that his Affairs on this side of his Empire being left in quiet and security, he might forthwith alter his former valour, and turning his Forces against the Perfians and the Rebels in Asia.

But after all these great Troubles, to return again into Hungary. The Rebels there had of long besieged the strong Town of Newbush, as is before declared; which being hitherto valiantly defended by the German Garrison therein, was now brought to such Extremity, as that it was thought almost impossible to be kept longer, and the German Soldiers therein being with oftentimes Affairs for the most part slain, and the rest of them that were left grievously wounded. Of which strong Town (being as it were the Key of that side of the Country) the Turks, which together with the Rebels besieged the same, were, for the commodious Situation thereof very desirous; and the Rebels thereunto as unwilling, for that it being once in their hand, would hardly ever be again once then recovered. For which cause Ulfahissin, one of the Captains of the Hungarian Rebels, then at the Siege thereof, perceiving it could not long be kept, to the intent that the Turks should not by force obtain the same, by Letters required of the Baffa the Emperours Lieutenant, that he might send his Enemy, That the Town might be delivered unto Humanian, another Captain of the Hungarian Rebels, lest the Turks should by force obtain the same, affuring him upon the Peril of his own Life, and the Confiscation of all his Goods to the Emperour, that upon a Reconciliation and Peace to be made betwixt the Emperour and the Hungarians his Subjects, he should again deliver the same Town and Fortresses into his Possession. Whereupon by commandment of the Arch-duke, and of Baffa, the Town was yielded up the seventeenth day of the Month of October, unto the afore said Humanian, and the Hungarians only received into the Town; yet with this Condition, That the German Soldiers which were yet left, and who had valiantly thus long endured the Siege, might still stay in the Town in Pay, and keep watch and ward together with the rest of the Hungarians, Humanian having command over them all.

Wherefore the Turks, seeing themselves disappointed of their Purpose, for the obtaining of this strong Town, rising by Night, and not a little discontented with the Hungarians, marched towards Strigoniun, at the Siege whereof the Vilier Baffa lay. Howbeit within a few days after, the Hungarians not liking to have the German in Garrison with them, turned them with their Captain Strigoniun out of the Town, and yet safely conducted them to Comana.

At the same time, yet of Altop, another strong Town of the upper Hungary, not far from Newbush, having been long besieged by the Rebels, they driven for want of Victuals to leave their Horse, for the space of five Weeks, and having now extenuated them all but seven, and nothing else left, yielded themselves, together with their Town, to the Rebels; as did also they of Wiglas, Schemnitz, and Gremnitz.

In the mean time, Boskoy, with a very great Army, the Hungarian Rebels came to Spier, a strong Town, about Sixteen Miles distant from Comana, attuned upon with a Guard of an hundred tall Soldiers, gallantly apparelled all in blew; a little before whole coming, Humanian, unto whom Newbush was a little before yielded, had summoned Freiburg, requiring the same to be yielded unto him. Which thing, Boskoy, being now come, by Letters likewise required of the Citizens, threatening otherwise most flantly to besiege them. Whereupon, Schenberg, Governour of Freiburg, doubting of the faithfulness of the Citizens, being almost all Hungarians, retired himself, with a good part of his Soldiers, into the Castle, with Protection, to spend his life, and all that he had, for the keeping of the same, and defence thereof. With this Constancy the Citizens moved, continued firm in their Allegiance to the Emperour; which Boskoy perceiving, and that the City was not to be got by threats, forthwith removed and went to Peitz, where he was most honourably received by the Vilier Baffa, and by him presented with a Crown of curious Jewels, and a thousand Ducckes, with five and twenty most goodly Horses; and there, having received from him full power to entreat of Peace, and to conclude the same with the Imperials, with Haly Baffa, and certain other of the chief of the Turks, joyntly in Commission with him, again departed, and went to Kypra, unto an Assembly of the Hungarians there to be holden; whither but a little before Sigismund Forgas was come with the Emperours Resolution concerning the Negotiation of Peace, whereas in the mean time other Commissioners from the Emperour were come to Comana about the Treaty of Peace with the Turks, they themselves requiring.

The Perfian King, at the same time by Letters sent unto the Archduke, advising him that this Treaty of Peace might not, together and at one time, be taken in hand with the Turks and the Rebels; but that if it were possible, an Attomement should be first made with the Rebels, and afterward a Peace concluded with the Turks; the common good of the Country being so convenient to be perceived: The Turks indeed not to be desirous of Peace at all, but only to go on, by keeping of the Christians at variance among themselves, and in insulgence between hope and fear, to do them harm, and themselves good; which was afterwards found to be so indeed.

The Perfian King had some Months before sent three Ambassadors unto his Imperial Majesty, who being come at divers times one after another, were all with peculiar Letters dismissed from Prague, the 26th. of November. Unto the first of which Ambassadors, Letters were given of this purport.

Inel Chan Beg, whom your Majesty hath first Ambassador unto Us, we have willingly seen and received, and given him Audience, in declaring of such things, as he had from you in charge. It is unto Us both acceptable and pleasing, that your Ma-

1605 jolly hath regard, so friendly to salute Us, and so carefully to set, to give us, and to strengthen with Us, whereby your Majesty much hasteneth Us into the desire of mutual love and friendship, which shall be again on our parts should be ready to perform such things as may be unto your Majesty pleasing; and that we should move for nothing more, than that our Friendship should daily more and more be confirmed, and forward: wherein We for this our parts will be wanting: Wherein your Majesty with great Joy hath undertaken, and with so happy success of Vittories hath runned your Wars against the Turk, whereby you had so just cause, We from our hearts in your behalf rejoice, as in all other Christians worthily do; and We our selves are fiercely much animated valiantly and cheerfully to proceed in our Wars, which the more for many years have made with the same Enemy, nothing doubting, but that God, the revenger of wrong, will so prosper the honourable Endeavours of your Majesty, as that you shall not only recover such things as have been wrongfully taken from you, but also weaken and distress the Power of that perfidious Enemy. Which, that it may the better be brought to pass, We also refreshers and Letters, exhort and incite the great Christian Princes and Potentates to extend their Power against this our common Enemy, and thereby to give him opportunity and occasion unto your Majesty, for the better proceeding of your Affairs in Asia. The course of our notable Vittories, which we have in few years, past obtained against the Turks, the Thomists raised in Hungary, have somewhat hindered, howbeit we hope by Gods permission, that all things shall shortly be again returned unto their former estate, so that we may wholly without let turn our selves with our hearts against the Turks. Yet in the mean time, we have thus much presented unto the King of Spain, as that he hath already set forth a Fleet unto the borders of his Territories, to distress his Forces; the progress Success of which Fleet we daily expect. We have also moved the Pope, that he should also give aid in this common Cause, and excite other Princes also to do the like, which be with great Endeavour doth. But concerning such things, as shall hereafter happen, We shall by Letters and Ambassadors certify your Majesty as occasion shall require; as at this present we had appointed to send unto you the Baron of Dohna, a famous and noble Gentleman, who (all things being ready for his Journey) suddenly died; and would have sent another, had not the unexpected change of the Affairs of the Netherlands otherwise distressed Us, we having no other way but that, at this time, to send into Perfia. For concerning the great Prince, who is now reported there to reign, what his mind is, or how he standeth affected, we have as yet no Experience. In the mean time, We do desire a perpetual and firm Friendship to be established betwixt Us and your Majesty, with a cordial peace and free Commerce, that if your Majesty (which We wish) shall extend your Vittories unto the Sea, your Subjects may have free Access and Traffick unto all our Kingdoms and Dominions. We also thank your Majesty, That you so kindly entertain the Christians into your Kingdoms, and grant to them to have the free exercise of their Religion; as also for that you have sent your Ambassadors unto the King of France, although without expectation of Success; whereby We easily gather your Majesties great Care and Circumspection every way. As concerning them whom your Majesty hath sent unto Us, they have diligently and faithfully performed their Duty, both here and in Perfia; whom we much commend unto your Majesty, to whom in all things We offer our greatest Love and Affection.

Unto the Second Ambassador were also given Letters from the Emperor, to this effect.

Writeth Chan Beg, your Majesty's former Ambassador, in the mean time, Mechi Cull Beg, another Ambassador, of yours came unto Us, whose we have courteously entertained, and graciously heard his whole Speech, as also by your Majesty's Letters, We have with exceeding great Pleasure understood both your friendly greeting of Us, as also of the happy Success of your Affairs against the Turks, since the departure of your former Ambassador, together with your kind affection towards the Christians in this Part, and of the Servants also of our Ambassador which died by the way, hath reported unto Us, how courteously our said Ambassador was by your Majesty received; and how you have showed your self affected against the common Enemy, which was unto Us a thing both acceptable and pleasing. Unto both which your Ambassadors the more solemnly to answer, We had appointed again to send an honourable Embassy unto your Majesty, had not these Lets and Impediments happened, which in our Letters given unto your former Ambassador are declared. But so soon, and as often as may be, We will endeavour, either by Letters, or by Ambassadors, more at large to manifest our Love and Affection towards you. Wherefore we greatly desire that your Majesty may continue in perfect Amity with Us, and valiantly proceed in subduing of the common Enemy. We on our part being ready to perform all things whereby we may justify unto you the desire we have for the preservation of our mutual Love and Friendship, as also of our Endeavours in our Wars, against the Turks, whereby long preserve your Majesty in Health, and make you still Victorious against the common Enemy.

Unto the Third Ambassador were likewise Letters given from the Emperor, of this purport.

Writeth Jus Bali Hassan Beg, your Majesty's Ambassador unto the French King, came this way, at the same time that other two of your Ambassadors were here present with Us, we received him with the same Courtesy wherewith we received them, making stay of him, until that they might all three be together dismissed. And because that his Embassy was undertaken for the furtherance of the common Good, although it wanted the wished success, yet We have thought it good to give thanks unto your Majesty therefor, and in most friendly manner to greet you by this your said Ambassador, whom we highly commend unto you, for that for the time he here stayed in our Court, he so behaved himself, as that he well deserved both our and your Majesty's Honour, wherof we wish him to be partaker. Almighty God bless your Majesty with all Felicity, and long to his good Pleasure preserve the same.

These Ambassadors with these Letters thus dismissed, one of them went into Polonia, and there declared unto the King the great Love and Affection of the Persian King towards him, offering unto him all love and kindness; first requesting him, That he would joy with his Majesty in all friendship and brotherly love; and then, that he would take up Arms against the Turk, their common Enemy, promising on his Matters behalf, That he should not lay down Arms until that Enemy were utterly brought to nought and destroyed. So that the Christian Princes would on the other side likewise impug him. This was a strange Message, and not before heard of in Polonia, where, for all that, the Messengers was courteously and bountifully entertained, and afterward with good words put in hope of obtaining what he had requested, was honourably dismissed.

But leaving these Ambassadors unto their long Journey; by reason again of the Hungarians, A great number of the Turks said, Hungarian Rebels, went together at Hidweg, had a purpose secretly to have surprised and oppressed the Imperial Soldiers in their Camps. Of which their purpose they in good time advertised, and therefore keeping good guard at the same time, contrary to their Expectations, as that after a small fight, they caused them to be taken thither to fight; whom the Imperials so hotly pursued towards Cinnia, that they flew of them above a thousand, took about two hundred more of them Prisoners, with fifteen hundred Horses, with which they carried away with them, and so having left sufficient Garrisons on that side of the Country towards Cinnia, returned themselves towards Vienna. In the mean time, the Commissioners from the Emperor being met together at Comara, about the Treaty of Peace with the Turks and the Hungarians, the fifth of December, receiving Letters from the Baia of Buda, certain of them, the next day after, went by water down the River of Danubius to Buda; where, they being honourably received, and having much and long Talk with the Baia concerning a Peace, found little difficulty therein, but that the Turks said they could nothing determine thereof without the presence and consent of the Hungarians. With this Answer, they, full of hope, returned back again to Comara, as did also Sigismund Forgar, with the like hope of Peace from Boisay. At which time, Boisay being about to depart from the Assembly of Kirapack back again to Caffovia, gave Power and Authority to Ulthaficus for the furtherance of the Treaty for Peace; who having received Letters from the Countess from the Arch-duke Matthias, about the end of December, together with his Wife went to Vienna; who being admitted unto the Arch-duke's presence, and having had an hour and halfs Talk with him, and every day after conferred with the Countess from eight a Clock to twelve, at length composed all Difficulties and Differences touching the Treaty of Peace, excepting five Articles only concerning Religion, the free exercise whereof the Hungarians in any wise required; so that now men began to conceive some good hope of a Peace to be in time concluded.

This Year thus ending, with the beginning of the Treaty for Peace, the next Year began with the wonted Troubles of War, the rebellious Haiducks in Hungary doing great harm in the upper Hungary, tyrannizing after their wonted manner upon men of all sort and condition. Where grievously divers Assaults unto divers Cities, they being valiantly repelled, were constrained to retire, the Polesians and Cossacks defending the same; yet did they nevertheless little harm unto the Country Inhabitants. Whereof complaint being made unto the King of Polonia, he by his Ambassador sent to Boisay at Caffovia, obtained, that those spoiling Haiducks should be called back again out of their Parts.

Now had Ulthaficus, the Negotiator for the Treaty for Peace to be made with the Rebels, so well dealt in that matter, as that the same in the latter end of January should have been published at Vienna, but that certain of the chief of the Clergy could not be brought to consent, that the free exercise of Religion should indifferently be granted to all the People in general, but to the Nobility only. Whereupon Ulthaficus, with the rest of the Commissioners for the Hungarians, with great discontentment being about to return home again without any thing at all concluded, the Deputies for the Emperor seeing that it could not be otherwise brought to pass, at length agreed (although though never so much contrary to the liking of the Clergy-men) to satisfy the Hungarians in this their Request, and that the free exercise as well of the Reformed, as of the Romish Religion, should be permitted to all men throughout all Hungary, in such sort, as it had before been in the time of the Emperors Maximilian and Ferdinand. Concerning which point for the Liberty of the Religion, Letters were delivered unto Ulthaficus; all the other points concerning the Peace being put off unto the next assembly of the States of Hungary, shortly after to be holden at Preshburg.

About the beginning of March, the Spahli at Constantinople had requested of the Visier Baia, That it might be lawful for themselves to take up their wonted Pension of the Farmers and Husbandmen here and there in the Country; which although it were unto them by the Visier Baia denied, who had commandment from the Great Sultan within a few days after, to give every one of them his present Pay in Money; yet they not so contented, but going out of the City, presumptuously presumed to trouble the Country-men, and to do the Farmers great harm. For which their Insolency, the Great Sultan (the chief Cages and Leaders of them being again returned into the City) caused them, some to be beheaded, some to be hanged, and other some to be bound in Chains and drowned; whereby no small fear was struck into the rest of the common Soldiers. But the Rebellion in Asia still increasing, and the Rebels there exercising both favouring and furthering the Proceedings of the Persian King, the Sultan forthwith sent for the Visier Baia, who the last year had served in Hungary, to go into Asia, to repress the Rebels there, and also to withhold the Proceedings of the Persian King; committing in the mean time the managing of the War in Hungary unto his Lieutenant.

The Treaty of Peace both with the Turks and the Rebels, was yet in hand, whereunto how much the Turks were for their part inclined, the Garrison Soldiers of Rab had good proof, for the eighteenth day of March, being the day at their request appointed for the Treaty, and whereon the Commissioners on both parts were meeting together, should have furthered the Negotiation of the Peace, not past fifty of the Turks coming to the Gate of the Town, required to be let in, as if they had come for that purpose. Whom our men nothing forbidding, were about to receive them into the Town; when as a Sentinel without the Town, it being a thick mist, perceived three thousand more of the Turks lurking thereby, and forth with giving an alarm to those of the Town, bewrayed the Enemies Treachery, who thereupon retired, they of the Town discharging their great Ordnance after them. The next Month, about the beginning of April, certain Messengers came from Eperia (a City of the upper Hungary, yet holden for the Emperor) to Vienna, declaring the most miserable state of that City; which, although the way thereto had been three or four Weeks before opened, it had received some good store of Victuals; yet now (as they said) was so on every side by the Rebels besieged, as that no Provision at all could more thereto come; hoping by that means to bring to pass, that the Citizens, pinched with hunger and want of things necessary, should at length yield themselves together with the City into their Power. By which means they but a little before had obtained the fleeing Town being taken, the Famine was so great, that the Soldiers had not only eaten their Shoes and Leather Jerkins, but had now also killed two Boys to eat, and some others of them had cast Loys among themselves, which should be killed for the other to eat. By which Extremity, Ruber, the Governor of the Place, was enforced to yield, unto whom Boisay, who then lay at Caffovia, is said to have offered a great sum of Money, with many other good things, to have taken his part; at which he most continually refused, protesting even unto Death to continue faithful in his Obedience to the Emperor.

About the same Time Ulthaficus, who had before not a little laboured about the furthering of the Peace in Hungary, writ Letters from Caffovia unto a certain great Man at Vienna; whereby he declared, that Boisay would not be content of the Estates of Hungary could of himself determine nothing concerning the Conclusion of the Peace; who had oft-times told him to his Face, that rather than they would again submit themselves to a foreign Governour, they would for ever put themselves under the Turks Protection; and yet promised by the same Letters, that although he had got unto himself great Displeasure thereby with the Haiducks, he would not for all that cease by all means to draw the States of the Country in their next assembly unto his part, so that that which was before concluded at Vienna concerning Religion, should not again be revealed; for many of them (as he said) were afraid that it would not be performed, which was there promised unto the States concerning the Exercise of their Religion. And that therefore they could not yet be persuaded to put themselves from under the Turks Protection, until they saw themselves sufficiently secured, both for the Liberty of their Religion, and the keeping of their antient Privileges; and that they could not, nor would not endure a foreign Governour to rule over them, with whom they could not talk; nor yet suffer Clergy-men to have any Voice in their Civil Affairs. And therefore (he said) he by thought in this point to gratify the Hungarians. And that Transylvania, wherewith he had been hitherto enforced to bestow to great cost for the keeping thereof, being now left unto Boisay, he should appoint such a Governour over Hungary, as the States of that Country should require. For that there was no hope of any Peace to be made with the Turks, except Boisay and the States of Hungary should undertake the Treaty thereof; fearing that they, but only seeking for a Peace in show, were oftentimes discovered but to seek for their own Advantages and Profits.

But concerning Ulthaficus himself, the Hungarians Rebels seeing him so much to labour about the concluding of a Peace, in scorn called him by the by-name of Cripulifacius, as he that too much inclined unto the Germans; which by-name he took in so ill part, as that he departed straight to Eperia, with a purpose not to have been present at the next assembly of the States; but being again pacified, and by Boisay called back, he made such a notable Speech unto the States in their next Assembly, that all men now began both to hope and with more for Peace than they had before done.

In the mean time the Turks in great numbers being gathered together to Belgrade, expected the end of this Treaty for Peace, and Letters from the Great Sultan to Boisay were intercepted also; whereby he advised him to proceed in his purpose, and joining with his Powers, to seize upon Alstria, Bohemia, and Moravia; for that he could be contented with Hungary and Transylvania, and leave the rest of the Provinces unto Boisay as his Inheritance.

The Tartars about this Time were about to make a Road into Polonia; but when as they with their often Incursions had not a little troubled the Haiducks also in the upper Hungary, they resolved amongst themselves to joyn their Forces together, and to fight as well against the Turks as the Tartars, and from thenceforth neither to fight the one nor the other.

Hereupon, whenas the Turks in great number came to assault Lippa, a Town of the Haiducks, they forsaking the Town, fortified the Castle with certain Companies of armed Men, and afterwards beset many others here and there in Caves and Cellars in the Town, and laid great store of Gun-powder there. Upon which Town the Turks coming, and finding the Gates open, and none to resist them, halted to have taken the Castle. But in the mean time, the Powder which the Haiducks had laid taking fire, blew up a number of them, and they which lay hid in the Caves and Cellars forthwith breaking out, flew of them whomsoever they met, and so made of the Turks a great slaughter, and again cleared the Town.

The Estates of Austria, considering the great harms they had in these late Troubles received, as well from the Hungarian Rebels, as from the Emperours' malicious Souldiers; and by Experience taught how dangerous a thing it was for them to rest upon other means for their defence, being thus their frangers; resolved now in a general Assembly of the Estates by them about this time holden, to take upon themselves the defence of their Country, against such sudden Incursions and Tumults of the malicious Souldiers, and no more to rely upon foreign Protection, still to seek when they had need to look upon themselves, to assure themselves in their own strength; they, with a general consent, agreed to have always in readiness two thousand Horle-men, and eight thousand Foot-men, to be maintained at the common Charge; fifty of the Country Peasants still finding one of the said Souldiers.

And much about this time, viz. the Third of June, Illshafius, a great Man amongst the Rebels, and yet the greatest furtherer of the Peace, (as appeared by his doings, and by that we have before of him written) having before obtained Letters of safe conduct from the Arch-duce, came now again with his Wife also to Vienna, there more at large to confer upon the Articles for a Peace to be concluded, with such as were on the Emperours behalf for that purpose deputed. Where, coming to confer and talk upon the matter, he was crost by Nicholas Bishop of Vienna, who hitherto had been present in Council together with the rest of the Commissioners, (a great enemy unto the Peace, in respect of the Article concerning the Liberty of Religion) he was, I say, by him crost, as that there was no hope of any thing to be for the common quiet concluded, so long as he was there present. For which cause, he, on both sides, and of all men divers of the Peace disliked, was in the Arch-dukes words willed no more to come into the Council for the disturbing of the Peace. In which Negotiation for the concluding of the Peace, Illshafius had taken such pains in travelling to and fro between the Arch-duce then lying at Vienna, and Boskey with the States of Hungary then lying at Cassovia, and so debated the matter on both sides, that all things being at good as agreed upon; for a full conclusion of all matters, he himself, together with George Hunaninus, Francis Magot, Sebastian Tockell, Stanislaus Turfon, and others, with two hundred Horle, and two and thirty Waggon, in all, four hundred Persons, the Seventh of September came to Vienna, with fifty Hussars following of them: Shortly after whose coming, the Treaty of Peace was earnestly begun with often Messengers passing to and fro between Vienna and Cassovia to Boskey, lying then very dangerously sick, until that all the Articles of Peace were near about the Fourteenth of September fully on both parts agreed upon; most diverse arising about the Article for the free Exercise of Religion. For although it was before declared, that men might have the free Exercise of Religion; yet the Hungarians, recalling that general word of Religion unto a particularity, would needs have it set down, that men might have the free Exercise of those Religions, which as on this day, called the Lutheran, Calvinian, and Romish Religion; neither would they conclude any Peace until they were of their Request in that point satisfied. Which Peace so concluded the next day after, the Deputies for the Hungarians sent an Ambassador to the Visier Bassa at Buda, to certify him of all their Proceedings, and the disturbing of the Peace; now the Articles whereupon the Peace was concluded, were these:

1. That from thenceforth it should be lawful for every Man throughout the Kingdom of Hungary, to have the free Use of his Religion, and to believe what he would.

2. That if the Hungarians so thought good, they might chuse a Palatine for their Country, who in the mean time the Arch-duce Mathias should no more use the Title of a Governor, but of a Vice-roy.

3. That the Crown of Hungary should still be left in the Emperours keeping.

4. That the Bishops that were nobly defended in Hungary, and had Lands and tithes, should from thenceforth be admitted into the Council, but the other Bishops not to be received.

5. That Boskey, for himself and his Heirs Male, should for ever hold Transilvania.

6. That the same Country of Transilvania should be still subject unto the Kingdom of Hungary.

7. That for his time he should bear three Royal Crowns and three open Helmets.

8. That he should no more afterwards file himself Prince, but Lord of part of the Kingdom of Hungary.

9. That they should pay the Haiducks their Wages which had levied them.

10. That the Harms done on both sides should for ever be forgotten.

11. That Bohemia, Moravia, Silesia, Lausium, and Austria, should not only with their Letters and Seals confirm the Articles, but also swear at Vienna to keep the same so far as should concern them.

12. That the Hungarians should likewise send some to Vienna, who in their behalf should with their Letters, Seals, and Oaths, confirm and ratify these Articles.

13. That the Assembly of the Estates of Hungary should be referred until a more convenient time for them.

14. That all these things being done, this Agreement should be publicly confirmed and enrolled in the Records of the Kingdom of Hungary.

15. That it should be lawful for the Hungarians by their Ambassadors to invite the Princes of the Empire to the approving and confirming of these Articles.

Which fifteen Articles were on the Emperours part subscribed by Trasfem, Mollart, Sigisfrid, Pruner, Lichtenstein and Krenke; and on the part of the Hungarians, by Illshafius, Peter Erhod, George Turjo, and Sigisfrid Forgat, and others.

A great Fire at Constantinople.

The Turks seeking to surprise others, themselves surprised.

The Commissioners for the Emperour, in treaty with the Turks come to Pisburg.

The Peace already concluded with the Hungarians, like enough to have again been broken off through the Treachery of some few disaffected Persons.

The twentieth of September following, the Ambassador for the Hungarians and of Boskey, being admitted unto the Presence of the Archduke Matthias, obtained of him Pardon for the forepassed Rebellion, and all that was therein done; unto whom security for the same was afterward given by the Province, thereby by no means to assure themselves, they should not be therefore afterwards troubled. But yet for all that was before done, the Title of the Prince of Transilvania was left unto Boskey for Term of his Life: who feeling his Sickness daily to increase, would oftentimes say, That he could willingly die, so that it might please God before his Death to give him leave to leave himself of his Rebellion before the whole Roman Empire. And so about the end of September, all the afore-said Ambassadors for the Hungarians and Boskey, being assembled into the Castle of Vienna, together with the Emperours Council, and certain other Noblemen of the Province belonging unto the Emperour, received every one of them the Articles of the Peace copied out, and laid written in Parchment, which done, they returned every one to his own dwelling. But Illshafius went from thence to Newbuhl, to be present at the Peace to be afterwards made with the Turks also; from whence he afterwards writ Letters unto the Visier Bassa, to request him, not as yet to attempt any thing against the Emperours Recovery, but peaceably and quietly to expell his Commissioners, which were thotly to come unto him.

But in the mean time whilst this Peace was thus in concluding, certain Tartars at Constantinople, in their Infidelity, let fire upon a certain Jews House, whereto arole such a terrible fire, as burnt not only many Houses, but a great number of the Jews themselves also; the harm there done being esteemed at forty hundred thousand Ducats. In which Tumult and Noise of the People running too and fro, and quenching of the Fire, the Great Sultan having a fall from his Horle, was thereof for a while sick.

The Turks of Constantia also having conspired with the Captain of the lesser Comora, came to have surprised the same. But the Garrison Souldiers there, having before had a Suspicion thereof, suffered so many of the Turks as they knew they were able to overcome, to enter; and so shutting the Gates of the City, kill'd them every Mothers Son, the rest which were without returning again to Constantia.

Peace thus (as is aforesaid) concluded with the Hungarians, George Turfon, Nicholas Hunan, John Mollart, and Alben, with some others, the Emperours Commissioners for a Peace to be made with the Turks, went to Comora; Sigisfrid Colloredo and Budin following them with the Army; for as yet the said Commissioners durst not altogether trust the Turks for interposing of them the way. Which Commissioners carried with them Solyman the Bassa of Buda, who had now been seven years kept Prisoner in the Castle of Vienna; and Alb Bassa, both bravely appaelled in blew Silk; six Waggon following of them, wherewith were carried certain Presents for the Great Sultan, to wit, a most curious Clock, certain fair pieces of Plate, an hundred thousand Ducats, with divers other things of great value.

But whilst they there staved, expecting to hear from the Visier Bassa then at Buda, a sudden insolent Accident fell out, like enough to have broken off again the Peace already made with the Hungarians; as also to have utterly cut off the Treaty of Peace to be had with the Turks; and to have let them all together by the Ears again. For albeit that the first Article of the Peace made with the Hungarians, was, That every Man should have the free Exercise of his Religion; yet the eighth day of October, about three of the Clock in the Afternoon, when a certain Hungarian Lutheran Preacher was in the Pulpit preaching to the People in a Church, in the Suburbs of Comora, Buchem and Knewie, two Captains, coming from Dinner with certain of their Servants more than half drunk, with their Swords drawn, rushed into the Church, and drove out thence the Preacher, upon whom Captain Buchem's Trumpeter also discharged a Pistol, and raised such a Tumult in the Church, that divers Children were tumbled to Death under foot, and the rest put in great fear of their Lives.

Which insolent Fact so moved the Hungarians, that Turfon and Budin there present, with the rest of the Commissioners, ready to have gone about the Treaty of the Peace, would needs the next day have departed from Comora, and were hardly by Mollart and Colloredo intreated to lay; Buchem and Knewie, the two Captains, being bound to their appearance for the answering of the matter, and the Trumpeter with Irons on his heels clapt in Prison. But the News hereof being carried to Newbuhl, and (as the manner of Report is) by Fame made far greater than it was; That an hundred and fifty Persons were slain in the Church, there arole such a Tumult amongst the Hungarians there, as that Illshafius, with the rest of the Captains, had much ado to quiet and appease the same; who, joyning with the Turks of Sirigone, and the Haiducks of the Illands, had determined now by Night to have invaded Comora, where the Outrage was committed, had not Vogrania the elders (a Man of great Gravity) coming from thence, declared unto Illshafius and the rest of the Captains all the Matter as it was done; upon whose Relation the whole Tumult was again appeased. But for as much as the two aforesaid Captains, bound to their Appearance, were by Night fled from Comora to Vienna, the Hungarians were very earnest to have them severely punished, as breakers of the first Article of the Peace, concerning Religion. Boskey in the mean time beleaded Catay's his Chancellor, who had gone about to have poisoned him, in hope after his Death to have been Prince of Transilvania himself; and so giving John Janffy in his stead, and giving him Catay's Lands.

Peace now made with the Hungarians (as is aforesaid) and Commissioners appointed for a Treaty of Peace to be had with the Turks also, (whereunto the Visier Bassa, then lying at Buda, was as forward as any being so commanded from the Great Sultan his Majesty) were wanted but a Place commodious for the said Commissioners, without Suspicion of Danger, and indifferent for them all to meet in. Whereupon Gasper Gallen, a Man of great Experience in such Matters, with some other convenient Place pointed to find out some such convenient Place for them to meet in; who having viewed many at length made choice of one within half a League of Comora, so fit for that purpose, as if Nature had provided it for the same. The great River of Danubius being there divided into three parts, made therein the Illands, all compassed with the Arms thereof, which the Commissioners for the Emperours, for the Turks, and for the Hungarians, might come without let one of another, to treat of their Affairs, and so in little Boats prepared for that purpose, pass over one to another, as their Occasions required. Into this place, so commodious for all three parties, the Deputies of the Emperours, the fifth and twentieth day of October, conducted by the Peace.

Horle:

Horietmen of Mansfeld, Hohenlo, and Bonchimin. After whom followed Milbachius, and the other Deputies for the Hungarians, assisted with the Nobility of Hungary, all attending the coming of the Great Sultans Commissioners; who likewise immediately after came, being brought up the River in four and twenty brave Ships well appointed.

Their Commissioners being thus apart arrived in the Islands, began first to consult by themselves, every one of their several Affairs and Business, and afterwards many times meeting together, with much Gravity consulted and conferred of the best ways and means for the making of a good and assured Peace for the appeasing of these Wars; which every one of them and all together, to that end employing the utmost of their Endeavours, at last the nineteenth of November, it was betwixt all the three Parties fully agreed upon and concluded, and Hoftages on all parts given one to another, with Oaths and Promises solemnly on all sides given and received, for the inviolate keeping and observing of the same; the Articles whereupon the said Peace was concluded being these:

A Peace concluded between the Emperour and the great Sultan.

Articles of the Peace concluded betwixt the Emperour and the great Sultan.

First, That the Emperour and the Great Sultan, in all their Letters, Dispatches, Instruments, and Embassages, should not file themselves by any other Names or Additions, but by the Names of well beloved Father and Son; to wit, the Emperour calling the Great Sultan his Son, and the Great Sultan the Emperour (in respect of his years) his Father.

That in the beginning of their Letters they should take upon them the Name and Quality of Emperour, and not of King, respectively one of them to another.

That these two Emperours should take order, that the Realm of Hungary and the Archduchedom of Austria, might be in Rest, Peace, and Tranquillity, and altogether delivered and assured from all Incursions, Oppressions, and Outrages of the Men of War on both Parties.

That it should be lawful for the King of Spain, if he so thought good, to enter into this Treaty of Peace, without the Opposition or let of one of the other of both these Emperours in any sort.

That the Tartars, and all other People usually wont to come in Arms into Hungary, should be compelled within this Treaty of the Peace, to be of disarmed of all Power by their means to do harm within the Realm of Hungary, and they there assured from their Violences and Robberies.

That every one, both on the one part and on the other, should forbear from making Incursions and Pillages, and Enterprizes of War, and from all Acts of Hostility one against another; and yet every one nevertheless to have Power to pursue Thieves and Robbers, and such others seeking after Booty, to the disturbing of the Peace, and injuring of the Common-weal; whereof every man should have Power to give knowledge, to the intent by common force to suppress them, and to cause them to recompence the Wrongs and Harms by them done.

That all Places, Castles, Towns, and Forts, should remain without attempt either on the one part or on the other, whether it were by Force, Surprise, or Treason, and so likewise the Goods, Families, and Cattel of the Country-men; which were of their Territories and Jurisdiction; Bosny still holding all that was lately to him granted by the Treaty of Vienna.

That all Prisoners taken in the Wars should be set at Liberty, but especially such as had been taken in Towns and Citadels, which by their Valour and Courage they fought to have defended; and the other Prisoners to be delivered by Exchange and Ransom, as should be most expedient and easie for both Parties.

That all Controversies happening, as well on this side as beyond the River of Danubius, should be peaceably ended by the Judgment of the Governor of Rab, of the Batta of Buda, of the Governor of Scawonia, and of the Governors of other Places; and that if they should chance to be of such important Weight and Consequence, as that they could not by these Magistrates be determined and composed, that they should in that case be referred to be decided by their Imperial Majesties; and that it should be lawful both for the one party and the other to repair and build the Places ruined, but not to build Places new, which might prejudice either the one part or the other.

That Amurath the Visier Bassa should send his Messengers with Presents to the Archduke Matthias, and that the Emperour should dispatch an Ambassador toward the Great Sultan with 1000000 Ducks, and that the Great Sultan likewise should send his Ambassador to Prague with great and rich Presents to the Emperour.

That this Peace should begin in the year 1607, and continue for the space of twenty years, and that one of the Emperours should send unto the other every three years their Ambassadors with their honourable and rich Presents, according to the Pleasure and Power of their Majesties.

That all the Emperours Successors, as also those of the Kingdom of Hungary, should be comprehended within this Agreement of Peace, together with all their Kinsmen, Allies and Confederates, as likewise those of the Great Sultans also.

That the Christians should again have the City of Vachia, which they should at their Pleasure keep and fortifie, and that Strigonium, with all the Villages thereto belonging, should remain unto the Great Sultan; yet so, as that no man should be with any new Tribute oppressed; and that such as had been free from paying of Tribute, should still keep the same Privileges.

And that the Turks should not exact their Tributes by the point of their Swords, but by the way of Justice, which they should commit unto the Discretion of Judges and Receivers to that end appointed, that so it might be paid without oppressing of the People, except haply they which should pay it, upon Prelimination should deny it, or too long delay the Payment of it, in which case it should be lawful both for the one side and the other, to use such means as should seem unto them good for the obtaining thereof.

These are the Articles of this Peace, which God turn to the Glory of his Name, and the benefit of the Christian Common-weal; and for which all the Towns of Hungary made great Joy and Triumph, which they declared by the thundering of their Cannons, which they in great number discharged, with many other Solemnities and Triumphs. The Commissioners themselves, in token of their conceived Joy, magnificently feasted one another also; which the Turks first began, and not content to have made them great cheer, gave unto our Commissioners great Presents also; for the Batta of Buda gave unto Mollart, Albani, Turfon, Alvan, Colibite, Budian, Hendoe, Caspar Gallen, and Elefchin, brave and courageous Horses most gallantly furnished; and to the rest exceeding rich garments and Tapestry Hangings of great value. And as at the time of this Feast, the Troop of Mansfeld had by many Salies and Volleys of shot given great Pleasure unto the Turks as they sat at the Table; Alla Bassa, to declare the Contentment and Pleasure sure he had therein received, sent to the Captain of this Troop two hundred Ducks, which he would not accept, requesting in stead of them to have delivered unto him a certain Captain by the Turks then kept Prisoner; whom the Bassa caused freely to be delivered unto him, and withal sent back again the two hundred Ducks to be divided among the Soldiers; which for all that Mansfeld refused, sending them back again unto the Bassa. After which Additions of Joy and Peace, every man returned home well content and pleased.

These things thus done, and the Peace confirmed, the Bassa of Buda forthwith sent his Ambassador to Constantinople, certifying the Great Sultan of it. Peace now made with the Christians who of late conceived great Joy, with a number of Janizaries and others, in great Magnificence went to the Church, to give Thanks therefore unto his Prophet Mahomet, and spent the next day with great Sport and Pleasure, purposing from thenceforth to turn all his Force and Power for the suppressing of his Rebels in Asia, and the subduing of the Persian King.

Now albeit that there was a Peace of late concluded with the Hungarians at Vienna, (as is before declared) yet divers fires and Tumults were nevertheless by the Haiducks in divers Places of the upper Hungary still raised; inasmuch that about the end of November, the Inhabitants of the County of Bosny were through their Infolencies enforced to joyn Battel with them, wherein a number on both sides were slain, and three Country Villages burnt, so that it should seem, no Peace can be so well and indifferently made, but that some will be still troubling and impugning the same.

Shortly after, viz. the Thirtieth of December, Bosny calling together an Assembly of the Estates of Hungary, propounded to them to be considered of, first, That the late Revolt, almost generally made throughout all Hungary, with all the fires and troubles thereby raised, had all been hitherto to no other end made, but for the defence of their Religion, and the maintenance of their ancient Liberty: Then, That whereas they by their general good liking had made choice of him for their Prince, and that hitherto he had done nothing without their knowledge and consent; and that even now at this present he was by their consent ready to depart from the Castles and free Cities in the upper Hungary; and had now sent his Letters unto the Archduke Matthias, for the sending of his Deputies to receive them, whether he should from thenceforth relinquish the Title of a Prince, or not. And that for as much as no War could be made without great harm doing, that he would therefore, for the avoiding of farther troubles about such matters, that a Decree should be made, That all such Wrongs and Injuries should be forgiven and forgotten, and that every man should fill hold all his good Goods, whether they were moveable or immovable, during the time of this late War. He wished also that the next general Assembly of the States, with all their Power and Endeavour, to urge the repealing of the Article concerning the burning of Heretics, with all other Articles contrary to their Religion; and not to remit any thing concerning the choice of their Palatine, as had in former time been used; neither in this next general Assembly of the Estates to neglect any thing which might seem to concern their Privilege of Liberty. And that therefore they should be careful to send thither Wife and powerful men, such as should not easily be overcome with the Clamours and Out-cries of the contrary Parr. At length he wished them to consider of this also, how a true and sincere Confederation might be made betwixt Hungary and Transilvania, so that a safe and quick Traffick and Commerce might in both Places be used.

These things thus done, Bosny's sickness fell more and more increasing upon him, to at length prevailed, that it made an end of him, to the great sorrow and grief of all the People in general, who had him in great Honour and Regard. He died at Calissia the Thirtieth of December, in the Year 1606. He was honourably defended, and a Man of great Spirit, Ambitious, Wife, and Politick, a great lover of his Country, but an extreme Enemy unto the Germans, and their Government in Hungary.

A little before his Death, he earnestly persuaded John Janfise his Chancellor, to continue in his Allegiance to the Emperour, and not to raise new fires, or to much as in him was, not to suffer any to be raised. Nevertheless, such his wholefome Counsel not regarded, there were some, who immediately after his death, were about to have raised new Forces, for to have seized upon Transilvania, and so to have stirred up new Troubles. For preventing whereof, Matthias the Archduke forthwith sent a Messenger unto the States of the upper Hungary, advising them, That the great harms and miseries considered which that part of Hungary had of late felt as an incurable, almost to the utter ruine and destruction thereof, which proceeded not so much from the Wars with the Turks, as from their own civil Tumults and Seditions; they should from thenceforth give themselves to Quietness and Peace, and not again insolently to prescribe unto the Emperour what to do, or how he was to dispose of the Country of Transilvania, assuring them, that the Emperour would not hereafter be as such a rebel, who rebellious Plots and Devices, but forthwith turn all his Power and Forces to the utter destruction and rooting out of such rebellious and seditious Persons, the disturbers of the common Peace and Quiet. By which the Arch-duke's warning, some, otherwise ready enough to have raised new fires and troubles, were not therein to forward as otherwise haply they would have been, but kept themselves quiet.

Now many there were (and yet are) which much marvelled, that the Christian Emperour would thus make Peace with the Great Sultan, (as is aforesaid) he being then so much troubled with Wars, both against his own Rebels, and the Persian King, in Asia, most part of his Forces being turned that way; so that a fitter time, or of more advantage, could not have been wished for the Emperour to have done greater matters against him in, and not only to have holden his own (which he did not) in Hungary, but so to have recovered some good part of his Losses there before received also. And indeed true it is, that the time then well served for both; but what availeth opportunity without Power? And had the Hungarians (the greatest strength the Emperour hath hitherto had for the defence of that little which is yet left of that so great a Kingdom) been at quiet, and at his Command, and he himself a Prince which had reflected upon his own Strength and Power, ever at his pleasure to have been raised, and as need should require, supplied, without depending upon his Friends and Allies; then haply it might have been in him accounted a great oversight to have omitted and overlooked so fair an opportunity. But the Hungarians, being then not only revolted from him, but taking part with the Turks, and the Turks with them, and he of himself with his own Power not able to hold the Field against them, or well to maintain a defensive War, and his Friends and Allies, his wonted and greatest stays, then his greatest need failing of him also, what should he in such a case do but as he did: to accept of a reasonable Peace whilst he might have it; especially against such an Enemy, as whose whole Power being turned against him, might have easily endangered his whole Estate. For it is not reasonably to be thought, how the Emperor should of himself, without the great Aid of the other Christian Princes, his Friends and Allies, be able to withstand the huge and dreadful Power of the Ottoman Emperor; as (without ominous Preface he is spoken) it is to be feared it will too true appear, whenever his Wars and Troubles in the East being ended, he shall again turn his Forces this way toward the West.

Now Batavia was no longer dead, but that some of those of the Nobility, both of Hungary and Transylvania (happily no less ambitious than he) began by divers means to seek after and aspire to that Principality. Of whom, though some, either with the weakness of their own means, or with the threats of Matthias the Archduke, deterred, ceased farther to seek after it; yet were there some others, who better supported, and nothing afraid of the Arch-duke's great Words, laboured under hand to have obtained it. For the croaking of whom, and the arising of farther Trouble to be raised by their ambitious Competitions, certain of the Nobility of Transylvania gathered together at Glandianople, the Twelfth of February, made choice of Sigismund Ragotz for their Governour, and their Prince of Transylvania, and the more to assure him of their love and affection towards him, bound themselves unto him by the Oath of their Allegiance solemnly taken in the chief Church there. And afterward sent Messengers to the Archduke Matthias at Vienna, to certify him what they had done, and to excuse themselves thereof; who coming to Presburg the Twelfth of March, they openly protested this Election of Ragotz for their Prince to have been made, not for that they were about to rebel, or to revolt from the Emperor, whom they would always acknowledge for their Sovereign Lord; but for that their necessity so required, many of the Nobility both of Transylvania and of Hungary gaping after this Principality, and going about for the obtaining thereof, to raise new fits and troubles. However, the same Ragotz, afterward doubting not to be able, without great trouble and danger, besides the Emperor's displeasure, to hold the same Principality of his own accord, about a year after, gave the same up again, and got himself out of the way to Sarennum, who was no longer gone, but that Gabriel Bathor was about to have slept into his Place; unto whom the States of Transylvania sent word by two of the Noblemen, That the free Election of the Prince belonged to them, and that therefore he should not seek by force to intrude himself into the Principality, but quietly to come unto the Election, and not to bring with him above a thousand Horse-men, and five hundred Foot.

Newbush agreed unto by the Emperor
Empire.

About this time, the strong Town of Newbush (otherwise called Newbushel) the last year so hardily won by the Hungarian Rebels was again delivered to Sigismund Colonius, for the Emperor; who, shortly after coming to Vienna, brought news of a great number of the Turks have risen up in Rebellion at Brigade, to have rifled the Town, and to have burnt another Town, called Alibria, down to the ground, and so with a great Prey to be gone over to the Rebels; and also Redeus, Batavia's Lieutenant, in going to take Possession of certain Lands given him by Batavia, to have been by an own Tenant, lying in wait for him upon a fair Passage; slain.

Amongst the Articles of the Peace before concluded betwixt the Emperor and the Great Sultan, one was for the mutual tending of Presents one of them unto another; with which Presents, when as the Ambassador, by the Emperor appointed for the carriage of the same to Constantinople, from day to day deferred to fer forward, the Turks and Tartars began to doubt, or else seemed to doubt, of the good meaning of the Christians, for the observing of the aforesaid Peace; and thereupon began again not only to roam abroad into the Territories of the Christians, but also caused the Pledges left at Buda for the observing of the Peace, to be hardly handled and clapt fast in Prison; whom, whereas the Balks of Buda shortly after suffered again a little to walk abroad, the proud Janiaries were therewith so much off-ninded, that rifling in a Tumult, they upon him many reproachful Words, and unto his Face calling him Traytor and Betrayer of his Prince and Country, one of which Pledges they grievously wounded also. Which their Insolency the Balks in some sort to chafe, and to deter them from doing the like again, caused certain of them the Night following to be secretly taken, and being bound, to be to cast into the River of Danubius. And yet shortly after, they purposing to make a Road upon the Christians, to colourably harms as they should therein do, and to lay all the blame thereof upon the Christians, and to excuse themselves, they procured the Balks to write unto the Archduke Matthias, of great wrongs done unto the Turks by the Christians, whereas there was no such thing at all; the effect of which Letters were, That whereas it was in the Articles of Peace left down and agreed, that both Parties should abstain from the Christians for all that had above an hundred times since the conclusion of the Peace, made Roads into divers Territories of the Turks, and slain many of them; but especially them of Leven and Serfchin, who (as they said) had slain divers Turkish Merchants of Pesth, and taken from them great sums of Money, as they had also taken from them of Pesth a hundred and twenty Florins, with divers other Cattel. Besides that, there were (as he said) four Turks more by the Christians slain, near unto Camsitz, and eight and twenty more taken Prisoners; and that in the mean way betwixt Hatman and Buda five and twenty Turks more were slain, and their Horses, with all that they had beside carried away. Which things, for that they tended to the breach of the Peace, he could not (as he said) but advertise his Highness of, for that he thought the Christian Captains upon the borders of their Territories to be men that hated Peace, and to seek by their Excursions, as heretofore they had done, to now likewise also, to disturb this good Work begun, and by all means to increase their own private Profit. And that therefore, seeing that he and the Turks on their part wished not to attempt or go about any thing contrary to the Articles of the Peace, that it likewise the Christians should contain themselves within their own bounds, and with all speed by Letters to give him to understand whether they would keep the Peace or not.

The Great Sultan (as is aforesaid) having made Peace with the Christian Emperours and now purposing to turn all his Forces against the Rebels in Asia, and the Perfian King, (as we have oftentimes said) and desirous to appease those his Troubles at home, before he had farther to do with the Perfian, he sent a Messenger unto the Balks of Alleppe, to lay down Arms, and to deliver over his charge unto another, to whom he had appointed pointed the same; promising, that if he would shew himself obedient unto this his Command, he would not only pardon him all that was past, but receive him into his Grace and Favour also. Whereunto the Balks answered, That he had never taken up Arms against his Majesty, but to be revenged on the Balks of Tripolis and Damafco, his sworn Enemies; who once taken out of the way, he would not only yield himself unto his Majesty, but re-deliver also the Tribute sent him from Caire and Alexandria, by him before intercepted, and (if he so pleased to employ him) to bring great Forces in his Service against the Perfian King. With which answer, the Sultan not contented, shortly after sent the Vifler Balks with a great Army against the Rebels into Asia; who, by his Willdom and Discretion, more than by force of Arms, having appeased the Rebels in the letter of Asia, and received certain of the chiefest of them into his favour, with an Army of an hundred and thirty thousand men marched directly towards Alleppe in Syria. Of whose coming, the Balks of Alleppe having intelligence, with an Army of forty thousand men, most part of them Harquebushers, went against him, and in a place of advantage, not past two miles from the City, there encountered him, and in three notable Battels one after another, withstood his whole Forces. But making himself ready to have encountered him the fourth time, understanding of great aid coming to the Vifler from the Balks of Damafco and Tripolis, he with speed retired, and returning into the City, and having trussed up his Treasure, with such things as he made most reckoning of, fled into the Mountains towards Perfia, with the greatest part of his Army yet left following him. After which unfortunate Battle, the Vifler Balks with his Army coming unto the City at the tenth by force took the same, and there, to the terror of the Inhabitants, put to the sword all the Garrison soldiers which the Balks had there left.

But the Balks, purposing with new Forces to have encountered with the Vifler, finding himself, together with his better Fortune, forsaken by many of his former Friends and Companions, did think it best at length to take his refuge unto the mercy of the Great Sultan; and to be relieved, by Letters requested the Vifler Balks to write in his behalf unto the Sultan; and so, if it were possible, to procure his peace. Which the Vifler having easily obtained, he was by Letters from the Great Sultan sent for to Constantinople, with assured promise, that he should be employed in favour against the Perfian King. Upon receipt of which Letters, the Balks with an hundred horse fer forward; and coming to Constantinople, there, in the presence of many other of the Balks, humbled himself unto the Sultan; who not only kept his promise with him in pardoning him, but also, in regard of the ancient Family whereof he was descended, as also of his great valour and fair conditions, received him again into his favour, and caused all the goods taken from him in Syria, to be again restored unto him.

Now in the mean time the great Sultan had, by the means of the great Cham of Tartary, endeavoured to make peace with the Perfian King, but all in vain; for that he demanded the City of Tauris, with all the Provinces before taken from him; which the Perfian King utterly denied, for as much as he had now by force of Arms recovered the same, and which in former time belonged unto his Ancestors. At which time the said Perfian King, the more to entangle the Turks, wrote unto the King of Spain, for the turning of his Forces also against the Turks, their common Enemy; the Letters being to this effect: That though they were in Religion divided, yet that in Power and in common hatred against the Ottoman Empire they were conjoined; and that he, considering the greatness of his Power and Arms, whereby he was become his Neighbour in the East, could not but most entirely love and favour him; and that therefore he had commanded all his Provinces, as well in India as in other places thereof, that they should shew unto his Subjects all manner of courtesy, and to demand of them no Tribute. And that he, having by force recovered the Frontiers of Aden, which Sulym the Turkish Sultan had sometime by Treason surprised, had appointed the same unto the service of the Spanish Governour dwelling in Goa. And that his pleasure was, That all the Christians dwelling in his Kingdom should enjoy the same liberty and privileges which his own faithful Subjects had. And besides declared, that he had now for seven years past made continual Wars against the Turkish Sultan, who had by Treason taken from him the strong Town of Chilam, for the recovery whereof, he had now divers times overthrowen his Armies. But for as much as he was determined to make no end of this War, until he had driven the Sultan out of those parts of the East, and recovered the Seat of Imajel and Juchel, his Ancestors in Babylon and Caire, he therefore requested him, being a King of so great power, to join in League with him, and to lend him his powerful Fleet into the Persian Gulf; promising, that by such means, the Ottoman Power driven out, he could easily make himself Lord of Syria and of Egypt. Last of all, he knocked up the Presents he sent him, to wit, the Images of Imajel, Juchel, and of Jofay, together with his own, cast in gold, and set with most rich precious Stones and Pearls; a Persian writing Table, garnished with fair precious Stones, four Dogs, by nature wonderfully spotted with red, yellow, and blue spots, two pieces of Arras, adorned with most precious Stones and Pearl, wherein the worthy Acts of him that great Tamartane were lively to be seen: four Hunters horses very smooth and richly garnished; twelve most gallant Plumes of Feathers of divers colours: six Drinking-glasses which could not be broken, and Cock-beds so cunningly made, as that they were like unto Chairs, having wrought in them the ancient Wars betwixt Africanus and Chifia King of the Modes.

Now the Emperor, for the better appealing of all former troubles, and the preventing of new, and the better assurance of the State, had, about the middle of August, called an Assembly of the States of Hungary to Presburg; whither they being come, and having long in vain expected the coming of Matthias the Arch-duke, by the Emperor appointed to have been President in that about to have returned home, but that, requested by the Arch-bishop to stay yet fifteen days longer, they were contented to do so; but yet upon condition, That if the Arch-duke they came not, they should not be bound to stay any longer: For why, they, by Letters certified of the attempts of the Tartars, (who had requested to have a place in the Borders of Hungary appointed them to dwell in) were desirous in any wise to have that Assembly of Parliament put off to a farther time, that so they might the better betime prevent and meet with such the Tartars Designs, whom they were loath to have for their bad and troublesome Neighbours. And now the Turks in the mean time, in hopes that the Peace betwixt them and

and the Christians would not long hold, were come to Buda in such multitudes, that the houses in the Town being not able to hold them, they were glad to set up Tents for them to live in within the City; for that the Bassa would not suffer them to let up any Tents abroad in the Fields, lest the Christians should suspect them to be about the raising of an Army, and so to disturb the Peace.

But the States of Hungary, having stayed full fifteen days, as the Arch-bishop had requested, and the Arch-duke not coming; made a solemn Protestation before the Chapter of the Cathedral Church at Presburg, that they departed from Presburg, and forsook home; not upon any discontentment or Contumacy, but for want of things necessary, and other their urgent Occasions, (having above seven weeks expected the Arch-duke's coming, without whom nothing could be done) and yet, that if it should please the Emperor by solemn Summons at any time after to call another Parliament, they would be ready upon any such Summons given, to return again to Presburg, and there to consult of all such things as should be for the good and welfare of the Common-weal; so that nothing were propounded contrary to the Articles they the year before agreed upon at Vienna, which they would have in all points kept whole and inviolate; so that if any man should go about or attempt any thing in disposing and ordering of the Publick Affairs contrary to that Agreement, they would not in any wise ratify the same, altho it were by the Emperor himself allowed; which their Protestation they requested to have registered, and sealed with the Chapters Seal, and so, not having done any thing at all for which they came, again returned.

After whose departure from Presburg, the Haiducks, (Men used to live by their Swords, and not by their Labour) of all others most discontented with this general Peace, began now to raise new fits and Tumults, and daily to grow stronger and stronger, craving Aid of the Turks, and Tartars, and not of the other Hungarians their Countrymen, now again returned to their wonted Allegiance unto the Christian Emperor; a number of which Haiducks flocking to Buda, the Bassa there, with some other of the Turks Captains and Commanders, entered into Consultation what to do with these fit Instruments for the troubling of the Christians, and the disturbing of the Peace. To this they were not long, and to call them off he was loth; but yet purposing to use them, and to let them a work as occasion should serve, he, to prepare an entrance thereunto, by Letters threatened them of Comora, that except they better kept the Capitulations and Articles of the late Peace, they should shortly hear of new matters. But in the mean time, Letters were sent from the Great Sultan to the Bassa of Buda, with charge, that altho the Christians were reported to increase their strength, he should yet keep himself within his bounds, and to attempt nothing against them, except they should proceed to manifest force; in which case he should not fail by all lawful means to revenge himself. Which the Sultan's mind once made known, the Turks again departed from Buda, most part of the great Ordinance that they brought with them being carried back again to Sigeth.

But the States of Hungary, being returned home from Presburg, and again Assembled, the Fourteenth day of October, by their general consent, decreed, That Tihay should again be joynted under their Jurisdiction; and that the great Ordinance throughout all the free Cities should be remanded and carried home unto the Places wherunto they before belonged: That the Vayvod of Transilva-

nia should be admonished, not to separate Transilvania from Hungary. That the Bassa of Buda should be warned to keep his Turks within their own bounds: And that the Nobility of Hungary should betime be admonished with all their force to repress the Haiducks, and all other their Enemies. Howbeit, the Haiducks proceeding in their insolent Out-rages more than before, took certain Forts, and with Fire and Sword spoiled many Places of the Country, causing the People to swear to be Friends to them and the Turks, and Enemies unto the Germans and Wallons; and demanding of Humanius the Crown wherewith Bosley had sometime been rewarded from the Grand Seignior, had a purpose to have crowned him, or some other for their King; who for all that, by a Messenger sent word unto them, that he would not at their hands accept that Dignity, but faithfully continue in his Allegiance toward the Emperor. But when the States of the upper Hungary thought to have gone against these seditious and rebellious People, and have surprised them; they were from so doing deterred by the Bassa of Agria, threatening with his Turks and Tartars to take their parts if they should once take up Arms against them.

About the same time, six hundred Haiducks going to the Castle of Saint Andrew, and coming thither could not belee in by the Garrison Soldiers, as they had desired; and perceiving them to make no reckoning of their Service, could no longer hold, but openly professed themselves to become the Great Sultan's Servants; who from thence marching to Budnik, took it by force, and ran off it, and so still seeking after Booty, ran out towards Tockay, where by the way they were in a strait by Humanius, lying in wait for them, entrapped, and almost all slain; who afterward sent two of the Turks Ensigns to take the Prisoners, and to the terror of others, empailed some of them upon Sakes, being brought Prisoners to Cassovia. For which unfortunate Expedition, some other of the Haiducks lighting upon two of the Captains, who by chance had eluded out of Humanius's hands, put them both to death for the evil leading of their fellows, hanging up the one, and with their Swords hewing the other all to pieces. Now by the report of some of the Prisoners taken, it was known this new Rebellion of the Haiducks to have been raised by the procurement of the Bassas of Buda and Agria, who by their Messengers had promised unto all help. Which Report to have been true, the Event did shortly after confirm; for the 27th day of November almost fifteen thousand of the Haiducks having before received from the Great Sultan three hundred thousand Duckets for Pay, came and most traitorously besieged Flek, a strong Castle, the Turks sending them great Ordinance from Agria, unto whom these Haiducks had promised to deliver all such Places as they should win. Howbeit, the Event of this siege answered not their desire; for Thomas Bosnia, Captain of Flek, with his Garrison of all German Soldiers, lo valiantly repelled them, and the extremity of the Winter-weather so distressed them, that they were glad to raise their siege, and be gone.

Now much about the same time, viz. about the beginning of November, a great Fire arose at Constantinople, wherein almost five hundred Shops of Wares, with many other fair Buildings were burnt, so that the harm there by fire done was esteemed to amount to above two millions of Gold.

At the same time that the Assembly of the States of Hungary should have been holden at Presburg, (as is before declared) the Emperor had appointed appointed also another Assembly of the Nobility and States of Austria to be holden at Vienna; where, after they were Assembled, certain Articles were unto them on the Emperors behalf propounded for them in that Assembly then to consider of; as first, that for the keeping of the Frontiers of Austria in quiet, the Contribution by them granted among themselves the last year, should this year following be doubled. Then, that if it should fortune the Enemy to attempt any thing of new against that Province, that instead of the Horles and Money which they were wont to lend unto the Wars, they should for the space of twelve Months, or of the greatest part thereof, as hereafter should require, of their own costs maintain ten Companies of German Foot-men, every Company being three hundred strong; and as many Troops of German Horse-men, every Troop consisting of an hundred Horse. And, that if for the better defence of the Borders of Austria there should be raised in no other fort than was used in Hungary, not at greater charges maintained. And, that if it should continue Peace, these charges should be converted to the payment of the Soldiers Wages: And that the States and other Subjects of that Province should so much as might be, be calmed from the trouble of sending either of Horse or Foot for the defence of the Frontiers. Thirdly, that Commissaries should be maintained this year also to attend the Army, and certain skillful Captains appointed for the maintaining of a fit General for the Army. That diligence and care should be had for the Provision of Corn and Victuals for the use of the People in General, as well in the time of Peace as of War. And that forthwith as it much concerned the good of the Common-weal, to have the Frontiers of Austria toward Cassia diligently viewed, for fear that the Turks great Garrison there lying, that therefore certain good and expert Soldiers, which knew those places well, should be chosen, who, together with the Deputies of the Emperor, Hungarians, and Sirians, riding about these Confines, should forthwith consider what were best to be done for the safety thereof. In brief, seeing that on the safety of Rals, the welfare of the City of Vienna, and of the Forts thereof depended, that for the repairing of the Fortifications thereof, and the better strengthening of the same, the sum of four thousand Florins should be appointed; and for the defence of the Frontiers of Austria from the incursion of the Turks Garrison of Cassia, five thousand; and for the furthering of the Buildings at Nustorfe, five thousand more should be paid; and that those who had been slack in paying of their Contribution, should forthwith be enforced to pay the same. And also that it might be considered of, how that too much inhauncing of the value of Monies might be restrained; that good orders might be kept; all the Country cleared from the Robberies of the Soldiers, stragling here and there up and down the same; that the counterfeits Hungarian and Polonian Money should be prohibited, as now current; that good order might be taken for the staying of the Plague, which then began in many Places in Austria.

Concerning which Articles, when as the States there assembled complained, all that Country to be with the long Wars against the Turk, the Incursions of the Rebels, and the Outrages of the numerous Soldiers, already almost exhausted, and then, according as the Necessity required, be made, but was unto a further time deferred, and the Assembly broken up.

The Emperor at the same time appointed a Diet of the Empire to be holden at Ratisbona; wherein he, having appointed Ferdinand, Archduke of Austria, to be chief in his place, with gallant guard of Footmen, came thither the eight Citizens honourably received. Unto which Assembly, when as the Deputies of the Electors, and of the other Princes and Cities of the Empire, were in great number come, at length, the twelfth of January, Divine Service being done in the Cathedral Church, Ferdinand the Arch-duke, with his Courtiers, the Emperours Counsellors, and other the Princes Deputies being there present, taking of the Nobility and Princes Deputies following of him, went to the Count; the Citizens in their Arms standing on both sides; where Geoffrey Ortelius, the Emperours Secretary, having in a notable Oration let forth the Emperours Love and Affection towards the Electors, Princes, and States of the Empire; and why, the Emperor himself could not be present at this Assembly, as willingly he would have been; he propounded in his Name five Articles for them in this their Assembly to be especially considered of. First, how the Empire might hereafter be preserved and defended against the Violence of the Turks, and the dangerous rebellions by their procurement stirred up in Hungary, to the endangering of the whole Empire; especially seeing that the Turks themselves, (with whom the Peace was of late concluded) by their doings had heretofore more than sufficiently declared what trust or credit was to be given unto them; and seeing that it is most manifest, them therein to have sought for nothing else, than that having made or rather contrived a Peace with the Christians for a time for the loppelling of the Rebels, and the repelling of the Invasions of the Persians, they might after provided and stronger to overcome the Christians. Which was cause to be seen; for that whilst they were yet intracting of Peace, they had taken Strigomium, and having concluded Peace, they ceased not as yet with their Council and Aid to help the Rebels in their rebellious Tumults; which was manifestly to be perceived by the Haiducks themselves, who were not ashamed openly to profess themselves to be the Great Sultans Servants, to require Cities and Fortresses to be yielded unto the Sultan, and to conspire against the very name of the Germans. For the speedy Remedy of which mischief, the Emperor had thought good, that consideration of this point should be had, that the Princes should either consent unto a certain standing and perpetual Contribution, whereby a sufficient strength might always be ready wherewith to withstand the Enemies attempts; or else that for certain years twenty thousand Foot men, and four thousand Horse might there be still in readiness, to be maintained at it in common charges of the Empire; which the Emperor (need to requiring) might use against the common Enemy. Or, that if this were heavy or troublesome unto the States of the Empire, yet at least they should consent yearly to contribute such Money as might suffice for the sustaining of such a Power. Another point of this Conclusion, was, about the correcting and reforming of the Administration of Justice in the Imperial Chamber. For, seeing that in the former Assemblies and meetings this matter could not be fully decided, by reason of certain hindrances and impediments which then fell out, and that without the due Administration and Execution of Justice

no Empire could long stand or flourish, no more than the World could without the Sun; his Imperial Majesty therefore would not have this Declaration of this necessary point to be put off or referred unto any other Assembly, but to be done and concluded in this present Assembly. The third point to be considered of was the War which hath been now for many years made in the Low-Countries, and the inconvenience thereof redounding unto the Empire. For whereas the Treaty of Peace in the Low-Countries, (as which Treaty both he and the whole Empire ought to have been there present) for the better concluding and ending of the same, he had heard the confederate Princes to be now acknowledged for a free State, he could not now any longer (as he said) forbear, but that (seeing the Low-Countries to be a member and Part of the Empire, and by the ancient Records of the Empire, and of the Emperours, and by many other Proofs it appears, the Governours of the Low-Countries to have been Vassals of the Empire) he should by Letters which were written unto the King of Spain, the Arch-duke Albertus, and the States of the confederate Provinces, admonish them, That they should not proceed to do or determine any thing in this matter, which might any way tend to the hurt or prejudice of the Emperour, of the Empire, and of the House of Austria. And forasmuch as that War in the Low-Countries had hitherto done no small harm unto the Empire, if happily it could not be agreed upon between the Parties, and that it should happen the same War to be any longer continued, or rather again renewed, it should then be considered upon, how the Empire might be satisfied for the great harm it had until this present thereby received, and how it might be done from the like harm hereafter kept and prevented. The fourth point in this Consultation, which was to be considered of, concerned the Coyne. For whereas it is manifest, that the value of the Mooney to be daily more and more inhaunched and raised, and that thereby not only the Magistrates in the publick Receipt, but the Subjects also in general received great and manifest harm, forasmuch as the piece of such necessary things which we must in this Life have ordinary use of, must of necessity be still more and more increased, according to the value of the Mooney, the Emperour thought good with mature Deliberation to remedy this mischief in this present Assembly of the Empire. The fifth and last point which was to be considered upon, was, the perfecting of the Matriculer of the Empire, for the giving unto every Man that which of due belongeth unto him; the perfecting of which Matriculer, the Emperour would have in this Assembly to be amongst them considered of.

Which Articles thus propounded, there fell a great Controversie amongst the Deputies of the Princes concerning the manner of their proceeding in these matters: as whether they should consider of these Articles in such order as they were propounded, or otherwise. And when as many thought it best first to consider of the Article for the Reformation of Justice, being the second Article propounded to be considered of, and afterwards to come unto the rest of the Articles to be afterward consulted of; when as the two and twentieth day of January they came again to Council, a Writing was by the Emperours command read unto them, whereby it was furnished unto the States of the Empire, the rebellious Tumults by Bosny and some others raised in Hungary to be yet by the Haiducks continued, the Sultan himself sending of them Rewards, and furnishing them with Ordnance and other things necessary for the Wars, by the Governour of Ageria, and the Basha of Buda, threatening all Extremities unto them which should go about to resist them; and then augmenting the danger which thereby might ensue unto the Empire, and especially unto the German Name; seeing that it was manifest those rebellious Haiducks to have especially conspired the Destruction of the Germans, and to have confirmed their League, by drinking of an Health: It was required, that leaving off these Contentions for the manner of their Proceeding, they would turn their Consultations unto the first Article, and relieve how Remedy might in time be given unto this mischief, and how Aid might be sent unto the Emperour against his Enemies.

But when as in their often meetings nothing could be concluded, by reason of the divers and different Opinions betwixt the Protestants and Catholics, Ferdinand the Arch-duke again calling together the Deputies of the Electors, of the Princes, and of the Imperial Cities, caused it by Letters to be declared unto them, How that the Emperour, not without his great Grief and Sorrow had heard, That for certain diffinitions among them they could not yet come to consult of the Articles propounded in that Assembly to be by them considered of, but to his great Grief to be from day to day protracted; and that therefore he requested them, That either they themselves would quietly end those Diffinitions amongst themselves, or else fend their Differences, conceived in Writing, unto the Emperour to be decided, and so at length to come effectually to consult of the propounded Articles. And indeed the Deputies aforesaid had in Writing before exhibited their Minds concerning that point, for the manner of their Proceeding, unto the Arch-duke Ferdinand. But forasmuch as that Writing was according to the manner of the Catholics and the Protestants, of two different sorts; the former thinking it meet to consult of the aforesaid Articles in such order as they were propounded, and first of all, to consider of the Contribution to be given against the Turks, and other Enemies in Hungary; but the other labouring, first for the Reformation of Justice, and the confirming of the Peace of Religion; and afterward to provide for Aid against the foreign Enemies, that to Kennedy might first be provided for inward, than for outward Enemies; expecting that as they had no express Commandment first to determine of the Contribution. Unto whom the Arch-duke by Writing again answered, That he had received no other Intimation from the Emperour, then that he should consult of the aforesaid Articles, with the Deputies there present, in such order as they were propounded: Neither that it was convenient, that the first Article concerning Contribution being neglected, they should proceed unto the second, seeing that the Enemies might easily, by the delay of putting off the same in effect take occasion in the mean time to do the Christians great harm. Besides that, that he had sufficiently protested, That Consultation concerning the Reformation of Justice should in this present Assembly be had also; neither that it was the Emperours mind to have it deferred unto any other Assembly. Wherefore he exhorted the Protestants, That they should forthwith endeavour by their Letters unto the Electors & Princes, and other their Superiours, to obtain leave, that they might first determine some certainty about the first Article concerning Contribution; that so giving way to the Opinion of the other party, they might instantly prepare themselves for the making of the Contribution. Howbeit, this his persuasion prevailed nothing, by

by reason of their Discord and Diffention about the order of their Consultation, the one part still labouring for the Contribution to be first agreed upon, and the other part holding as hard for the Reformation of Justice; so that Ferdinand the Arch-duke, out of hope of concluding any thing that good was, not in vain to spend his cost and time any longer, the fifth of May dimitted the Assembly, and returned home, as did all the rest of the Electors and Princes Deputies, no one article that was propounded being so much as once reasoned of, but all left undecided; so small care was there of the common good, either for the raising of Money for the withstanding of the Turks and Rebels, or for the Reformation of Justice; and the Necessity of both, either on the one side or the other, so hardly urged, and yet in Conclusion be neither respected or regarded.

Whilst the Diet to no purpose (as is aforesaid) was by the Arch-duke Ferdinand holden at Ratisbon, Matthias the Arch-duke, with a great Train of his, came in the mean time to Presburg, where he was with much Joy and Triumph received; the Garrison Souldiers in order standing on both sides the way as he went unto the Castle: Napragius the Bishop of Rab, with an eloquent Oration welcoming of him, in the presence of certain of the Hungarian Nobility, who had gone out of his City to meet him, and now also honourably welcomed him, much rejoicing at his coming. The next day the Arch-bishop and Cardinal of Strigounia, with a notable Train of Hungarian Gentlemen came to Presburg; who, forthwith received into the Castle, and having saluted the Arch-duke, conferred with him of many things in this Assembly to be consulted of. In the mean time Haiducks (that Noble House of whom we have so often spoken) arrived there also with twelve Coaches, ninety Harquebussiers, and forty Hungarian Horsemen going before him, and three hundred Haiducks which had attended upon him, being at the Gate dimitted. So the chief of the Hungarian States being come, the Consultation was begun the three and twentieth day of January; where, when as the Arch-duke had propounded unto the Hungarian Nobility, what things they were especially to consider of; it was by them answered, The Haiducks, before their coming out, to have determined, not one whit to depart from them in the year before propounding and agreed on at Vienna; nor to admit any limitation at all of them, so that for the appeasing of the Tumults of the Haiducks, there was no need of any new Consultation, but only to confirm such things as was then and there consulted and agreed upon. From which their Resolution, when as the Hungarians were not to be removed, and being grieved with the scoffing at of certain of the Clergy (thereupon refusing in any wise to make their appearance, as they were commanded, before the Cardinal in the Castle) were about again to depart, making a solemn Protestation, themselves to be guided of such harms as should thereof ensue; it was at length so that all parts agreed upon, That the whole matter should be committed unto ten chosen out of the Hungarian Councilors, and ten more of the Councilors of Austria, to be consulted and determined of. By whom, being met all together the eight and twentieth day of January, in the House of Illustrious, it was concluded, That seeing that Peace and Quietness in those Countries of Hungary and Austria, could not otherwise be made, that these Articles and Conditions, concerning which no Agreement could the year before be made in the Treaty at Vienna, being quite left off and neglected, the rest of the Articles which were there agreed upon, should be still entirely observed and kept; and that it should be lawful for every man to have the free Exercise of his Religion. Which thing the Commissioners of Austria by a special Writing there confirmed unto the Hungarians. Wherby they declared have perceived, not only by the true relation and report of the Hungarians, but also by their own experience, unto how great Inconveniences the whole Kingdom of Hungary hath of long been exposed, as well for the Wars it hath had with the common Enemy of Christians, as for dividing the civil Tumults and Seditions therein; and that therefore they, not willing that such harms should in those Countries again increase and grow, to the infinite effusion of Christian Blood, after the Articles of Pacification agreed upon at Vienna, saw no other better Remedy for these so great Inconveniences, than that all Parties should still hold themselves contented with the same Articles of Pacification concluded and agreed upon in the said Assembly at Vienna. And that therefore they had decreed, those Articles to be sincerely and inviolably kept; and promised unto the States of Hungary, to give them their Aid for the defence of these Articles, against all their Enemies, being ready to give good reason thereof before God, the Church, the Emperour Rudolph, the Arch-duke Matthias, and his other Brethren, and all the House of Austria, as the Necessity of those Countries should seem to require; hoping also that the States of Hungary would rest themselves likewise in that Pacification of Vienna, and the assistance thereof, in all points observing the same; and that they would always give their ready Help and Aid unto the Countries of Austria against their Enemies in like manner. All which things thus agreed upon, were determined, Letters of Confederation to be in the Name of Matthias the Arch-duke, and of all, as well the Ecclesiastical as Temporal States of Hungary and Austria, to this purpose written, That whereas, for the appeasing and suppressing of the Tumults and Seditions, which the Haiducks by the Infliction of the Turks had of late not doubted to raise, for the concluding of Peace with the Great Sultan; they were met together at Presburg, and therein altogether busied, to devile how the Kingdom of Hungary, with the Countries adjoining, might from Destruction be delivered, in the Christian Religion preserved, and from wast-burned, spoiled, and ravaged; upon mature Deliberation, and as well in the Name of them that were present, as of them that were absent, made such a Confederation and League, That if hereafter it should fortune any detriment of War to be by any man made or done unto the Hungarians, or the Countries thereabout, for the aforesaid Articles of Pacification, which they had determined religiously to keep, that they would forthwith with their united Forces come to Aid their Confederate Brethren, and together with them to live or die.

With these Letters signed and sealed with the hand of the Arch-duke, and of the Noble Men there present, the first of February, Illustrious, with George Turpin, were sent unto the Tumultuous Haiducks (who had now appointed their Meetings to be sent unto the Sultan and the Tartar Cham, to crave their Aid) to dissuade them from such their purpose, and to persuade them to quietness; threatening them withal, That if they would not hearken unto such honest Conditions, they should at together, and at once, be set upon and oppressed by the whole Power of the States.

Letters of Confederation betwixt the States of Austria and Hungary, for the maintaining of the Articles of Pacification agreed upon at Vienna.

The States of Enferie commanded by the Archduke Matthias to be always in a readiness against the Haiducks.

The Assembly at Presburg thus ended, Matthias the Archduke returning to Vienna, and forthwith calling together the States of Enferie, declared unto them all that was done in the Assembly at Presburg. And for as much as that Assembly was chiefly to that end appointed, That the Kingdom of Hungary should not altogether be plucked away from the Empire; and that after the revolt thereof, the greatest harm to be done by the Incursions and spoiling of the Enemies, would lie upon the Countries of Austria; he advised them to look unto themselves, and carefully to provide for the Common-weal, as that having Money always in readiness to maintain an Army, they might with all convenient speed go to meet the Haiducks, if haply they would not conform themselves unto the Articles of the Pacification, but again raise new Broils; so that they might defend and preserve their Country from their Outrages.

The Prince of Valachia died, whose Widow notably preferred her Country for her Son.

About the beginning of this Spring, when as Jerome Prince of Valachia was dead, leaving behind him a Son but thirteen years old, the Emperor admitted him, as yet not capable of the Government, under Tutors, unto the Succession of his Heritage. Which thing the Valachians being by no means willing to endure, and bearing themselves upon the help of the Turks, went about to make choice of another instead of their Prince of late dead. For which cause, the Prince's Widow, by Letters certified Pollacie, her Son in Law, of this Outrage and Injury of her Subjects; and having obtained of him a great sum of Money, and therewith raised an Army of ten thousand good Soldiers, went forth against the Valachians, and in open field overcame them, in blood and terrible a Battle, that having slain five thousand of the Valachians and Turks, he had over them a notable Victory, and by that means preserved the Principality of that Country for her Son.

The Duke of Florence came to the Mediterranean Sea; for which cause, a Messenger about this time coming unto him in the Great Sultan's Name, promised him great Matters, if he would from thenceforth forbear to hurt and pursue the Turks Gallies. Which his Request served the Turks to no other purpose, but as it were to put (O) unto the Fire. For the Duke afterward caused new Gallies to be made, and his Fleet increased, and therewith did more harm than formerly he had done.

The Haiducks refused to admit of the Pacification made at Vienna.

The Great Duke of Florence had hitherto done great harm with his Fleet unto the Turks in the Mediterranean Sea; for which cause, a Messenger about this time coming unto him in the Great Sultan's Name, promised him great Matters, if he would from thenceforth forbear to hurt and pursue the Turks Gallies. Which his Request served the Turks to no other purpose, but as it were to put (O) unto the Fire. For the Duke afterward caused new Gallies to be made, and his Fleet increased, and therewith did more harm than formerly he had done.

Now although that after the ending of the Assembly at Presburg, Illirius and George Turpin had delivered unto the Haiducks the Articles of the Pacification, and commanded them from thenceforth to keep themselves quiet; yet for all that could they not yet be persuaded to hearken unto such their Counsel: for that they being Men still accustomed to the Wars, and living by their Swords, could not endure to fall to Husbandry, and such other Labours. For which cause, they of the Country about Gymerie, were much vexed, which dwell in the Country about Nyft, Letters to this effect: That forasmuch as they, being divers times certified of the miserable estate of their Neighbours, had refused to come to aid them, they should yet now remember how necessary a thing it were, with their conjoynt Minds and Forces to help one another; for that the Haiducks, having now passed the River of Tisla, were broken into that Province, and were run as far as Budine; neither were they minded to stay, but to rob and spoil all the Country before them, if they were not with speed encountered. And the rather, for that but a few days before they had received thirty thousand Hungarian Ducks from the Turks, whom they now acknowledged for their Lords, with Horfes and other Gifts, to be divided among their Leaders and Captains; and moreover, daily expected Aid from the Tartars, who in great Numbers lay about Belgrade. Wherefore it could not be expected what great harm and loss was by the Haiducks done, as well unto the Noblemen themselves, as to the common Country-men; that they should therefore thereof give their Neighbours to understand, and with all speed to take up Arms against the same rebellious Haiducks.

Not long after, about the latter end of March, Proclamation was made by the Commandment of Matthias the Arch-duke, throughout all Austria, That every man should provide himself to take up Arms. The cause whereof men diversly suspected; howbeit that unto this Proclamation was this Reason joyned, That the Arch-duke was determined himself to go about the fourteenth of April into Moravia, and there to gather together all his Power, as well Hungarians, as Austrians and Haiducks, for the War he was to take in hand. There were also Letters in the Arch-duke's name sent unto the Vassals of Austria, to give them to understand, That whereas they were not ignorant, what, for the obtaining of Peace, and Defence of these Countries, had of late been decreed at Presburg; and that all the States of Enferie had approved the report thereof received from their Deputies, and so promised their help and aid unto the Arch-duke, as if that he himself would take in hand any Expedition, they would joyn themselves unto him, and together with him to live more desirous of War than Peace, did not only not rest upon the former Pacification, but gathered an Army also in the Borders of Moravia, with a purpose to make an inroad as well into Moravia, as into Austria it self. For which cause, the States of Moravia also were enforced, for defence of themselves, to raise an Army, and to crave help from their Neighbours. And that therefore, seeing the Arch-duke, mindful of his promise for the common Defence of the Country, was resolved to defend his Life and all his Fortunes, and in his own Person to undertake an Expedition unto those Places from whence the greatest danger was to be feared to fall upon those Countries; necessity then required, that the States themselves also should suffer nothing to be wanting on their Servants, forthwith to joyn themselves unto the Arch-duke; and, to the uttermost of their power, to endeavour themselves to deliver them and theirs from death and destruction. That God, in whose name this Expedition was by them to be taken in hand, as by the lovers of Peace, might in short time make an end of all tumults, and grant unto those Countries without Peace and quietness. And that therefore they were to be admonished, That, according to the tenor of the Decree made at Presburg, they, with such a number of Horfes and Foot, as they could upon the sudden raise at a day to be shortly after named unto them, should joyn themselves unto the Arch-duke, and not to suffer any thing to let them in so doing. So that if haply any change or sickness should happen unto their General, yet notwithstanding that they should fend their Power under the leading of some other man, feeling that the Arch-duke himself would not to adventure his Life and Fortunes, and (if God should see it so good) account it a great gain even to lose the cause, so that thereby he might do his Country good.

About the beginning of April, the Cardinal returning from Prague to Vienna, brought with him the Emperours Answer and Resolution, viz. That

The States of Austria warned by the Arch-duke to prepare themselves for an Expedition to be made into Moravia.

1608

The Arch-duke Matthias prepared himself for his Expedition into Moravia.

The Nobility of Bohemia are by the Emperor commanded to be ready in Arms.

The Arch-duke Matthias with an Army cometh to Znaum in Moravia.

he did ratify and confirm all things that were done and concluded with the Hungarians and Turks; but that his Will was, That the Confederation made betwixt the States of Hungary and Austria at Presburg, should be void, and be none at all. Whence the Arch-duke protesting that he could by no means like of, or suffer to be done, he, the sixteenth of April afterwards, with a great number of the Peers, Nobility, and Counsellors, and a multitude of good Soldiers, going out of Vienna towards the Monastery of Neuburg, set forward upon his Journey, carrying with him eight and twenty Pieces of Ordnance, there expecting his Soldiers in all places levied; by publick Letters protesting, That no man should from his Army receive any harm; or if that by chance any harm were done unto any man by his Army, aluring his Subjects it should be again unto them redressed and recompensed.

But the rumour of this Expedition being brought into Bohemia, the Nobility of the Country began to assemble themselves the sixteenth day of April, whither, when as many of the Deputies of the other Countreys were assembled also, it being decreed, That the Nobility of the faithful States there present, should with all speed return home, and so provide themselves and their Subjects of necessary Arms; that, need so requiring, they should thereby be able to defend themselves and their Country, the Assembly was dissolved. Besides that, the Emperour himself, careful for all Events, caused many, both Horfes and Foot, to be brought to Prague, and to be diversly billeted in the Citizens houses; and afterwards, the eighteenth of April, by Letters directed unto certain Princes of the Empire, and to certain Earls also, Citizens, and other Vassals of the Kingdom of Bohemia, warned them with all speed to lend Aid unto him at Prague.

But Matthias the Arch-duke in the mean time marching forward with an Army of twenty thousand Horfes and Foot, the twenty fourth day of April came to Znaum, a City of Moravia; and wasthere, by the States of Moravia (who the day before were come thither also with four hundred Horfes) honourably received and brought into the City. From thence, sending out Letters into the Territories of Bohemia, and to the City of Prague, he requested, That they would fend out of every place two Deputies for them, unto the Assembly to be holden at Zaplana the fourth day of May: promising withal, That he himself being there present, would yield unto their Deputies a reason of his doing, as also what he meant to do hereafter. Besides that, he, by Letters sent unto the Electors and other Princes of the Empire, declared the cause why he was enforced to make this Expedition; and withal sending unto them a Copy of the Agreement made at Vienna the five and twentieth day of April in the year 1606, by the common consent of the Arch-dukes; in most friendly manner requested them, That they would not intermeddle in this business, but rather with their Counsel and Aid to further the same.

But the three and twentieth day of April, the Emperour sent the Popes Ambassadors, with the Ambassadors of divers other Princes and States, then lying at Prague, with sundry of the Bohemian Ministers, in Embassy to the Arch-duke Matthias, Rite lying at Znaum; whom the Cardinal the next day after followed also, to make good his good Pacification, if it were possible, with the Arch-duke. But the Emperour in the mean time calling unto him the Counsellors of the old and new Town of Prague, (contrary to his wonted manner) most courteously with his own hand received them, and giving them thanks for the faithful Duties by them hitherto performed; requested them, That hereafter they would continue in their like fidelity and Loyalty also; most liberally promising unto them all kindnes, with the restitution of the Privileges concerning the Liberty they had before lost in the time of the Emperour Ferdinand. And not long after, a general Muster was taken, not only in the City of Prague, and the Towns thereabouts, but also throughout all the Kingdom of Bohemia, and three hundred Musketeers appointed for the guard and keeping of the Castle, under the command of Count Salines, who had Commiffion for the raising of other Soldiers also.

At the very same time, it was from Constantinople certainly reported, the Tartar Chah to have died, and the Turkish Sultan having received news thereof, to have dismissed his Son, whom he hitherto had detained as a Pledge, and with divers Ships and Gallies, to have caused him to be transported over the black Sea, unto the Borders of Tartary, there to take possession of his Fathers Kingdom. It was also then reported, certain of the seditious Turks, making of a road to have surprised Smyrna, a rich City of Asia, and to have foraged all the Country about it far and near, and coming unto Magnesia, a chief City of that Country, to have had ten thousand Crowns by the Inhabitants offered, from thenceforth to spare the Country thereabouts. The Persian King also, at the same time notably to proceed in his Wars, and to do the Turks great harm, the Turks and Tartars seeking in vain to withstand him.

In the mean time, Ambassadors coming unto Prague from the Electors of Saxony and Brandenburg, part of them, the ninth of May, went unto the Arch-duke Matthias to Zaplana, who still lay there encamped with an Army of five and twenty thousand Men; of whom they requesting a Truce for the space of eight Days, for the making of a Pacification betwixt the Emperour and him, and for friendly ending of this business, easily obtained the same, especially seeing that those Princes Electors, being joyned and bound unto the Emperour in a double Confederation, as well for their Electorship, as in respect of the Kingdom of Bohemia, could not, as they said, otherwise do, but fend present Aid unto the Emperour, his Necessity so requiring; to which end they had now in readiness certain thousands of Soldiers in the Frontiers of their Countries, be forthwith sent unto him: The other part of these Ambassadors in the mean time staying with the Emperour, where after the German manner, they were well provided of good Cheer and Wine.

About the seventeenth of May, Matthias the Arch-duke, with eighteen thousand Men, rode and marched towards Prague, Colman with the rest of the Army following him. And although that the Arch-duke had severely commanded his Soldiers to abstain from all robbery, spoiling, and burning of the Country, and had divers times severely punished some Offenders therein, by hanging of some, and heading of others; yet could he by no means to refrain them, and keep them in, but that some of them would sometimes be straggling abroad, and doing harm, especially the Hungarians, who were still running out even as far as the Emperours Camp, and the new City of Prague. Whom if it should come to the Emperours Soldiers (being then twenty thousand strong) would not meddle withal, bring to command by the Emperour. Howbeit some of these Stragglers going too far abroad into the Country, were by the Country-men cut off and slain.

The Tartar Chah died.

The seditious Turks raise new stirres in the latter end of Asia, and spoil Smyrna with the Country thereabouts.

Ambassadors sent from the Electors of Saxony and Brandenburg for the appealing of the troubles betwixt the Emperour and Matthias.

Matthias the Arch-duke marcheth towards Prague.

An Affinity of the States of Bohemia, holden at Prague, in the Presence of the Emperor. The Re-quests of the Nobility and States of Bohemia unto the Emperor.

The three and twentieth day of May, an Assembly of the States of Bohemia was called at Prague, the Emperor himself being there present, Adam Wallfenne carrying the drawn Sword before him. In which Assembly, the Nobility and States of the Country with one consent promised to spend their Goods and Lives in the Emperours quarrel; yet in the mean time requesting these things following to be granted and confirmed unto them; viz. That Religion, according to the Confession of Bohemia and Austria, should inviolably be kept, and that which professed the one, should not therefore (coit or despite the other. That Bohemians only should be preferred to Archbishops, Abbots, and other spiritual Preferments. That the Archbishops should not meddle with Civil and Political Affairs. That Ecclesiastical Offices should be permitted unto the Protestant Ministers, as in former time, the Catholics in the mean time holding that they had. The Pontifical dispensation in causes of Matrimony, according to the Decree of the Assembly holden in the Year 1602, should be abrogated and taken away. That it should not be lawful for Priests and other Ecclesiastical Persons to buy Lands or Territories, without the express consent of all the three States, but to hold themselves contented with their Tyths and other their Revenues. That it should be lawful for all men in their own ground and Territories to build Churches of Religion, on both sides. That Protestants and Patrons of the University of Prague should be joynted to the Confraternity, as they were in the time of the Emperor Ferdinand. That one should be chosen for Burggrave in this Assembly. That chief political Offices should not be left void above a Month. That unto these political Offices men of both Religions should be admitted, so that if the Burggrave were a Catholic, the chief Judge should be a Protestant. That every man should enjoy his Right, and that no Decree should be published against the same; neither that they which were of the Order of Knights should be rashly fined, or bound to any arrest. That one of the Bohemians should always be chosen into the secret Council, and made acquainted with the Bohemian Affairs. That every man might have access to the Emperor, and not all things to be done by his Counsellors. That it should be declared to all Men, what was to be understood by the Crime of Treason. That no man should be made a witness Offences; and that no man should for any light Offence, together with his Goods, lose his Life and Reputation. That the Suits of Widows, Orphans, and others also, should with Expedition be dispatched, and not from day to day deferred. That from henceforth the Father should not be bound to pay the Sons debt, which he was run into without his knowledge; neither yet the Son himself. That in political Offices Men should not be too much grieved with too heavy Exactions. That Men fined should not be summoned but in good Terms, and that such as were in any Reputation be bound unto any arrest, without the hearing of their Cause, and much less to be imprisoned. That the Sword, upon forwardness or madness taken out of the Church of Thine certain years before, should be again set in the former place. That Lawyers which pleaded mens Causes, should be contented with such Fees as were by common Decrees appointed them. And last of all to conclude, they in any wise requested the Emperor, that it would please him to ease the Nobility and States of Bohemia of these Grievs, before they were compelled to answer unto such things as were to be propounded unto them on his behalf. Who easily granted unto most of these Articles, those which concerned Religion only excepted, so that the Senators of the old Town of Prague obtained the desired Sword to be again forthwith set in the wonted place. But as for the business of Religion, it was altogether put off and deferred unto the next Assembly to be holden at the Feast of St. Michael.

About the end of May, the Arch-duke Matthias's Ambassadors, having received leave Conduct from the Emperor and the Nobility of the Kingdom of Bohemia, came to Prague; and being admitted into the Council of the Nobility, Charles Count Tjerrant, to whom that charge was given, having in the Archdukes Name first talous the Nobility, caused what he and the rest had in charge, to be before them out of a long Writing in the Bohemian Tongue read; which done, when as the Nobility so requiring, they were put aside, and almost an hour after were called again, they received Answer, That the points of the Ambassage by them propounded, were greater, and of more weight, than that sufficient Deliberation could thereof in so short a time be had; and that therefore it was by the Nobility thought meet, that Commissioners on both sides, meeting together in the open Field near unto Debriffe, should there consult of these Articles, and by the Consent of the Emperor and the Arch-duke, to do what they might to end the matter; Unto which Answer the Arch-dukes Ambassadors consenting, the ninth of June returned again unto the Camp. The Emperours Ambassadors within two days after with forty Coaches and an hundred Horse following them unto the Place appointed; who oftentimes going to and fro, at length so wrought the matter on both sides, that the Business quickly and friendly ended, they were again made Friends.

The Articles of which Pacification and Agreement between the Emperor and the Arch-duke were the seventeenth day of June, in the Castle of Prague, openly read in the Bohemian Tongue, Lichtenstein, Kimske, and other Chieftains, the Arch-dukes Ambassadors, being there present, in order thus:

That the Emperor refused not, but that the Crown of Hungary should be delivered into the Arch-duke Matthias's Hands; and to remit unto him the Kingdom of Hungary, and to remit unto his Subjects the Oath of their Allegiance before given unto him, so that the Nobility and States of Hungary should chuse no other King but the Arch-duke. That in the next Diet of the Empire, he should propound unto the States of the Empire to be considered of, what Contribution they ought to make unto the Archduke for the defence of their Frontiers, if happily longer War were to be made with the Turk. That he should the Writings which concerned that Kingdom of Hungary, within the space of two Months to be delivered unto the Arch-duke. That he should likewise also surrender up the Arch-duke of Austria, by himself hitherto possessed, unto the Arch-duke: yet so as that the Arch-duke should take upon himself all the Emperours Debt, as well in Hungary as in Austria, and within a year should cause sufficient Recognizance or Caution, sealed with his own hand, to be delivered unto the Creditors. That he should cause all the Letters and Writings, as well concerning the upper Austria, as the nether, within the same time to be delivered unto him, together with a Copy of the Privileges therein, until that Deliberation might be had concerning them, to be transferred unto him also. That the Nobility and States of Bohemia should in the Emperours Name ratify and confirm the Treaty held at Vienna, for the making of the Peace between the Emperor, the Turks, and the King Matthias the Emperor's Army out of Bohemia.

The Hungarians separate a part, might be with such fury in a Place of advantage charged the Hungarians coming to that place, having slain about nine hundred of them, some others were also carried away Prisoners, with a great booty of Horses, Waggon, and other Goods. With which deed the Hungarians groined, trod down the Hungarians, and began to set fire on the Villages and Houses in the Country thereabouts. But the news thereof being brought unto the King, he forthwith by Herbolden, General of the Horse-men, commanded the Hungarians and Haiducks not only to desist from this their Insolency, but themselves also, upon a great Penalty, to help to quench the fires by them raised.

The fleet of July, King Matthias tiding with his way with his chief Counsellors towards Linz, and dividing his Army into three parts, that so they might use more facility pass through those Countreys, unto whom the Hungarians and Haiducks had in this Expedition done great harm, with six hundred Harquebusers, and a number of Country-men went off to a Place called Parantits, where, having cut off the Passage, and cut down Trees cross the ways, that such fury in a Place of advantage charged the Hungarians coming to that place, having slain about nine hundred of them, some others were also carried away Prisoners, with a great booty of Horses, Waggon, and other Goods. With which deed the Hungarians groined, trod down the Hungarians, and began to set fire on the Villages and Houses in the Country thereabouts. But the news thereof being brought unto the King, he forthwith by Herbolden, General of the Horse-men, commanded the Hungarians and Haiducks not only to desist from this their Insolency, but themselves also, upon a great Penalty, to help to quench the fires by them raised.

In the mean time, the coming of King Matthias being reported at Vienna, great preparation was there made for the receiving of him and bringing of him into the City, according to his Royal Dignity, who, the fourteenth of July, toward night, being come thither, with the Arch-duke Maximilian his Brother, and three thousand Horse, the Archbishop of Hungary, who, with Count Trautson, and many other the Emperours Counsellors and Servants, went out of the City to meet him, and there amidst eight Ensigns of German Soldiers, and fifteen hundred Horse-men, as it were in order of Battle, received him with a long and Eloquent Oration, as did afterwards Transilvania in the name of the States of Austria; the Emperours Counsellors also honourably welcoming him. Which done, mounting again to Horse, the King, with the Arch-duke Maximilian his Brother, staid until that two Troops of the Horse-men (each of them consisting of two hundred Horse) were all entered into the City's and afterward fifteen hundred of Buckheim's Horse-men, and the afore said eight Ensigns of Germans going before, and the Emperours Counsellors following them, the King himself with the Arch-duke his Brother, and with his Train, set forward, and passing over the Bridge, whereon three triumphal Arches were most sumptuously erected, he was by three thousand Citizens of Vienna, gallantly apparelled and armed, with much thundering of the great Ordnance and Volleys of small foor, most magnificently received, divers other Triumphs and Sports, to manifest the Joy of the People, being there made also, which for brevity sake we pass over. But being gone a little farther, he was by the Senators of Vienna on Horse-back received the Hungarians. That they also should not refuse, at the Emperours request, to promise unto the Arch-duke a certain Summation unto the Kingdom of Bohemia; but yet with condition, so that if it should happen the Emperor to dye without Heirs Male, before the death of the Arch-duke his Brother; or but if he should have Heirs Male lawfully begotten and under age; that in that case he should only have the Rule and Government of the Kingdom of Bohemia, yet when certain Roman Catholic Princes joyntly unto him. That the Arch-duke should by writing confirm unto the Nobility and States of Bohemia, That he should after the usual manner and fashion demand the Kingdom of Bohemia, being void of a King. That he should take the usual Oath of a King, and always have like regard of all their Privileges as the other Kings his Predecessors had. That the States of Bohemia should not gain say, but that the Arch-duke might hereafter use the Title of the designed King of Hungary. That the Administration of the Marquis of Moravia should be granted unto the Arch-duke Matthias and his Heirs, together with the Title of a Marquis, until that after the death of the Emperor this Province was again to revert unto him which was to enjoy the Kingdom of Bohemia. But if it should happen the Arch-duke to dye before the Emperor, the States of Bohemia should not refuse, but that this Province separate a-part, might (as should seem good) chuse unto it (self a Patron and Defender, unto whom the Emperor should give the Bishopric of Amlitz, hitherto in Temporalities subject unto the King of Bohemia, should from thenceforth acknowledge the Arch-duke Matthias to be the Governour thereof, left there should be a confusion of Suits in Moravia; the Bishop in the mean time having regard unto his own Privileges. That the Emperor at the request of the Arch-duke should maintain the Privileges of them self Silesia, and of the States of the six Cities, and augment them also with new Privileges, being reasonable and convenient. That for the defence of the borders against the Turks, the Nobility and States of Bohemia should not contribute more than hitherto they were wont, yet saving unto the Arch-duke power and ability in the general Meetings and Assemblies of the Kingdom to entreat thereof, as the Emperor had hitherto had. That the Titles of all the Provinces which the Emperor did now surrender unto the Arch-duke Matthias, should be still unto him reserved. That the Arch-duke Matthias should utterly renounce the County of Tirah, and surrender his part thereof unto the Emperor. That in the Meetings and Assemblies to come, the Arch-duke should by all means endeavour, that the Emperor should receive a reasonable yearly Contribution out of those Provinces which he now departed with. That all offences hitherto committed, should generally be forgiven and pardoned, and all every Person on both Parties, only Verkarious excepted, concerning whom, as also concerning his debt, the Nobility of Moravia had undertaken in their next Assembly to take order. And that Arms should on both sides be laid a part.

Which Articles thus agreed upon, and on both parts accepted of, the Crown of Hungary, with the Ornaments thereto belonging, such as are King Stephen's Sword, the Golden Apple, with the Cross of the Kingdom upon it, two pair of Rich Shoes, a very ancient Robe, with a Royal Scepter, were by the Emperours chief Lieutenant carried into the Camp, and there in a broad and open Field delivered unto the Arch-duke Matthias, together with his Army in order ranked, and sixteen thousand Horse and Foot divided into three Battalions, after he had received their Royal Ornaments, ceived under a rich Canopy, borne up by fix of the ancientest of the said Senators, and he brought to Saint Stephen's Church; whither, he was no sooner come, but that lighting from his Horse, he and was received by the whole Clergy, and under a Canopy, brought into the Church; where, after Service done, he was like a Triumph and Magnificence, through divers other triumphal Arches, brought to the Caffe, the great Ordinance on all sides full of thundering off from the Caffe, the Walls, and the Windows of the Town.

But these Triumphs, and Solemnities ended, shortly after, whereas they began to confute about such things as concerned the good Government of the Kingdom of Hungary, and the crowning of the King, and that the Protestants of Austria in many Places began to Exercise their Religion according to the manner of the Confession of Augsburg, and that the Ministers began openly to Preach in the Churches there, Leopold, the Archduke and Bishop of Passavia, coming to Vienna, with Melius the Popes Nuncio, (but a little before came to Prague) with Cardinal Forgafue, and the Bishop of Vienna, with earnest and importunate solliciting of the King, obtained from him a Commandment, That that Exercise of Religion should be again abrogated, the Churches shut, and public Preaching forbidden. Which thing forthwith brought forth new fits and troubles in Austria. For the Protestant States, forthwith calling a Council among themselves, by general consent refused by Oath of Loyalty and Allegiance to bind themselves unto the new King, until they had of him obtained the liberty for the free Exercise of their Religion; and combining themselves together, resolved even with the loss of their Lives and Goods to maintain the free preaching of the Word, and the Exercise of their Religion, according to the Confession of Augsburg; and to that end commanded all their Subjects and Tenants to be ready in Arms, that, need requiring, every thirtieth man, tenth, or fifth, might be prevailed to come forth unto the Wars. But having sent a Supplication unto the King, whereunto 180 of the Nobility had set their hands, and receiving no Answer, but that they should desert from their purpose, and without delay to make their appearance to take the Oath of their Allegiance unto the King, they forthwith, the fourteenth of September, going to Horne, by Letters sent unto the rest of the Roman Catholic States, protested themselves to be clear before God and the whole World of all the evils and mischief that were afterward to ensue, if those States, notwithstanding the appealing and ending of those Troubles, or the safety of them their Country-men should take their Oath of Allegiance unto the King. And so forthwith raising an Army, left upon the sudden they should be at Horne oppressed, they began by all means to provide for their Affairs. But the report thereof coming unto the States of Bohemia and Moravia, their Neighbours, they were from them given to understand, that they would become Intercessors for them unto the King, and yet not to be wanting unto them at their need, as occasion should require.

In the mean time, Letters were brought from Constantinople to Vienna, declaring King Matthias's Ambassadors audience with the Great Sultan) to have in an Eloquent Oration on the King's behalf promised religiously to keep the Peace, of late made between him, the Ottoman Emperor, and the Hungarians; and afterward, in the King's name to have offered his Prelates unto the Sultan, and he, in the presence of his chief Baffles, to have received them. But when he came to request the Government of Transylvania, he would in no wise thereto consent, but gave the same to Gabriel Babor, with commandment unto the Bafsa of Buda for the establishing of him in this Principality.

About the beginning of October, the Counties of Transilvania and Fursenburg, were from King Matthias sent unto the Protestant States at Horne, and shortly after them, Maximilian the Arch-duke followed also; who, although they with all glorious promises fought to appease them, and by all means to draw them to take the Oath of their Allegiance; yet could they with them no whit prevail, without granting of them the free Exercise of their Religion. But the sixteenth of October, the Catholic States, not expecting the consent of the Protestant States, at Vienna took the Oath of Allegiance unto Matthias the new King of Hungary, the great Ordinance in the mean time thundering off with Drums and Trumpets in every place of the City sounding, and the rest of the day being with great Feasting, Triumph, and Solemnity spent.

King Matthias, having thus at Vienna received the Oath of Allegiance of the Catholics, shortly after departing thence, the twenty second of October coming to Presburg, was there by the Nobility of Hungary received, and brought into the City towards, viz. the sixth of November, offered in writing unto the King certain Articles, whereof they desired to be by him assured; most of which Articles were drawn out of the Pacification made at Vienna the twenty third day of August, in the year 1606, the chief effect whereof was this: That the free Exercise of Religion should be permitted unto all Men in all the Cities and Towns of Hungary, not so much as that City excepted wherein the King should be resident: That no German Captain should be suffered in any the strong Forts of Hungary, but that the strong Towns of Rab, Comora, Vivicaria, and others, should be committed unto the Government of natural Hungarians born: That the Crown of Hungary should still be kept in Hungary, and committed to the keeping of temporal Men: That first and before all other things, a Count Palatine should be chosen: That the King himself should always reside in Hungary, or if not, that the Palatine should in his absence have full power, with the Councils of Estate of Hungary, to determine and conclude of all things, and that the King should therewithal hold himself contented: That no public Office should be bestowed upon any, but upon such natural Hungarians as had of their Country well deserved; nor permitted unto any for Money: That no Jewish should be suffered in the Kingdom, neither that Ecclesiastical men should be much favoured as formerly they had been: That Officers should not be bound to give account of the Administration of their Offices, but before the Treasurers of Presburg, being natural Hungarians born: That from henceforth Money should not be carried out of the Kingdom, as hitherto it had been: That the Palatine being dead, the King should within a year choose another, the chief Justice in the mean time after the old manner supplying his room: That a little before The Protestant States of Austria had the Nobility sent their Ambassadors unto the King and the States of Hungary, then gathered together at Presburg; with request, that inasmuch as they could not by any intreaty obtain of the King the free Exercise of their Religion, as well within their Cities as without, and that very necessity had driven them by force of Arms to seek for the same, that they would, by sending of them Men, afford them such Aid as was unto them due by the former Pacification made at Vienna the year 1606. Which troubles of Austria, the Nobility and States of Hungary desiring to have appeased, sent George Turpin, and some others, with Letters of Intercession in their behalf unto the Arch-duke Maximilian; in which when they had delivered unto him, they received from him this answer, That King Matthias never thought to disturb the common quiet of that Country, or to attempt any thing against the Privileges thereof, granted by the Emperor Maximilian of happy Memory; but to grant unto the Cities the liberty of Religion, he could by no means, partly in respect of Conscience, partly for the danger that might thereof ensue from the Pope and the King of Spain, and yet nevertheless, that he would promise to suffer and tolerate the free Exercise of Religion without the Cities, and in the bestowing of public Offices to have no regard of Religion; yet with this Condition, that they should lay down Arms, submit themselves unto the King, acknowledge their Fault, and crave Pardon for the same; for that in so doing, the States should haply prevail more than by force of Arms.

With which answer, (being no better could be got, the Hungarian Ambassadors going unto the Protestant States of Austria, began by divers reasons to persuade them to submit themselves unto the King. If the Hungarians should (as they said) give aid unto them of Austria, they should in so doing, instead of helping them, but do them more harm; for that the Hungarian Power could not be brought into Austria, but to the utter destruction thereof. That the League betwixt the Hungarians and them of Austria was a general League, and concerned as well the Catholics as the Protestants. That the Christian Religion was never with the Sword planted or defended, Christ himself saying, them to be happy which therefore suffer Persecution, and commanding Peter to put up his Sword into his Scabbard. That it was an easie matter for every man to raise Sins and Tumults, but that again to appeale them was a far harder matter. That by the taking up of Arms, the free Exercise of Religion could not be furthered or provided for; it being rather dangerous, lest the contrary part prevail, it should be utterly suppressed. That by this means, Hungary itself should be exposed to many dangers, for that not only new Sins might upon this occasion by the Subjects thereof be raised, but other foreign Princes take up Arms against it also; the Emperor, by force of Arms, seeking for his Right, and the Turkish Sultan, by a new Invasion, going about to bring the same under his Subjection; and telling them farther, the Arch-duke to have promised to take good order for all things, so that they would lay down Arms; and that the Clemency and Bounty of those Princes being known, they were not to doubt but that they would indeed perform what they had in word promised; and that the Hungarians could not now do or attempt any thing against the King; but that if it should happen these two Arch-dukes being dead without Heirs male, the Government of these two Provinces should come unto the Arch-duke Ferdinand, that then they should have more cause to help them of Austria again; him: Maravia they said to be a free Country, and yet the King to have thereunto given no more allowance for the liberty of Religion, more than his bare promise. Wherefore seeing that both the fortune and chance of War was doubtful, and that War was not without the great expence of Money to be maintained, that they were of opinion, it to be best for the Protestant States of Austria to lay down Arms, and by way of request to sollicite their cause with the King.

In the mean time, the Grievs whereof the Hungarians complained being taken away, and all Controversies happily ended, Matthias was, by a general consent, chosen to be Palatine; and Matthias, the 14th of November, openly proclaimed King of Hungary; and the 19th of the same Month in St. Martin's Church at Presburg in this manner crowned: first, the Royal Crown was in a flatly Chariot carried out of the Caffe unto the Church, with a great number of the Counsellors and Nobility of Hungary attending the same; in which Chariot were also carried ten Ensigns, with the Arms of the Kingdom in them, filled up, four of the Hungarian Counsellors taking it out of the Chariot in a little Chest covered with Cloth of Gold, and so carrying of it into the Chancel of the Church. After which, King Matthias, together with the Arch-duke Maximilian his Brother, followed on Horse-back, both attired in Hungarian Apparel, and to going into the Chancel, there layed about half an hour, until that he was by two Bishops brought forth unto the Altar, where whom ten of the Hungarian Nobility carried ten several Ensigns, after whom followed the Palatine with the Crown, Endecius with the Royal Scepter, Forgafue with the Apple of the Kingdom, Turzo with King Stephens Sword, Tschichs carrying the Pax, as they call it; Bulian the Cross, the Cardinal Forgafue laying Maist, with divers Bishops and Prelates helping of him, by whom the King was at the beginning of Service assisted with Oyl; where, while the Epistle and Gospel were in reading, the Cardinal let the Crown upon the King's Head, all the People crying out, Long live Matthias, the King of Hungary. But the King, with the Crown upon his head, taking a drawn Sword out of Sigisfred Colonniz, the Marthal's hand, thrice brandished it a cross over the Clergy-mens heads, and received the Sacrament at the Cardinals hand. The Mass being ended, he, by an high-way covered with Cloth, going in his royal Robes from St. Martin's Church, to the Barefoot Friars Church, as he went, caused money to be cast abroad among the People. In which Church, after the first Chapter of the Gospel of St. John being read, he made 28 Knights. From thence the King, with the Crown yet on his Head, and in his flatter Robes, went out of the City at St. Michaels Gate, and there on Horse-back was brought unto an high Stage covered with cloth, whereon he was sworn unto the Hungarians as King, and they unto him as his Subjects; and afterward thrice mounting up to Horse upon a little Hill made for that purpose, and so down again, and thrice brandishing his Sword a cross, he returned back again into the Caffe, where he with Maximilian the Arch-duke, Cardinal Forgafue, the Popes Nuncio, and the Palatine, sat down at one Table, the rest of the Hungarian Nobility, to the number of 70, sitting down at fix other Tables, and so dining with great mirth; the Haidukes, and common sort of People, being there bountifully feasted also: where many of them, in scrambling for the money that was cast abroad, and in taking up of the Cloth from the Scaffold, having their hands and fingers cut off, and so lamed, carried from thence the wofull remembrance of that was there then done.

The Solemnity of this Coronation thus past, King Matthias thought it good for him yet for a time to stay at Presburg, until that the new building in the Caffe was ended, which the Nobility of Hungary had appointed for the keeping of the Crown of Hungary, to the intent that he himself might fee the same, with other the Royal Ornaments put thereto, and sealed up with his own Seal; he in the mean while labouring to appease divers Contentions, and to place fit men again in the great Offices of the Commonwealth; for that the Hungarians would by no means suffer the Germans to enjoy any of the same: for which cause, many of the chief Officers, men of great Authority, were displaced; and amongst them, Sigisfred Colonniz also, a man who had most well deserved of the Kingdom of Hungary: howbeit, shortly after, he by the Council of Maximilian the Arch-duke, was by the Hungarians themselves (repenting them that they had done) not only reformed unto his former Offices, but had by them (and that without his just desert) even greater Preferments offered him also; for a notable thing the Judgement of the common People is. But Illyshichius, now the Palatine of Hungary, the 28th day of November, talking with the King Matthias at large, and earnestly intreated with him in the behalf of the Protestant States of Austria, especially for that the other Protestant States of Hungary, learned now in their behalf to move moved also; and the Moravian Ambassadors openly at the same time protesting, that their States could in no wise forsake them their Friends, the States of Austria, if their need so required. And albeit that both the Elector of Saxony, and other Princes of the Empire, were become earnest Intercessors also unto the King for them, yet the Popes Nuncio so hardly withstood them, as nothing could at last be granted.

About the beginning of December, the King returning again from Freiburg to Vienna, about the sixteenth of December the Protestant States of Austria at length sent Ernstus the free Baron of Landau, Maximilian Pöhlme, Sebastian Grobner, Charles Forberger, Pilgram Stifendorff, and Christopher Buchner, their Ambassadors unto the King, to bring them answer whereunto to trust, who, the 27th of December received answer. That they should hold themselves contented with such answer as they had before received, and to submit themselves to the Kings pleasure, or else, to do what they themselves saw good. With which answer they returning, the States forthwith began to levy new Forces, and to persuade their Soldiers, that, mindful of their Oaths, they should faithfully serve whithersoever, and against whomsoever.

An hot Skirmish.

And now a great Army of the Protestant States of Austria lay in the Villages about Crembs and Spaine, so that those two Towns were thought to be in great danger of them; for the strengthening of which Places, Buchme was by the King sent thither with 1500 Horse and certain pieces of great Ordnance, and an Edict which published the 10th of January, charging the States to be present at Vienna, the 21th day of the same Month, to take the Oath of their Allegiance to the King. Howbeit, they most stiffly still refused to do so, or to remit any thing of that which they had before required; insomuch, that Maximilian the Arch-duke, who, hitherto had not a little laboured in this cause, was quite out of hope to bring them to any Conformity, or make any good end thereof. In the mean time, certain of Buchme's Horse-men on the King's part being about to have taken a Place, for which they thought convenient for them for to lodge in had like to have been disappointed of the same by the Horse-men of Gerrane, on the States side. About which matter, Buchme, coming forth with seven Troops of Horse-men, and Gerrane but with three Troops of Horse, and three Companies of Foot, there was betwixt them a hot Skirmish for the time, fought the 13th of January, in which Skirmish an 100 of Buchme's Horse-men were slain, but of Gerrane's Men not so many; they having the advantage of the Ground, and so therewith in the Skirmish holpen both for the defence of themselves and the annoying of their Enemies. Whereof the King having knowledge, and therewith much moved; beside the aforesaid Edict, caused another to be proclaimed at Vienna, against such Soldiers as served the Protestants; prohibiting them all, and pronouncing them Rebels, except before the 21th day of January, they lay down Arms, departed out of the Protestant Camp. Howbeit, the Protestant States were so far from dimming their Forces, as that they with new Supplies strengthened the same and having taken an Hill not far from Hallenbryne, and from thence discharging thre score of 20 pieces of great Ordnance, struck a great fear and terror into the Minds of the King's Soldiers within the Town.

The States of Moravia make Intercession for the Protestant States of Austria.

About this time also the States of Moravia (that nothing might on their part be wanting for the making of an Attonement betwixt the King and the Protestant States of Austria) sent some of their Ambassadors unto those States at Horne, and othermost unto the King at Vienna, who, having access unto the King, declared unto him, the States of Moravia, from whom they came, to be earnestly importuned by the Protestant States of Austria to lend them Aid, according to the Agreement made with them the year before; and told him moreover, that This manner of his proceeding tended not unto Peace and Quietness, but rather unto the Trouble and Destruction both of the Kingdom, and of all the other Provinces to him belonging; all that Error, the ground of those Troubles, they said, to depend on a perverse interpretation or misconstruing of words, rather than of the matter it self; so that it might by Men desirous of Peace easily be composed and ended. And that therefore their request unto his Majesty was, That he, having regard not only unto the good and welfare of his Provinces and Subjects, but even of himself, and of his Honour also, would of his Clemency and Goodness vouchsafe to give remedy unto the present danger, and avert the miserable Calamities now hanging over them, and even ready to fall upon their heads. The Protestant States they said to be content to put the Controversie to be decided and composed by certain grave and wise Men, to be chosen Arbitrators on both parts; yet with this Condition, That for the space of fourteen days, no Hostility should on either side be used; that the Ambassadors, both on either side, beneath Amstun, should be compelled within this Truce; that such as were kept in durance for their Religion, should be set at liberty; and that all High-ways and Passes should be from all Ambushes, and other dangers cleared. Unto which their request the King condescending, gave leave unto the States of Moravia, upon the most equal Conditions they could devise, to compose and end all matters; who so laboured in this business betwixt the King and the Protestant States of Austria, that at length, viz. the twelfth of March, a Pacification was made betwixt the King and them his Subjects; Leopold the Arch-duke, Melinas the Popes Nuncio, the Bishop of Vienna, and other great Men of the contrary Religion and Faction, seeking in vain to have letted the same; the chief Articles and points of which Pacification were these: That the Nobility in their own Houses, and in their Towns, as also in their Houses in the Cities, should for themselves and their People have the free Exercise of their Religion; That the free Exercise of Preaching might be used in the three Churches at Hersford, Tribel-sinuel, and Horne; That other Churches shut up, might again be opened by three of the Romish and three of the Reformed Religion, and the free Exercise of Religion in them used; That Counsellors and other publick Officers should from thenceforth indifferently be chosen out of men of both Religions; but that such Offices as were hereditary should so still remain; That the Election of Magistrates and other publick Officers in Towns and Cities, should from thenceforth be made by the Magistrates and Citizens themselves, and not to be nominated from the Court as hitherto they had been: That no Church should hereafter be shut against either part, but their own Churches to be left unto them both quietly and undisturbedly. That the Nobility and Citizens in the Towns and Cities should from thenceforth have power to make choice of their Ministers and Preachers, and that for them it should should be lawful to visit the Sick, and to administer unto them the Lords Supper: That the Oath of Allegiance should be taken of them of the Reformed Religion, in like manner as it had been taken of them of the Romish, but yet not with the same Ceremonies of the Romish Church; all union and confederation with them to be had, to be taken away; that all grudging, hatred, and quarrel should be on both sides forgiven, and for ever forgotten; Wolfgang of Haffkirch, Poligius, and others, removed and put from their Offices, for not taking the Oath of Allegiance, being again received into Favour, and restored into their Places: That it might be lawful for the Towns and Cities above Amstun to have the free Exercise of the Reformed Religion in their Suburbs and Hospitals.

It was not long after this Pacification so made, that the King Matthias the seventeenth of May, went to Linze with three hundred Horse, was there with eight Troops of Horse-men, and fifteen Companies of Foot, by the States thitherforth to meet him, most honourably received; and by three triumphal Arches brought into the City, where he received of the States of the Reformed Religion, the Oath of their Obedience; which with much Joy, Triumph, and Feasting performed; he, the sixteenth and twentieth of the same Month, again returned to Vienna. The aforesaid States of Austria in the mean time with great zeal continuing the free Exercise of their Religion at Horne; a great multitude of People daily resorting unto the Sermons there made; they of the Romish Religion much grieving, and detesting therat. The King himself also being come to Vienna, per divers Romish Catholics out of their Offices, and placed those of the Reformed Religion in their rooms, to the great discontentment of many.

About this time, the Batta of Agria, notwithstanding the Peace, had for the sum of twenty thousand Crowns before hand paid, secretly compacted with one Andrew Drake, to have the strong Town of Fleek in the upper Hungary delivered unto him. Which the Traytor had intended (as he himself confessed) to have performed, by setting of the House wherein he himself dwelt by night on fire; unto the quenching whereof the Garrison Soldiers resorting, his purpose was in the mean time to have secretly let in the Turks, and so to have delivered the Town into their Hands. But this his wicked purpose in good time discovered, and by him confided, he was therefore, as he had well deserved, alive cut in four pieces; a just reward for his foolish intended Treason. The Batta of Buda also contrary to the Treaty of Peace, about the same time were taken up, and sworn the Oath of Allegiance of above four hundred Country Villages of the Christians, being not comprised within the fore said Treaty. But as the Turks for their part were secretly plotting how to encroach upon the Christians, and to do them harm; so the Haiducks on the other side in great numbers gathered together in the upper Hungary, began here and there to molest and trouble the Turks, until they were by their Superiors commanded to desist from so doing, for disturbing of the Peace.

Now about this time also, Illyshichius the County Palatine of Hungary died at Vienna; a man much beloved of the Hungarians, his Countrymen, and now by them no less lamented for: whose dead Body was with great Honour afterward conveyed from Vienna unto his own Territory in Hungary, and there with all funeral Pomp buried with his ancestors. In whose stead George Turfay was afterward, by the general consent of the hundred and fifty of the Hungarian Nobility, chosen County Palatine of Hungary, and so with the universal and solemn Acclamations of the People lauded.

And now the Troubles for Religion were scarcely well ended in Austria (as is aforesaid) but that the like, or rather worse, began forthwith, even for the same quarrel, to arise in Bohemia; the Hussites (as they call them) most earnestly importuning the Emperour for the free Exercise of their Religion, or rather for the taking away of certain grievances done to their Religion; and the Roman Catholics even at the same time leaving nothing unattempted, which might serve to bring them of the Religion into hatred with the Emperour, and others sitting at the Helm of the Government of the Estate, and so to frustrate whatsoever the Emperour had in the general Assembly of the States the last year granted unto them of their Religion, for the free Exercise and Advancement thereof: The composing of which Controversie, (tending unto the raising of the fury of the whole Kingdom) when as the Emperour had referred unto certain of his chief Counsellors; and they altogether favouring the Roman Catholics, would give them of the Religion no certain Answer whereto to send; they therewith much discontented, as out of hope to be by them relieved, and insensible to be by their Adversities, his Enemies of the same State, oppressed; layd their heads together; and after good deliberation taken, what worst bet for them to do, both for the safety of themselves; their Wives, Children, and Religion; they, by general consent, of themselves appointed themselves of May to hold a general meeting of them of the Religion (in the new Court at Prague), there to consult of all matters concerning the business of Religion. And yet in the mean time in Parliament protesting, by the Mouth of Wenzeslaus, Bohemian, a Baron of Bohemia, Them to have appointed this time for the Emperours good; and for the common quietness of the whole Realm; as also for the better informing of the Emperour of all Matters; and to provide that the Emperour and the Kingdom might not through the means and persuasions of those his evil Counsellors be brought into extreme Peril and Danger. Immediately after, the States of the Religion with all speed dispatched their Ambassadors unto King Matthias, the Elector Palatine, the Duke of Saxony, and the Duke of Brandenburg; to request them, by their intercession to become Mediators between them unto the Emperour, for the obtaining of the free Exercise of their Religion, which in all points agreed with the Confession of Augsburg, and which long before was exhibited unto Maximilian the Emperour, and by him allowed. Now in the mean time the States of the Religion were by some for their their proceedings commended; but by others for some not only blamed, but also accused of Rebellion against the Emperour and the State. But the matter being declared unto the Emperour, he complaining unto himself of the inconsiderateness of his Counsellors; to maintain his Authority, caused the Parliament then in hand to be prorogued; and to seem of himself to grant that which he could not well withstand, commanded by a Decree, that same very day to be appointed for the concluding of that Article of Religion, on which the States themselves had before appointed for their Assembly to be holden in the new Court at Prague. Notwithstanding which Decree, many troublesome Spirits publicly set forth other their Conceits in Writing, to far other purpose, grievously therein reprehending the States of the Religion, for that of themselves they had appointed a day for their Assembly into the new Court at Prague; Which (as they said) was nothing else but in a rebellious manner to rise against the

Laws of the Kingdom, and the Authority of their lawful Prince; and therefore advised them to forbear from making any such Assembly as was by them appointed. Hereof arose great troubles even unto the Emperours House, in Prague the chief City of Bohemia, they of the Religion not daring to trust the Roman Catholics, neither they them being still ready upon every false report, or vain surmise, to go together by the ears; until that the Emperour, for the slaying of these Troubles, and the avoiding of farther danger, was glad to cause it to be openly proclaimed in the new Court at Prague, That his Imperial Majesty, having received and understood the Apology of the States, now did abrogate that his Edict published against them but a few days before; and now by this his new Edict did account all the States of the Religion for his faithful and well beloved Subjects; and, as of them unto whom the right of the Kingdom, and the King's Oath belonged, as well as to all other States of the Kingdom. And that he also had those the same States excused, in that they for the good of his Majesty, and of the whole Kingdom, had appointed their Assembly in the new Court at Prague; and that therefore he denounced them in so doing, not in any thing to have done anything contrary unto his Majesty; And that he appointed the five and twentieth day of May for the general Assembly of Parliament to be holden in the Castle of Prague, for the ending of the Article concerning Religion, and the restoring of such the publick Grievances of the Common-wealth: yet with this proviso, That the said States should faithfully and quietly come unto the said Parliament, without entreating of any foreign Souldiers; as that his Majesty should also, not by himselfe, neither for pay entertain any, or suffer any foreign Souldiers to come into the Kingdom. Which the Emperours Edict being proclaimed, the States of the Religion having made their publick Prayers, and sung certain Hymns and Psalmes unto the Glory of God, for the good success of their business, left the new Court at Prague, and returned every man home to their own Houses, to make themselves ready to come unto the Parliament to be holden at the appointed day.

The States of Bohemia by writing declaring their dissent to the Emperour their purpose for the defence of their Religion.

But the day appointed for the Parliament being come, and the Emperour still delaying the matter, the States of the Religion, weary of such long delays, and in doubt to be therewith deluded, as having not received from the Emperour any such answer as whereon to rest, the third of June offered unto the Emperour a short writing, concerning their Grief and further purpose, to this effect. They had (as they said) ascertained, and well known, that regard being had, not only of so many requests of so great and most noble Princes, made in their behalf; but even of the Emperours promise also, made unto them, both in the general Assembly of the States the last year, and in the late Precept of the Emperours also, they should at length have received such answer unto their Petition, concerning the free Exercise of their Religion, as whereon they might have safely relied. Which, for that it had not been yet done, they referred the doing thereof unto God and future time; imputing the blame thereof, not unto his Imperial Majesty, but unto the unquiet and troublesome Natures of some as well the Ecclesiastical as Temporal Magistrates and Persons. But so far as much as they meant not longer to be deluded by their Enemies, and much less to be defrauded of his Majesties Royal Promise, which was now unto the World known, they had thought good to offer and present unto his Majesty a Writing conceived in the Bohemian Tongue, according unto which they desired to be secured, concerning the free Exercise of their Religion;

most humbly requesting his Majesty to accept of the same, and at length to satisfy their requests. Which if it might not be granted, (the Emperours Majesty, having more respect unto the troublesome Clergy-men, and some other his evil affected Counsellors, than to the faithful States and Subjects of his Kingdom;) that then they would rest themselves upon the Decree made in the Assembly holden in the year 1608, and upon the last Edict of his Majesty; yet with this solemn Protestation, That seeing they had by certain Information understood much Warlike Preparation (but especially in Bavaria) to be made; and divers Consultations in many Places to be holden against the States of the Religion, (his Imperial Majesty, and the other his faithful Counsellors, thereof not knowing,) which might tend unto the Ruine and Destruction both of his Majesty and of the whole Kingdom; they themselves would take upon them the defence thereof, and do their endeavour, that, furnished with Men and Arms, they might to the uttermost of their power defend him their Sovereign, together with themselves, and the whole Kingdom, against the Force and Invasion of their foreign Enemies.

In the mean time, while these things were thus in doing, an Ambassador came from the Duke of Saxony to Prague, to intreat the Emperour for the States, and for the granting of them the free Exercise of their Religion; the Ambassadors of the States of Silesia forthwith following of them also; who, in like manner requesting also of the Emperour, to have the liberty for the free Exercise of their Religion by him confirmed unto them; promised their most ready help and aid unto the States of Bohemia, if it need should so require. But the States of Bohemia, having from day to day in vain expected answer from the Emperour, turning themselves unto their former Resolution for the defence of themselves and of their Religion; forthwith raised a great number both of Horse and Foot, whom, with their well known Captains and Commanders, they brought even unto the City of Prague. Howbeit, at length, viz. the sixteenth of July, the Saxon Ambassador earnestly soliciting their Cause, and urging their request, they, according to their desire, received answer from the Emperour, by Letters from his Majesty written to this effect.

He gave all Men (as he said) to understand, and by these his Letters willed to eternal Memory, That after that all the free States of his Kingdom of Bohemia, which, in the receiving of the Lord Supper, participate the Body and Blood of our Lord Jesus Christ under both kinds, his faithful Subjects, had in the Assembly holden in the Castle at Prague in the year 1608, in all humility requested, That it might be lawful for them to hold, and freely to Exercise their Religion, according to the Confession of Augustus, (as some call it) exhibited unto his Father Maximilian the Emperour of most happy Memory, and by him unto the said States allowed; and that he then and at that time, by reason of other most weighty business, for which that Assembly was then called, and such as could suffer no Procrastination or delay, had thought it good to defer the allowing and ratifying of this their Petition, unto this present Assembly of Parliament; and that the same States now again assembled, incessantly renewing this their former Petition and having thereunto joynted also the request and Intercession of certain Noble Personages, had requested to be therein satisfied; and that he with his counsellors would consult how Provision might be made for his Subjects in the Kingdom of Bohemia, as well Communicating under both kinds, as under one; now Ambassadors from the Duke of Saxony and the Duke of Silesia in the behalf of the States.

The States of Bohemia raise their Forces.

The Emperours Letters unto the States of the Religion in Bohemia for the free Exercise of their Religion.

at length to have effected the same. Wherefore seeing that his Will and Desire was, that both in these and future time, Peace and Quietness might for the increasing of the Kingdom be preserved and kept amongst his Subjects of all the three Estates of the Kingdom of Bohemia, communicating as well under the one, as under both kinds; that both parties might freely, and without any impediment or let, have the free Exercise of their Religion, whereby they were both in hope to obtain everlasting Salvation. And to the intent that Accomplishment and Satisfaction might in all points be made, as well according unto the breaking up of the Assembly of Parliament in the year 1608, as to the performance of his own Precept, of late published, (whereby he hath acknowledged, and even yet acknowledged, those same Estates communicating under both kinds, and subscribing to this Confession, for his faithful and loyal Subjects, unto whom the Right and Immunities of the Kingdom of Bohemia belonged) He by the common consent of the Counsellors, and other Magistrates of the Kingdom did determine, That his Subjects, communicating both under one and both kinds, should friendly and peaceably live together, without wronging or reviling of one another; and that upon the Pain and Penalty in the Law set down, to be inflicted upon them that should otherwise do. And moreover, seeing that they which communicated but under one kind, enjoyed the free Exercise of their Religion in all points throughout the Kingdom of Bohemia, that he gave leave, and commanded, that they also which communicated under both kinds, viz. all the States of the Religion, with all such as embraced the Confession of Bohemia, sometimes exhibited to Maximilian the Emperour, his Father, in the Parliament holden in the year 1575, and now again by himself presented, should every where, and in all places of the Kingdom, have the free Exercise of their Religion, without the let or interruption of any; to retain the same, until a general Union of Religion, and an ending of all Diffusion and Controversies might be made. Moreover, That He did grant unto the States of the Religion this Favour, That they should have the lower Consistory at Prague, with Power to conform the same according to their own Confession. That they might lawfully make their Priests, as well in the Bohemian as German Tongue, and let them over their Churches, without any let of the Arch-bishop of Prague. That he did also restore unto them the University of Prague, which for many years ago belonged unto the States of the Religion under both kinds; giving them Power again to open the same, to furnish it with grave and learned Men of their own Confession, so beautify it with good Laws, and to appoint certain of their own Company and Profession for Governors and Defenders as well of the Consistory as of the University; whom, so by the States appointed and chosen, he without any stay or delay, or other instruction or information that they should from the States receive, would confirm in that their Office, and pronounce them for the lawful Defenders; yet so, as that if he, being let by other greater business, cannot perform the same within the space of fourteen days, they shall nevertheless continue Defenders. And as well enjoy the charge of the Office committed unto them, as if they had been therein by him confirmed; and that one or other of their number being dead, it shall be lawful for the States to chuse others in their Places. And if that, besides the churches which they now hold, they should build any other more, or erect more Schools for the instructing of the Youth, it shall be lawful for them freely, and without any let so to do, as well in the Cities as in the Country Towns and Villages. And so far as much as in some of the Cities of the Kingdom of Bohemia, Men of both Religions dwell together, he therefore did will and command, That for the preservation of Peace and Quietness, either party freely exercising their Religion, and obeying their Priests, should by no means either hurt or trouble them on the other party; and much less to hinder them to bury their dead in their Churches or Church-yards, with the ringing or tolling of the Bells, or go about to turn any Man from his Religion, of what state or condition those persons be, whether he dwell in the City, or in the Country Town or Village; or by force to draw them to their Opinion, or to take their part. For that he only respected, that Peace and Quietness might be kept, and that mutual Love might still grow amongst all the three States: Unto which end and purpose, that He for himself and his Heirs, and the Kings of Bohemia his Successors, in the Faith and Word of a King, did grant and promise unto the States of the Religion, unto whom this common Peace of Religion (as they call it) promisseth, as to a principal member of the Empire, all the things to be forever inviolably kept (the Ecclesiastical and Temporal Persons whoever in vain resisting) so that no contrary Precept or Edict, should either by himself, or any other his Heirs or Successors be published against the States of the Religion; or being published by any, should be accounted effectual and strong; especially, seeing that he by these his Letters, amongst all the Edicts hitherto published against these the States of the Religion, to be void, frustrate, and of none effect; that he would that any thing of those which were done by the States of the Religion, whilst they sought for the Confirmation of this Article concerning Religion, should for ever be lay to their charge, or by any man by way of reproach objected unto them. And that therefore he straightly charged and commanded all Magistrates, and such as bare rule in Bohemia, to the utmost of their Power to protect and defend all the three States, together with them of the Religion; and neither themselves to trouble them, nor suffer them to be by any others for the Exercise of their Religion molested or troubled: For that he and other the Kings of Bohemia, his Successors, would most severely chastise all such as should offend against these his Majesties Letters (which, to be for ever remembered, he would cause the same to be enrolled in the publick Records of Parliament) whether such Offenders were Ecclesiastical or Temporal Men, to be sharply punished as the Troublers of the Common Peace.

This was the sum of his Majesties Letters, which he caused to be publicly set up in the Castle of Prague the thirteenth of July, that it might be to all men known, this Article of Religion, which was the first of the Articles in this Parliament promissed, to be concluded and agreed unto according to the Mind of the States of the Religion, and to their Requests to be in all points ratified. Who forthwith thereupon, the sixteenth day of July, caused the first publick Sermon according to the Confession of Augustus, to be preached in the German Tongue in a Church of them of the Religion, which had for a long time before been shut up. At which time, they also sent unto the Elector of Saxony, to send unto them certain learned men, for the setting up of the University, and the governing of the Consistory at Prague. And yet for all this, the Ambassadors for the States of Silesia, still earnestly labouring with the Emperour for the Liberty of Religion to be granted granted to the said States and the rest of the Inhabitants of the Province; the States of Bohemia refused in any way to dismiss their Soldiers whom they had mustered near unto Raggenfon, until the Silesians were of their request in that point satisfied; offering also unto the Emperour a large Libel of the Grievs of them the said States.

Now it may be that some having read so much as is before written concerning these late Troubles about the free Exercise of the Reformed Religion, but especially in Bohemia, Austria, Moravia, and Silesia, may deem the same both tedious and beside our purpose; yet rather unto such, as who, together with my self (the Wars betwixt the Christians and the Turks ended, and the Peace concluded as is aforesaid) desire yet to know in what state those frontier Countries stand; which being the greatest Bulwarks on that side of Christendom, and the chief Territories of the House of Austria, are (the peace being either expired, or otherwise broken off) most subject unto the Fury of the puissant Enemy, as nearest unto him, and so like soonest to feel of his great Force and Power, prefixing unto it self neither bounds nor measure, so long as there is any thing farther. Against whom the Christian Emperour had no other Forces of his own to oppose, more than such as he could raise out of the Reliques of Hungary, and the aforesaid Frontier Countries. All together but weak helps against so puissant an Enemy, as never cometh into the field but with a world of Men following of him; but yet much weaker, being (as now of late they were) every one of them apart divided in themselves about matters of Religion, the incurable malady of the Christian Estates and Commonwealths; the heavy and lamentable effect whereof of too much of late appeared in the loss of Strigomion, won by the Turks with a far less Army than ever the Grand Signiors Lieutenant General was wont to come into Hungary withal; and yet the Christian Emperour, by reason of the revolt of the Hungarians, (upon a discontentment about the Exercise of their Religion) not able of himself to relieve the distressed City of Strigomion, or yet to put an Army of any strength into the Field, for the defence of the rest of his Cities or Territories. So weak are even the greatest Princes, their Subjects being among themselves in Minds divided.

But not to stray farther, the Turks Ambassador in the mean time with a notable train of an hundred and fifty Turks coming from Vienna the one and twentieth of September, and there having saluted; and with great Gifts presented the Kings, set forward toward Prague, where he was by the Citizens and certain Noblemen of the Emperours Council the twelfth of October honourably received; and the nineteenth of the same Month admitted unto the Emperours Presence, first presented unto him from the Great Sultan his Master, a rich Tent of divers colours, most curiously wrought with fair Orient Pearl of great value; and then four courageous Horses, all furnished with most rich and sumptuous furniture. He presented unto him also certain Turkish Weapons set and garnished with precious Stones, and a Princely Turks robe, such as they use at their Marriages, glittering with Gold and precious Stones, with divers other rare things of less value; together with which he delivered unto him the Great Sultans Letters, and withal desired the Confirmation of the Peace before made for twenty years, to be now again renewed. Unto which Ambassadors Letters were afterward delivered from the Emperour, together with certain other rich Presents to be by him presented unto the great Sultan: viz. certain Carcoches lined within with Damask, and covered without with black Velvet; six fair and gallant Horses most richly furnished; a Clock of wonderful Workmanship; two fair Desks to write upon of Ebony; with divers other like Presents of no small price. Who so charged with Presents, and bountifully rewarded, and to his good liking answered, was afterward, in the beginning of January, with a train of two hundred Horses from Prague honourably dismissed.

The Persians enter into the Province of Babylon.

The Turks defeated.

The Turk makes Gambolot Bassa of Aleppo, who had been the most powerful Rebel in Asia, and was newly reconciled and brought into favour with the Grand Signior.

He commands him to be slain.

Ambassadors come from the Persian to the Emperour.

THE Turkish Emperour, having been fired some years from the care of Wars in Hungary, in regard that he had concluded a Truce for twenty years with the Emperour Rodolphus, he now bent all his Forces against his Rebels in Asia, and the Sophie of Persia, where he had no good Success this year. For the Persians, having formerly extended their Monarchy far into the Turkish Empire, and defeated Cisale Bassa, and others in divers Battels; now they entered into the Province of Babylon, with a design to join it to Persia. Achmat, to stay the course of their Prosperity, sends a mighty Army thither, under the command of Nassir Bassa; but his fortune was no better than those that went before him. The Persians came to meet him, gave him battle, defeated him, and slew twenty thousand of his Men. These mournful News coming to Court, did much displease the Sultans Mind; he could not endure it should be said, that the Persian had defeated his mighty Armies thrice in open Battel; and much less that it should be so, and that he should seize upon his Countries: wherefore, to repair this loss, he levies new Forces to be commanded by Gambolot Bassa of Aleppo, who had been the most powerful Rebel in Asia, and was newly reconciled and brought into favour with the Grand Signior. His main came to the Port to receive the Sultans Commandments, and to pass his Army into Asia; but, whether having some suspicion that he had intelligence with the Persians, or that such as envied his Greatness, had given some bad impression of his Loyalty to the Sultan; within some few days after his arrival, Achmat caused him to be slain by his Capigi. Whereby we may well observe, that he that is a Rebel to his Prince, which hath so violently oppressed his Subjects, and for his Countries on fire by Sedition, the which he hath been forced to quench with the blood of Innocents, cannot but end his days violently and miserably, seeing that God revegeth the Blood of Innocents upon the guilty.

The Persian, seeing what advantage he had gotten the Persian, laboured by the bruit of his Victories to draw the Christian Princes unto his party, and with them wholly to ruin the Othomans; the which he had so happily begun. For the effecting whereof, he sent his Ambassadors to the Emperour being at Prague, to persuade him to break the Peace with the Turk, and to join with him. The Ambassadors arrived at Prague this year with rich and rare Presents; first, a Cross of Gold enriched with many precious stones; amongst which there was one piece of Amber, wherein was seen the figure of the Virgin Mary, holding her young Babe in her Arms; the which was so artificially graven, as it might be thought the work of Nature; a Topas of exceeding greatness, given to the King of Persia by an Indian King; two Knives of Damask, with hafts of Jasper, and their sheaths covered with Diamonds; a certain kind of Indian Wood of most excellent vertue, most sovereign to cure the pains of the Brest, and to purge the Stomach; the gall of a Pelican, excellent to cure the Pleurisie, Apoplexy, and Fever; two Topazes, the one white, and the other violet, this last was so big, as it was capable to make a Cup; an Amethyst as big as a Hens Egg; a Persian Bow inlaid with the Veins of a Camel, and a rough Diamond exceeding great; a white stone of the colour of Water, which was a preservative against the Plague, being hung about ones neck; three Oriental Pearls exceeding big; three rich Escarbuncles, and three marvellous fair Diamonds; and with all this a Serpents Horn, much esteemed for the rare Vertues. All these Presents were very well accepted, and the Ambassadors much honoured. But what appearance was there for the Emperour, who had so great Differences with his Brother Matthias, King of Hungary, who saw the greatest part of his Subjects rebelled against him, his Provinces in division, Transylvania in Combustion by the Conspiracy which had been discovered against Battery, and finally a general Disorder over all, to break the peace with the Turk, (who was at his Door, retained only with this Bar) and to ally himself with the Persian so far from his Countries, from whom he could draw no Succours, but only that he might keep the Othomans busie in Asia? Thus the Ambassadors returned, carrying home nothing but good Words.

Since the Troubles which hapned in Bohemia made him see of what importance it was to entertain Peace with the Turk; for if he had broken it by the Persians Persuasion, he had given his Enemy an assured means to ruin him; for the

the Arch-duke Leopold entred into Bohemia with an Army of nine thousand Foot, and three thousand Horse; he surpris'd petty Prague, attempted the old Town, and seeking to force it, he flew many which made resistance. Matthias King of Hungary advertised of this Disorder, parts from Austria with a powerful Army, and advanc'd speedily towards Bohemia. It was to be feared, that if Matthias's Army and Leopold's had met near unto Prague, it had been the loss and overthrow of the one, and the defoliation and ruine of the Country. The Emperour foreseeing this Danger, caus'd 300000 Florins to be deliver'd to Romeo Leopold's Lieutenant, for the payment of his Army, and so sent him out of Bohemia. This division betwixt the Princes of the House of Austria, grew by the Practices of some of the Emperours Council, who being delegated Judges to compound the Differences of the Bohemians of divers Religions, instead of labouring to reconcile and unite that People, for the good of the publick, they made themselves Partisans to the one, to oppresse the other; and thereby they drew the Princes into a dangerous division, for the support of Parties. And moreover, the Arch-dukes Ferdinand and Leopold practis'd to deprive Matthias, King of Hungary, of the Succession which he pretended of Bohemia; lest that being Master, he should take revenge upon their Partisans for the Troubles whereby they had formerly afflicted the Country. Such was the Estate of Affairs in Germany, giving the Turk a fair Opportunity, if he could have embrac'd to rich an occasion, to make his Profit of their Combinations. But the Confirmation of the Truce, and the Affairs of his House, kept him in Thrace.

Let us see how the Turk speeds at Sea; where he hath the Knights of Malta, the Sicilians, and Neapolitans, and the Florentines, vigilant and valiant Enemies, to annoy him, and cross his Designs. The last year, 1609, the Christians had no good Success, loss fell particularly upon the Knights of Malta; for he that fights often, can hardly vanquish always. The Gallion of the Order, commanded by Chivalier Guidotti, an Italian, had made two Voyages to Sea very fortunately, and brought to Malta three hundred Turkish Slaves. The encouragement of this good Success engag'd many Knights to divers Enterprises. They arm'd certain Gallions, and made a Fleet of ten good Ships of War, as unfortunate in their Conquests as the Gallion of the Order had been before successful; for, meeting with the Turks Fleet in the Seas of Cyprus, they were let upon, and most of them slain or made Slaves. The Knight Frezzini was slain, and the Red Gallion, wherein he commanded, taken by the Turks; but it was after a whole day Fight. Ambrusio, otherwise called Fuallade, another Knight, was made a Slave, and his Gallion taken; the Knight Ogger ran the same fortune, with the loss of a Gallion. Frezzini having brought a Pinnace with him to attend his Ship, after some fight near unto the Gallion, it escap'd by night. In this Voyage, unfortunate for them of Malta, the Gallion of the Order would needs seek some better adventure; the Knights of Bailen and Rhodes, did accompany him either of them with a small Gallion. He set upon the Caravan of the Turks Fleet, near the Island of Rhodes, his success being the beginning of this Combat made him hope for Victory, and the number of the Enemies Vessels for a rich Booty; for there were among the rest two great Gallions of the Sultans; these are Ships which belong to the great Seigniors Women, laden commonly with great Riches; but twenty Gallies of Rhodes seeing this fight, came out of their Port to succour them, and by the favour of a fair Wind, drew them into safety.

The Gallion of the Order first upon the Turks Caravan.

At Malta the bruit was, That the Turks Army consisting of fourscore Gallies, should go and besiege the Isle of Gozo, whereas a Knight called Saint-Liger commanded. Whereupon, the Great Master had resolv'd to fortifie the Castle of the Island, with a good Counterscarp, which he caus'd to be made, sending thither two hundred Souldiers, and thirty Knights for supply, all brave Souldiers, who might have made a great resistance, if the Turks had attempt'd it; but the Enemies if the Turks had attempt'd it, and gave them time to rest.

But this Year 1610, Vignancourt, the Great Master of Malta, lent the five Gallies of the Order into Barbary, towards the Port Farino, memorable, for that it was the Haven where Saint Lewis the French King ended the Navigation of his days, and at his return from Hierusalem and Palestina, went to receive in Heaven the glorious palms of his holy Actions. The Gallies of Bijerta had been accustomed to fetch Palms there in that season (which was in the Spring time,) whom the Gallies of Malta had a design to surpris'd, but the contrary Winds, and the tempestuous Seas overthrow that Enterprise; yet their Voyage was not altogether unprofitable; for returning toward Malta, being within the Channell which divides the Island from that of Sicily, they encountered with a great Gallion of Tunes, armed by a Turk called Caranfian, being in view of the Gallies of Malta: The Kaife (who commanded) assur'd his Company, and (smiling) promised to free them from their Enemies being so transported with Vanity, as he spake confidently, that he would not fear twenty of the Gallies of Malta; but this his pride was soon abated with his ruine; for the five Gallies came close under him, and plied him so furiously with their Cannon, as they sunk him. The Gally wherein Verdelli, an Italian Knight, commanded, had like to have been lost, for being grappled with the Gallion, if the Vigence of Verdelli had not speedily retir'd it. The Turks, after the loss of their Vessel, began to swim away, but they were all made Slaves to serve in the Gallies of Malta, who this year had no other Fruits of their generous Enterprises.

The Gallies of Cosmo de Medicis, Great Duke of Tuskey, parted from Ligorn, under the Conduct of the Commander and Admiral Inghirami, and running along the Coast of Barbary, they took a Turkish Ship in the sight of Algier, laden with Merchandise, Arms, and Munition of War, as freeing many Christian Slaves which were in it. This happy beginning promised them better fortune. They pass'd on, and some twenty five Leagues beyond Algier, they go to surpris'd the Town of Bijquerre, a small Town in Circuit, but strong and well walled. Inghirami drawing near unto the Coast, took down his Masts, lest they should discover his coming. In the mean time, he sent two long Boats to find some place fit for their landing; the which being carefully observed, Colonel Budhi landed his Men, and about eleven a Clock at Night march'd in good order towards the Town, and forced it. The Darkness of the Night kept them from spoiling it; being content only to let their Guards and Sentinels in the most important Places of the Wall; but day being come, the Souldiers made themselves Masters of the Town, which they sack'd and spoil'd. Certain Moons and Turks, during the Obscurity of the Night, had retir'd themselves into a Mosque, which they fortified: They were summon'd to yield; but the fear of being Slaves, (which they could not avoid) made them resolve to die in their own defence; so as the Florentines having forced the Place, put them all to the Sword; and then embargued their Troops, having fill'd Bijquerre with Fire and Blood. The Night following, being in the Gulf call'd the Bad Woman, they met with a Pinnace laden with Corn, the which they took, and sent to Ligorns, and then they pass'd on to encrease their Conquest. Being upon the Coast of Sardinia, two Gallions of Bijerta did furnish them with a fair Occasion. Inghirami sendeth his Gallies to pursue them, who having had them in chase threecore Leagues, took the one, wherein they had one hundred and twenty Slaves, and freed many poor Christians from the Chain, who suffer'd the Tyranny of the Turkish Servitude. They also took a Turkish Gally within half a League of Algier, and spoil'd it. And thus triumphing over their Enemies, they took their Course towards Ligorn, having taken four Turkish Vessels, spoil'd the Town of Bijquerre, and twice brav'd that of Algier.

The Moriques or new Christians chased out of Spain.

This year was fatal for the Moriques or new Christians in Spain, who being in number nine hundred thousand Persons, as the original writes, and had continued there from Father to Son, for the space of nine hundred years, were now in an instant banish'd, and made Vagabonds with the blast of the Kings Mouth: Men discourag'd diversely hereof. Some said, that the King had reason to do it, for that they had secret Practices and Intelligence with the Turk, his capital Enemy. Others affirm'd, that he did wilfully to prevent their Attempts against his Estate, which were to be feared, considering their Numbers were so great. And some said plainly, that it was to have their Lands and Inheritances, which had continued so long in their Races. But the King declared his own intent by his Edict, the which he published in these Terms.

The King of Spain's Edict.

The King: For that reason doth in Conscience bind a good and Christian Government, to expel out of all Realms and Common-weals those things which breed scandal, and bring hurt to our good Subjects, and Danger to the Estate, but especially which are offensive to God, and prejudicial to his Service; for this cause, Experience having taught us, That the residence of the new Christian Moriques, and their abode in the new Christian Towns, Granado, Murcia, and Andelofa, hath been the cause of all these Inconveniences: For that besides the manner of their proceeding, which joynd in the Rebellion of Granado, the which began by cruel Murders of all the Pridits and old Christians which lived amongst them, calling the Turk in to their Aid; yet having drawn them out of the said Country, and suffer'd them to live in their other Provinces, as they would repent them of their Faults, and live faithfully and Christianly, according to the Precepts and just Ordinances which were given them: They have not observ'd and kept them according to the strict and direct Rules of our Holy Faith; but have always made them to condemn it, and to have no fear to offend God; as hath been seen by the great numbers which have been punished by the Inquisition; and besides, they have committed many Thefts and Murders against the old Christians. And not content herewith, they have conspir'd against my Royal Crown and Realms, seeking Aid and Succours from the Turk, certain interposed Persons being sent to that effect, and doing the like with other Princes, promising unto themselves Aid and Assistance, offering unto them their Persons and Means. And seeing that during so many years, in which they have practis'd these Treasonable Conspiracies, not any one hath come to reveal them, but they have always cover'd, conceal'd, and denied them; it is a most apparent sign that they have all been of one Mind and Will, against the Service of God and of me, and against the good of this Realm; yet they might have imitated many Knights of theirs, of generous extraction, who have done service to God, Christians, and most valiant Vassals.

Wherefore considering all this, and how much I am bound to set down some good order, and to procure the preservation and increase of my Realms and Subjects, and desiring to provide for all; I have decreed, with the Advice and Council of many judicious learned men, and others, that are very religious, wife, and jealous of Gods Service and mine, to chase out of the said Realms of Granado, Murcia, and Andelofa, and out of the Town of Hernache (although it be not within the Limits of the said Realms) all the new Christians Moriques, both Men, Women, and Children. For when as a great or defensible Crime is committed in any College or Community, it is fit that College or Community should be ruin'd, and that the Isles for the greater, and one with another should be punished; and that such as pervert the good and sincere Life of Common-weals, and of their Towns and Cities, should be banish'd from other Inhabitants, lest their Contagion infect them.

For this cause, by virtue of these Prefents, we ordain and command, That all the new Christians Moriques, without any exception of Age or Sex, of those that live and reside in the said Realms, and in the Town of Hernache, except such as be Slaves, shall within the space of thirty days after the Publication hereof, depart out of our Realms and Dominions of Spain, with their Wives, Children, Servants, and others of their Nation; and that they shall not presume to return nor make any residence in them, in any sort whatsoever; And we forbid them to depart by the Realms of Valencia, or Aragon, nor to enter into them, nor to stay in any of our Realms or Countries after the time prefixed, upon pain of Death, and confiscation of all their Goods. And we command, that no Person within our Realms and Seigniories, of what Estate, Qualities, or Condition soever, shall presume to receive, conceal, or defend publicly nor secretly any Morique Man or Woman after the said term, upon pain to lose all their Goods, Vassals, For, and Lands; and moreover to lose all the Graces and Benefits which they have from me, to be applied to my Exchequer.

And though I may justly confiscate all the Goods moveable and unmoveable of the said Moriques, as belonging to Traitors, and guilty of high Treason; yet using Clemency, I am content, that during the said term of thirty days, they may dispose of their moveable Goods, and carry them away, not in Gold, Silver, Jewels, nor Letters of Exchange, but in Merchandise, which is not prohibited, bought of the natural Subjects of this Realm, and not of others; or in the Commodities of the said Country. And to the end they may during the time of thirty days dispose thereof, and of their moveable Goods, and employ it in Merchandise, or in the Commodities of the Country, and transport what they shall buy; (for as for their Lands that must be annexed to our Revenues, to be employed in the Service of God and the Common-weal, as I shall think most fit) I declare by these Prefents, that I take them into my Royal Protection and assure them and their Goods, That during the said time they may go and come, to sell, exchange, and alienate all their moveable Goods, and to employ their Money, Gold, Silver, and Jewels, in Merchandise not prohibited, or in the Commodities of the Country, and to transport the same freely, without any let or interruption, by Land or by Sea, paying usual Customs; so as they carry no Gold or Silver coined, or any other thing prohibited by the Laws of my Realm. Yet we are content, they shall carry so much Money as shall be needful for their Passage by Land, and embarking by Sea; commanding all our Officers and loving Subjects to see this present Edict duly observed. &c. Signed, I the King.

After the Publication of this Edict, the term of thirty days was refrained to twenty, to let the Marqueses be halcyon to depart, and the Ships and Vessels of what Country soever were stayed in all the Ports of Spain, to transport them whither they would go. Many passed from Spain into Barbary; but during this year there came above 150000 of these Marqueses into France; the King sending Commissaries, to see them well used, and orderly transported away.

War in Barbary.

There was a War fallen out in Barbary betwixt Muley Xenny, King of Fez, and Muley Sidi, his younger Brother, both Mahometans, in which the Younger forced the elder to flee his Country, and to come and crave Aid from Philip King of Spain; But the unfortunate loss of Dou Sebastian King of Portugal, was a good Prefident for the Spaniard not to trust in barbarous Kings, without good assurance; He treated with the Barbarians, and promised him Succours, with an hundred thousand Ducats, to return to Alarache, (a place which held for some time by Money or other Practices, he should draw unto him as many Soldiers as he could; and that for the safety of the Succours that he should give him, he should put Alarache or Arrache into his Hands.

Defection of the Town of Arrache or Alarache.

This Arrache is a strong Town in the Realm of Fez, in the Province of Algar, seated upon the Ocean, at the Mouth of the River of Luce, wherein part of it is built, and the other part upon the Rocks, it had a good Port, and hard to take for that it is defended by a Fort, in the which the Kings of Fez, do usually erect a Garrison of three hundred light Horse, and three hundred Harquebussiers; for that the Portugals and Capitans hold in a manner all the Sea Towns of the Provinces of Habat, and Erif, where they have great Garrisons. This Province is from the River of Nsoor along the Mediterranean Sea, unto the Straight of Gibraltar, the other is upon the Ocean from the said Straight unto the River Luce, in the which the King of Spain holdeth at this day the strong Towns of Tanger, Arzill, and others. According to the former accord, the Barbarian returned to Arrache, with his Money in one of the King of Spain's Ships; to whom in a short time repaid many of his Friends and Servants. The Spaniard the mean time having prepared a Fleet of a great number of Gallies and Ships, and embarked ten thousand Soldiers therein, he gave the command thereof unto the Marques of Saint Germaine, who arrived on the twentieth of November in the Evening at the Port of Arrache, and there rode at Anchor all the Night. The next day in the Morning, the Marques, calling all the Captains to a Council, imparting unto them his Design for to force Arrache, in case that the Moorish King did not keep his Promise; they gave him assurance, that they would carry themselves like unto brave and valiant Soldiers. But see what happened; The King of Fez, having no means to go from his word, forcing the Spaniard so strong as he might well force it, many of his Followers and People, fearing to fall under the Power of Spain, they would have banded him; but having the Government of the Castle in his Devotion, he thrust out the Garrison, and delivered the Key himself unto the Marques of Saint Germain. Upon the first bruit that the Spaniards were entered into the Castle, all the Inhabitants ran to Arms, and thinking to resist them, after that many of them had ended their days valiantly, during three hours Combat, they were forced to yield unto the Marques; who presently planted the Cross and Arms of Castile upon all the Towers and Siecples. Thus this strong Town, which the Capitans and Portugals had so long desired, and whereby the Inhabitants received a great ruine, is in the end fallen under the Domination of their King. The News of this Exploit being brought into Spain, pleased the King much, and the People made bon-fires for joy; these are the Alterations of times. The Moors in old time were wont to over-run Spain, and now the Spaniards take their Pleasures in Mauritania.

About the end of this year, News came to Constantinople, of the great Wars which had been between the Uncle and the Nephews, by the death of the Great Cham of the Tartars; the Son, who during his Fathers Life time had continued at Constantinople as an Hostage, and was now sent back into his Country by the Sultan Achmat, thinking to enjoy his Fathers Estate; his Uncle, Brother to the deceased Cham, persuaded to seize upon the Crown; but either of them having drawn an Army of 60000 Men together, in the end, they joyned battle, whereas after the slaughter of 40000 Men upon the place, the Son had the Victory, and by that means obtained the Crown of Tartaria.

I will conclude this year 1610, with the Relation of a particular Business, to the new greedy desire of the Turks to get by any unjust means whatsoever, and their Infidelity and Falshood to say and swear any thing for Bribes. Some years before, one Master Willoughby, an English Gentleman, having rigged up a Ship for war into the Gulf, he came unto Alger, and Barbary to sell his Levant; he there at that time one Solyman Catan was Bassa. This Ship was suddenly seized on, and rifled by the command of this Bassa, upon no other Subject, but that the Bassa pretended this Ship had burnt a Caramool of his, which in truth the Bassa himself had caused to be set on Fire, that under colour thereof he might seize upon the Ship and Goods. Master Willoughby went to Constantinople, and there made his complaint to Sir Henry Lilbo, then Ambassador for the English; but yet could get no satisfaction; whereupon he returned into England, and obtained Letters from his Majesty to the Grand Signior, and to Sir Thomas Glover, then Ambassador, residing at Constantinople; which having received, he went presently to the Chimacham (who was Lieutenant to Marash Bassa the Grand Visier, he being then employed in the Wars against the Persians.) The Chimacham having read their Letters, would not suffer them to be delivered to the Grand Signior; promising to do Justice upon Solyman Catan, who he discharged from his Place, and sent for him to Constantinople; who being come, and called in question, he denied the Fact; Master Willoughby (having no certain proof of his loss) laboured one Officer Bassa a Turk, who had been at Mecca, as was therefore held a very holy man, who for a Brother of his to procure false Witnesses, upon promise to have the tenth part of what should be recovered; The Witnesses being ready to swear to his Assertion, Solyman Catan hearing their Oath, compounded with Master Willoughby, and gave him four or five thousand Dollars; so the business ended. Which shews the Corruption of the Turks, and that the holiest of them for Money will not stick to bear false Witnesses, and take false Oaths.

200000 persons died of the plague.

The Turks obstinate belief touching predestination.

A great Battle in Tartaria.

Death of the French Ambassador at Constantinople.

The Ceremony of Ambassadors at their first Audience.

This year 1610, the City of Constantinople was wonderfully afflicted with the Plague, the which dispersed it (itself over all, and crept into the Grand Signior's Seraglio, wherein one of his Sons died of that Infection; whereupon the Grand Signior was forced to retire for his safety, and to pais the remainder of the Summer in his Palace or Seraglio of Darrah Bassa, about a League and a half distant from the City; this violent Contagion did to rage in Constantinople for the space of five Months, as there were numbered two hundred thousand Persons dead within the time, and they did commonly carry every day twelve or fifteen hundred Bodies to be buried. The greatness of this Mortality is not to be imputed so much to the Corruption of the Air, as to the wilful Negligence of the Turks, who would not vouchsafe to turn away from a Body dead of this Defile, when it goes to burial, nor to forbear to visit their Friends being infected. The obstinate belief they have of Predestination maketh them brutishly contemn all sorts of dangers: For say they, alon as man comes out of his Mothers Womb to enjoy the Light of the World, God writes in his Forehead all the good or evil shall happen unto him, and particularly of what Death he shall dye, the necessity whereof no humane power can avoid. All is governed (say they) by Destiny, and therefore they regard not any Infection, but contrariwise when any one is dead, another takes his Clothes and wears them; which is the cause that Constantinople and the Grand Caire are seldom free; and whereas the Air is any thing disposed to Contagion, there dyes such multitudes of People, as they do not number them but by hundred thousands.

Before the beginning of this Plague, the Baron of Salgrave, Archebischope for the French at Constantinople, ended his Embassy with his Life. His most Christian Majesty sent the Baron of Mole, eldest Son to the Baron of Sansepe, to supply his Place. He arrived at Pera this Year in the beginning of September, and about the end of October the Sultan being returned to Constantinople; after that he had visited the Muphti, (who is the chief of their Law), the Grand Visier, the Defordra, (who is the Sultan's high Treasurer,) the Bayasque Bassa his chief Gardiner, with other great Men of the Port which were highly in Favour; in the end he was admitted to Audience, and to kiss the Sultan's Hand. A Ceremony, which in mine opinion I owe unto the History, to shew that the Majesty of the Turkish Emperours is so great, as to approach near unto them the Ambassadors of foreign Princes are forced to disguise themselves, and leaving the Habits of their Nation, to attire themselves, and their Train after the Turkish manner. Thus the Ambassador of France parted from his Lodging at Pera, wearing upon his French Apparel a long Turkish Robe of Cloth of Gold curled, furred with Sables; his Gentlemen and Secretaries, to the number of sixteen, had the like Robes, but of meaner stuff, wearing Caps of black Velvet, he had twenty Servants in long Cloak of Scarlet, called in Turkish Ferrages, and upon them long Robes of the same stuff, with Caps of Taffata; the four Dragomans, or the Kings Interpreters, the Captains, Masters of Ships, and other French-men attired all in long Robes, accompanied the Train. He past the Channel which doth separate Pera from Constantinople; being come to the other side, he found many goodly Houses for him and his Train, which some Turks that were Friends to France, had sent him to conduct him to the City; at the Gate whereof many Chiaus and Jagayars attended him to conduct him to the Seraglio, two Chiaus Bassas went of either side him, accompanying him thither, the rest of the Turks going before. His arrival was no less honorable at the Palace Royal, than his coming to the Town: Two Capigi Bassas, or chief of the Porters, received him at the entry of a great Court, and conducted him to the Grand Visier, who attended him at Dinner in the Hall, where he was waited, being accompanied only with one Dragoman or Interpreter; the rest of his Train were conducted into a low Gallery, whereas Dinner was prepared for them after the Turkish manner: That is to say, a great Tappety upon the Ground without Cloth or Napkins, and some Dishes thin for. The Meat was Water-gruel with Sugar, and some Potage with Pullets; there were two Men either of them holding a certain Instrument of fiddled Leather, in which there was a Beverage which they call Cerber, made of the juice of Lemons, Water and sugar, and withall they held a Cup of blanch'd Copper, giving to every one Drink and good among the Dishes to serve them more commodiously. From this Feast, difficult to them that had lived after the French fashion, they passed into another Gallery, whereas the Ambassador and sixteen of his Company received each of them a Robe of Tinsel, the which having put on upon their other, they were conducted thow a little Court paved with Marble, towards the Grand Signior's Chamber, which was enriched on the outside with many Pillars of Marble, and square Stones of the same stuff, and beautified with two little Fountains on either side: The Chamber within was about ten paces square, the Planchard was gilt, the Walls enamelled with flowers after the Turkish manner, and the Floor covered with Tappety of Gold and Silk. At the entry of this Imperial Chamber stood six Capigi or Porters, where two of them took the Ambassador under the Arm, and led him to kiss the Sultan's Hand, or rather his Robe; for having saluted him from the greatest of Christian Kings, he kiss but his Robe, and then was led on the one side, going backwards, to the end he should not turn his back to the Emperour. The French Gentlemen were conducted after the like manner to kiss his Robe. But they could hardly see the Sultan, for his Face was turned towards a Window that was grated, before they which, during the Ceremony, there past 30 Capigi, every one carrying a piece of the Presents which the Ambassador had brought; during the which, the Frenchmen could not see him but on the other side. This Salutation being ended, the Ambassador made a short Speech, and presented unto the Sultan the principal Letter of his Embassy, written in the Turkish Tongue.

The Sultan's Chamber.

And this past at Constantinople, whereas the Sultan did willingly receive an Ambassador, his will he more honoured above all others. But in Transylvania the Affairs went after another train; the combinations which seemed inferable to this miserable Province, made it fill the Theatre of all disorders. Gabriel Battori, who governed it since the cession of Rogotzei, had put himself into the Turkish Protection, against King Mathias, who pretended a Title, by reason of the cession made by Prince Sigismund unto the Emperour, as King of Hungary, and had recovered Hermopolis, and chased Raduliste Vayvod of Valachia out of his Country; where, having fallen a new Governour, and filled the Garrisons with Haiduckes, he returned toward Transylvania, to oppose himself against Forstgasse, King Mathias his Lieutenant, who came with Troops out of high Hungary, and paid the River of Tibis. The Vayvod Raduliste had retired himself into Molotia, to pay Solyman to protect Constantinople, whom he thought to have to understand. The Sultan had an intention to seize upon his Country, and to make but one Monarchy of their three Provinces: whereupon they joined their Forces together, and in the end of June entered into Valchia, from whence they expelled Battori his Lieutenant with all the Garrisons. This Exploit made them to hope of a continuance in the Prosperity of their Arms; they entered into Transilvania, whereas they purified Battori with such diligence, as they forced him to come to a Battle near unto Comstia, the which he lost with part of his Troops, being constrained to leave himself with his Horsemen in Hernstadt, whereas some of the chief Inhabitants seeing him receive this Disgrace, attempted to submit themselves under the obedience of King Matthias: but the Practice being discovered by him, he did such Execution, as he purchased to himself the Name of Cruel.

In the mean time Fortigalle, Lieutenant to King Matthias, maketh use of this defeat to seize upon Transilvania: he made an Accord with Andrew Nage (who had drawn high Hungary into Rebellion, and caused the Haiducks to revolt) so as being freed from that fear, he entered into Transilvania; where, having taken some Towns and Castles, he layd Siege to Clusenburg, the which he battered so furiously, as the Garrison and Inhabitants seeing themselves ready to be forced, yielded, and took the Oath of Allegiance to King Matthias the five and twentieth of July. But as these Prosperities of Fortigalle were humane, so did they not long continue. Battori being shut up in Hernstadt, conjures all his Friends to come unto him, and entreated the Balfas of Buda and Zemefwar to succour him, according to the commandments which they had received from the Grand Seigneur; he practised with Nage (a man which did swim continually in the boats of Inconstancy) and makes him to revolt again in high Hungary, upon a promise, that Fortigalle had not kept promise with him; so as Nage took Arms again, seized upon the Fort of Bayens, and filled all high Hungary with Combustions; so as Fortigalle could expect no Succours at his need from thence; then having received some Forces from the Turks and Tartarians, he went to field, pursuing Fortigalle with such heat and fury, as he forced him to abandon all that he had taken in Transilvania, and to retire into Valchia. What Desolations did this War bring unto these Provinces by so many Prises and Reprises: Battori going with a thousand Horse to surprize Tocai, upon the Frontiers of Valchia, whereas they then held a great Fair, he found the Garrison to watchful upon their Guard, as having lost part of his Horsemen, he was forced to return into Transilvania.

On the other side, Fortigalle with his Hungarians, thinking from Valchia to recover high Hungary by the Country of the Zecelians, could not effect his Design; for Battori being advertised thereof, stopped his Passage; and in like manner the Earls of Bucheme and Dampier had passed the River of Tibisce to meet him; so as Battori let such Guards in all the Passages and Streights, that Fortigalle was forced to return towards Polonia by the steep Mountains, and desart Places; whereas his Army was so oppressed with Famine and all other Necessities, as they perished miserably, there remaining few alive; with the which he ended his Passage into Polonia, and from thence soon after he returned into Hungary, but with a very poor Equipage.

Thus the storm ceasing in Transilvania by the restraint of Fortigalle, a more violent Tempest fell in Moldavia, to the end that these unfortunate Regions should never be without some touch of Miserie; For the Turk having understood, That Constantine, Prince of that Country, had relieved the Valachian against Battori, his Allie, or rather his Tributary, he sends a new Prince into Moldavia, the supposed Son of one Thomas, or Aaron as some write, who had in former time commanded there, and with him fifteen hundred Souldiers, with Letters of command to the Turks and Tartarians thereabouts, to assist him with their Forces. This new Prince was sometime in France, and afterwards detained Prisoner in the Fort of Jaques in Spain, within the Pyrenean Mountains. Thus two Princes contend for Moldavia, the one supported by the Polonian, and the other by the Turk. But behold, a third Prince cometh in and pretends a Title, being Son to one Janisio, who had commanded there. This Man had been a Prisoner in the black Tower at Constantinople, to which he was committed by the Sultan Amurath, for that he had lost a Battle in the year 1601, against Michael, who then posselt Moldavia; who escaping from thence, wandered through divers Countries, and at last coming into England, his Majesty of Great Britain pitying his miserable Estate, recommended him by Letters to Sir Thomas Glover, his Majesties Ambassador, then residing at Constantinople, with commandment to assist him, and to follicite his Reddition with the Grand Seigneur. Upon the receipt of which Letters, he retired this wandering Prince into his House at Pera, where he entertained him, with many of his Friends and Followers which repaired unto him, for a long time; and in the mean time, he follicited the Grand Seigneur for his Reddition, having good Accels unto him, by reason that he spake the Turkish Tongue perfectly, and needed no Dragoman or Interpreter. To whom the Sultan still gave good Answers, but with Delays, that it was not yet time; but he should have satisfaction. His Competitor (who was in Possession of Moldavia) hearing of this Practice, made Friends at the Great Turks Court, and corrupted some of the Balfas by Bribes, (they being all by Nature very covetous) to the end he might cross his design, and make him away if it were possible; and among the rest, he had won Murath Bassa, the Grand Vicar, a Man of great Power and Authority, who practised many means to get the Moldavian into his Hands. First, he sent word unto the Ambassador, That the Sultan, having a meaning to restore him, desired to see the man, if he were capable of the place or no; but being advertised of their intent, and well acquainted with their Practices, he refused to send him. After which, he wrote unto him, That it was the Grand Seigneur's Pleasure, he should fend the Moldavian unto him, that he might confer with him. To whom the Ambassador made answer, That unless he might see a Warrant under the Grand Seigneur's own Hand, he would not deliver him. Murath Bassa, seeing that none of these Practices could prevail, resolved to fetch him out by force. For the effecting whereof he drew together two thousand Janizaries. The Ambassador hearing of his intent, fortified his House, and armed his People with the Moldavians which were with their Prince, meaning to stand upon his defence. Murath Bassa, desirous to know what the Ambassador did in his Lodging, disguised a Janizary like unto a Greekish Shepherd, who entering into the Ambassadors House, found them all in Arms; then returning unto the Bassa, he told him that he had to do with a mad Man, and if he proceeded in his Enterprize, he would hazard the loss of many Janizaries; whereupon he gave it over. After which, the Ambassador being called home into England, the Moldavian despairing of Reddition from the Turkish Sultan, he turned Turk; and being presented to the Grand Seigneur, was made Bey of Bursia in Asia; the which he enjoyed no long; long; for Nassif coming from the Persian Wars, discharged him. Thus Moldavia, having many pretending Sovereigns, suffered many mileries, and was a Prey to Turks, Tartarians, and Polonians, all Partisans to these Sovereigns.

These were the Troubles which the Turks caused at land for the Ruine of the Christians. But behold what he suffered at Sea by the Gallies of Florence, Malta, and Naples: the Florentines made their Enterprize apart. The great Duke of Tusfany being advertised, That the Caravan which transported the Tribute of Egypt to Constantinople, prepared to put to Sea, he resolved to divert this Tribute, and by the Valour of his Arms to bring it to Legorn; and for the effecting hereof, he secretly armed four Gallions, under the Command of Beauregard, a French-man, who was Admiral. The first was called the new Gallion, in which the said Admiral went; the second, the Great Legorn, commanded by Brandequedor, General at Land, and allied to the Duke; and the other two were commanded by two French Captains. Beauregard having received Commandment to pass with this Fleet into the Levant, to meet with the Caravan, he bent his course towards Candy, a fertile Island inhabited by the Grecians: Being arrived in the Port of Califone to water, he continued there six days. Leaving this Island, he sailed towards Cyprus, which is held by the Turks; and to coasting Syria, they learned of a Ship of Marfellers, that the Caravan was yet in the Port of Alexandria, where they prepared for their Voyage to Constantinople. To attend them, the Admiral Beauregard went and cast Anchor at the Port of Sidon, called Sarepta, governed by Emir, or Amil Racardin, a Rebel to the Turk, and a great Friend to the Florentines, where he stayed twelve days, to take in Bisket, Fleth, and other necessary Refreshings. And having made a more strict League of Friendship with Racardin, he honoured him with a Coffet full of Arms, whereby the Florentines Ships came as freely into those parts, as into their own Country.

Beauregard, having well victualled and munitioned his Gallions, returned towards the Isle of Cyprus, whereas he found a Christians Ship, called the Flying Dragon, which came from Damietta, by whom he was assured that the Turks Army, consisting of a great number of Gallies, was gone out of the Port of Rhodes, and had taken a Flemish Ship. These News made him think that he should meet the Fleet, and that he must of force defend himself. Wherefore he made all things ready and subscribed the Order which his Captain should hold during the Fight, causing his Ordnance to be mounted as if they were to joyn. He had four as good Gallions, and as well furnished, as any in the Levant Seas, either of them being armed with forty Pieces of Ordnance, and four hundred good Souldiers. Betwixt the Island of Cyprus and Caramania they encountered this Turkish Fleet, consisting of forty Gallies and two Galliaffes, under the Command of Bassa Malapha Grego, who was General of this Fleet, which was in sight of the Florentine Ships: the Galliaffes advanced to take view of them, and to find how far their Cannon would reach: and in the mean time the Gallies put themselves into the form of a Croissant, ready for the Combat. Beauregard, an old Sea-Captain, and well practised in Sea-fights, would not make a short assault the Gallies, but attended until the whole Fleet came close up to him; which being near, he saluted them so furiously with his Cannon, giving them the broad sides, as the Turks (who expected no such Reception) were all amazed, and making a stand, would proceed no farther. Their General having well observed the resolute Countenance of the Florentines, divided his Gallies into two Squadrons, giving charge to the one to give an Assault to the Florentines Gallions, and in the mean time the rest should prepare themselves to fight.

Being thus divided, they came one after another to the Assault, the which continued for the space of six hours; and yet could not board them: Malapha seeing five of his Gallies sunk by the Enemies Cannon, with the loss of all the men that were within them; but suddenly the Wind changed, and proved favourable to the Florentines, who embraced this Advantage, giving chase to the Turks Gallies, forcing them to seek their safety in the Haven of Ranagaffa, the chief Port of Cyprus; a way: so incontinent are the accidents of War, and especially at Sea, whereas the good or bad Success many times dependeth of a little Wind.

This Turkish Fleet having lost five Gallies, and recovered a Port in Cyprus, the Admiral Beauregard seeing his Design against the Caravan disappointed, he resolved to return towards Legorn with his Gallions. Being at Sea, he encountered a Turkish vessel called a Caramoufal, which came from Rhodes, to go unto Cyprus: they chased it, and in the end overtook it, which they prest to with their Ordnance, as they flew one hundred and thirty Turks, and took three hundred Slaves. The Booty was very rich, being valued at fourteen hundred thousand Crowns. After this Prize, their Victuals beginning to fail, having been so long at Sea, they bent their Course for Legorn: but the Wind falling contrary, they were forced to stay eight days in the Island of Scarpante, past the Bar of Malina, and having given chase to certain Gallies of Tunis, they arrived at Legorn the fifteenth of June, where there was great joy for their Return, and the Prize which they had brought, the which, according to the Custom, was to be divided; one third to the Souldiers and Mariners, and the other two parts employed for the Entertainment of the Ships, and the payment of the Captains.

This Caravan, which goes from Egypt to Constantinople, is every Year attended for, not only by the Gallions and Gallies of Florence, but by those of Malta and Naples, and by all the Pirates of the Mediterranean Sea: like unto the English and Hollanders, who yearly lay in wait for the Indian Fleet before the conclusion of the Peace and Truce with the Spaniards. And although their principal Design was to take some part of the Caravan, yet they had other Enterprizes upon the Turks Country, besides the spoil of Merchants which they met by chance, which many times paid the charge of their Voyages; and sometimes they that thought to take, were taken, and lost both their Ships and Lives.

The Gallies of Malta, commanded by the Bailiff of Venouge, and those of Naples by the Marquess of S. Croix, joyned together soon after, with a design to foyn upon the Caravan, which carried the Revenue and Tribute of Egypt to Constantinople, or else to put in execution the enterprize which they had long before projected, upon certain places of Albania, or to surprize or spoil some Island in the Archipelago which might pay their Charges. But the first failing, they met with a Venetian Ship laden with Merchandise, to the value of one hundred thousand Crowns. The Spaniards who commanded in the Gallies of Naples, seized upon this Ship; but the General of Malta would by no means consent unto it, nor suffer any of the Merchandise to be put into his Gallies, for that he would not unjustly violate the Friendship which was betwixt his Order and the State of Venice.

was enforced to pay the Money again; the which he did, but withal, he paid God to them some publick sign which of them had done the wrong. And thereupon, the Turk going forth to repair home to his Houſe, fell down dead in the Street.

The Great Maſter Vignacourt, continuing his generous Delights to ruine the Turk, had an Enterprize againſt Navarrin, a place importing this common Enemy of Chriſtians; for the Execution whereof, he ſent the five Gallies of his Order, under the charge of Fuqueras, great Commander of the Order, and chief of the Nation of Provence. They came within ſome miles of the Shore, but found their landing very difficult, for that they had been diſcovered by one of the Caſtles of Navarrin, which had given the alarm unto the whole Country, ſo as they were forced to paſs on to ſome more eaſie Conqueſt, to the end their Voyage might not prove unprofitable; wherefore they failed into the Archipelago, and came near to the Coaſt of Morea, ten Leagues from Corinth, where in the Night they landed 800 Men under the Conduſt of the Commander of Cremencia, General at Land; this Troop marched towards Corinth, and an hour before day were at the Town Gates to force them. Some Turks took Arms, but their weak reſiſtance could not ſtay the Knights from entering with their Troops; they ſack'd the Town, and having taken what ſpoil was portable, they carried away with them 300 Slaves. After this Triumph, the Chriſtians made a happy retreat, and in good order, notwithstanding all the attempts of the Turks Horſe and Foot, who were drawn together in great numbers, making 10000 Soldiers, for the Country is very populous; in view of whom they imbarcked their Spoil and Slaves. Hereby it appears, that this was one of the moſt deſperate Enterprizes that hath been of long time ſeen. For to attempt a Place ſo far from their retreat, in ſo populous a Country, which upon the leaſt alarm may draw together two or three thouſand Turks, and to make their retreat with ſo ſmall a number, againſt ſuch great Troops which purſued them; doubtleſs we muſt confeſs, that as they ſhewed great Valour, and had good Fortune, ſo they undertook a very dangerous Enterprize. Thus the Knights of Malta vanquiſhed, whom we might term the Maſters of the Mediterranean Sea, if the Revenues of their Order would ſuffice them to ſet forth Shipping and Forces equal to theſe.

But to follow the variable courſe of the Hiſtory, let us obſerve the different Occupations of Chriſtians. At Prague the Germans entertained themſelves with the conſideration of a Crown which appeared in the Firmament, over that City about the middle of October, giving a very great Light, and about it Armies of Men fighting who ſhould have it. At that time the Emperor Rodolphus was upon the Welt, or declining of his days, and Matthias who ſucceeded him in the Empire, then King of Hungary, was upon the Sun-ſhining of his Triumphs. Many expounded this heavenly Apparition, as a Preſage of Happineſs and good Fortune to Matthias; he enjoyed the Crown of Hungary already, and by Deſignation that of Bohemia, and now they did prognostiſicate unto him that of the Romans. Doubtleſs men which alſo after great Fortunes, do rather adore the Sun-riſing, than the ſetting; and Maſs Life when it declines, taſts of the Leſs. The flourishing Glory of Matthias, his Age, and his Actions in the Wars, did add nothing to the Authority of other Men in the Country, but did mightily ſettle his own. Three Suns which were ſeen in the Firmament over Vienna, the chief City of Austria, confirmed the Germans more in this their hope, that he ſhould have the third Crown of the Romans. This laſt Apparition happened the year following.

About the end of the year, ſome of the English Ambaſſadors Men entering into quarrel with certain Jamaſogans of the next Serail; from words they fell to blows; during which tumult one of the Ambaſſadors Men threw a Stone, and ſmote a Jamaſogan on the Fore-head, whereof he died within few hours after. The Age of the Serail complained hereof to the Grand Viſier, who preſently ſent the Subbaſia of Galata to make inquiry of the Fact; the Ambaſſadors were ſent himſelf to the Serail, and ſent for his Men which had been in the quarrel, willing the Turks to deſign the party which had thrown the Stone; who alſo ſome ſhort ran upon one Simon Dikibis, a man that was newly come from Candy, where he had ſerved in the Venetian Garrifons, and was now entertained into the Ambaſſadors Service. This Simon was not he that threw the Stone; notwithstanding the Turks would none but him; on him they laid hands, and dragged him away. The Ambaſſador interpoſing himſelf, and offering to pledge for him, was thruſt away by them, his Men beaten, and one of his Pages wounded; whereupon he complained to the Grand Viſier, but prevailed little; for to Priſon they dragged this Simon, and there kept him a whole Month; neither could he be releaſed, alſe the English Nation offered great Sums to ranſom his Life; for the Turks would needs have Blood for Blood. The day of Execution being appointed, the Ambaſſador ſent his Chaplain to the Priſon where this Simon was, to prepare him for Death; unto whom (examining him how he had formerly lived) he confeſſed, that in England ſome few years before he had killed a Man, for which fact he fled thence into Candy; from whence he came to Conſtantinople, where he was to ſuffer for that which he did not; the juſt Judgment of God puniſhing him to the ſhedding of his Blood in ſinful ſinful among Turks unſeſſedly, for the Blood which he had ſhed in England willfully. He was hanged at the Ambaſſadors Gates, his Head and Heels the next Night were flown away by the Turks, as it was thought, to ſe in ſome kind of Sorcery; the other parts of his Body they had leave to take down and bury.

This year 1612 they did celebrate at Conſtantinople a double Nuptial Feaſt; for the Marriages of Baſia Mehemet, Son to the deceased Civila, with the Sultans Siſter; and of Baſia Mechemet, Admiral at Sea, he whom we have ſeen lately return from Egypt, and bring to Conſtantinople the Revenues of that rich Kingdom, with the eldeſt Daughter of his Emperor. For the Feaſts of young Civila, the Spahi made Couſes on Horſeback with Battle-axes and Bars, in the open place near unto the Serail, where they made divers fireworks of very great charge, but of ſmall invention; and they gave Preſents to above 20000 Perſons, beſides the charge of the banqueting ſtuff which amounted to above 20000 Crowns. The Pomp was double; for the Sultans Women did celebrate that day with the greateſt Ladies of the Port, and the Men ſeparated in other Places did ſolemnize it in like manner. But the magnificence of the Marriage of the Baſia Admiral at Sea with Achmat eldeſt Daughter, had far more luſtre at the Port. The Ceremony was performed on the thirtieth of June, twenty days before the wedding and the order of this Pomp, as well as ſome other which we have deſcribed in this Hiſtory, requires a particular Relation.

The day before the Conſummation of the Marriage, they ſent the Brides moveables and Jewels, from the Serail to the Bridegrooms Lodging, with this Order and State as followeth: Firſt, there marched 20 Janizaries on foot, being followed with the Grand Provoſt of Conſtantinople, and the general Serveior, both on Horſeback, and attired in Cloth of Gold; the Age, or Colonel of the Janizaries, very proudly adorned, and environed with ſome Janizaries, marched alone on Horſeback; after theſe two hundred men of Quality well mounted, and richly attired, followed with a flow pace. The laſt which march'd in this Pomp or Ceremony, were the Tallimans, Centons, Emirs, and other Miniſters of Mahomets Clergy. And preſently followed after the Baſia Achmat, Deſtarda, or High Treafurer, who conducted the moveables, as choſen by the Sultan to be God-father or Sagios to the Bride, being environed with twelve Footmen attired in long Robes of Gold. After him followed the moveables, Apparel, and Jewels, which made the Brides truſt, having in the Head excellent Muſick after the Turkiſh manner, of Hoboyes and Kettle-drums on Horſe-back.

Theſe Moveables, or this Truſt, conſiſted of twenty ſeven Preſents. The firſt was a little Hat all of Gold, covered with precious Stones, and with Pantofles or Womens Shoes, after the Turkiſh ſhale, of pure Gold, enriched with Turquoſes and Rubies; a Book of Mahomets Laws, the covering whereof was of Maſſe Gold, all ſet with Diamonds, many Bracelets, and other rare Devices for Women, of pure Gold, with many precious Stones; a little Coffin a Cubit long, and half as broad, all of Chriſtal of the Rock, having the corners of Gold, in the which were to be ſeen great Diamonds and huge Pearls, to the value of 80000 pounds ſterling: after this precious Coffin, were carried many Stockings embroidered with Gold and Pearl, and Head ſcarves for the Fore-head, with many Robes of Cloth of Gold. All this was diſtributed into twenty ſeven Preſents, as we have ſaid, and carried with great Pomp by twenty ſeven Men on foot.

After theſe Preſents followed eleven Caroches full of young Maidens, Slaves to ſerve the Bride; theſe Caroches were covered and ſhut, and either of them attended by two Eunuchs Moor; and after theſe followed twenty eight Virgin Slaves, attired in Cloth of Gold, and accompanied by twenty eight black Eunuchs all on Horſeback, and richly clad. After which were ſeen 240 Mules, laden with Tents of Tapeſtry, Cloth of Gold, Satin, Velvet, with the ground of Gold, with many Cushions, which are the Chains the Ladies of Turkie uſe; with many other rich and ſumptuous Moveables. Such was the Truſt which this young Princeſs brought to her Spouſe Horſe. Doubtleſs this Equipage was ſtately, and did well become the Pomp and Greatneſs of the Ottoman Houſe, from whence he had iſſued, the mightieſt and richeſt of all the Royal Houſes in Europe, yea, I dare boldly ſay, of all the World.

The Marriage day being come, the Bride was conducted to her Husbands lodging with no leſs Pomp and State than her Moveables. The Janizaries marched firſt, as they had formerly done, being followed by the Grand Provoſt, the Serveior, their Age, and many other Officers of the Port. The Emirs (who are defended from Mahomets, and alone carry green Turbans) marched after to the number of eighty; this Name of Emir is as much as to ſay Lord. They which wear them answer not, and obey none but their Chief, called Mirabachi, and their Voice in Judgment ſtands for two; they were followed by the Tallimans or Priets of Mahomets Law, and by a great number which ſtudy it, and which alſo to the Offices of Cadies or Judges, of Cadifleguier or Muſi. The Viſiers or ſupream Judges of the Turke Empire, who judge of all Affairs in Council, came after with the Grand Viſier, who is Lieutenant General to the Turkiſh Emperor throughout his whole Empire, and keeps the Seals of his Empire. He had on his left hand (which is the moſt honourable rank in Turkie) the Grand Muſi, or ſupream Biſhop of their Law. The Muſick followed after on Horſeback, conſiſting of thirty Men with Drums and Hoboyes, being followed by eight Egyptians, which carried Buſſian Tabors, and did a thouſand Apith Tricks. Theſe were followed by forty Muſicians, marching two and two, ſome playing on Citrons, others on Harps, and ſome on Lutes after the Turkiſh manner. A Fool (held for a Saint amongst them) being muſſed with a Cap and a Cloak covered with Mutton bones, danced and ſung with theſe Inſtruments; fifty of the chief Officers of the Arſenal march'd after them, and thirty Men with Hammers and other Iron Inſtruments, to break down whatsoever advanced too far in the Streets, and might hinder the free Paſſage of two Trees of an immenſe height, laden with divers ſorts of Fruits all of Wax, carried by many Men, and ſupported from the top and the middle with Ropes. After theſe Trees came twenty Officers belonging to Achmat Baſia the high Treafurer, God-father to the Bride, who himſelf alone richly attired, and proudly mounted, after whom came two great Torches light, carried by many Slaves, and then a third torch of a wonderful bigness, all covered with plates of Gold, and ſhining more with precious Stones than the Flame which burnt. The Raiſſer Age with fifty of the Princeſs's Officers, followed theſe Lights, and after them was carried a great Canopy of Crimſon Velvet, and after it another greater, covered with plates of Gold, whole Curtains being thruſt open, hung down to the Ground. Under this Canopy was the Princeſs on Horſeback, with ſome of her black Eunuchs, her Caroch followed covered with Cloth of Gold, and drawn by four great white Horſes, wonderful beautiful. Then followed eight other Caroches, in which were a great number of the Brides Maidens, with many Negroes gilt; and finally, twenty five Virgin Slaves, choſen amongst the faireſt, all on Horſe-back, having their Hair conſultedly hanging upon their Shoulders. Such was the Pomp of this Marriage; but many times the Nuptial Feaſt is intermixt with funerals mourning. For not many days after, the Sultans ſecond Daughter, promiſed to Naiſſif Baſia, was carried to her Grave without any Pomp or Honour; for the Turks make no great esteem of Women.

The day after the marriage, the Grand Seigneur or did cruelly beat his Sultana, the Mother of this Daughter, whom he had married to the Captain Baſia; he ſtabbed her with his Hand-jar or Dagger through the Cheek, and trod her under his Feet. The reaſon was, becauſe he had ſtrangled a Favorite of his, which was one of his Siſters Slaves, whom the Grand Seigneur having ſeen, and being enamoured with her, ſent for her. The Sultana hearing thereof, cauſed her to be brought to her lodging, where the ſtript her of her Apparel, ſtrangled her, and put her Cloths upon one of her own Slaves, whom ſhe ſent to the Sultan inſtead of the other, and at her return ſtrangled her alſo; as the had done many others when they once appeared to be with Child by the Grand Seigneur.

The Plague beginning furiously to ſpoil the City of Conſtantinople, the Sultan was forced to return to his Country Palace, called the Serail of Darut Baſia, to avoid the danger of this violent Contagion; the which makes me think, that the Turkiſh Emperours for their own profit diſpenſe 1612 with some Articles of their Faith; for, as we have said before. The Turks are so obstinately tied to the belief of Predetermination, as they will not vouchsafe to turn from a pestiferous Body, when it is carried to the Grave, and much less forbear to visit his Friends being sick of the Plague, for that (say they) if we must needs die of this Contagion, it is vain to flee it, for it will find us wheresoever; if not, our Health shall never be empaired, altho' we converse with those that are sick of this Disease. But their Sultans know well how to fire the danger, yes, and to cause them to be led under the Altars that come to kiss his Hand, lest they should offer him some violence. Thus we see the defect of false Religions, when as we see this mark of Universality in the Faith taken away; for there every Man believes according to his private interest, as well among many others which have separated themselves from the Truth, to canon themselves in their Errors, where we do often try the diversity of their belief.

Sultan Achmat, being in his Palace of Darut Bafsa, and going to visit a stately Mosque which he caused to be built there, a Derwis or religious Turk, thrust on by some devilish Fury, cast a great Stone at him to beat him down; but the blow of this detestable Traitor, fell upon his Shoulder, and hurt him but lightly. Achmat commanded they should draw from the wretch a Confession of his Confederacy; but the Officers of the Port caused him to be executed the next day, somewhat too suddenly, and by a Death too honourable for a Crime so full of Abomination, for they caused his Head to be cut off. A Derwis of the same Order had in former times sought to murder the Emperor Mahomet the Second.

The Funeral of the Lady Glover, the Ambassador's Wife.

On the fourteenth of April, the Lady Ann Glover, Wife to Sir Thomas Glover, Ambassador for the English, being sick of the Englisch, was buried with very great Solemnity, the like had not been seen in the Country since the Turks conquered Constantinople. There were present at this Funeral of most Nations in the World; the Sermon was preached in a large Garden under a Cypress Tree; and although but few of those present did understand it, yet it wrought this effect, that whereas the Jesuits and Friars had formerly possessed both Turks, Jews, and other People, that the Englisch Nation since the change of their Religion, had neither Churches, nor any form of divine Service; hereby they perceived, that they had both, and served God far more decently and devoutly than they themselves; inasmuch that the Jesuits being ashamed of their Impiety, and slanderous Untruth, durst not for a while after walk the Streets for fear of the Turks, who threatened them for so much belying the Englisch. The Sermon being ended, the Body was carried from Pera unto the Englisch Graves, which were almost a mile from the Place; it was clofed in Lead, and laid in a Caroch covered over with black Velvet, and the Horses with black Cloth. The Dutch Ambassador, the Hungarian Agent, the French Colonel, with a great number of all Nations both Men and Women followed her to her Grave. The Tomb was of fair Marble built four square almost the height of a Man, having an Epitaph engraven thereon. We have seen the year before, the Island and Town of Lango spoiled by the Gallies of Malta and Naples, but the Castle was saved from Ruine by the resistance it made against the Christians Attempts; but this year, in June, the great Duke of Tulcan Gallies running over the Archipelague, assailed it so furiously, as they forced and spoiled it, carrying away twelve hundred Prisoners. Mechmet Bafsa, Admiral at Sea, whom we saw even now buised at his Nuptial Pomp with the Emperours 1612 eldest Daughter, being advertised of these Spoils of the Florentines, by the daily complaints of the Turks which lost their Shipping, and of many other Enterprizes attempted upon his Masters Countries lying near the Sea shore; he departed from Constantinople in August with three and thirty great Gallies, having commanded all the Beyes of the Islands and Towns in the Archipelague to join with him, with as many Gallies as they could make, to stop the Christians course in the Wid. But whilst that he is buised in those Seas, the Pirates of Rafcia defending into the Euxine Sea, by the Mouths of these Rivers which discharged their Waters into the Sea, over-ran and spoiled the Turks Coasts in those parts.

At the firm Land Constantine, one of the pretending Princes in Moldavia, annoyed all that had any dependence upon the Turk. A part of that great Army of the King of Poland, which had pursued for their Pay, spoiled Pruthia and a Prince of the Tartarians, discontent for that, Achmat had preferred a Coffer of his before him in the Invelliture of the Realm of the Tartars Precipians, with 5000 Soldiery spoiled the Rivers of Moldavia under the Turks Dominion, and did do the like in the Gulph of Nicopolis.

This was at such time when as miserable Moldavia was the Theatre whereto the Turks, Tartarians, and Moldavians acted a bloody Tragedy at the Cost and Charges of the poor Country-men. For Tomho, having been chosen Vayvod or Prince of that Province by the Turk, Constantine, who could not endure that he should reign, armed the Country, over-ran it, spoiled it, and made havock of all, detaining two Capigi Prisoners, whom the Sultan had sent unto him, with commandment to obey his Will, and a prohibition not to trouble Tomho in the Possession of that Province. But this was a Message of hard Digestion to Constantine; he could not with Patience yield to this Cession of Moldavia; and instead of fending these Messengers back to the Turk with an Answer, he carried them with him into Polonia, whither he went to demand Succors, and caused them to be guarded as Prisoners. In the mean time, by the Support and Aid of Potosky, Governour of Velin, his Brother-in-Law, he obtained from the King of Poland, that he should be supported against Prince Tomho, his Competitor, whom the Turk had advanced; and to make his entry into Moldavia more easy, they resolved to send an Ambassador unto Constantinople, to entreat Achmat to call back Tomho to his Port, that Constantine might quietly enjoy Moldavia, and to acquaint him with the right and interest the Polonians had by their Captulations with the Turks, to name a Vayvod or Prince in that Province, to the end no wrong might be done unto them.

This Polonian Ambassador being arrived at Constantinople (thinking to be presently dispatched, either by a grant or denial of his demand, and not to stay above fifteen or twenty days) being visited at his arrival by all the Ambassadors of Christian Kings and Princes which remained there; but instead of Audience, after six weeks attendance, he was arrested and detained Prisoner, understanding from the Turks, that he should have no Liberty until that the two Capigi, whom Prince Constantine carried into Poland were released.

The Troubles and Divisions among Christians, Neighbours to the Turk, have always served as a Bridge for this Infidel to invade them, and by this Advantage to usurp rich Towns and Countries as lie fit for him. Now that Valachia, Moldavia, and Transylvania, are torn and turmoil'd with continual Disorders and Contentions; the Sultan seems to embrace this Occasion, to make himself Sovereign of these Provinces, and to get Possession Possession of all that lies betwixt the River of Danube, the Mountains of Sarmatia, the River of Thibiscus, and the Euxine Sea. He employs all his Thoughts and Invention upon this Subject, to bring his Designs to effect. He arms and draws Forces about Belgrade, under the Conduct of Bafsa Mahomet Bekerg; He commands the Tartarians to enter into Moldavia, and he sent a Naval Army towards the Mouth of the River Danube, which made the Frigots of Russia to dilodge, the which had continually made Inroads and Spoils upon his Lands. Battori, Prince of Transylvania, was that time before the Town of Cromford, which he had besieged, but the tediousness of this Siege made him resolve to send an Ambassador to Constantinople, to demand Succors from the Grand Seigneur, to the end he might be able to continue this Siege, and to take the Town; he gave this charge to Andrew Giezy, and sent him to the Sultans Port; but instead of serving his Master faithfully, he practised a detestable Treason against him, to put the Turk in full Possession of Transylvania, and to make him absolute Sovereign. The practice was concluded after this manner, That the Bafsa Mahomet Bekerg should enter the Province with his Army, and that Giezy should join with him with certain Troops, and should deliver unto him Veradin, Lippa, and some other strong and important Places, and for recompence he should invest him in the Principality of Transylvania, in the place of Battori, and under the Authority of Achmat.

This Treason might have been this miserable Province into Ruine, and it may be the rest near adjacent, if it had taken the Effect which the Treachery of Giezy had promised unto himself. But the Bafsa of Buda, understanding that Battori had some vent of the Practice at the Port, and that being now in great fear and Perturbation, he had-railed the siege from before Cromford, and was ready to call himself into the Arms of the Palatine of Hungary, and to crave relief from him; the crafty Bafsa knowing that this course would be prejudicial for the Sultan, and finding that the depopling of Battori would be more difficult than they expected, he diverted Mahomet Bafsa from attempting any thing against Battori or Transylvania. This act shews sufficiently, that Christian Princes which think to shelter themselves under the shadow of the Turkish Crescent, are very ill assured; for he never fails to sit up Enemies against them, to make them fear for Succors, and himself Necessary; Then in the end he expels them, and becomes absolute Master of their Countries. It was also said, That the Bafsa Mahomet would not attempt any thing in Transylvania, by reason of the Election of the Emperor Matthias, whereof the Bafsa of Buda was assured by the Ambassador which the said Emperor sent to Constantinople, to carry the Presents unto the Sultan; which Ambassador was honourably entertained at Buda by the said Bafsa, and from thence conducted safely to Constantinople.

But not to keep these Turkish Troops idle, Mahomet Bafsa, being advertised that Constantine, the pretending Prince in Moldavia, had been in Poland to crave some assistance from thence, he resolved to employ his Forces that way, to dispossess him and settle another.

But the better to understand the beginning and success of these Moldavian Wars, we must make a Repetition of that which past some years before. In the year 1608, Jeremy Mohyla, Prince or Vayvod of Moldavia died; committing the Government to his Brother Simen, during the Minority of his three Sons, Constantine, Alexander, and Bogdan, the eldest being but eight years old.

He left three Daughters, married to three generous Princes of Polonia, Potosky, Vijnosky, and Corscely. Prince Simen continued in the Government until the year 1611; after whose decease the young Prince Constantine, by the Persuasion of his Mother, that he might safely take upon him the Government of Moldavia, and not attend the Confirmation from the Sultan, for that Prince Simen, who had been confirmed by the Turk which then reigned, was but Tutor to his Nephew; entered the Government. At this time there remained at Constantinople, one Stephan or Tomho, who had of a long time practised the favour of one of the Vissiers called Abmetmet, an Eunuch of Georgia (who was then Chinach or Lieutenant to the Grand Vicer) and of some other Baffas, as well by Money as by other Practices, suggesting falsely that he was Son to Prince Aaron, who had been Vayvod of Moldavia before the deceased Jeremy, and he prevailed so by his Practices and Corruption (whereunto the Turks are more subject than any Nation in the World) as he was admitted to the Principality by the Grand Seigneur, and having given him to understand by the Vissier, that Constantine had thrust himself rashly into the Government, and that he would not acknowledge him for his Lord and Sovereign, nor pay the yearly Tribute, which was 40000 Chequines, he sent Fossygen Aga with 20000 Turks and Tartarians to settle Stephen or Tomho in Moldavia, and to expel Prince Constantine. Which Army marched so secretly, as they had in a manner furnished him, yet drawing together a head of 10000 Men, he resolved to attend the event. The Aga sent to acquaint him with his Commission, and among other things threatened him, that if he would not suffer him to proclaim Stephen Vayvod of Moldavia, and yield him the City of Tax free, he would cut him in pieces. Whereunto Constantine made answer, by the advice of the Prince Potosky his Brother-in-Law, That the Grand Seigneur had been abused; for if he had understood, that his Predecessor had granted unto the deceased Prince Jeremy his Father, and to Prince Simen his Uncle, That he should succeed his said Father in the Government; it was not credible that he would seek to dispossess him by force, without hearing, and install in his place an unknown Person, who had falsely supposed himself to be the Son of a Prince of Moldavia; neither should they find, that he had refused to acknowledge the Sultan for his Sovereign Prince, or denied to continue the same Tribute which his Father and Uncle had paid; but if the Aga would proceed without any respect of his Officers, he did hope that the true God of Battel would maintain him in his just defence, and would not suffer an Unhappy to prevail over a lawful Prince. Fossygen Aga, who had no will to capitulate with Prince Constantine, being corrupted by Stephen with Presents and Promises, advanced with his Army, so as the next day they joyntly battel, but which the Aga sent by Multitudes of Turks, Tartarians, and Valachians, could not make it good. Wherefore Potosky entreated Prince Constantine to save himself, and to suffer him to finish the Battel; but he could by no means persuade him, still resolving to attend the event. Whereupon they went both again to the charge with such Troops as they had left, and defeated many of the Turk's Forces; but being oppressed with a new supply of 20000 Horse which the Aga sent by Stephen, they were constrained to yield themselves to the Mercy of their Enemies. Prince Constantine fell to the Tartarians state, either for that he had been taken Prisoner by some of them, or else was given them by Fossygen Aga, to draw a ransom from him, and be instead of their Pay.

1612 But they made no great use of him; for as they led him away, passing the River of Nieffe, he leapt into it, thinking either to save himself by swimming, or unwilling to survive his Disgrace. And as for Prince Potoski, he was carried to Constantinople, and was put into the black Tower, which is a Prison appointed for Men of Quality, where he continued until the year 1616. The Iols of this Battle by Constantinople, gave an entrance to Stephen into Moldavia, no Man daring oppose himself against the Turks Forces; so as Fossfeyen Ada called Stephen to be proclaimed Prince of Moldavia in the City of Tas, and then dismissed his Army, and returned to Constantinople. Such was the Fortune of the Prince of Moldavia, ruined by the Turks, and such was the Disorder and Confusion of his miserable Country.

This Summer Constantinople and the Country round about, was annoyed by abundance of Grahhoppers, as it had been in the former year; but to free themselves from this devouring Vermine, about the middle of July, the Patriarch of Constantinople and Alexandria, with divers other Bishops, and Calloires acted in their Copers and other Ornaments, went forth in solemn manner at the Gate of Adrianople, being the North Gate of the City. Whereupon (said the Greeks) they all perished; and indeed about this time infinite heaps of them were found dead; but not by reason of their Curse, for most were dead before they cursed them, and were to be seen dead upon every bush and twig of a Tree before their curse, and many lived after their Curse, and continued until the next Summer. The cold dew which fell this Summer (being extraordinary) were thought to be the natural cause thereof; God calling these Curses to fall, to free the Country from this devouring Creature.

Let us now describe the Milities of the Transilvania, and of his Province, a Table lo often represented in this History. Gabriel Batori, who governed Transilvania, as lawfully descended from the Sovereign Princes thereof, having made himself a Tributary unto the Turk, and by his impious Actions mingled Mohomet's Impiety with the Christian Religion; and moreover, exceeding in his Cruelty, became a memorable Example to all Posterity, that Princes carry the glorious Name of Christians, when they have once laid aside all fear of the Sovereign of Princes, cannot attend, but a miserable end in their Reign, conformable to the curse of their Enormities. So Gabriel Batori, holding it a Law of State to settle his Affairs with the ruin of Religion, allies himself with the Turk, and with him afflicts the Christian Provinces. But seeing many Factions made against him, as well by the descendants of Bolffy, as by Giesi, Bethlen Gabor, and some other, he supports himself with the Forces of Andrew Nage, the head of the Rebels in High Hungary, who came unto him to the siege before Cromlad to assist him in his Affairs. Batori entertained him with all shews of Courtship, invited him to dinner in his Tent; and for a greater Demonstration of Friendship, after Dinner they two went to take the Air on Horseback. Nage had drunk after the Hungarian manner, Batori entreated him to run his Horse a career, and he refused it, the which Batori taking for an Offence, spake many words of contempt unto him, and he answered him in the same manner, being more inflamed with Wine, than governed by Reason. Batori being wonderfully offended, that a Man of no fort, being but a poor Soldier of Fortune, crept up to some Authority among the Soldiers but by Degrees of Rebellion, should give him such words of Indignity, gave him three blows on the Head with a Battle-axe which he held in his Hand, and flew him. Thus Nage (twins justly in his own Blood, having wickedly and to the ruine of his Country, flooded in the ways of Inconfinity, and popular Tumults; and so he died as he had lived.

But Batori found himself daily oppressed with many Affairs, which drove him infensibly to his Ruin. Peter Decaci, Kinsman to the deceased Bolffy, annoyed him on the one side with Troops of Soldiers; Andrew Giesi (who had betrayed him in his Embassy to Constantinople) levied Forces to persecute him; and Bethlen Gabor, a Nobleman of Transilvania, and assisted by the Turk, took many Places from him, after that Giesi had forced him to raise his siege at Cromlad, and generally all Transilvania revolted against this Prince.

To see more plainly in the Obscurity of these confused Disorders, you must understand, that this Province is supplied by three several Nations, the Scythians, Saxons, and Hungarians. The Scythians (descended from the Scythians) came with Attila King of the Hunnes, in Pannonia, now called Hungary, and taking their way towards their Country, they inhabited that part of Transilvania which lies next to Moldavia, and dividing themselves into seven Colonies, they built the Towns of Kifli, Orbat, Scipfi, Cykadarbath, Aranos, and Maros. The Saxons (mutually against the Government of the Emperour Charles) King of Bohemia, for certain Impositions wherewith he had charged them) retired into Transilvania, and by force seized on that part of the Country which confineth upon Valachia, where they built the Towns of Hermesbad, (otherwise called Cibin) Cromlad, Nenzen (or Bisric) Medwisch, Scipfburg, Clawenbourg, and Alba-Julia. The Hungarians inhabited this Province from the time of Saint Stephen King of Hungary; and having received various Privileges, they obtained such Preheminence among them, as since their Successors have caused themselves to be called Nobles of Transilvania, and the Vayvods or Princes of the Country have been taken from among them. The Towns of Varradin, Dever, Zilab, Gela, and some others, owe their beginnings unto them. The greatest part of these three Nations which inhabit Transilvania were revolted against Batori; but particularly the Saxons had taken Arms against him, his great Cruelty having forced them to this extreme Remedy.

Batori being thus abandoned by his Subjects, persecuted by his Nobility, and forsaken of all the World, knowing not whither to fly for Succour, and not daring to trust unto the Turk, who openly favoured Gabor's revolt to try if he could by Pretens draw the Emperour Matthias to his own Assistance. Wherefore he sent Ambassadors unto him, to promise all Subjection and Obedience; and he sent for Presents, a long Robe or sacerdotal Cloak of Gold, furb with Pearl and precious Stones, certain Plumes of black Herons, adorned with precious Stones, a Turkish Sword, the Scabbard being of Silver richly set with Jewels, ten black Horses with rich furniture embroidered with Gold and Silver, and a Turkish Horse, having half the Body and Legs of the colour of Gold, with his Furniture of Crimson richly embroidered. He laboured to have the Emperour give notice to the Bassa of Buda, That this Attempt of the Turks against Transilvania, was against the Articles of Peace; but the Bassa made answer, That his Emperour was not to be blamed if he seized upon that Province, which did immediately belong unto him, and kept it quiet from the Practices of others. But Batori, relying not wholly upon this support, but desiring to have more strings to his Bow, sent Ambassadors to the Sultan, Sultan, with rare and rich Presents, who had feared Treaties and Councils with the Bassas; the which Negranis, the Emperours Ambassador residing at Constantinople, discovering, he sent word unto the Emperour, that he entertained a Monster among Men.

About the same time there came Ambassadors from the Saxon Towns of Transilvania, complaining much of the Cruelty and Tyranny of Batori. The Saxons (said they) living many years in Transilvania, had beautified the Provinces with Towns, Villages, and Markers, and had by their virtue obtained many Privileges from former Emperours; but Batori, against his promised Faith, and the Oath which he had taken, had deprived them of their Privileges, and afflicted them in such sort, as they were in a manner rooted out the ancient Family of the Saxons; that he had afflicted them with Imprisonments and miserable Servitude, and had detained John Benner three years in Prison, for no other cause, but for that he knew he had brought a great Estate out of Germany; he had deprived honest Widows of their Estates, and had oppressed others with unjust Exactions; he had surprised Hermstadt, the chief City of the Saxons, and suffered the Haiduck to spoil it, and to commit all sorts of Infolencies. That he had expelled the Magistrate, banished honest Citizens, ravished Women, slain the Parents, to deprive the Children of their Inheritance, and committed all the barbarous Cruelties that could be devised. That he had sent three hundred Captives to the Sultan for a Present; many he cut into small pieces, some he had thrown down from the tops of Mountains and Towers; some he had hung up by the Feet, others he had drawn in pieces with Horses and Trees, and to conclude, he had practised all kinds of barbarous Cruelties. That having expelled Religious Princes out of Moldavia and Valachia, he had made them subject to the Turk, for no other end, but getting an occasion to circumvent the Christians, he might waste all with Fire and Sword, having Multitudes of Barbarians to second him; and for a Conclusion of his notable Cruelty, having freed the Town of Gaudin, he made choice of twenty of the principal Inhabitants, and delivering to every one of them a Pike, he forced them in his Presence to kill one another in the midst of the Market-Place.

But God revengeth his Excess by his Ruine, whereto we shall presently see him run headlong miserably; for, Bethlen Gabor, his capital Enemy, having joined his Forces with those of Bassa Serder, they both entered together into Transilvania, forced Ungazi, took Dever, and struck a great Terror into the whole Country. Ogli Bassa on the other side furmously the difficulty of the ways, and lodgeth with his Troops in the Suburbs of Cromlad, and from thence went and camped over all the Tract of Barry or Barjac. Thus Batori sees himself oppressed by an Enemy from whom he can expect nothing but his Mifery and Ruine; he attended Succour from the Emperour, upon the Conduct of the Palatine of Hungary and Forgetisse, they came, but not such as were able to resist the Turk. This made him write to Trianan for the levying of Soldiers; but the hatred they bare him generally, deceived his hopes, no man would march under his Ensigns. This refusal makes him distrustful, he dares not confer with any man touching the Affairs of the War. A treaty of Peace seems more fit for his Affairs; he makes an overture to his most familiar Friend, and tells them, that he holds it necessary to purchase his Peace with Serder Bassa at what price soever; yea, were it in delivering into his hands the Places of greatest Importance. But he receives no other Answer from them, but that they had rather die than advise him to it. Thus he sees himself void of all hope of safety in his Affairs; he wanted Money, his Subjects, yea, even his Soldiers hated him, as a Prince abandoned to all Cruelty; and for his last Remedy, and the most infallible in base and cowardly Minds, he fell into despair, entreating one of his Servants to kill him; but the other refused him that honour, suffering him to draw on his miserable Life, till that within some few days after, going forth to view where his Troops were lodged, being in an open Chariot, accompanied only with two Gentlemen, fifty of his Soldiers (which attended him in an ambush) shot at him, flew him, and hurt those that did accompany him. It is true, this accident happened in the year 1613, when as this unfortunate Batori went to give an account unto God of the bad Government of his Estate.

Some few days after, Bethlen Gabor was declared Prince of Transilvania by Bassa Serder, who gave him this advancement at his Introduction; Batori shall serve for an Example to bad Princes; I do not think that you will follow his Steps. Beware you attempt not any thing without the Privy of my Master. Maintain Peace with your Neighbours, and make Men of Experience and Honesty of your Council. Transilvania did yet feel the continuance of a form of a fatal War, when as in less than forty days it saw it self settled in the calm of sweet Peace, by the acknowledgment which all the Towns made unto Bethlen Gabor, and the Oath of Fidelity which they took unto him, as to their elected Prince; notwithstanding that the Emperour Employed all his Credit to hinder it. But the desire of Peace, and the fear of the Turks Armies, drew all the Governors of Towns to acknowledge Gabor; such were the Affairs of Transilvania, disordered by the Turk. Let us now make an end of the remainder of the year 1612, the which we have deferred, for that we would not interrupt the relation of the Affairs of this Province.

We have laid elsewhere, That the King of Perfia had offered Conditions of Peace to Sultan Achmat, much to his Advantage, feeling that he yielded himself the Turks Tributary, in regard of certain Lands which he had conquered from them. Now the Vifir Naffif, General of the Army against the Perfian, brings his Ambassador to Constantinople, to conclude this Peace. Naffif arrived with his Army and the Perfian Ambassador at Senderat, right over against Constantinople, whilst most of the Bassas of the Port went to salute him, and then returned. But the Grand Vifir stayed there two days; on the third he past over to Constantinople, where he was entertained at the water side by all the Bassas which accompanied him; an infinite number of Janizaries going before with their Pieces, and some of them in Armour, after whom followed their Aga on Horseback; then came a great number of Jamagians, and the Emirs or Kindred of Mohomet with their green Turbans, with many blind men shouting aloud; these holy men carried the banner (as they say) of Mohomet, and the People (standing by) kissed it with great Devotion as they past; after them came the Chaux on Horseback, the Bassas, then the chief Muphti, and last of all Naffif Bassa himself; after whom followed the Treasure which he brought with him for the Emperour, being two hundred thirty four Moyses laden with Gold and Silver. The Vifir, as he past by the Sultans Window, bowed himself very low unto him, from whom he had a nod with his his Head, and so for Spurs to his Horse and rode away fast, as the manner of the Turks is when they salute a greater man than themselves, presently to run or ride away space. The Visier being come to the Scire, went in to the Sultan to kiss his Hand, where he continued a whole hour, the rest of the Baffa's attending without. There were present at this day Pomp the Emperours Ambassadors, the French, the English, the Polish, the Low Countries, and Venetian; the Persian remaining still at Scudare. The Grand Visier, as he past by the Emperours Ambassadors, put off his Hat and saluted him, but not therell. The same day Tompho, who had been lately made Prince of Moldavia by the Grand Seigneur, sent many Poloni to Constantinople, whom he had taken in the Wars. All which (notwithstanding they threw down their Caps and offered to turn Turks) were put to death. And within few days after, the Visier Nassif, sitting in the publick Divano, had three Robes sent him from the Grand Seigneur to grace him.

Achmat, having a Will to let the Persian see the Magnificence of his Court, went out of Constantinople and unto a pretext to go take the Air at his Country Palace, called Darni Baffa, he takes occasion at his return to make a stately entry at his Imperial City. The general Surveyor being advertised of his will, caused the ways from his Palace of Darni unto the City, to be covered with Sand; the which contains two French Leagues, or four English Miles. This done, the Emperour parted from his retinue, and entered in Rome in this manner: A great number of Men at Arms marched first at his back, and after them some Troops of Foot, the Cadis of Constantinople, or Men of Justice, and all the Talismans, or those of Mahomet's Law, in very great numbers followed after, and after these march'd the Visiers and Baffas in great Pomp; after whom followed the Sultans Household, that is to say, ten Men leading in their Hands ten goodly Horses richly caparisoned, the last of which had the Bridle and Saddle all covered with precious Stones; the Sultans Targuer was made fast unto the Saddle, and upon it did hang even to the Ground a great tassel of Pearls; and over all this, a long Horse-cloth or covering for a Horse, the which was embroidered to thick with Pearl, as the ground could not be discerned; after which followed the rest of the Emperours Household in divers Troops; first, fifty Janizaries on foot, every one leading Dogs in Leashes, Mastiffs, foot, every one leading Dogs in Leashes, Mastiffs, or Irish Grey-hounds, the goodliest of all were those which the French Ambassador had presented unto the Sultan. Secondly, the Grand Seigneur's Footmen called Peiks, Persians by Nation, all well attired, wearing on their Heads Bonnets of Silver, and gilt, in form of Pots. Thirdly, three-score Archers on foot, in the midst of which the Sultan came, attired in a rich Robe of Cloth of Gold embroidered with Pearls and Diamonds, his slaves were enrich'd after the same manner; his Turbant covered with five Plumes of black Herons Feathers intermix'd with great Diamonds, and a Chain of the same Stones about the lower part of his Turbant; upon his little Finger he had a Diamond of a large bigness and estimable price, the which gave a marvellous great Light; he was proudly mounted upon a goodly Horse richly caparisoned, Emperour like, the Saddle was caparisoned with Gold, Pearl, and Diamonds, the Stirrups of pure Gold set with many Diamonds, and from the Horse Neck did hang a great tassel of Pearl, the which was so great, as they were esteemed very rich and precious. Fourthly, after the Grand Seigneur followed three Men on Horse back, carrying in their Hands, the one his Arms, the other his Cloak, and the third his Imperial Equites and Gentlemen all on Horseback. Fifthly, Then came the Muffick after the Turkish manner, consisting of three-score Men on Horseback, which played upon Phiebs, Clerons, and Trumpets. Sixthly, There followed an hundred Pages of the Sultans, bravely mounted, and followed by many Eunuchs, fifty of which Pages carried every one a Faulcon upon his fist, having their Heads enrich'd with Diamonds, and these were followed by thirty Guards of the Port. Seventhly, Fifty Faulcons and Huntsmen richly attired and well mounted; four whereof had either of them before him upon his fiddlebow, a Leopard covered with Cloth of Gold. Eighthly, A great number of other Pages, fairer than the Pictures of Adonis or Love, chosen amongst the Infants of the Tribute, and unfortunately appointed for the filthy and unnatural Pleasures of their Master, whose Garments after the Turkish manner were precious, and made of rich Cloth of Gold curled. They were followed by a great Troop of young men plainly attired in Cloth, having upon their Heads yellow Caps pointed in form of a Sugar-loaf, and these were ordained to serve the Sultans Pages.

There were moreover attending the Sultan in this Pomp divers Beglerbegs, as of Bosnia, Buda, Romania, Natolia, and others; every Company going distinct, both of Horse and Foot, with the Baffas Servants all gallantly attired and well mounted; and after them followed Nassif's Attendants, being five hundred in number richly armed; there were also the Kings Fire-men, Calkers, Azappes, the Rices or Officers of Gallies with Spears in their Hands; all that belonged to the Arsenal, the Carters which governed the Carts going to War, and their Captains: then the horsemen with their Banner, and the Armourers all in Armour, with their Banner. There were also the Banners of the Grand Seigneur Mahomet, and of the Grand Visier, every one in his order before the Grand Seigneur; and after all followed the Capigies and Officers of his Kitchen. The number of all sorts of Attendants in this Pomp was so great, as it was esteemed to amount to the number of forty thousand Persons.

The Persian Ambassador, for whose sake the Emperour Achmat had made this stately shew, to the end he might carry back into his Country a pattern of the Ottoman State and Government, called to call out before his Lodging when as the Sultan passed by, an hundred pieces of Silk, the which were gathered up by the Archers of his Guard, whereof they made good purchase. All these Magnificences, added to those which we have formerly related at the Marriages of the Sultans Sister and Daughter, with other Pomp celebrated in France, Spain, Naples, and Germany, for the Marriages of Levis the Thirteenth, King of France, with Ann of Austria, Infant of Spain; and of the Prince of Spain with the Lady Elizabeth of Bourbon, the Kings eldest Sister, and for the Coronation of the Emperors, and the Emperours entry into Nuremberg, may give unto this year 1612, the Title of magnificent or stately.

Four days after Sultan Achmat's entry into his Imperial City, the Persian Ambassador had audience, and was received to kiss his Hands; he presented unto his Majesty in the Hall of the Palace of Persia his Master, four hundred balls of Silk, a Befondar State as big as a mans fist, with some others that were less; nine bags of Leather full of Turquoises, the which were a foot and an half long, and above four fingers broad, a great number of Tapeitries of Wool, Silk, Cloth of Gold and Silver, with many other things of great price, and very rare. The Compliments being ended, they began to treat seriously of a Peace between two great and ancient Enemies, the Turk and the Persian; the which, after some Difficulties, was concluded upon these Conditions: That the Persian King should pay yearly unto the Turkish Emperour, by way of Tribute, a quantity of Silk to the burthen of two hundred Camels; that the King of Persia's Son should be called Baffa of Tauris, and that the Cadi or Sovereign Judge of that Town should be kept from Constantinople. This Peace thus concluded to the Turkish Advantage, the Persian Ambassador returned to his Master, having left most of his Train dead of the Plague at Persia's Son. Being arrived at Tauris, the King of Persia feeling this Peace to be so dishonourable and burdensome for him, he caused his Ambassadors, who was come from Constantinople to see him, wear the Peace. Some write that he did him some indignities, which made these two great Monarchs return again to Arms.

The Grand Visier Nassif, after his return to Constantinople, to shew his Great Power and Authority, procured means to have the Chichimach (who had formerly supplied the Place of the Grand Visier in the absence of Nassif) to be deprived of his Baffas Place, and sent presently over unto Scudare, under pretence of preferring him to a Government near unto Trebisond in the Confines of Turkey, but with an intent to deprive him of his Head. The Friends of this Chichimach, (who were many, and great in Court) seeing him so disgracefully sent away, and doubting Nassif's purpose, procured leave to go back again, for that he was an old Man, and might from thenceforth live at home in quiet; and for his former Services a thousand Aspers a day allowed him for his Entertainment; which Nassif took very discontentedly.

During the Persian Ambassador's abode at Constantinople, the Emperour Matthias (Successor to Rodolphus his Brother) sent an Ambassador to the Sultan, to complain of the Enterprises which were made daily upon Transylvania, a Province which he said belonged unto him, as a dependance of his Realm of Hungary. This Ambassador, called Negroni, was received at the Court; and admitted to kiss the Sultans Hand; but his Presents were little esteemed, for that they were of less value than those which they had lately received from the Persian. His demands to have the Province of Transylvania, were grounded upon an Article inserted among those of the Peace betwixt the Emperour and Bathey; that is to say, That Bathey dying without Issue Male, Transylvania should remain at the Disposition of his Imperial Majesty. This Article being read by Negroni in the Turks Council, whether he had been admitted; the Muphti or Sovereign Priest of Mahomet's Law, answered, That it was contrary to his Law; to the Demands of this Ambassador touching Transylvania were rejected, seeing that Bathey had no Power from the Sultan (said the Grand Visier) to treat with the Emperour, and to give him Transylvania after his Death. Negroni grounded this Gift of Bathey (mentioned in the said Article) upon the eighth Article of the Peace betwixt the Turk and the Emperour, concluded in the Isle of Danow, by Amrath Visier, and the Deputies of his Imperial Majesty, in these words: That all which had been granted in the Treaty of Peace made at Vienna, to Bathey, should be duly and faithfully observed.

The malice and falsehood of the Turks.

Nassif, the Grand Visier, replied, That the Baffa Amrath being then Visier, might err in signing these Articles of the Peace upon the Danow; and at the same instant he shewed forth some other Articles whereas that was not inferred; saying, That the Sultan would faithfully perform those Articles, which he had signed; but that he refused to sign them, the which he refused to do; so as Nassif used some Threats to terrify him; but Negroni replied, That he was in their Power, and that in this case he had rather lose his Life, and die gloriously for the good of his Masters Affairs, than to have it taken from him at his return to Vienna, with Shame and Infamy, having signed those Articles. Finally, he promised to advertise his Imperial Majesty, and to certify them of his Pleasure; which promise for this time ended the Contention.

In the beginning of this year, Sultan Achmat, after the Reception of the Persian Ambassador, and the stately entry he made into Constantinople, went to lie at Adrianople, where his Janizaries and Spahies began to mutiny, spurning at their Bread and Rice which was given them for their daily Entertainment; and being demanded the Reason of this their Insolency, they answered, that no Emperour before him had so carried out his Men in the depth of Winter; which answer did much incense Nassif Baffa. This Visier was in such Credit with the Grand Seigneur, as during his abode at Adrianople he came three times in Person privately to visit him, who grew so powerful over his Masters Affections, as he obtained a privilege, That it might not be lawful for any Man to speak with the Grand Seigneur privately, but himself. Being returned to Constantinople, this happened a great Fire, in which there were five hundred Houses burnt. The Visier Nassif coming to see it quenched, and finding some Janizaries more careful to break open Locks, and tife Shops, than to do any good Service, he struck out the Brains of one of them with his Mace, and brake the Arm of another.

It had been an ancient Custom in Constantinople, that the owner of the House with all his Family where the Fire began, should be put to death for their Negligence: but it happening that the Emperours own Scire, in the time of Mahomet, Father to Achmat, being set on fire, Cicalla Baffa presented a Petition unto him, that this Custom might be abolished, holding it unjust that other Men should be put to death, and the same law pass in the Emperours own House: whereunto he yielded, holding it reasonable. And soon after there happened another great Fire, at which the Visier called many of the Janizaries to be hanged: finding them too busy in tiffing Houses; and he went up and down the Streets with his Scimitar in one Hand, and a Janizaries Head in the other, which he had cut off. The Grand Seigneur sent Holy Water unto the Visier, wherein he had dipp'd a piece of Mahomet's Garment, the which being poured into the Fire, the Turks said it ceased presently; yet by the Report of visible Witnesses it burned four hours after. The Grand Visier Nassif was a cruel Enemy to the Janizaries, of whom he sent fifteen thousand away into Asia, and would not suffer any more to be made, but only Spahies; and over such Janizaries as remained he made his own Servants to be Churbagies, and Ages or Captains over fifties and hundreds; fortifying himself by all the means he could devise against the future time, to prevent his fudden Ruine; but all this could not preserve him from a shameful fall, as you shall hereafter hear.

In the mean time let us pass unto Affrick, to observe the Troubles which fell in the Realm of of Fex and Morocco; the Quarrels betwixt Prince Xerif Muly Cidan, and the Xerif Muly Achmet, Ben-Abdalla his Nephew, and the Victories of Cidan against Abdalla. The Family of the Xerifs, Princes of Fex and Morocco, took its beginning some hundred and four years since, from Mahomet Xerif, born at Tigumedit in Dara, at this present one of the Provinces of Morocco: he was Aliaqui or Preacher of Mahomet's Law, who, seeing the Divisions betwixt the Sovereign Princes of those Realms, and that the Portugals had seized of the chief Forts of Morocco, he began with three of his Sons, Abdalla, Hamet, and Mahomet, to lay the Foundation of a new Monarchy, supported by three Pillars: the first was by a counterfeit Piety and disguised Religion; upon a godly Pretence to make War against the Portugals Christians which were in Affrick, and upon a passionate desire to retire the Mahometan Moors which were in their Pay, to the end they might by that means weaken them, and chase them with more ease out of the Territories of Morocco. The King, who at that time held the Scepter of Fex, (feeling nothing but the out-side of the Xerifs Designs) suffered his three Sons to display their Standard against the Christian Portugals in the Realm of Morocco: Innovations and Novelties are commonly pleasing to the common People. At this beginning, these three Leaders were followed by a great number of Soldiers: they vanquished in many Encounters; and the bruit of their new Victories flying into the Realm of Morocco, retired the Moors from the Portugals Service, whom they defeated soon after, with their Commander Ben-Abdalla. True it is that it was to their loss; for Abdalla, the eldest of these three Brethren, lost his Life in this Combate. But they seized upon the great Town of Taradente in the Province of Sus, and of the Provinces of Herra, Idewaca, Ubidewaca, Cus, Gueule, and in a manner of the whole Country betwixt Morocco and Mount Atlas, settling their Principality in Taradente, whereas the Xerif their Father carried the Name of the Governour of the Province of Sus.

They kill the King of Morocco.

The King of Fex begins to fear
them.

The King of Morocco, fearing the Greatness of these new Conquerors, dissembled the desire he had to bring them under, assuring himself that Time would present him some good occasion; so he suffered them to enter into Morocco: but they prevented him; they took away his Life by Poison, and seized upon his Realm. The King of Fex, who had by an indelicate Simplicity suffered them to take Arms, and by that means to open the way to a great Fortune, he saw a far off the Temple of these unjust Spoilers to fall upon Morocco and other Places. The fear of the like Calamity did much afflict his Mind: but the Xerifs entertained this idle Prince with fair shews; they abused his Bounty, and with the fourth part of the rich Spoils which they had taken in so many Towns and Provinces, they lull his distrust asleep; moreover, they send him the Tribute due for the Realm of Morocco. Hamet takes upon him the Name of King of Morocco; Mahomet that of King of Sus, in the Town of Taradente; and by a good Intelligence betwixt them, they make themselves fearful to all those Countries; so as they have nothing more to fear, than the Threats and Vengeance of Heaven. They then began to condemn the King of Fex, and plainly to deny the Tribute of Morocco, pretending for their Reason, that they were issued from the Line of Mahomet. This Contempt of the King of Fex did so open his Eyes, he finds the Faulte past, by the Interest of the present: he sees the Xerifs had abused the Liberty which he had given them: whereupon, he went to Field with an Army of eighteen thousand men, and planted his Siege before Morocco; but, as his Enemies Party was stronger than his, so he was chased away, and his Army defeated at the Passage of a River. Thus the Xerifs became peaceable Possessors of Morocco. The Peace of the Country made them men idle, and Idleness drew the two Brethren into Quarrel: where, after two bloody Batels, Mahomet being Victor, he took his eldest Brother Hamet, deprived him of his Realm and Liberty, and made him end his days miserably in Prison. Thus God doth punish the unjust Spoiler of another man's Good. We shall see in their Posterity the continuance of the same Quarrel.

Mahomet, fettered Sovereign in Morocco by Blood and Fratricide, as monstrous in Ambition as in Cruelty, he turned the same Army wherein he had beaten and vanquished his Eldest Brother against the King of Fex, (whose Improvidence had suffered Mahomet and his Brethren to take Arms, under the deceitful Title and Pretence of making War against the Christian Portugals): he assaulted him with great Forces, vanquished him, took him Prisoner, and deprived him both of Realm and Life. Thus the Xerif, in the Person of this Mahomet, became Sovereign Princes of Fex and Morocco. The Victory so happily gotten of so many Nations, made him fearful; but by his Cruelty he drew upon his Descendants the just Judgment of him who punisheth the excess and enormity of Crimes unto the fourth Generation. His Posterity was miserable, the unjust desire of Reign, (one ruining another) entertained the Brethren in perpetual Discord: for Cidan, now King of Fex and Morocco, was lately expelled by his Brother Kequi; but afterwards, Fortune changing her Inconstant Favour, Kequi was purified by Cidan, defeated, and forced in the Year 1610 to leave his Life in Algarbe in Portugal. Abdalla, the Son of Kequi, seeing his Fathers Affairs thus desolate, retires himself towards the Mountains in the Province of Sus; where, finding opportunity to annoy his Uncle Cidan, he made daily Incursions upon his Territories, with some Troops of Arabians, who had joyed with him, being two hundred Horse and two hundred Foot. But finding this to be a long course to attain unto the Conquest of the Realm from whence he had been expelled, he bethought himself, that some certain counterfeit Fictions in Religion, had in former times brought in his Grand-father, and made him absolute Lord of a great Country; wherefore he made use of a Prophecy, forged in his ambitious Spirit: and to work an Impression in the Peoples Minds (as he to be moved with a Passion of Religion) he sent certain religious Mahometans through the Country, with a shew of holy Simplicity, who went preaching from place to place, That one Palquere, a Man of holy Life, had given unto a Son of his a Drum of an admirable power and vertue, commanding him expressly, to keep it carefully, until that a Prince called Abdalla should come into Morocco, and that then he should beat his Drum, and in it the People at the sound thereof might go to the War with all safety; that it should be helpful to them, give Peace to the Realm, and settle all the Customs and ancient Laws to their common consent. Thus they preached this Prophecy, the which they said was now accomplished, seeing that this Prophetic Drum had been found, that Abdalla, the eldest Prince of the House of the Xerifs, had caused the Drum to be beaten, exhorting all men to follow the War for the common good of the Country.

These Vanities being preached by their ignorant and malicious religious Turks, increased the Number of Abdalla's Party: whereof Cidan being advertised, he sent a great Army against him into the Province of Sus, under the command of Alcas Remye, to hinder the progress of his Designs: but Abdalla finding these Forces to approach, retired himself towards the Mountains, from whence he might charge the Enemies Army; the which he did so happily, as within few days he cut off five thousand of his men. This success did so advance his Affairs, as his Troops increased daily, so as Cidan was forced to go with new Forces to fight with him, the which was the cause of his ruin: for at this time he was invetted, and notwithstanding the good success of his false Prophecies, lightly grounded upon the sound of a Drum, he was feared, and slain in this year one thousand five hundred and twelve.

Gotardus, discoursing of this miraculous King of Mauritania, whom he calls Muly Hamet, writeth, that he was charmed with devilish Incantations, and freed from all outward force, carrying himself for a Divine Prophet; That with one hundred and eighty Horse, and two hundred Foot, he went to make Head against Cidan King of Morocco, having forty thousand men; That his Soldiers, (who were so few in number) being ready to fly, he persuaded them with a cunning speech to prepare to fight; That coming near to Cidan's Camp, they might see a great Army of Enemies fighting against them, in which there were five thousand of Cidan's Army overthrowen, and the rest in great disorder put to flight, and yet Muly Hamet had not advanced with his Troops; That within a few days after, Cidan commanded them not to drink, nor wash in that River, which if they did they would die: but some neglecting his command, thinking to quench their thirst, died suddenly. He took many places in those mountainous Regions, which no man had formerly subdued; his Forces increasing daily, having five and twenty thousand men, and vowing to go against the Christians, more came unto him; so as he went against Cidan with a great Army, who likewise attended him, Hamet persuaded his Soldiers that no shot could hurt them; so as they assaulted Cidan's Camp with such fury, as within less than an hours space they had slain above six thousand men, and put the rest to flight. They write, that Hamet lost not above four or five, and that such as were struck with any Bullet, heaved Marks but no Wounds; and that the great Ordnance either flew over them, or the Powder vented out at the Touch-hole and wrought no effect. Cidan, having lost his Brother in the Fight, fled with all his Treasure, to recover new Forces, and in the mean time Hamet made himself Master of the whole Country. There were certain Hollanders admitted unto him, whom they found sitting upon a Carpet made of the Bark of Trees, having a white Shirt, and a long Garment upon it, a red Cap on his Head, bare Thighs and red Shoes, a Bag about his Neck, and in it he hid his Alcoran, a short crooked Sword and a Dagger hanging by him. Being saluted by the Hollanders, he willed them to sit down by him, telling them that he was sent from Heaven, to purge the World from evil, and to prepare the Law of God; to expel Cidan out of his Kingdom, and to restore Peace unto the World: wherefore he advised them not to have any commerce with Cidan, nor to assist him in any way. They observed many marks upon his body; he had one blue Tooth, all the rest being white; Hair upon either Shoulder, a red Circle in the Palm of his right hand, and the proportion of a Spur upon his right foot. Having gotten some Victories against Cidan, and taken the Town of Morocco, in the end his devilish Art falsifying him, he was slain, as you have heard. Such were the Affairs of Affrick, in the Realm of Fex and Morocco.

But in Algier a wonderful drought had caused cruel Combinations; it had so devoured the Fruits of the Earth before their Maturity, as there followed a wonderful Famine throughout the whole Land. The Turks attributed the cause of their Misery (some) unto their Sins; then to the coming of the Moors, who had been expelled out of Spain, as a pernicious Vermin; and sometimes to the licentiousness of Christians, which lived in those Places. Wherefore in the beginning of May this Year, the Judge of the Town ordained, That all the Turks should make their devout Prayers to Mahomet their Prophet, to obtain Rain, so necessary in that Country; that the Moors should depart in that Country; that the Moors should die; and that all the Christians, as well free as bond slaves, should cause their Heads and their Beards to be shaven: this was speedily executed; for the Turks Decrees require a prompt Obedience. But the miserable Moors, which could not get out of Algier within their three days prefixed, detained either by Sicknes, or some other Impediment, were all cut in pieces. For thirteen days, there was nothing seen within the Town but Processions of Turks without Turbans, crying and howling, after their manner, to obtain Rain from their false Prophet: but he which commanded the verigency over times, from whose hand proceeds fair Weather and Rain, and which makes the Earth fruitful, held the Pipes of Heaven yet stopped, to open them at more religious and holy fideles. For Bernard Murray, of the Order of the Redemption of Captives, hearing that the Turks meant to revenge their Miseries upon them, and to ruin a little Chappel which the Christian Slaves had in the Prison, for the pious Exercises of their Religion, obtained (by the means of Bis, Consul of the French in Algier) permission from the Dovan, or Turkish Judge, to make Processions, and to pray unto God to lend them the dew of Heaven, which was so necessary for them. All the Christian Slaves which were Prisoners continued their Devotions for the space of five days: but on the fourth day, being the Eighth of May, there fell such abundance of Rain upon Algier, as these poor Christians, seeing their Prayers heard in the midst of the Enemies of their Faith, gave infinite Thanks unto God for his great Mercy and Grace.

This miserable Christian Slaves were still detained in Irons and cruel Servitude, by this Accident. This Murray, of the Order of the Redemption of Captives, accompanied with two others of the same Order, had redeemed to the number of one hundred thirty and six: but when he was ready to embarke them, their evil Fortune would have it, that the Gallies of Genoa near unto Algier, where they took the Bassas Son of that Town, with many other Turks, and amongst the number a Virgin of Algier, of a very noble Family, and of as rare a Beauty, for the misery of these Slaves: for that when as the Bassas Son and the others were redeemed by a Frigate which the Father had sent, the fair Algerian Virgin was still detained by a Captain of the Genoways, who had retired to Cady, an Island adjoining, there to satisfy his Desires with more ease, upon the frail and fading perfection of this fair Slave, which had deprived him of his Liberty. In the mean time the Bassas of Algier, seeing his Son returned with the other Turks, and not the Algerian Virgin, commanded that the hundred thirty and six Slaves should be put again into Irons, with the three religious men which had redeemed them. Thus this feminine Beauty, or rather, the Passion of this Genovays, who holds the Possession to dear, makes a great number of Christian Souls to suffer by insupportable Servitude, howsoever they of his Nation (flattering his disordered lust) say, that his Delire to win her to God, and to make her a Christian, caused him to keep her so carefully.

Slaves

This suffered in Algier the loss of their Liberty; but a Capuchin Friar, a Florentine by Nation, endured at Tunes the loss of his Life, by the Cruelty of the Moors chained out of Spain, and retired into those Countries. This religious Man, being from a Slave among the Turks, attended daily from a Slave among the Turks, money to redeem his Liberty: but it happened, one day disputing in a Barber's House with a Morisque concerning Christian Religion, the Zeal of his Faith transported him so far, as to lay among divers Turks, That his Religion was better than that of Mahomet's. These Words, took continuously in that place, were reported by the Moriques to the Cadi, or Judge of the Town, whom they prefix with such horrible Clamour, and Cries, as he pronounced Sentence of Death against this Capuchin.

He was delivered unto them, and they stripped him naked, leading him with Infamy through Tunes, some spitting in his Face, others casting Dirt at him, and so they led him out of the Town, where they tied him unto a Post, and they being cruelly incited by a Speech which a Morabour or religious Turk laid unto them, That he among them that gave him not one Blow with a Stone, should be no good Turk, stoned him to death, where afterwards they burnt his Body, and threw the Ashes into the Wind.

The Martyrdom of this Capuchin was followed by the constant Confession (amidst the violence of Torments) of a penitent Renegade, a Florentine by Nation, and Captain of the chief Gally of Chio: Four French-men being Slaves in the Island of Chio, in the Patron or chief Gally, belonging to the Bey or Governour of the Island, they resolved to recover their Liberty with the hazard of their Lives, to return into France, and carry into some Port of Christendome that Gally, being the best appointed in the whole Haven. They drew unto their Party the Captain which commanded, being a Florentine Renegade. Their Enterprise should have been executed when as they should go to Land to cut Wood. But whether that the Scribe was treacherous to his Companions, or transported with some rash Indiscretion, being on Land, he spake these Words aloud, the which overthrew both the design, and them that projected it; Ho, we shall return into Christendom. A Turk which was near, taking hold of these words, reported them unto the Patron; who presently laid hold upon the Scribe, and drew from him the confession of all the Enterprise. He presently sends an hundred Men Slaves and the Captain, upon the four French Slaves and the Captain. But these five made such a generous resistance, as to the other Slaves, who were for the most part Moldavians, or of the Provinces which border upon the black Sea, had had the Courage to fight for their Liberty, without doubt the French men Enterprise had succeeded happily. But what could five Men do against an hundred? yet these French men were all slain, and the four French men were all slain, and the Florentine Captain was taken alive, and referred to the rigour of a cruel Death. For they continued him six hours together in most violent Torments, he still calling upon the holy, and sacred name of Jesus Christ, even to this last Gaspe, and detesting the Errours and falshood of the Law of Mahomet. This happened in October this Year.

A little before, the Estates of the united Provinces, and Count Maurice, seeing the losses which the Ships of Holland suffered in the Mediterranean Sea, many of them being taken by the Turkish Gallies, and a great number of their men made slaves; to the end they might be freed from that danger, and have a safe Passage for their Ships, and procure liberty for their Captives, they resolved to make a League with the Turk. Wherefore they sent Cornelius Haga to Constantinople, who, not only willingly accepted of that Embassy, but performed it with such discretion, as he purchased great credit and commendation to himself, and much profit to the Provinces. He had resolved at first to pass through Hungary; but he found so many crosses and obstacles, by some that were Creatures to the Pope and Spaniards, as he was forced to turn out of the way, and seek a great Circuit. First of all, he fell into the hands of the Arch-duke Ferdinand, who caused him to be examined, and admonished to desist from his purpose: After which he was soft at Sea, and in the end, having surmounted all dangers, he recovered Constantinople the first of May. He had express charge from the United Estates to labour for three things, the first was, to treat of the deliverance of the Hollanders that were Slaves. The second, to make a League with the Turk. And the third, to obtain from him a free Navigation for the Hollanders throughout all the Seas and Ports of his Empire.

This Ambassador was brought to kiss the Sultan's hands, and was favourably received; he presented unto his Majesty, in the name of the Estates of the United Provinces, his Letters of Embassy, with the Presents which followed. These being of Paradise, of rare and precious Plumes, wonderful goodly to behold, and valued at eight hundred pound sterling; two Vessels of Christall, wonderful rich and beautiful; four other Vessels made of Fishes Bones, whereas the art seemed miraculous in the graving; fifty pieces of Cloth of Gold of divers colours; five pieces of Silk, five of Damask, five of Silk watered, and five plain; a Staff of an Elephants Tooth graven with admirable industry; a Parrot shut in a Cage of Christall, so artificially done, as no man could discern the entry; and many fair and rich Table-cloths of Holland Cloth, most part powdered with flowers to the Life, and wrought in their lively colours. The which the Sultan did accept with admiration. All these things he sufficiently, That the Estates from the beginning, or soon after, have raised Handy-works as well as Traffick and Navigation to the highest point of Perfection.

The sixth of July following, the League was sworn betwixt the Ottoman Emperour and the United Provinces of the Low-Countries, by the which Achmat promised to cause to be let at liberty all the Hollanders that were detained slaves within his Empire: That the Traffick should be free for the Hollanders Ships throughout all his Seas and Havens; and moreover he granted, That the Estates should have an Ambassador residing at his Port. This alliance with the Turk, for the which they have to often, and with little reason blamed the French, hath been affected and fought by the English and Spaniards, as we have said elsewhere; and now by the Hollanders, whose Estates proceed in all their Affairs with such weight and measure, as it seems they do nothing but with great Reason, and to good purpose.

About

The Moriques chafe the Jews out of Pera.

The Practices of the Moriques against the Christians of Pera.

The Turks Army for Transilvania.

A Question for the Patriarch of Constantinople.

About the end of this Year, the Jews, whose long Slavery throughout the World reproacheth their wretched and miserable Oblinacy, received at Pera, near Constantinople, the weight of a furious Tempest which fell upon them, stirred up against them by the malice of the Moriques Grandines chafed out of Spain, and retired into the Levant. These, having by Presents won the favour of the Cadi, or Judge of the Place, who was a Negro, newly settled in that Charge by the Grand Visier Nassif; they obtained Power from him to thrust all the Jews out of Pera, and to demolish their Synagogues. This Power they executed with all violence: And yet these miserable Jews durst not make their Complaints unto the Magistrate, except one of their Sect which dwelt in the Isle of Chio; who, being then at Constantinople, and supposing he had more credit than the rest, went to complain to this Cadi Negro, who presently caused to be given unto him five hundred blows with a Cudgel, instead of doing him Justice; so dangerous a thing it is to have to do with such unjust Magistrates.

The Infidelities of the Moriques transported them farther; for after they had expelled the Jews out of their Dwellings, they threatened to do unto the Christians at Pera as much as had been done unto them in Spain; and they bragged, That they would seize upon their Churches, and especially on that of the Franciscan Friars, the which was reasonable fair for the Place. But the French ambassador, having made his Complaint to the chief Visier, he prohibited them to make any attempt against the Christians, upon pain of rigorous Punishment. This Prohibition stayed their fury; but they did not forbear in all other occasions to shew the cruel Hatred they owe unto Christians: as to the Jews, in all Encounters where they came, they did a thousand times more mischief than the Turks themselves.

At the same time the Scies, Achmat had drawn together a mighty Army to go into Transilvania; he caused it to camp in Tents near unto Constantinople, about his Palace, called Darut Baska, whither the People of Constantinople went to walk, and to see his Forces; within few days after, he went to Adrianople, meaning from thence to proceed in his Voyage, carrying with him all the chief Men of his Port, except the Basha of the Sea, or Admiral, who remained at Constantinople, to have a care of the City, and for the greater safety thereof, this Basha caused an Edict to be published, That no man should go out of his House, nor keep any Light in it after the ordinary Cry, which was made an hour within night, when as the Talissans crying from the tops of their Mosques, invite the People to make the Sala, or Prayer. After the Publication of this Ordinance, he sent certain Chaox to treat all the Ambassadors residing at the Port, not to suffer their People to go out by night, to the end that their liberty might not serve as a dangerous Example to others. But notwithstanding all the Basha's Entreaties and Prohibitions, three English-men of the Ambassador's Train went out by night into the Street, where they were met by the Provost of Pera, who took them, and presently (without respect of the quality) caused either of them to have an hundred and fifty blows with a Cudgel, and then committed them to Prison, the doors whereof are never opened but with a Silver Key: so strictly do they observe in Turkey the orders of the Princes Lieutenants, without exception of Persons.

About the end of the Year, the Patriarch of Constantinople (by reason of divers Complaints made against him, was deprived by the Grand Visier, and one Cyrillus, Patriarch of Alexandria,

(a learned and religious Bishop) was (much against his Will) preferred to the place. The former Patriarch hereupon excommunicated all such as had wrought his Overthrow, but he himself was banished into the Isle of Rhodes. In his Passage, the Bark wherein he went was cast upon Mytilene, in which Place he renounced all Right and Claim to the Patriarchate before the Bishop of that Place, and resigned it to the Bishop of Eratras: whereupon the Bishop came from Paras to Constantinople, and laboured with the Visier Nassif for the place; who, upon promise to pay him fifteen thousand Chequens (which is ten thousand more than they were wont to pay) made him a Grant thereof: which Cyrillus, the late elected Patriarch, understanding, he came with all the Grecians to expulsiolate the Bishops with the Grand Visier; who answered, That he was to do what he could for the Emperour's Profit, and nothing against it; wherefore, if they would give so much as the other had promised, Cyrillus should continue in the Place, which the People were very willing to perform, but Cyrillus refused it; and so the other was made Patriarch; who presently lent for the old Patriarch to come from Rhodes to make Peace with him, for that they held not his Excommunication just, being not deprived by a Council, but only by the King. About the same time, Nassif the Grand Visier, sent for the four Ambassadors, of England, France, Venice, and the States of the Low-Countries; and the reason why he sent for them, was, to raise their Custom One in the Hun dred more than the Merchants had formerly paid.

Whilst that the Sultan Achmat's Army drew near to Transilvania, and fortified the Places which he held in those Countries, Cosmo de Medicis, Great Duke of Tuscany, bent his generous Designs against the Fort of Aghman in Caramania, in old time called Ciccia, a Province, which in the Writings of Antients, hath been honoured with two famous Cities, where to lay, Tharhis, the County of Tharhis, and Selenicia, the Port whereof is called Aghman, a Haven which in old time hath contained within its bosom the fearful Forces of the Pyrates of those days; from thence, in former times, hath come forth a powerful Army of Pyrates with a thousand Sails, so proudly rigged, as many of them had their Sails of Purple, the Tackling of Gold Thread, and the Oars garnished with Silver, marks of their Spoils of above four hundred Cities ruined by their Pyrates, who struck a terror even to the Romans, and forced them, to avoid their Fury, to set to Sea that great Fleet whereof Pompey the Great was General.

The Trophy, erected upon the Walls of Aghman, of the Heads of forty Egyptines, lost in a Ship called the Prosper, by the ignorance of the Captain which commanded in it, made the Great Duke to study to have his Revenge for this Affront; and his desire to abate the Pride of the common Emperour, elevated his Mind to generous Enterprises. In the end of March, this present Year 1613, he armed six Gallies, under the Command of the Admiral Inghirami, the which he manned with six Companies of Foot, commanded by Julio de Cony, called Montano, General at Land, besides forty Knights of the Order of S. Stephen, and a good number of Gentlemen Adventurers, among the which was Don Pedro de Medina. This Fleet parted from Ligorne, and came to Civita Vecchia. In the beginning of April they took in many Noblemen and Gentlemen of France, which attended them, and would be Partakers in the Enterprise; the which were, the Earl of Candale, eldest Son to the Duke of Epernon, Cipierre, Thimenes, De Vie, Monterault, De la Tour, and his Brother Bolseire, Villandre, Verneigies, Du plessis, De la Motte.

1613] Morte magnus, Ayes, Del Tour, Saints Cyres, Moplasgar, and Lovnes. About mid April the Gallies landed in the night near unto a little Town in Affa the Isles, called Geronda, held for that Geronda of the Antients; but their Defect was fruitless, they found it defare by the Gallies, and the Inhabitants, who had prepared all Surprizes. They returned again to their Gallies, and sailing towards the East, they encountered three Vessels like unto their Caramoufals, the which they fet upon and took; and about the Fifteenth of May, having forced the Levant Seas, they resolved to attempt Agilman. Upon the way they took a Vessel called Grippe, which instructed them of the Estate of the Port. Fortreis. They understood that there were two Gallies of Cyprus in the Port, that the Place was well furnished with all things necessary, and guarded without by a good number of Horse-men, and that within few days after, one of the laid Gallies should come out of the Port of Agilman, and go to the Island of Pappadula, to fetch a new Mail. Ingrimbair thought to prevent it, carrying his whole Fleet thither, the which he laid clost in the Island to besiege the Turkish Gallies, but it having discovered his Fleet, he put out to Sea, and with speed returned to the Port of Agilman; to give the alarm unto the Country. Notwithstanding the Christians resolved to assault it, they went with their Fleet to the Port Cavalier, twelve miles from Agilman, from whence they sent a Long-boat to discover; the which brings them word, that the whole Country was in Arms. About two nights after, the Christians had intelligence of some that had been so generous; yet they pals on, and about three of the Clock in the Morning they came near the Shore, being covered with the silence of the Night, so as before six of the Clock they had made their Landing about a mile and a half from the Port. The Seigneur of Montano, and the Earl of Candale, with some few choice men, landed first, to discover: a mile from the shore they encountered the Turkish Gallies, and the Lord commanding Montano commanded they should finish their landing, leaving twenty men for the Guard of every Gallie.

This Fort of Aglian is seated upon a little pleasant Hill, which looks towards the South. It extends from the Hill unto the Sea-shore: the form is oval: that part which is next to the Sea is altogether Meridional, and the other which is distant from the top of the Hill, looks towards the North. The Walls are built of good Stone and Lime, the which are five Fathom high, and one broad. Within there was a Wall drawn from the East to the West, which divides it into two unequal parts, the which they enter by a Port let in the middl.

The Circuit of the Wall is fortified with eight Towers, whence five great Guns are placed, the which are five Towers whole which be whole are of a square form, and have five fathom in breadth on either side; the half Towers have the same greatness on the one side, and half as much on the other: their height exceeds not the Wall, unless it be that which is built on the top of the Hill, which is raised about eight foot above the Wall, and stands on the plain.

There were in this Fort, six hundred fighting men, with store of Victuals, Munitions for War, and many pieces of Ordnance; without, there were an hundred Horse scouring up and down for the Guard of the Place; and within the Port there were two Gallies, a Caramoufal, and a Greek Brigantine, with some hundred and fifty fighting men. The Order of the Combat was as follows. The Admiral of the Sea, and the Mars, a General at Land. For the principal Port, and that of the Retreat, he sent two Companies of Foot, which were those of the Admirals Gally, the Captains Gally, and of S. Stephen, with the Petards, all under the charge of the Earl of Candale, who leading this forward, discovered a Corps de gard of Turks, Horle and Foot together; wherco he prefently advertised the General, sending him word, That he would march on towards the Fort, and if the Turks came to charge him, he would kill them all in pieces. Many advised him to return to the Gallies, because all the Almex had the Relolution of the Earl of Candale, who pafed on without Charge untill he came within one hundred and twenty Paces of the Wall, where he was charged before by the Musket-flor of the Fort, behind by the Gallies, and in flank by them of the Mountain, with just horrible howling and crying out, as the Mariniers which carried the Petards being wonderfully amazed and terrified, let them fall to the Ground, and fled away. The Baron of Montmorant, at Tiel, a Souilder of Langueuec, took them up. They carried off the Petards, untill they came within fifteen Paces of the Walls, when as twenty Turks fell forth, with a View to make Head against the Earl of Candale's Troops; but seeing themselves too weak, they fled prefently again back to the Town. The Earl advanced to enter with them, but the Port was so soon shut as they were in; wherefore they muft of force let the Petard to work. But whilst they were making it fast unto the Gate, there fell a Shower of great Stones upon the Troop on the right side, Don Pedro de Medicis (who would needs be present) was cast down and half slain; Calonge, Mont-terauk, La Tour, Davanes, and Detour, had taken upon them the Charge of the Petard, every one carrying a part, to put it speedily in Execution.

Whilst they were thus buffed to force the Port, the Sergeant-Major came unto the Earl of Candale, and told him, that there was a Troop of three hundred Mufqueteers come to charge him: these were two Beys which came out of the Gallies with their Troops, and the bad and which the two Companies that Montana had left at their Landing, had kept. The Earl of Candale had left part of his Troop with the Petard, and turned Head with the rest against these Beys, to charge them; but they had no meaning to fight, but only to make a shew; and seeing they should be forced, if they staid longer, they took their way towards the Mountain, and in their Retreat made a shew of being pursued, and persuaded them not, fleeing it fitter to return to the Petard which played so happily, as it made a Breach capable for three men to enter in front.

The Squadron of the Knights of S. Stephen, commanded by the Commiffary Lenzoni, and the Company of the Gallies of S. Mary Magdalen, with two Ladders were to affault the High Tower. The Company of the Admiral-Galley, with one Ladder, was to assault the Port of the Retreat; and the Company of the Gallies of S. J. was to fight with the Gallies and Veffels in the Haven: all thefe Troops (being led by the General Montano, and by Captain Alexander of Tarentum, Serjeant-Major) marched in order towards the Fort. But the Petard, having effected, as we have faid, the Earl of Candale entered fuddenly with his Troops, and affaulted the Port of the Retreat: there to apply a Petard, which alfo very fortunately made a Breach. The Turks, amazed at the noife and forcing of their Gates, fled unto their Walls; fome retiring into their Towers, and others into the Barricados which they had made in the Street. At the fame instant they planted two Ladders on the lower part of the Town Wall, and by adjoining to the Sea, whereof one was broken, and the other fuch that were upon it; by the other (notwithstanding 1613] that the Turks Horsemen charged them behind) a good number of Christians got up to the Walls, making their way by their arms, whilst the rest left up the Turks to rout; having taken their Cornet, they forced the rest for to flee unto the Mountains. The Squadron of Knights, with the Company of the Gally of Saint Mary, having had a longer way to march, came not so to the Tower upon the Hill, until that after the Petards had wrought their Effects, so as the Turks being retired thither, they found very great assistance, besides the attempts of the Enemies Hoile, which charged them bold, and they with their Ladders against the Wall, and could not make them hold. Wherefore the Commiffary Lansoni, having performed as much as a brave and resolute Man could do in that Extremity, resolved to leave that Place, and go unto some other where he might be more necessary; but being the last to make the retreat, he was shot through with two Musket Bullets, and suddenly flain. The Company of the Gally of Saint John vanquished the Gallies in the Bay, and the Admiral Sir John the Admiral at Sea went to take possession as soon as they had given him a sign, having the other two Vessels at Liberty.

Within the Fort, in the Towers, and at the Barricades, the Combat was hot and dangerous, the Turks had despair and the advantage of the place on their sides, The Christians, thrust on by their Valour and constant Resolution, press them on at all files; there was nothing to be seen but Blood, wounded or dead men; but much more of the Turks side than of the Christians. In the end, after a Combat of four hours, the Christians (some of whom were taken, many were slain, and the Christians obtained an absolute Victory; but as it could not be made without loss of their Enemies, who made great resistance; so there were five and fifty Christians wounded, of which number De Vic, a French Gentleman was one, who had a Musquet hurt through his Thigh, going to charge a Troop of Turks which were retired into a Tower; and some Gentlemen were slain; among the which was young Buffiere, a French Man, whose Valour in this Action, made the Turks so afraid that he so generously, conceived a certain hope that he would have proved a valiant Captain; if Heaven had lent him longer Life. The sorrow for his Death was general, as well among the Italian Troops, as among those of his own Nation. Vernegue and Villandre, two other brave French Gentlemen were also slain. The dead and the wounded were carried into their Gallies; they emptied the Fort of all the Artillery, Munition for War, and Victuals; the Trophy of forty Florentines was beaten down, and all the Houses set on fire. Aglim being dead, and the Turks on their side, with their busied care,

Slaves, having freed about two hundred and forty Christians which were in Irons. The two Turkish Gallies were drawn out of the Port, and carried away with eight other Vessels. In this Triumph, as the Admiral Toghrami bent his Course towards Ligorn, upon a middle of the way a Turkish Carameoul came in a middle of the Fleet, as into a Taill; it prepared to defend it self, but the Christians prevailed, it, but not without loss, for the Turks made so great resistance, as there were above fourscore Christians hurt or slain; the Earl of Candale fighting alone at the Prow of the Gallie, by the Permission of the General. But this Carameoul being taken, and the Florentine Mariners entered, it split and sank suddenly. The great Dukes Gallie, encountered several other smaller Vessels, which they took, and afterwards arrived happily at their Port.

The twelfth of August following, Othavio of Arragon, General of the Gallies of Sicily, by the Commandment of the Duke of Osuna, Viceroy in that Realm, parted from the Haven of Palermo, with eight Gallies well armed and manned, to go into the Levant. His first touch was upon the Admiral Basia of Scor, where he understood that the Admiral Basia of the Sea was gon from Constantinople with thirty Gallies, bearing his Courte to the Island of Nagropont, and moreover, that others attended him in the Haven ; and that the Gallies of Rhodes prepared to go and joynt with him, all which Naval Fleet was to fall upon Soria, against the Turks Rebels.

Notwithstanding these News, Othello continues his Course upon the Island of Niagara, where he is underflood by a Greek Vessel, that the Turkish Admiral meant to fend twelve Gallies to Rhodes, to guard certain Vessels of the Fleet, which came from Alexandria by the Channel of Samos. True it is, that of twelve which were together when they parted, two were sent by the Bey, or Captain which commanded them, to the Island of Chios, so there remained but ten together. Othello resolved to charge these ten, causing his Fleet to row that Day, and almost a whole Night as secretly as they could, along the Shore of the firm Land of Natolia, and at the break of day he arrived at the Cape of Corvo, twenty Miles from Chios; from whence he sent his long Boat to discover. But in the mean time he himself espied the ten Turkish Gallies not far from him; at a sight whereof he ordered his Gallies to march forth with Diligence, as at Sun rising he was about the Enemies Gallies, and had invented them. At his first approach he discharged all his Ordnance, and then with his Admiral-Gallee he joined with the Turks Gallie which carried the Standard; the Spaniards entered, flew and massacred all that made resistance; the Combat began at the Prow, from whence they came to the Poer, whereas the Bey, or Commander of the ten Gallies, flew to whom they forced to yield. In the mean time the Turk Gallies of Sicily charged the Turks so furiously, as they took five, all great Vessels carrying Lanthorns; two fled towards the Land, hoping to save themselves, but the Turks had scarce leisure to leap to Land, and to flee into the Country, abandoning their Vessels to the Spaniards, who pursued them; the other three Gallies having gotten some advantage, fought by Night, so seven only came into the Spaniards Port, and of which they had a very rich Booty, freeing above a thousand Christian Slaves, which were at the Chain, and by a strange change of Fortune, putting into their Places the Turks which had incained them. Among the most remarkable of the Prisoners, were the Commanders of the ten Gallies, called Sinan, Bey of Grigina, in the Island of Cyprus; the Bey of Alexandria, (Son to Ibal Bassa, who was defeated in the Battle of Lepanto, by Don John of Austria) and some Beyes or Captains, and Patrons of Gallies.

This Summer, the Emperor Matthias being gone to an Assembly of the States at Presburg in Hungary, in the mean time Sigismund Battori, who had been Prince of Transilvania, and so great a Terror and Scourge unto the Turks, as he made Sinan Pasha, having an Army of one hundred and fifty thousand Men, to the thirce within ten days from before him, and would never endure the sight of him, he having but forty thousand Men in his Army. But afterwards, being the Author of his own Misfortune and Miseries, by his inconstant Humors, he came and lived a private Life at Prague, and there died of an Apoplexy. At the Estates of Presburg they consulted of the their prize, and put them to flight. The Baffa of Agria advertised of the defeat of his out-riders, goeth forth with one thousand Men, to recover the Booty from the Haiducks, which they had newly taken from his Soldiers; but after a sharp encounter he lost his Horse, and two hundred of his Men, being forced to make his retreat. From thence the Haiducks went and spoiled the Country about Solnos; some others holding the ways of Strigiron or Gran, took a Turkish Bride with her Baggage, who was going from Gran to Buda; and four hundred Boestaches (some of them Haiducks, and the rest Turks, Men which hold no party but their own, to rob with the more impunity) seized upon Balaster, Micout, and Felacs; but at the recovery of them, they were so ill injured by the Hungarians, as most of them lost their Lives there, and the rest were taken Prisoners.

But the Emperor, who desired to be relieved in the important Business of Transylvania, assembled the Estates of Bolowia, Austria, Siria, Carinthia, thia, Carinthia, Silezia, Lusatia, Moravia, and Hungary, his Hereditary Countries; whom he gave to understand, That the Peace was violated in Hungary, by the Hostilities of the Turks upon the Christians; to whose Prejudice Sultan Achmat had subjected unto himself the Provinces of Valachia, Moldavia, and Transylvania; this last, under the Government of Beithem Gabor, who had made himself his Vassal. That the Sultan had sent word unto his Imperial Majesty, that he should not pretend any thing there, to the end this Country might be wholly united to the Turks Empire. Whereupon he earnestly exhorted the Assembly to consider wisely: First, whether Transylvania should be left wholly in the Turks Power: Secondly, why the Sultan would not consent to the ratification of the Truce: Thirdly, of the means to make War, if the Necessity of his Affairs should force him: Fourthly, to what end the Turk would hinder his Imperial Majesty, that he should pretend no right to Transylvania: Fifthly, that the Turk had sent him an Ambassador, who, contrary to the Articles of Peace, had not brought any Presents: Sixthly, if they should make a new accord with the Turk, to consider advicely, what assurance they might take, seeing that he would not consent unto the sixth Article of the Peace.

Their opinions were divers upon these Propositions; but all joyfully consented to maintain the Authority of the Imperial Majesty. The Hungarians, only interested in their resolutions to War, by reason of the Spoil of their Country, as a passage for all their Troops, they fought the Emperor, that if he meant to send any Forces into Transylvania, they might have commandment to march some other way, and not over their Lands. Beithem Gabor in the mean time laboured to recover those places which had been lost. Wherefore he provided himself to make some attempts upon Lippa and other places; as at Borene, Gerns, and Arach. The Governors of these places gave advice unto Forgassie, Lieutenant General to the Emperor in high Hungary, representing unto him the estate of their Garrison, and the fear they had, that if Beithem should once get them into his possession and power, he would deliver them over unto the Turk: That if they would send them Succours, they would endure all extremities they yield to the Enemy. Yet for all this they made no haste to send them Succours; and Sander Bassa, according to the commandment he had received from the Sultan, having brought Forces to Beithem, the Siege of Lippa was relieved in the Estates of Transylvania.

On the five and twentieth of October, the Cannon being drawn out of Veradin to batter the Fort, Beithem went to invest it, made his approaches, and battered it so furiously, as having made a reasonable breach, it served first for a Passage for four hundred Men to escape, who left the Governour with very small means to defend the Place, and without hope of Succours from Hungary; which made him come to a Parley, promising to yield the Place, to have their Lives and Goods saved. The Forts of Gerns and Arach were delivered by the same Capitulation. That these three Places should not be put into the Turks Hands, but should remain perpetually united to the Principality of Transylvania: and to take all interest from the Turks, the Estates of the Country should pay unto Sander Bassa the Charges and Entertainment of his Troops. These Places thus gotten by Beithem, he manned them with new Garrisons; the Imperial which were within them being retired to Forgassie, the Emperours Lieutenant in high Hungary. But the Estates of Transylvania being assembled at Veradin, disputed diversly, whether they should resign these three Places into the Sultans Power; some represented the Discontentment he would have if they were refused, and the Inconvenience that might ensue; others were not of Opinion that the Province should be so dismembered, giving the most important Places thereof unto his Turks. Thus with out consenting or refusing the delivery of these Places to the Turk, the Estates concluded, that Prince Beithem should do therein what he held most Necessary for the Tranquillity of the Country; beseeching him most humbly, to free them from the Imperials, who had seized upon Hufi and Pivars. Such were the Affairs of Transylvania this Year, a Province distracted from the Emperours Power by the Turks Practices.

At Constantinople, Sultan Achmat, desirous to beautify the outward part of his Sealie with a goodly and spacious Place upon the Sea shore, he caused a Platform to be made within the Sea, being eight hundred Paces long, and one hundred and twenty broad. The Provost of Constantinople caused this Resolution to be proclaimed, when as presently every House lent forth a Man, and the chief of Families themselves laboured there in Person. There might you see the Baffas serve as overseers of the Workmen, and the Janizaries and Spahies carrying Scautles with a wonderful Alacrity; and at all hours of the day there was Mufick of divers sorts of Instruments, to ease their Labour, and to encourage them to continue. The Vissers going to visit the Workmen, caused a larges of pieces of Silver to be cast amongst them. Thus the Sultan being served with admirable Diligence in this his work of Pleasure, he saw it finished in three Months, having been begun in October this year.

Whilst that the Sultan employed his leisure after this manner, in the structure of a Platform within the Sea of Constantinople, certain religious Men parting from Pera, had a design to build another in the Waves of Infidelity; but more profitable for the Health of Souls. This was an Employment of Jesuits into the Country of Mingrella, in old time called Cholos; Lewis Granger, a Priest of this Society, with two others of his Order, and an Armenian for their Interpreter, parted from Thrace with this godly Resolution, to preach unto the People far from God, the Truth of his Holy Word, and to guide them happily in the way to Heaven. He passed the Bosphorus of Thrace, and the famous Gallies of Leander and Hers, and cut through those Waves, whereas he that could not quench the Fire of his

Paffion, quenched the flame of his Life; he passed beyond Pompey's Pillar, or rather that of the most happy Daniel Styhia, who erected his towards this Mouth of the Sea: and about the sixth of June this same year they arrived at Verna, a famous Town in Thrace, whereas a Company of French Soldiers (whom the violence of the weather had some years since forced to leave the Emperours Service in Hungary) were in Garrison for the Turk, to defend his Subjects against the Incursions of the Cossacks; yet these Frenchmen do still observe the Catholic Religion inviolably. From thence he sailed towards Cardula, and by the encounter of a little Gallion he entered into the Port of Trabzon. Within few days after he was carried in the same Vessel to Eriza in the Country of Lexia or Laffia, which on one side looks towards the Country of the Georgians, and the other that of Trabzon. The Christian Religion hath been for a long time planted among those People, but very ill manured; for the Fathers, to free their miserable Children from the Tribute wherewith the Turks oppress them, cause their Children to be circumcised after the Mahometan manner; and for the same Consideration they marry their Daughters unto Janizaries. Moreover they abandon themselves to the Mahometan Impiety, to the end they may be delivered from their insupportable Oppressions, and their Turkish Yoke. The Jesuits found there a good Subject to work upon for the Health of Souls; during their abode there for certain days they catechized the Men, baptized the Children, and advertised the Women married unto Turks, what they were to do for the maintenance of their Faith: But for that their Communion or Charge was to go unto Mingrella or Cholos, they went again to Sea, and sailed towards Gema, which is the further Corner of the Black Sea: this Haven being very unfit to cast Anchor in, they followed the Gallies which carried a Baffa called Onese from Constantinople, who should treat a Peace on the behalf of Sultan Achmat, with the Prince of the Mingrellians, and dispose him to pay a Tribute; with these Vessels they went into a Port called Maerogala, nine Miles from that of Gema, holding this Place more safe than the other: but in Truth there is little assurance whereas the Waves and Winds command Sovereignty. A North-west wind rising about Midnight on the fifteenth of September, drove their Gallies near unto the Shells and Rocks, whereas one was broken and cast away. This Tempest continued many days, and during the Violence thereof, another Gallie was lost in the which the Jesuits had been, by good advice they had retired to Land during the Fury of the Sea and Winds. The Jesuits improved the cause of this loss, to the Prohibition which Onese the Baffa had made unto them, not to pass into Mingrella before the Peace were concluded with the Princes of that Country; the which grew long, by reason of the Difficulties which happened in the Treaty. In the end those Princes reliving to pay the Tribute unto the Turk, it was concluded.

The Liberty of Travell follows Peace. Granger and his Companions proceeded in their Journey; twenty days after their departure from Maerogala, they arrived at Saurapella, a place of Georgia; whereas the Prince's Vicer came to visit them, and after the Georgian manner saluted them, bare-headed, and kneeling upon one knee. Gorel, Prince of the Georgians (who was then at Barles, whereas the Court was to pass the Feasts of Christmas) being advertised of the arrival of these new Christian and French Teachers, sent for them, received them favourably, and allowed them bare-headed, and kneeling. After that he had made them to bless his Court, he held many Discourses with them of the Truth of the Roman Church; and of the Popes Power, as the Father of all Christendom; being moved partly thereunto by a feeling of Piety to the Church, and partly from the Instructions he received from these Jesuits, lo as enlightened with a new Beam of the true Light, he intreated Granger to crave Absolution of his Sins from the Pope, the which (said he) he may give me by the Power he hath from God; promising to send him his Confession in writing. But understanding that the Jesuit had Power from the Pope to absolve him, he purged his Conscience of all his Sins, by a general Confession of his Life. Without doubt the Zeal of these Souls, so far from Succour, shews plainly what the Harvest would be, if so many Labourers were found as are necessary. A Monk of Georgia, who had lived some for the space of twelve years, had in former times planted Piety there; the which they of this mission did now alter. This Prince Gorel intreated the Jesuits to send him some of their Company at their return into Europe, promising to make great esteem of them, and to give them a Church, a House, and all things necessary for their maintenance. The Prince offered them Silver, which they refused, modestly excusing themselves upon the Rules of their Institution, which forbids them to receive any temporal recompence for the Administration of Holy things. Thus they parted from this Prince, who commended much their manner of living, and caused them to be conducted to Saurapella, to continue on their Journey into Mingrella.

The third of February, in the year 1615, they parted from this Town with the Turks who came to conclude the Peace, and passing by the Banks of Fels (a River which divides the Country of Cholos, now called Mingrella), they arrived at Heraciano, otherwise called Heracbia, and from thence to Margoula, whereas the Prince of the Mingrellians (called Dodran) then remained, being busy in the Reception of Trebis Cham, King of Georgia, who was come thither to visit him, being expelled his Country by the King of Persia. The Jesuits were brought to kiss the Hands of Prince Dodran, and of Liparia his Uncle, who was Regent of the Realm during his Minority. They both promised them assistance in their Affairs, sending them to the Town of Macauri, to make their abode there whilst they were busy in the Affairs of their Country, the which at that time were somewhat confused. The Bishop of that Place entertained them with great Demonstration of Love, and soon after, making a Feast of Trebis Cham, or Prince of the Georgians, he would needs have the Jesuits assist at this Banquet, for a great Testimony of his Love. It is the manner of those of Cholos, or the Mingrellians, as well as the Georgians, to sing at their Meats. The Trebis Cham desired, that the Jesuits might sing some note when it came to their turn, whereof they excused themselves divers times; But there was no Remedy, they must do as others have done: whereupon they sung the Hymn of Pliny the Younger, &c. appointed for Holy Thursday. Being thus favourably entertained in Mingrella, they make their residence at Macauri, with hope to labour profitably for the Health of Souls, which err in that Country through the Darkness of Ignorance, for want of Men to teach them the way of Truth. They are Christians of the Greek Profession, under the command of divers Princes, always in war either against the Turk or the Persians. They carry the Name of Cham, which is much tent herewith, soon after he cauled threecore and fifteen Boyers to be apprehended, cutting off all their Heads, and would not pardon any one, notwithstanding the great instance that was made by their Kinsfolks, charging them with the Crime of Treason, as if they had conspired against his Person, having no proof at all: but these his Cruelties did nothing daunt the Boyers, as Stephano had persuaded himself, but contrariwise, they were the more incensed, and many of them took Arms openly, and had then seized upon him, been revenged of his Cruelties, and fed their Country at liberty (which had not been ruined as it was afterwards) if he had not been assisted by the Citizens of Tas, whom he compared to second him in this occasion, promising them immunities of all Subsidies; in regard of which promise, these poor Wretches, preferring their private Profit before their publick Safety, employed themselves in the Service of this Tyrant, and fought valiantly against the Boyers, who were come to assault him in the City of Tas: but finding that he was better assisted than they expected, after some light Skirmishes they retired as well as they could, whereat many were taken Prisoners, whom the Tyrant cauled to be slain in cold blood, or empaled to terrify the rest.

The Boyers which escaped from this Defeat, knowing that there was no hope of Mercy in Stephano, who was full of Revenge, nor by consequence any Safety in Moldavia during his Government, they resolved to have recourse unto the Princes (Widow to Jeremy) who had fled into Polonia when he was the News of the taking of her Son Constantine. This Prince understood from the Boyers of the tyrannous Government of Stephano, and that most of the Moldavians were resolved to shake off the Yoke of his Tyranny, and desired to have Prince Alexander in his place, remembering the good usage they had received from the deceased Prince Jeremy his Father. These Considerations, together with a desire of Command upon her Son (who was then but sixteen years old) were for Motives to persuade both her and her Son to embrace this occasion, the which they imparted to Prince Vifnoskiy, Son in law to the Princes, and to Prince Corresky, who at that time aspired to marry her youngest Daughter: These Princes not only allowed of this Design, but they offered themselves willingly to accompany Prince Alexander into Moldavia, and to take the whole care of his Army. This Resolution being taken, they presently employed all their credit to levy men, and had within less than two Months drawn together ten or twelve thousand Footmen and Horse, Polonians, Cossacks, and Transilvanians: whereof the Vayvod Stephano being advertised, he presently levied what Forces he could, of Moldavians, Tartarians, and Valachians, having drawn together an Army of almost twenty thousand men, which he kept about Tas, and there resolved to attend the Princes of Polonia.

Prince Alexander being advanced with his Army within two Leagues of Caminitie in Podolia, he was much troubled to pass the River of Nistrie, which divides that Country from Moldavia, fearing the Fort of Cochina, in the which there was a strong Garrison of Moldavians, and store of Munition to defend the Passage of the said River: but it fell out happily for Prince Alexander; for the Captain which commanded in the said Fort being much discontented at the Cruelties of the Vayvod Stephano, came voluntarily of himself to offer his Service to Alexander, and brought him the Keys of the Fort, leaving all to his Disposition; so as he past his Army easily into Moldavia, and in sign of joy discharged many Volleys of his great Ordnance, which made Stephano distrust the Affections of the Moldavians, and to feel a pricking in his Conscience, which could never abandon Tyrants and Oppressors.

Prince Alexander, making some stay with his Army at Cochina, in the year 1615, advanced towards Tas, and being come within half a days Journey, he sent forth eight hundred Cossacks, (chosen out of a great number) to discover the Countenance of his Enemies Army: but they were not far advanced, before they encountered fifteen hundred Tartarians, sent by Stephano to give some charge to the Polonians. Although the Cossacks were fewer in number, yet finding the Tartarians in disorder, they charged them so resolutely as they defeated a great part, and put the rest to rout. After which Exploit, they brought word to Prince Alexander, that Stephano's Army might be about the number of fifteen thousand men; but they were such as were gathered up in the Country, and not trained up to Arms, who were rather drawn to by constraint than of their free will, and therefore were not much to be feared. This happy Success, together with the Reports made by the Cossacks, did greatly encourage Alexander's Army, being also much incited against Stephano for certain Letters which he had written to their Prince, full of Threats, as if both he and they had been already at his mercy; the which did the more encourage the Polonians, and made them resolve rather to dye fighting, than to fall into the hands of this cruel Tyrant. The same day there came certain Deputies of the Moldavians to Prince Alexander, without the privacy of Stephano, to know what his Design was, and to intreat him to take pity of Moldavia, which was threatened with a speedy ruine, if the War continued any longer; to whom the Prince made Answer, That his Intent was not to oppress Moldavia, but to free it from the Tyranny of Stephano; that he had been invited by a great number of the Boyers, who had come unto him into Polonia to that end, and had given him assurance, that it was the common desire of the Moldavians: That upon this confidence he had marched with what Forces he could draw together; and that if he did prevail in his Designs (as he assured himself with their assistance) he would govern them with no less mildness than his Father Prince Jeremy had done, whose Son and lawful Successor he was. The Deputies returned well satisfied with this Answer, and having published it in divers places, many Moldavians came and joined with the Prince's Army, and assisted him faithfully in this Action.

In October, Prince Alexander advancing about three Leagues with his Army, he made a stand in a fair Champion, where there were good Springs to refresh them, and in the mean time he called a Council at War, to resolve, what course he should take, and when he should draw the Enemy to fight. In the mean time he had sent a Troop of Cossacks to discover the Army, who brought word that they were ranged in Battel, and that they had twenty Cannons ready in front, the which did not much amaze Prince Alexander, for that some days before, the General of Stephano's Artillery had sent to assure him. That if he gave Battel, he would annoy his Men as little as he could, having a desire to serve the Prince, and by this means be revenged of Stephano, who had cauled his Brother-in-law's Head to be cut off, upon a false supposition which he had conceived against him being innocent. The which first intreated the Princes, that nothing should procure them more secret Enemies than Cruelty, and that at one time or other they in whom they most relye abandon them when as they least expect it. The disposition of the two Armies.

phano meaning to make a second Discovery of the Prince's Army, sent twelve hundred Tartarians, and two or three hundred Moldavians, who being sent afar off (for that it was in a plain Champion) the Prince sent five hundred Cossacks with four hundred Polonian Lances, to encounter them: The Tartarians perceiving it, made a hew at the first, as if they would retire, to draw them by little and little from their Camp; and being about a League off, they made a stand, thinking that they durst not charge them: but they were soon won with such fury, as they overthrew them, and flew most of them, so as there elapsed not above five or six hundred, who retiring to their Camp, cauled a great Amalement. The Prince's Army was much encouraged by this Exploit, and increased daily in number, as it is usual in Civil War to follow that Party which hath the first advantage.

Presently after this Execution, the Prince, meaning to advance his Army towards the Enemies Camp, his forward was stayed by a Battalion of one thousand Horse, who had the night before seized upon a narrow Passage, betwixt a Pool and a Marsh, by the which they knew the Polonian Army must pass: but this Obstacle was soon taken away, by the Advice which was given by certain Moldavians, to send a Company of Horsemen by a way unknown to the Enemy, by which means they might surprise them behind, before they were discovered. The Execution of this Stratagem was given to the Cossacks, who speedily went, being guided by certain Moldavians; who coming within fifty Paces of the Enemy undisturbed, they charged them, and were seconded so fitly by the forward, that staid on the other side, as of one thousand Horse there returned not above fifty to their Camp, to carry news of their bad Success.

Prince Alexander, having happily opened this Passage, advanced with his Army within Cannon-shot of Stephano's Camp. Prince Vifnoskiy was of opinion, that they should make a kind of Inclosure with their Carts, which might serve them as a Fort, having no place of Retreat within ten Leagues; the which being discovered by Stephano, he shot certain Volleys of Cannon through their Fort, so as there were some Soldiers slain, and some hurt: so as the Prince answered him with the like, but to no small effect, for that night surprised them, neither had they above eight small Pieces.

Prince Vifnoskiy spent the night to encourage his Soldiers, letting them understand that they had no reason to be amazed, although their Enemies were more in number, for that most of them were Peasants, never trained up in Arms nor seen Battel; whereof they had had good proof in many Encounters, where they had ever been Victors over their Enemies, although they were inferior in number: That they were so many Telimonies and Assurances that God did fight for them, and would use them to punish the Tyrannies of Stephano, and his Cruelties against Moldavia. Finally, if they were Victors (whereof he doubted not, if they did their Duties) there was not any one but should return laden with rich Spoils and Reconcomences from Prince Alexander. This did to encourage the Soldiers, as they dyed to fall of their Duties. Moreover, the Princes gave unto Colonels and Captains to understand of the Inexperience they had with the General of Stephano's Artillery, wherewith they were much comforted.

The next day, being the Eleventh of October, they began to put their Armies in Battel, during the which there were divers Skirmishes, wherein Alexander's Party had still the Advantage; so as it seemed they were so many Prefages of good Fortune which should betell them that day. The Prince's Army was ordered by Vifnoskiy, to whom Prince Alexander had given the Charge of General, as most capable, having sundry times given sufficient Proofs of his Sufficiency and Valour in other Battels. This General, seeing Stephano's Horse men divided into three Squadrons, and the Tartarians most advanced, he appointed the Cossacks to encounter with them; the which was judiciously and discreetly done, for they both go freely to the Charge, neither are they covered with any Arms, but only with the Skins of certain Beasts, wherewith they make themselves to seem as fearful as they can, observing no order in their fighting, and using Cries which are fearful to such as are not accustomed unto them; and being once broken, they seldom return again to the Charge. The Polonian Lanciers, called in their Language Hofsfarys, being about one thousand and five hundred men well armed, made the second Battalion of Alexander's Army, led by Prince Corresky, and were placed on the right hand against three thousand Tartarian, Valachian, and Moldavian Horsemen. The Hungarian Foot, being about three thousand men, were in the middle of Prince Alexander's Army, with the Cannon, upon a little Hill of some advantage; and on the left hand was the rest of the Chariots, who were led by the Princes Alexander and Vifnoskiy; and the Baggage was a little behind the Foot in the Camp where they had lodged the night before.

The Tyrant Stephano, having disposed his Army into divers Squadrons, began, about Nine of the Clock in the Morning, to play with his Cannon upon Alexander's Army, who found that the General of the Artillery had kept his Promise, for most of the Bullets flew over his men, and hurt them not; upon which Confidence, he commanded the Cossacks to charge the Tartarians which were advanced, whom they soon defeated. At the same Instant two thousand light Horse gave charge to the Hungarian Foot-men which guarded Stephano's Cannon, and in an instant cut most of them in pieces, and the rest yielded themselves; as Alexander became Master of his Cannon. The Tyrant, seeing his Infantry in danger to be defeated, and his Cannon lost, cauled a Battalion of three thousand Valachian and Moldavian Horsemen to advance, who without doubt had recovered the Cannon, but the generous Prince Corresky, with his Polonian Lanciers, charged them so furiously in the Flank, as that they flew almost the one half of them upon the place, and put the rest that remained to rout. Presently after this followed another Squadron, the which Corresky perceiving, he wisely retired towards his Camp, leaving his men wearied and tired with the slaughter of their Enemies, and not able to maintain the Fight without some rest. Then came Prince Alexander, and Vifnoskiy who was his faithful Guide, with the rest of his Horsemen, to encounter this last Battalion of the Enemy, whereunto they went with greater Courage, for that they were assured the Vayvod Stephano was there present, which Charge continued for the space of a quarter of an hour, during which time Prince Corresky had leisure to take breath, and to gather together what possibly he could of those of his Party, to succour them that were then in fight, who were almost tired, and Prince Alexander fat engaged. But seeing these unexpected Succours, he and his Men recovered their Forces, and their Enemies were so much amazed at it, as that all them that remained alive were put to rout and fled.

But Stephano (being naturally a Coward) apprehending blows, had retired himself to the rest of his Foot-men, who had not yet come to fight, making a show that he would rather dye with them than fly away: but seeing the Event of this last Charge, and his Horsemen all in rout, he now resolved to save himself by flight, having never given one Stroke in this Battle. The Foot-men which remained, being about four thousand men, seeing the success of the Battle, yielded to the mercy of the Victors, and cried out, God save Alexander, Vayvod of Moldavia. The day of the Victory, Prince Alexander made his Entry into the City of Tas, having the Princes Coresky and Vifnosky on either side, after whom followed his whole Army. Entering into the Castle, he was there proclaimed Prince and Vayvod of Moldavia by all the Nobles and Boyers of the Country, the which he would never accept until that time. The next day, Prince Alexander understanding that a great number of the chiefest of the Inhabitants of Tas were fled into the Mountains and Fortells to attend the Events of these Troubles, he sent certain Boyers to invite them to return back again (with all assurance) to their Houses, causing part of his Army to dilodge, and to be quartered in the Country thereabouts; and there were one thousand and five hundred Foot, and five hundred Horse (under the leading of Prince Coresky) sent to the City of Vaffila, for that Stephano had fled that way, and might return back again into Moldavia. As for the Artillery, some were sent into Polonia, and some were put into the Fort of Cochina, the which is as it were the Arsenal of Moldavia.

At the same time, Prince Alexander, knowing that it was no less necessary to preserve than to get, he called the chief Noblemen of his Court to Council, to resolve what was fit to be maintained in his Estate, which he had newly gotten by the Sword: where it was concluded among other things, that he should speedily send an Ambassador to the Grand Seignior, to let him understand that he had never any intent to take Arms against his Majesty, nor to withdraw Moldavia from his Obedience; but that he had been taught unto being in Polonia, and invited by the Boyers of Moldavia, for the unpeackable Cruelties of the Vayvod Stephano, who had resolved to root out the Nobility of the said Country, having put many of the chief to death without any occasion. They had also charge to give the Sultan to understand, That when his Majesty advanced Stephano to be Vayvod of Moldavia, he had falsely suggested that he was Son to a Prince of Moldavia; that he was not truly advertised by his Baffes and Counsellors, that his Predecessor had promised to the deceased Father of Prince Alexander, and to Prince Simeon his Uncle, that after his Decease his Sons should succeed him in the said Estate, if they shewed not themselves unworthy, and did pay the yearly Tribute of forty thousand Chequines, which Tribute, since the Death of Jeremy, had been offered by Prince Constantine his eldest Son, to Houffan Aga, when as he was intended to settle the said Stephano, as also that Prince Alexander promised to pay it hereafter; and if need should be, he would give Prince Bogdan, his Brother, as a sure and certain pledge for the performance of his Promises during the first year.

The Ambassadors having received these Instructions, they took their Journey speedily to Constantinople; but instead of passing through Thrace, which was their directest course, they were forced to go by Transilvania, being to be hindered by the men of War which then troubled all Thrace. Coming to Buda, they went to salute the Baffa which commanded there, who being a special Friend to Stephano, put them in Prison, violating the Law of Nations observed by the most barbarous, and afterwards he sent them to Braille, whither the Tyrant Stephano had fled. They say he gave fifteen thousand Chequino's in recompence to the Baffa, and to revenge himself in some sort of Prince Alexander in the Persons of his Ambassadors, he caused their Heads to be cut off one night after Supper, and their Bodies to be cast into the Danube. The Deaths of these Ambassadors were very prejudicial to Prince Alexander, by means whereof the Grand Seignior was not truly advertised of what had past in Moldavia, nor received the Compliments, Offers, and Submissions of Prince Alexander, so as he was wonderfully incensed against him, and swore his Ruine, as you shall hear hereafter.

Stephano having received four thousand men from Michna Prince of Valachia, and gathered together the Relicks of his scattered Army, he marched toward Valachia, whereof Prince Alexander being advertised, he sent Prince Coresky with six thousand Horse, Polonian and Cossack, to Tiench, a strong Frontier Town, to guard that Passage: And Prince Alexander and Vifnosky they layed at Tas with the rest of the Army to preserve the Country, and to prevent all Alterations in favour of Stephano, who had some Intelligence that the Inhabitants of Horrova (a Country in Moldavia containing about fifteen or sixteen French Leagues in Circuit) were in Arms, and had joyned with a great Troop of Tartarians to come and invade him, knowing well that Prince Coresky was otherwise employed with part of the Polonian Army. Alexander stayed not to have these Rebels come to Tas, but sent Vifnosky, his Brother-in-law, with four Forces as he could draw together, to encounter with them. They met together with in two Leagues of the City, where Vifnosky charged the Tartarians with great fury, as half of them were slain upon the place, and the rest of them fled: there were a great number of Prisoners taken, and all the poor Inhabitants of Horrova were brought unto Tas in token of triumph. The dead being numbered, there were found about eight hundred Tartarians and others slain, and of the Polonian only fifty, and some hundred hurt.

Prince Alexander, having received News of this Defeat, was wonderfully glad, and went presently to Horse-back with his Company of French, which he had only referred about him, to go and meet with Vifnosky, and to congratulate his happy Victory. This being done with many Compliments and Embracings, he cast his eye upon the poor Inhabitants of Horrova, whom they led like a Troop of Sheep, and had such Commiseration on them, as he presently sent them back again, having taken the Oath of Fidelity, hoping that this his Clemency would draw the most Factions to Obedience, having formerly tried the Oppressions of a most cruel Prince. Prince Alexander having given Thanks to God for this new and unexpected Victory, he sent a Gentleman unto Prince Coresky, to advertise him thereof, who as to the same instant was busied to dispose of his Troops to meet with Stephano, who returned into Moldavia. The Encounter was in a plain Champagne, having on the one side the River of Crete, the which divides Moldavia from Valachia; the Skirmish continued from ten of the Clock until it was Noon, with like advantage; but Prince Coresky being advertised that Stephano was in a Squadron of Horse which was some two hundred Fades distant from him, he joyned unto his Troop four hundred Gerbeyes, who were well armed, armed, and led by a very valiant Captain, with the which he charged him with such violence and fury, as he forced them to give back, yet fighting in such fort, as the Event seemed to be doubtful: the which being discovered by another of the Prince's Captains, who led a Troop of five hundred light Horse, he came so fitly to succour him, as Stephano and his Horse-men were forced to fly, whom the Prince pursued and cut in pieces. Stephano escaped with a Troop which he had reserved rather for the guard of his Person than to fight. Prince Coresky, at his return from the chase of his Enemies, caused the dead to be numbered, where he found, that of Stephano's side were three thousand and four hundred men slain upon the place, besides those that were Prisoners and wounded; and of his part only three hundred and fifty.

Presently after this Victory, the season of the year being cold (it being the twelfth of November) Prince Coresky put his Troops into Garrison, and returned with one hundred and fifty Horse to Tas, where he was received with much Honour and Joy. The Princess, Mother to Alexander, was yet in Poland; but being advertised of her Sons fortunate Success, she returned to Tas, and brought with her Prince Bogdan her youngest Son, with Alexandra her Daughter, who was yet to marry. At whole Arrival there was great feasting and joy; then they began to treat of a Marriage betwixt Prince Coresky and the Princess Alexandra, the which had been then consummated, if Bellona had not opposed it, stirring up new and more powerful Armies than the precedent, to exercise the Virtues and Valours of the said Princes, and to try the Patience of the two Lovers, who loved one another tenderly from their Youth.

To continue the deduction of new Affairs which troubled the quiet of the said Princes more than ever, you must understand, That about the end of November this Year 1615, they were advertised, that Michna Prince of Valachia, with a Baffa called Habraun, came against them with an Army of forty thousand men, Turks, Tartarians, and Valachians, to succour the Vayvod Stephano; and moreover, that Belthim Gabor, Prince of Transilvania, had Charge from the Grand Seignior to arm against them, and to assail them; which in effect was a false Alarm; for the said Baffa had been sent by the Grand Seignior to bring Caubanes (which are Robes of Cloth of Gold which the Grand Seignior doth usually lend in favour to Princes that are under his power) both to Michna and Stephano, who he held to be in peaceable possession of Moldavia, but not with any Army, nor with an intent to make War against the said Princes; for he was yet ignorant what had passed against Stephano. Notwithstanding, the Princes holding this Advertisement to be true, assembled a Council of the chief Noblemen in Court, where it was resolved, That an Ambassador should be speedily sent to Prince Michna, both to know his Intent, and to discover whether he marched toward Moldavia, and with what Forces. This Charge was given unto a brave Gentleman of Polonia called Boarysky, who parted presently from Tas; and being entered into Valachia, he understood that Prince Michna was then in his Town of Bonska, some twenty French Leagues distant from the Frontiers of Moldavia. The Ambassador being arrived, demanded Audience before Michna, by whom he was sent unto the Baffa, who at his first Entrance demanded what he had made his Master Alexander demand to carry Arms in the Country of the Grand Seignior without his Authority; for the which he should be punished, and those that did assist him; commanding the Ambassador presently to be put in Irons, as if he had been a Thief, or some miserable Criminal. The Ambassador's Servants, seeing how they entreated their Master, escaped as fast as they could, leaving the like; who returning to Tas, informed Prince Alexander what had passed, nor any intent to enter into Moldavia at that time. The Baffa, disdainful to speak any more to the said Ambassador, he gave charge to some of his Officers to examine him particularly of all matters: and within few days after he returned to Constantinople, leading the said Ambassador thither with him. But soon as they were arrived, they lent the Ambassador unto the Divano, where he was again examined by a Visier, and in the end he was condemned by him to the Gallies, there to remain perpetually. So little account do these barbarous People make to violate the Law of Nations, especially with Christians, presuming that all the World should bow unto them, as if they were Gods upon Earth.

There was another Ambassador sent by Prince Alexander unto Belthim Gabor, who was Prince of Transilvania, being at Fureur or Alba Julia, whom he received very courteously; to whom the Ambassador delivered the Subject of his Charge: That Prince Alexander, his Master had been advertised, that he made some levy of men to joyn with Michna Prince of Valachia, and to make War against him; the which he could not easily believe, for that he had made profession of Friendship to his deceased Father, and had no cause now to leave it; and therefore, conjuring him, not to meddle in the Affairs which he had to decide with Michna; and that in requital (if any occasion were offered to serve him) he would employ all his means. The Ambassador having ended his Speech, he delivered his Princes Letters of Credit; to whom Belthim Gabor made this Answer, That he never had any intent to take Arms, nor to attempt any thing against Prince Alexander, whose Father was his true Friend; neither would he ever give any cause to discontinue this Love and Friendship betwixt them, whereof he would give good proof in all occasions, especially in this Subject now in question. The Ambassador was much satisfied with this Answer, the which was also confirmed by Letters yet notwithstanding he afterwards levied Forces against Prince Alexander, but he would not joyn with Michna's Army.

To return to the course of our History; Presently after the Baffa's Departure from Ciench to return to Constantinople, Prince Michna sent an Ambassador to Alexander with Letters, by the which he excused himself for the ill usage of the Ambassador by the Baffa, protesting, that he was much grieved, and that it was not with his Consent that he had carried him with him, promising him to employ his best means to mediate his Delivery. Moreover, that he was not ignorant what Authority and Power the Grand Seignior had over his Baffas; that he had no Army on foot, as he was given to understand, and that his design was not to support the Cause of the Vayvod Stephano, unless he were forced by the Commandment of the Grand Seignior. And whereas he intreated him to deliver his Enemy Stephano into his hands, he could not do it, unless he should violate the Laws of Hospitality, in betraying his Friend, who had fled unto him for succour, and withal, he should incur the Indignation of the Sultan, Sultan, and he in danger to be dispossessed of his own Estate, having no sufficient means to maintain himself against a great Power. Prince Alexander, having heard this Ambassador, and received an Answer from the Prince of Transylvania, by the Advice of his Council dismissed all his Foot-men, and part of the Cossacks, retaining only five or six thousand men with him during the Winter.

Prince Viskounsky appointed by a Priest.

About this time there was one of the most cursed and impious Acts committed that ever was heard of. Prince Viskounsky, who was a Protestant of the Greek Church, having prepared at Christinas to receive the Communion after their manner, the Priest (who had usually served him by that Devotion, being corrupted with money by his Enemies) poisoned the Bread, which the Prince having received, he suddenly fell sick, and his Torments were so violent, as he died the next day. This bred a suspicion that he had been poisoned; whereupon the Priest was apprehended, who presently confessed that he was guilty, and had been provoked by his Enemies. As his offence was terrible, being committed by a man of that Coat, who had made use of so reverent a Sacrament to poison a Prince beloved of all men for his rare Virtues; so his Punishment was very severe and long, being bound in a Chair made of Copper wire, and a fire made round about him, so as he was heard for twelve hours crying out fearfully for the insupportable Pains which he endured. Whilst that Prince Alexander and his whole Court mourned for this fatal and unexpected accident, there arrived a Spy which he had sent into Moldavia, who told him that there was a Bassa gave him to understand, that Prince Alexander's Army, and that Stephano was there in like manner, who pressed them daily to march into Moldavia; and to begin the War, he sent four hundred men to surprise the Town of Berladia, whereas Prince Coresky had left part of his men in Garrison during the Winter; who keeping bad guard, were surprised, and most of them cut in pieces, as he assured himself of an easy Victory. But Prince Alexander, hearing of this Defeat, he sent four hundred Cossacks, who made such speed, as within three days after they arrived at Berladia, a Town not walled, no more than the rest; where, having set fire in many places, they forced his men to come forth, cutting them in pieces, and the rest were burnt; so as there escaped not above five or six to carry this bad news unto their Master, who was much afflicted.

Skinder Bassa comes with an Army against Prince Alexander.

Stephano's men defeated by the Cossacks.

A Defeat of Turks at Vassilly.

At the same instant, when as the Cossacks were sent upon this Expedition, Prince Coresky, desiring to be revenged for the Defeat of his men, took two thousand and five hundred choice Horse, and put himself into Vassilly, fearing the Garrison he had left there would be in like manner surprised; whereof the Bassa being advertised by some of the Country-men, he sent his Son (being twelve or thirteen years old) and gave him an old Turk, of great experience, for his Conductor, with seven thousand men, holding this a good occasion to get Reputation to his Son. Prince Coresky being advertised of his March by some Moldavians, and that they should surprise them early in the morning, knowing that they were of necessity to pass a Bridge of Wood over a River that runs by the Town, he disposed his men in that runs by the Town, he disposed his men in such sort, as that the Enemy could hardly discover them; some of them were lodged within Vassilly, and the rest were covered with a little mountain that adjoined upon the Town: when as some of the Turks had passed the Bridge, two Squadrons fallied from the Town, and charged their forward so furiously, as they were in a manner all put to the Sword; and amongst them was the Conductor of the whole Troop, the which was no difficult thing to execute; for that the Turks, who had marched in a manner all night, to arrive early in the morning, were benumbed and half dead with Cold: the rest of the Turks which had not yet past, hearing the noise of this hot Alarm, durst not advance, but retired speedily, fearing perchance that the Bassa's Son might be put as well as his Conductor. Prince Coresky pursued them unto a Village four Leagues distant from Vassilly, killing and taking Prisoners all he found in the way. Among the Prisoners there was one who gave it out that he was near Kinfinum town to the Bassa; who being brought to Prince Alexander, he received him very courteously, and gave him a Garment fit for him, having been stripped of his own; he also gave him a Horse, and sent him back unto the Bassa with a good Convoy, to whom he sent a Letter, by the which he intreated him not to advance in favour of Stephano, promising, that if the Grand Seigneur would suffer him to enjoy Moldavia quietly, he would be most faithful unto him afterwards, and pay him the yearly accustomed Tribute: whereof the Bassa made no great account; for he was wonderfully incensed, both for his Sons bad success in this Enterprize, and for the death of his Turkish Captain.

Upon the day of this Victory, Prince Alexander sent fifteen hundred Horse to fortify Prince Coresky, whereof eight hundred were lodged in a certain Borough six Leagues from Ticowit, whereas the Bassa and Michna were then with their Army; being about five and twenty thousand men. These eight hundred men neglecting their Guards, did nothing but drink drunk, and molest their Hosts with all kind of Insolencies, and forcing their Wives and Daughters, which made them take care a Retaliation to be taken, and to that end they called upon them certain Boyes out of the Country, who chusing their time, cut all their Throats when they were asleep, and most of them drunk.

About the end of this Year, Prince Alexander called a General Council, whereas the Princes, his Mother, Prince Coresky, and all the chief Noblemen and Captains assisted, where it was resolved that they should retire to Cochina, being thirty French Leagues off; for that it was the strongest place and the best furnished of all Moldavia, and whither they should be far from their Enemies, and near unto Polonia. According to this Resolution, Prince Alexander parted the next day with his whole Army, and came in four days march to Cochina, in the extreme cold Season that could be; having lodged his Troops, the Princes sent divers Gentlemen to all their Friends and Confederates, to conjure them to come speedily to succour them; and in the mean time they made gave order to make provision of Victuals, and of all other things necessary for their Army. The Bassa being advertised of this Retreat, he marched with Michna and Stephano towards Tas, notwithstanding the extremity of the Cold, which was so violent, that many died upon the way; whereupon they stayed until the time was more mild.

In the beginning of March, the Lord of Tischewick came unto Prince Alexander with 3500 Cossacks, and within few days after arrived the Lord Potosky, Nephew to him who had been taken at the first Batel, and carried Prisoner to Constantinople, who brought with him a Troop of fifteen hundred Polonians well armed; there came also other Succours unto him, so as by the end of that

Month the Princes Army was ten or twelve thousand strong Foot and Horse.

Prince Alexander, hearing of the Enemies approach, sent forth 1000 Horse with his Company of French Cavaliers to discover the Enemies Army, who flying to reach themselves within half League of the Town of Epanocha, where as Michna's Tartarians were lodged; they were discovered and presently inveiled by them and by a great number of Turks; and although that there were little hope to resist to great a Multitude, yet Alexander's Men (who had always been accustomed to vanquish) behaved themselves very valiantly, fighting rather to die, than to yield safely without giving proofs of their Valour. This fight continued from ten of the Clock in the Morning, until Night; and of the whole Troop there elapsed but twelve, seven Polonians, and five French, the rest were either slain or taken Prisoners, among the which was the Captain of the French Company called Mounetpin, whom they would have sent with the rest unto the Grand Seigneur's Gallies: But Stephano preserved him, upon promise that he would do him good Service. Here Fortune (which hath hitherto been favourable unto Prince Alexander) began to show her Inconstancy, to teach Princes not to run rashly into Dangers, although they have had some Advantage over their Enemies.

Jesuits at Constantinople accused.

At Constantinople, about the end of August this Year 1616, Envy, the most furious of all the Winds that shake the Affairs of the World, stirred up a horrible Tempest, whose violent Gusts fell dangerously upon the Jesuits settled at Pera by the Sultans Permission, at the Persuasion of Henry the Fourth, the French King; and labours to cast them upon the Rocks where they might suffer Shipwreck, shameful to their Order, and prejudicial to the Christians, which live in the midst of Mahometism. And to ruin them without all hope of help or relief, they accused them before the Grand Visier, to be spies to Spain; to give Absolution to Renegades; to baptize Turks, to conceal fugitive Slaves, and to send them into Christendom; and whither they objected the Doctrine of killing of Kings, if they were Tyrants, the which had been really written by a Spaniard of their Coat: all which Crimes are commonly punished at Constantinople with Death. They relied upon their Persons, and lodged them in a Dungeon, where were six in number, that is to say, Francis Botton, Denis Guiller, Dominick Maurice of Chio, and John Baptista Joberi their Superior; all four Priests, and two Assistants, and with them a Franciscan Friar, Vicar to the Patriarch of Constantinople. A suspicion of Danger in an Estate is easily believed upon the least accident. In the mean time the Emperour Ambassador came to Constantinople, to renew the Truce; they entered with their Drums beating, and their Ensigns displayed. They which thought to end Trophies to their Glory by their Ruine of the Jesuits, made use of this entry, and gave false Advertisements to the Seraglio, that there were in Constantinople, and at Pera, many thousands of Christians disguised in the Habits of Greeks and Turks, which came with this Ambassador, with an intent to put that in Execution which the Jesuits had projected. Moreover, they informed the Grand Visier, and the Mughli, that the Churches in Pera, and the Ambassadors Houses were full of Arms; and that now when as the Turks Estate, and especially Constantinople, was unprovided of Forces, having employed their Armies in divers Places, and at one instant, as in Poland, Persia, and both the Seas, that they meant to draw the Greeks into Rebellion, and give an entry to the Cossacks,

by the black Sea. The Sultan and his Baffaes took an alarm, they commanded every man to wear the Habit of his own Nation, with a prohibition to wear any Hat except the Frank's, and they to wear a Grecian Habit; they also enrolled all the Christians in Constantinople and Pera. But the Sultan did not think his City of Constantinople free from the danger of surprise by this diligent search, but he would seek his assurance in the Blood of Christians; so as he commanded that all the Frank's should be slain, without exception. But yet this Commandment took no effect, by reason of the Remonstrances which the Grand Visier and the Mughli made him, representing to him, that by this Cruelty he should draw upon his Estate a dangerous War from all the Christian Princes in General. But all this freed him not from fear, he walks all Night on Horseback up and down the City, contrary to his Custom, and he caught a Friar, Vicar to the Patriarch, who had been taken with the Jesuits, to be executed in his Presence; and he doth expressly forbid the Passage from Constantinople to Pera, and from Pera to Constantinople. During this Prohibition, the French Ambassador had past from Pera to the City, to solicit the People in the mean time at the Sea side (for it is the Custom to go to the Sovereign of Mahomet's Law with a small Train) during the time of his being there, a Multitude of People ran down to the Shore, to see their Men, thinking for certain, that they were sent to put them to Death: They lamenting their miserable Fortune, and the Turks charged them furiously with injuries, as the Men whom they thought practised by Conspiracy their ruin; But the Grand Visier having written with his own Hand, and sent one of his People to them that kept the Passage, the Ambassador with his whole Train was suffered to pass to Pera, but he found the Storm as raging at Pera, as when he came; for one Night after, the People of that Place fell into such a Fury, as it was to be feared from the Law of Nations would have been violated by the Infidelity of some furious People, although the Subject were of small Importance. About five hundred Paces from the French Ambassadors quarter, there fell out a Dispute in a Lodging, betwixt some who spent the Night in some kind of Employment; the Turks that dwelt near, being awaked with this Noise, ran to Arms, and trooped together in the Street, being in all 1000 men armed, crying out, that this Noise came from the Frank's, (that is to say, from the Christians in the Weg's, as Italians, French, Spanish, English, and others) who meant to rise; and they resolved to force the Ambassadors Houses, and to put all to Fire and Sword, if some better advised of the Troop had not persuaded them to delay the Execution until day, the which being come, the French Ambassador had means to get the Sultan to interpose his Sovereign Authority, to bridle the Infidelity of a Multitude inconsiderately incited. Such is the danger, in the which many times the Ministers of Christian Princes find themselves, who for their Masters Service live at the Mercy of a Nation barbarously furious, as the Turks!

The Jesuits in the mean time continued Prisoners in the Dungeon, until that the Baron of Saxe, Ambassador for France, had let the Grand Visier see their Innocency, and procured their Liberty, and the Sultan by his Letters Patents did publish the falshood of the malicious Accusations invented against them; but to avoid the Fury of a Multitude, blind in their Passions, and dangerous 1616 in their fury, they went to Sea, to return to France; but after they had sailed some days, they were again committed to Prison, by reason of some certain advertisement that was given to the Sultan of the same substance: The Sultan informed himself truly of their Probity, gave them their liberty, calling back two to Paris, to live there, with the like Privileges they formerly had, and suffered the rest to return into France.

Alexander, Prince of Moldavia, having lost a thousand Horse near unto Cochina, the last year, as you have heard, the Baffa and Stephano were puffed up with this good Success; but Michna had no joy of it, who, hearing that the Princes attended him at Cochina, with a Resolution to defend themselves, remembering that a certain Italian making a Profession to foretell future things, had told him, That if he ever came to fight with the Polonians, he would be in danger of his life: wherefore, by the Advice of his Chancellor and Camp-Maffer, called Spareschich, he pretended, that he had received News from his Lieutenant, that there was a great Troop of Tartarians entered into Valachia, and spoiled the Country; upon which Pretence he took leave of the Baffa, and returned, leaving all his Soldiers in the Army, relieving only an hundred Horse for his Guard. Being in Valachia, Stephano wrote unto him, that he had defeated the Polonians in Battel, in the which there were slain six thousand men upon the place, and had taken a great number of Prisoners, which they meant to send to the Grand Scignior: at which was but a mere Invention to mock Michna, and to make him forty that he was not in the Action: whereupon he was furiously discontented, as he called the Heads of his Chancellor and Camp-maffer to be cut off, for their bad Counsel, charging them that they had some secret Intelligence with the Polonians.

About the end of March, the Baffa, with Stephano, and a Tartarian Prince called Munna, resolved to advance with their whole Army (being twenty thousand men) towards Cochina; and being within two Leagues, they made a stand a whole day to refresh their men. In the mean time the Princes put their Army in order of Battel, in a little Plain within a quarter of a League of Cochina, leaving a thousand choice Horse within the Town under the Command of Prince Corsky, assuring themselves that the Turks would not fail to camp betwixt the Town and the Prince's Army, that if they were defeated, they might have no means to retire into the Fort, which was held impregnable. The Princes drew eight pieces of Cannon out of the Fort, which they planned within a Trench which was covered with a Wood. The Baffa on the other side thought that he had the Princes at his mercy, being advertised that they had not half so many men in their Army: early in the morning he caused his men to march in good order, who arrived near to Cochina about seven of the clock in the morning, where, having made a stand to discover the Princes Army, he went and incamped betwixt them and the Town, as it had been foreseen. His men being put in order, the Tartarians, who had a great desire to be revenged of the Cossacks, who had defeated them in many Encounters, intended to have the Point, which was granted, and the Trumpets sounding, they advanced towards a Battalion of Cossacks, nothing distrustful the Cannon which was planted on that side, and not far. Coming within the shot, they presently played upon them, and overthrew a great number of the Tartarians, and terrified the rest, who, being thus routed, fleeing, they charged them furiously, and cut the rest in pieces, and so retired towards their Army, 1616 seeing another Squadron of Valachians and Moldavians come to succour the Tartarians. The Lord of Tifchevich, with his Troop of fifteen or sixteen hundred Horse well armed, went to encounter the said Squadron, which advanced bravely towards the Princes Cannon. The Countess was long without any show of Advantage, which made the Marshal of the Turks Army to send three thousand Turks to succour them: and the Princes caused a Squadron of Cossacks and Moldavians to advance, who carried themselves so valiantly, as they forced the Turks to retire above an hundred Paces. Then Prince Alexander cried out, Now my Companions behold the Enemy is in disorder, let us charge them resolutely, and the Victory is certain. After which he advanced with the rest of his Army, commanding two Cannons to be shot off together, for a sign to Prince Corsky that he might fall forth, and charge the Turks Reserve, as it had been resolved, but he layed not for the Signal, being already advanced above three hundred Paces, fearing that the Party would be ended without him, or that he should fail at need.

The Baffa seeing this Stratagem, which he feared not, and the bad lucks of his men which he had felt to fight, and that he was charged both before and behind, he began to be amazed, and having caused a Squadron of two thousand Horse, Turks and Valachians, to advance to second his Troops, he retired apart with Stephano (who was no less afraid than himself) with the rest of the Turkish Cavalry, to attend the event of the Battel. There was never a more furious Combat seen (which continued for the space of two hours) full of fearful Howlings of Turks, who in the end fainting, seeing no succours come unto them, whereas if the Baffa and the cowardly Stephano had joined with them, they had without doubt fortified their Carriages, and renewed their Forces, and by all appearance won the Victory, which they lost beyond all mens Expectation. When as the Baffa and Stephano saw that their Forces were in rout, and no means to draw them again together, they began to make a Retreat with above two thousand Horse, which he did not yet fought: in the mean time, the Princes Tifchevich and Corsky, (like two Thunderbolts of War) cut all in pieces they could meet; and fearing lest they should make a new head, the Princes drew all their men together, and made a stand upon the Place of Battel, not suffering their Soldiers to go to the Spoil, before they were assured that the Enemy was retired in great haste, fearing the Princes would have pursued them, the which they would willingly have done, if their Men and Horses had not been almost retired in the former Battel, in which there were slain above twelve thousand men, besides the Wounded and Prisoners.

Prince Alexander being returned to Cochina, by the other Princes and Noblemen, they gave Thanks to God for the Victory they had obtained against the Turks and their Confederates; and there was much joy with the Princesses and all the Ladies, who were retired into the Fort, attending the Event of this fearful Battel. Prince Corsky burned with desire to enjoy his Mistress, whom he loved as his own life; so as by a free consent of all Parties, they were married within two days after the Victory, to the great content of all the Court.

Whilst that the Princes began to enjoy the Fruits of their Victory, the Baffa and wretched Stephano returned to Tas, but finding no safety there, they parted presently; the Baffa to Constantinople, and the Tyrant unto Valachia to Prince Michna.

1616 Michna, who was his only support, notwithstanding that he had mocked him apparently. But before this Wretch departed from Tas (having no hope ever to return again) he caused the Town to be let on fire in many places; so as of two and twenty thousand Houses, there were not above six hundred untouched. The Princes having notice hereof, in the beginning of April, they marched speedily thither; where finding it so desolate, they resolved to pursue Stephano into Valachia, and punish him according to his deserving. The next day they marched towards Valachia, being to pass the River of Siretta, there being of the said River but a narrow Ford, which was of five hundred men in Garrison, to keep the Frontiers. The Princes arriving at this place, the Garrison put themselves in defence; but they were soon forced and cut in pieces, so as there escaped not one; and as for the Inhabitants, they were well treated, having made no resistance, and without, they hated Michna for in which they received from the said Garrison. The Army having rested there three days, advanced with all speed towards the City of Bonza, whereas Michna then remained with wretched Stephano, who had no care but to make good cheer. The Army being come within a League of Bonza, it was discovered by some Country men, who ran to advertise their Prince, wishing him to save himself speedily, for that they had discovered the Polonian Army near the City. Michna was ready to sit down to dinner, having invited Stephano to accompany him; but he was so amazed at this unexpected coming of the Princes, as he ran in dismay to his Stable, and mounted upon the first Horse he could find, without Saddle, and so took his way towards Tergovitz, being followed by few of his People, one of which gave him his own Horse, which was better furnished; and as for Stephano, having failed his own Horse, he fled all alone towards Nisepol.

The Princes being entered Bonza without resistance, they were wonderfully grieved that they had not found Stephano, which was their whole Design, and that Prince Michna (to whom they intended no harm) had been so amazed. The Army, at their first Entrance, spoiled the City, which the Princes could not hinder, nor yet the ravishing of many Wives and Virgins, which drew the Wrath of God upon them, and in all appearance was the true cause of the Miseries which afterward befell the Princes. During their Abode at Bonza to refresh their men, many Boyes or Noblemen of the Country (desiring to shake off the Yoke of Prince Michna's Command, who governed insolently) came unto Prince Alexander, beseeching him to stay in Valachia, promising that the whole Nobility would willingly yield him all Obedience and Fidelity. But the Prince (having no intent to dispossess Michna) thanked them for their good will, which the Boyes understanding, they told him, that they would be glad (seeing he refused it) that Prince Cherbanne (who had been their Vayvod before Michna, and had been expelled Valachia by Bethlem Gabor, and forced to retire into Germany to the Emperor) might return and take upon him the Government of Valachia, intending him to give him Passage through Moldavia if he preferred himself; the which Prince Alexander willingly granted, desiring much that Prince Cherbanne were restored, for that Michna favoured his Enemy, and had himself a design upon the Estate of Moldavia, which in the end he obtained.

Prince Michna being come to Bonza, which is betwixt Bonza and Tergovitz, he layed some days there attending his Train, during the which he 1616 sent speedily to his Wife, being at Tergovitz, willing her to go with all speed to Nisepol, for that he feared the Princes would seize both upon them and their Estates, as they might easily have done if they had foreseen what afterwards befell them. Michna being come to Tergovitz, he presently sent an Ambassador to Prince Alexander, to know upon what Design he had entered Valachia with his Army, having no cause, but contrariety, that he had given good Testimony that he was his Friend, for that he would not assist the Baffa and Stephano when they pursued him to Cochina, notwithstanding that they were much stronger in Person: That if his Intent were only to liele upon Stephano, he assured him that he was not worth him, but was fled another way, promising, that if he could ever take him, he would deliver him into his hands; intreating him withal, to retire out of his Estate, not suffering his Army to spoil it any more, and that they might continue good Friends. Prince Alexander received this Ambassador very courteously, who hearing the Subject of his Embassy, made Answer, That he had the day before sent unto his Maffer to inform him of his Intent, which was, not to attempt any thing against his Person nor Estate, but only to pursue Stephano, who had fled from the City of Tas before he parted; and to let Michna know, That he meant not to wrong him, nor to injure himself, with any thing that he his, had sent him back his Plate, with all his rich Moveables. Michna's Ambassador having thanked Prince Alexander, returned to Tergovitz, and found all true that the Prince had said; the which freed Michna from farther fear.

Before Prince Alexander's Departure from Bonza, he sent the Lord Troiansky with two thousand Horse to pursue Stephano; but it was with our effect; for he understood that he had passed the River of Danno with his Wife, and a small Detachment of Tartarians, in the same time a Troop of fifteen hundred Tartarians, being advertised that the Polonian pursued Stephano only with a thousand Horse, and that they were tired with long Marches advanced to charge them; but it was not with that Success they expected: for Troiansky discovering them afar off in a plain champion Field, had leisure to put his men into four Squadrons, and there attended them, who approaching near to discover the number of the Polonians, would gladly return without blows, but it was too late; for Troiansky commanded two of his Squadrons to charge them suddenly, so as within less than a quarter of an hour they were defeated, and above four hundred slain upon the place; the rest fled the same way that they came: of the Polonian there were not above five and twenty slain, and about fifty hurt.

The Princes had resolved to leave Valachia, forbidding all Captains and Soldiers, upon pain of death, to carry away any Valachian of either Sex with them, threatening that who disobeyed, should be put to death, and his Estate confiscated; after which they began to march; and being upon the way, they were advertised that the Inhabitants of Ehbrenea were again revolted, and in Arms, refusing to acknowledge Prince Alexander, and to pay the accustomed Tribute, unless he would make it appear that he was confirmed by the Grand Scignior. Prince Corsky was sent forth with five thousand men; whole coming did to amaze them, as they yielded without any resistance. This Prince, being loth to lose any time, laid Siege to the Town and Fort of Bialgront, seated upon the River of Babon, the which was held by the Tartarian Presestari, in which Fort there was a Garrison of Janizaries, and many Boyes

The Inhabitants of Ehbrenea revolt the second time.

1616 Boyers of Moldavia, who defended themselves valiantly, and made many Salles, in which they flew above three hundred of the Prince's men, and he himself was in danger to be taken, if he had not been speedily delivered by the Lord of Tifchevich and his Troop, who charged the Janizaries so resolutely, as they forced them to retire, leaving many of their men dead upon the place. The Prince seeing there was no hope to take the place without Cannon, raised his Siege, and returned to Tas the Prince Alexander.

Soon after, Hebram Bassa wrote to Prince Alexander, (as if he had been his friend) giving him to understand, That from thenceforth he should live quietly in Moldavia, for that the Grand Seigneur's Lieutenant-General, or chief Visier (from whom Stephano had always drawn his chief support) was in disgrace, promising the Prince to employ himself for him to his Master, which he did either to make him careless of his own Strength, or to draw some Recompence or Reward from him, if the Grand Seigneur should confirm him in Moldavia, as there was some likelihood, seeing that Stephano had made himself altogether unworthy, as well by his flight, as by his wicked Actions, which made him in the end so odious to the Grand Seigneur, as he resolved to ruin him. So as soon after they were advertised, that the Grand Seigneur had given Commandment unto the said Bassa to seize upon Stephano, who had retired himself to Brablie, and to bring him unto him alive or dead, with whatsoever did belong unto him; the which he executed after this manner: The said Bassa marched with all diligence towards Brablie, carrying a Chiaus with him; and being within four or five Leagues of the Town, he sent one of his people to advertise Stephano of his coming, and that he meant the next day to dine with him. Stephano (who disfrustrated nothing) holding the Visier to be still his friend, parted early in the morning to meet him, and coming near him he alighted from his Horse to do him reverence, and the Bassa did the like; where, after some little Conference together, he drew out the Commission he had to seize upon his Person, and to carry him to Constantinople: the which Stephano perceiving, he turned him to his Servants, and wished them to shift for themselves, for that he saw he went to his death. His men being retired, the Chiaus, who had his Mace in his hand, gave him a blow between the Shoulders, and then caud him to be bound hand and foot, and cast into a Cart drawn by four good Horses: and in this manner they carried him to Constantinople, where being arrived, to avoid the Punishment he had deserved, he denied his Faith, and became a Renegade: and withal, he became very poor and miserable for at the same instant that he was taken, the Bassa sent to seize and carry away whatsoever he had at Brablie and Nicopolis, where his Wife remained, so as he had nothing left him but the remorse of Conscience that tormented him continually, for the barbarous Cruelties which he had practised in Moldavia. Some of his men returned to Tas, and there declared what had befallen Stephano in their Presence, for which they generally gave thanks unto God, and were very joyful.

him, with great Preparatives both to receive him, and to refresh his Army. The Bassa making his entry into Tergovist, had amongst other things of one, thirty or forty Musicians on Horse back, playing upon certain Instruments almost like unto Trumpets, which made but silly Musick; he had also many Pages, who instead of Cloaks were the Skins of Leopards, Lions, and Tygres, as if they meant to terrify the World; and his Army consisted of about twenty thousand men, some Turks, some Tartarians, to whom Michna joined his Forces, having 10000 Horse and Foot, which he had drawn from Valachia and the neighbour Countries. The Bassa being entered the Castle, whereas Prince Michna attended him, after many Complements, they entered into a great Hall well appointed, where the Bassa presented him his Letters Patents, and a Robe which his Master had sent to Michna, which he caused to be put on in the presence of all the Noblemen of Moldavia, with many Ceremonies too long to relate. After which, Prince Michna led the Bassa into another great Hall where a Feast was prepared, as well for himself, as for such as he would admit to his Table; Michna offering to serve the said Bassa, but he would not suffer him, causing him to sit down right against him. On the Second of July they parted from Tergovist, and marched into Moldavia, whereof the Polonian Princes were advertised; but the Princes, Mother to Alexander, maintained, That the Bassa came only to bring the Patents to Prince Alexander her Son; which dangerous Opinion of hers grew by reason of the Letters which Hebram Bassa had sent to Prince Alexander, not remembering that it came from a Turk, his sworn Enemy, and therefore not to be credited, especially in a matter of that importance, so as he was the cause of their utter ruine.

About this time, the General of the King of Polonia's Army, called Zolchysky, envying the Honour which the Polonian Princes had gotten by so many Victories, and withal drawn by his own private Interest, writ to Prince Michna and the Bassa, that if they would promise to procure the Sultan to advance the eldest Son of the deceased Prince Simeon (who lived with him) to be Prince of Valachia (whereof his Father had been formerly Vayvod) he would so weaken the Prince's Army, as they should be forced to yield or fly. Whole Demand being easily granted, this Traitor writ to certain Captains of the Cossacks, that they should leave the Prince's Army, and come with all speed into Poland, to accompany Uladislaus King's Son, who had been chosen Duke of Muscovy, and meant to go thither with a great Army by reason of some troubles, and that they should be very well paid. The Cossacks (who depend upon the Crown of Poland, serving those that promise them) began to mutiny, saying plainly, That if they had not money speedily, they would retire into their Country, yet concealing that they had been called to any other Service; and without any long stay, they parted early in a morning about 8000, carrying with them great store of Oxen, Sheep, and other Cattel; with all the Spoils they had got in the precedent Victories.

After their Example, Bischo, General of Prince Alexander's Army, whether corrupted by Bays, or for that he had an apprehension of this powerful Army which came against them, retired almost secretly toward Michna and the Bassa, being followed by 2000 Horse. This was a Subject of great amazement to the Prince's Army; and yet, as if they had been inebriated by some devilish Charms, they could not relieve to make a Retreat 1616 as they might easily have done without danger. Many advised Prince Alexander to this course, even Prince Michna writ unto him, advising him to retire into Polonia before that his Army approached nearer to Tas; the which he did for fear of the Success, whereof his false Prophet had forewarned him, as we have formerly observed: whereupon Alexander went to Council on the 25th of July, but they could not resolve, the Commanders and Soldiers being much divided, many of them demanding their Pay, else they would not fight; the which they took for a Pretext of their Retreat. In the mean time the Tartarians, which made the Vanguard of Prince Michna's Army, approached; which made the Princes to leave Tas, and to march toward Cochina; but they could not do it secretly, but the Tartarians were advertised, who past speedily through the City, and charged them in the Rear, in which Encounter George Rasky, Nephew to him that was taken with Constantinople, having fought valiantly, and slain many Tartarians with his own hand, was in the end shot thorow the body with an Arrow, whereof he died presently. The Lord of Tifchevich came speedily to the Charge with a Troop of Cossacks which he had stayed, and charged the Tartarians so furiously, as he slew eight hundred upon the place, and put the rest to rout.

Alexander, having received the Letter above mentioned from Prince Michna, made Answer, that (contrary to his promise to continue his friends, and never to take Arms against him) he had craved aid from the Turk to dispossess him of Moldavia, to the which his Predecessor had never pretended, neither could they according to the fundamental Laws of the Country, and the Conventions accorded by the Grand Seigneur, when as the Moldavians submitted themselves under his Sovereignty, by the which no man could be Vayvod of Moldavia unless he were born in the Country. Moreover, he should remember, that it was in his power to dispossess him of Valachia, when as he entered Bona with his Army in pursuit of Stephano; the which he would not do, nor detain any of his precious Moveables, which he had reserved and sent unto him; that if he abused the Power which he then had, God would not suffer to great an Ingratitude and Unlittleness to remain unpunished. And although his Army were far inferior to his, yet he would let him know, that he neither feared him nor the Bassa, putting his chief Confidence in the assistance of the Almighty, who had in many occasions used them to abate the Turks pride, which he should abhor, if he were a true Christian, rather than to joy with them to satisfy his Ambition.

Prince Michna having sent this Letter to Skinder Bassa, General of the Turky Army, he was so incensed, as he presently commanded his Lieutenant to pursue the Polonians with twelve thousand choice men, they being then at Cernard, betwixt Tas and Cochina. Prince Alexander being advertised hereof, he suddenly caused his Army to advance towards the Fort of Cochina. At the same time, the Chancellor to Prince Chorbannu, who came with one hundred and fifty Horse to Prince Alexander, to assure him that his Master was coming to his aid with five or six thousand men, was pursued by the Turks near unto Tas, whereas he thought to have found the said Prince, and of all his Troop only himself and one more escaped, so as the Prince could have no certain news of the said Chorbannu. Prince Coresky, who had remained with two thousand five hundred Horse not far from Cernard, was also encountered by a great Troop of Turky and Tartarian, which he could not well discover by reason of a little Mountain that covered them: the Prince seeing some of them appeared, changed them; but finding, that as he defeated one Troop, a fresh succeeded in his place, he was forced to make his Retreat, with this advantage, that he had almost slain five thousand of his Enemies, having not lost above two hundred and fifty of his own men. But the Prince was wounded with two Arrows, one in the Thigh, and the other in the Back, which was a great disaster for himself and for the whole Army. * He which commanded this Troop of Turks being much amazed at this unexpected Encounter, having gathered his men together, and joyning them to fifteen thousand others whom the Bassa had sent, he being yet at Tas, he caused this Army to approach within a quarter of a League to the Polonians, where, having encouraged his men in what he could, he told them, that to show his Affection unto the Sultan's Service in this occasion, he was resolved to send a Challenge to Prince Coresky, the confest to be the most valiant of all the Polonian Army, so as he presently dispatched one of his Captains to go unto the Prince, and to call him in the behalf of his General. The Captain coming to Alexander's Camp, demanded to speak with Prince Coresky, who being brought unto him, delivered the Charge he had from his General. The Prince, although he were neither able to stand nor to sit on Horse-back, by reason of his Wounds, yet would he needs have accepted this Challenge, if Prince Alexander, and the chief Noblemen of the Army, had not conjured him to excuse himself by reason of his indisposition; letting him know, that the event of such a Combat did not only import him, but all those of his Party who had their chief hope in him; whereunto the Prince added their infatigable Injuries; and among others, his dear Spouse, who was much afflicted for his Wounds. The Lord of Tifchevich (a brave and valiant Gentleman) being then present, intreated Prince Alexander to give him leave to accept the Challenge for Prince Coresky his Cousin; the which was willingly granted: so as he sent a Gentleman with the said Turk, to know if the General would yield thereunto, which he did willingly, not being ignorant of the Quality and Valour of the said Tifchevich. It was agreed that the Combat should be betwixt both Armies, lying in a plain open field, within a quarter of a League one of another, with promise, that neither Party should be assisted.

The two brave Warriours having taken leave of their friends, came to the place appointed, in view of both Armies. The Turks General being about fifty Paces from his Army, caused Water to be brought, with the which he washed his Mouth, Eyes, Nose, Ears, and Privy Parts, believing (according to his Law) that this washing would serve as a purifying; then turning toward the East, he made his Prayer: after which he went to Horse-back, being richly armed and furnished, and then marched softly towards his Adversary, who attended him well mounted and armed, and so they began their Combat, their chief Arms being Bows and Arrows, which they spent without hurting one another; till at last Tifchevich, having a Personel, that the Turk thorow the Body, and overthrew him, who striving to rise again, Tifchevich passed over him with his Horse, and wounded him in the right Arm, and at the next blow flew him: after which he cut off his head, and carried it to Prince Alexander.

The Polonians were very joyful of the happy Success of this famous Combat; and the Turks being much amazed, advertised the Bassa and Michna, that it was necessary they should bring 1616 the rest of their Army and their Cannon, if they would be revenged of the Polonians. In the mean time the Tatar Basha, who had abandoned Prince Alexander, with a Troop of two thousand Tartarians and Moldavians, found means to get before the Polonian Army, and to cut off the way betwixt Comrade and the Town of Bahoean six Leagues off. The Valachians and Transilvanians, led by the General of Michna's Army, invested them upon the right hand, and the body of the Turks Army followed behind; so that there remained nothing but upon the left hand a Wood of Timber-trees which might favour their Retreat. Skinder Basha, hearing the Success of the Combat, commanded his Army to advance presently with sixteen Cannons. The Princes seeing themselves environed by so many Enemies, they resolved to fortify themselves with their Carts and Carriages, and to defend themselves; but what could five or six thousand men prevail against two or three and twenty thousand; so for many were thought to be in the Turks Army: True it is, they expected daily Prince Charles, and the Lord Buff, who were within two days Journey and brought with them ten or twelve thousand men. This made the Basha and Michna to advance, to force the Polonians to yield or fight. Coming near unto their Camp, and seeing them invest upon all sides the Wood, they approached their Cannon, which was able to have spoiled their Camp, but it was not their design; they only desired to take the Princes and Princesses Prisoners, with the chief Noble-men: Whereupon they sent to summon the Polonian Army to deliver into their hands the said Princes and Lords, promising that the rest of the Army should depart with Bag and Baggage, wherunto they would not yield, but made an Answer all with one consent, That they would rather dye than commit such Betrayals and Treachery. This being reported to the Basha and Prince Michna, they commanded that some of their Cannon should be charged with small Bullets, and discharged through the Polonian Army; whereby there were a great number slain and wounded. The Princes, who had but some small pieces, made certain Volleys, but to small purpose; neither had they any more Bullets left, and little Powder; so that by ill chance part had been burnt some few days before, so as all things seemed to foretell their ruin at hand. The Lord of Tisbeovich, having judiciously observed, that remaining in that inclosure, he could not escape Death, or at least Captivity, resolved with five hundred Horse (the most valiant among the Polonians) to force through three or four Squadrons which were in guard by the Wood side to the end none might escape, that Place being most suspected to the Turks; the which they executed with such fury, as they overthrew all they encountered; shewing, that it is a very dangerous thing to make head against those who are reduced to that Extremity, as they must either vanquish or dye. Prince Corshie would not have failed to have made the like Retreat, and to have carried Prince Alexander with him; but he could not fit on Horse-back by reason of his Wounds; and besides, he had rather have died than to leave his Wife in that Extremity. His last refuge was to disguise himself as well as he could, giving it out, that he had escaped with Tisbeovich, to the end he might pass for a common Soldier, if the Prisoners were put to Ranfome. In like manner the Princesses disguised themselves in the best manner they could, for the like intent.

The Turks Cannon having overthrown many of their Carriages, which served as a Rampier, two Squadrons, one of Tartarians, and the other of Turks, presented themselves at one instant in two several places to force the Polonians Camp; who seeing no means to make resistance, and to repel the Enemy, laid down their Arms, crying out with a loud Voice, That they yielded; wherewith their Enemies were exceedingly glad, desiring nothing more than to take these Noble Princes Prisoners, and to dispose of the rest at their pleasures. The Turks and Tartarians having entered upon what they could lay their hands on, beginning to share their Prisoners, the Princes Alexander and Bogdan, with their Mother, were delivered unto Skinder Basha, who led them to Constantinople, whereas soon after their arrival they forthwith took their God, denied their Faith, and became Renegades, for fear of perpetual Imprisonment, wherewith they were threatened. For having caused himself to be Circumcised according to the Law of Mahomet, he died, and the Princess his Mother was confined to the old Seraglio. As for Prince Corshie (in this general ruin of a digit it felt to the Turks Tyranny) he had a misfortune himself, as he pass for a time unknown, and was led to Tai among the common Soldiers, where he was afterward discovered by a Soldier of his own Party, who obtained his liberty by this base treachery. The Turkish Captain who had gotten this Prince, hearing of his quality by the afore said Villain, he led him to Skinder Basha his General, who recompensed him well, and made both him and the Soldier who discovered him, to take solemn Oaths not to impart it to any man; for he had an intent to draw some great Ranfome from this Prince, and to restore him to his former liberty, knowing well, that if he carried him to Constantinople, the Grand Seigneur would confine him into his Prison, by which means he should make no use not benefit by his taking. But it happened, that another perfidious of the Polonian Army advertised Michna of Corshie's Captivity, and in whole hands he was; who was so jealous, as he could and overthrew the good design of Skinder Basha, telling him plainly in the presence of many, that he knew for certain, Prince Corshie was amongst his slaves, and that he should beware he did not escape, for that the Grand Seigneur would call him to account. The General made answer, that he would be glad it were so, but he had not yet any notice of him, thanking Michna for his good advice. But, fearing that if he did what he intended, suffering Prince Corshie to escape for a Ranfome, the Sultan coming to the knowledge thereof, would be much incensed, and punish him with disgrace or death, the advice he he told Prince Michna plainly, that the advice he had given him was true, and that Corshie had been found disguised among his other Prisoners, whom he would present unto his Master, with the Prince Alexander and Bogdan, as he did, of whose delivery you shall hear hereafter. The young Princess, Wife to Corshie, having disguised her self, and disguised her face with her Nails, and other helps, fell into the hands of a Tartarian Captain, with many others, who carried her into Tartaria, whereas she was most inhumanly treated.

In the Mediterranean Sea, Cosmo great Duke of Tuscany continued his Enterprizes this year against the Turks: his Gallies part from Ligea and arrived at the Levant, in quest of some occasions to annoy these Infidels. They drew near unto Cerge, in old time Citibarea, the five and twentieth of April,

The Princes taken Prisoners and carried to Constantinople.

April, when, meeting with certain Christian Ships, some Venetians advertised them, that the Island of Chio, the Turks had prepared two Gallies to pass into Barbary. Inghirami (Admiral to the Great Duke) resolved to set upon them; being on the way, he turned with his Fleet when they were to pass, and being covered by the Night, he cast Anchor under Cafso Rous. But as he attended a favourable Occasion, the Moon shining, discovered him to the Turks, and the Guards having advertised the Turks Gallies, they presently began to fly, the one following again towards Land, and the other continued her course at Sea with all speed. Inghirami with his Admiral Gallie got before that which was going to Land, invested it, being followed by the Gallie called St. Stephen, and three hours within Night grappled with it, and laboured to enter it; but the Turks (who were all good Soldiers) defended it valiantly, so as they were above an hour joined together, leaving one another furiously, yet the Turks (who were entered into Inghirami's Gallie) fought valiantly upon the Hatches; but in the end the Florentines had the Victory, and took this Gallie, with much loss of Christian Blood. It was the Patron Gallie of that famous Pirate Amurat Rais, which was commanded by the Son of Manni, a Portugall, called Musapha Celsi, who was taken alive, but fore wounded. The other Gallie which had fled to Sea, and was the Captain Gallie of the said Amurat Rais, was commanded by the Bey of Mulene, Nephew and Son-in-Law to that Pirate, called Amurat, who had married his Daughter, being his Mothers Son, was invested by the Gallies of Saint Marie Madalene, and the Patron Saint Cosmo; the Combat was no less furious than the other, the Turks making a wonderful defence; but after some hours fight, in the which the Blood of either side was abundantly spilt, the Florentines had the Victory. Amurat, Bey of Mulene, was slain, and Musapha, whom these Turkish Gallies carried to Algier in Barbary. They were of five and twenty banks a piece, carrying Lanthorns, and furnished with all things necessary, and manned with four hundred and twenty Janizaries, all men of Action, and practised in Piracies with that Pirate Amurat Rais. In this prize the Florentines took two hundred and forty Turks, and freed four hundred and thirty Christians; among the Artillery of these Gallies, they recovered a Cannon and two Scares of the Gallie of Saint John, and a Sail belonging to the Great Dukes Captain Gallie, which the Pirate Amurat Rais had formerly spoiled. These Turkish Gallies were laden with great store of rich Commodities, the which was valued at two hundred thousand Crosons. But this Conquest was gotten with the loss of much Blood; for the Florentines had two hundred twenty three men wounded, and five and thirty slain; in those two Commodities, the which made the Admiral Inghirami to rest satisfied in this Voyage with the taking of two Gallies, after which he returned to Ligea.

We have formerly made mention in the Je-fuits Business, being presented at Constantinople, of the entry which the Venetian Ambassador made into that City. And this was the Effect of his Ambassage. The Peace concluded at Sina Torok, in the year 1606, betwixt the Emperour and the Sultan, was somewhat altered by the divers Interpretations and Explications, which they made of the Articles therein contained. But this year 1616, in the Month of March, the Ambassadors of both their Imperial Majesties assembled at Pe- enna in Austria; that is to say, the Cardinal Rossigli, Arch-bishop of Strigonium, and Chancellor to the Emperour, the Cardinal Kisgfi, Bishop of Vienna, the Baron of Rais, Count Adolph Althaus, the Earl of Salmes, the Earl of Thora, and Pauli Apponi Nagi, for the Emperour; Hali Basha of Buda, Achmat Tibania, and Gasper Grafiani, for the Turks; where they concluded these following Articles, to take away all pretext of Controversie in the Explication of the said Peace, which was agreed upon at Sina Torok. But it was after that Ambassadors had been sent of either side, as well to Constantinople as to Prague, with royal and rich Presents.

Articles extracted out of the Letters Patents of Achmat Emperour of the Turk.

1. Forasmuch as many things have happened of either side, contrary to the Peace concluded at Sina Torok, it hath been necessary to confirm it anew, and to reduce it into the right course: Wherefore this holy Peace, made and concluded at Sina Torok, shall be observed for twenty years complete, to begin at the date of these presents. Given in the month of Chomazialbil, in the year of the Prophet, 1024.

2. That the Peace heretofore concluded at Sina Torok, shall remain firm in all its Articles, according to the Treaty which the Emperour Rodolphius did send unto Us, signed with his hand, and sealed with his Seal, the which we have received willingly, and the same Treaty we also sent back confirmed to the Emperour of the Romans, the which he received in like manner, and this Treaty which was sent unto Us bare date the ninth of December, in the year 1606 of Jesus, of reverend and happy memory; and that which we sent unto the Emperour of Romans, wherewith he was satisfied, was dated in the year of the Prophet One thousand twenty one.

3. Since the time that Agria, Canise, Alba-Regalis, Pesth, Buda, Zohofe, Haxwan, and other places have been taken, that the Villages which were of their appurtenances shall hereafter remain annexed unto them. But those Villages, which since the Peace of Sina Torok have been hindered from paying their Tribute by either side, or have been held by force, contrary to the Treaty of Peace, that those Villages shall be seized by Commisaries of either side, by the Emperour of the Romans, and presently shall be set at liberty, and restored to their Lords and right owners. As for the Villages which pay Tribute to either part, those which are situate upon the Frontiers of the Emperour of the Romans, towards Novigrade and other Places, shall be seized by Commisaries thereto appointed, who shall take a Register, to the end those Villages may not be molested by our Neighbours. In like manner, the Commisary shall make a Register of the Villages which pay to both sides, lying near the Towns of the Emperour of Romans, of Strigonium and other Places, to the end they may take notice what Villages are bound to the one or other Party, that hereafter there might grow a Controversie, and for that which concerned the 158 Villages about Strigonium, for the which there was some controversy, the sixty lying nearest to the said Town shall be adjudged as it hath been agreed, and the Commisaries of either side shall send out for it. The foresaid Villages lying near to Strigonium, and all others of the Realm of Hungary, which shall be adjudged to the one or other Party, shall not in any sort be disputed, more than of ancient Custom, and there shall be nothing excited from them more than the Tribute.

The Judges of Villages shall pay unto the Lord the Tributes according to the ancient Customs; if the Judges 1616 do not bring the Tribute, the Baſſa or Beig of the Place shall summon the Inhabitants thereof, to the end there Judges may come and pay the Tribute, and if they do it not after these summonings, he shall write unto the next Governor for the Roman Emperor, that the Judges of the Villages may be sent unto him with the Tribute: And finally, if after all these Formalities it be not paid, the Baſſa or Beig may use force to fetch in these Inhabitants, and make them Slaves, the which shall be offered throughout the Villages which owe us tribute in the Realm of Hungary, yet nothing shall be exacted or demanded of them more than they have been accustomed to pay in ancient times. The Commissaries deputed shall view and set down by a joint consent the limits and bounds of the Lands and Seigneuries, which are held by either part in the upper or lower Hungary, and in the Realms of Croatia and Slavonia.

4. They that shall break the Peace of either part, if they cannot be convicted and punished instantly, we have decreed, that there shall be order taken of either side, and Justice shall be done within three Months. All Prisoners of War and others which have been taken since the Peace of Situa Torok, shall be set at liberty without ransom.

5. Achmet Tahaia hath presented unto us a Roll of Places built and fortified since the Peace, for the retreat of Soldiers. Whereupon we have ordained, that Informations should be taken of all Fortifications made on either side since the Peace of Situa Torok, and if it be found that any Fortification hath been made contrary to the Peace, it shall be visited within four Months by the Captains on both sides, or by a Nobleman of either Party, and the Fortifications which shall be found to have been thus made contrary to the Peace, shall be demolished.

6. And, for that some wicked and malicious Spirits have attempted many things unbecomingly to infringe this holy Peace and good Amity; we have ordained, that if hereafter any Persons of either side shall attempt or practise any thing that is wicked and lewd, contrary to the Peace and mutual Correspondency, we will advertise the Emperor of the Romans thereof; and in like manner the Roman Emperor, King of Hungary and Bohemia, shall advertise us to our Court, and no credit shall be given to the Reports of such Persons.

7. The Priests, religious Men, and Jesuits, among the People of holy Jesus, which follow the Pope Religion, may build Temples in our Realms, there to say divine Service after their manner, and read the Gospel. We will yield them all favour, and will not suffer any one to disturb them contrary to Law and Equity.

8. It shall be lawful for the Inhabitants born in the Realm of Hungary of either part, to re-edify the Villages ruined and laid waste, and after they are inhabited, they shall pay Tribute to the one and the other, if they be such Villages as have been accustomed to pay to both.

9. Merchants shall have free leave to traffick, passing from our Port into those Countries, and the transport of Merchandise shall be free to such as shall take Letters from the Governors of the Frontiers, or from the Receivers of the thirds, the which they shall present in passing, and the Lord of the Place or the Receiver shall attest the said Letters by his manual sign or seal; for the which they shall not take any thing of the Merchant. If the Merchant be to pass by any dangerous Place, they shall give him a sufficient Consent to conduct him in safety, and after that the Merchant hath paid of the said fifth the thirds, which is the full due, no man shall molest him nor hinder him to go where he pleases.

10. The Merchants which would pass from the Realms and Seigneuries of the Emperor of the Romans, and the Empire of Austria, into our Kingdoms, with Merchandise or Money, shall be under the Ensign of the Emperor of Romans, and shall have his letters patents to pass, without the which they shall not be suffered to pass. And if they enter without Ensign, or the said Patents, the Agents and Consuls of the Roman Emperor may seize upon their Vessels, Merchandise, and Money, and shall give advice thereof unto their Emperor; wherefore all the Merchants of the Emperors Countries, of the House of Austria, and of the King of Spain, both as well those of the Low Countries, as his other Realms, may come with all assurance into our Realms, with their Ships, Money, and Merchandise, paying three in the hundred. And as for the Agents and Consuls of the Roman Emperor, they shall pay unto them two Appers for the hundred; and in doing so the said Agents and Consuls of the Roman Emperor shall have a care of the Merchants Affairs. If any Merchant chance to die, the Emperors Agent and Consul shall cause his Goods to be sealed up, and shall take them into their Possession, to the which our Treasurer shall have no colour or pretension. And when as the Merchants have paid the Custom of three for the hundred in our Place, they shall not be bound to pay it in another for the same Merchandise. If the Merchants have any Controversie amongst themselves, or with others, the Cadi, or Judge of that Place, may take knowledge of the cause, if it exceed not the value of 4000 Appers, but it shall be judged by the Cadi of our Port.

11. As long as this holy Peace shall continue, the Posts which shall be sent with Letters by the Baſſes, Begues, Lords and Agents, or by the Vijlers, on our behalf to the Emperor of the Romans; and respectively from him to our Court, shall be honourably entertained by our Officers; and if the way be dangerous, they shall give them assistance to conduct them into a place of safety with their Letters. And if the Agent which is with us desire to write any particular Letter unto the Emperor, and not send an express Messenger, that this Letter shall be carried by the post, and delivered safely where it is directed. That the Messengers of the Baſſes and Begues shall go no more into the Villages, but the Judges shall bring the Tribute and deliver it where they ought.

An Accord for the Execution of the Articles touching the Villages in Controversie, and the railing of Fortifications.

TO conclude all Differences touching the division of Villages, and demolition of Fortifications made in prejudice of the Peace of Situa Torok: We the Commissaries deputed, had agreed upon the time of four Months: But, for that all Controversies cannot be decided within that time, by a common consent we have concluded the time of twelve Months, for the Expedition of all that shall remain undecided; all things remaining in the same Estate during the time. For the making of these Affairs on the behalf of the Majesty of the Roman Emperor, shall be the Noble Lord Adolph of Althen, Earl of the sacred Empire, with others, according to his Majesties good Pleasure. And on the behalf of the Ottoman Emperor hath been named the Noble Lord Ali Pasha. For the greater alinement of these things, we the said Commissaries have caused six Copies of this Plea to be dispatched, in the Italian, Hungarian, and Turkish Tongues. And we the Director or President of the Privy Council to his Imperial Majesty, and Cardinal, and other Counsellors of his Privy Council and Commissioners, having full Power and Authority, have confirmed these Affairs upon our Hands, and the Seals of our Arms.

1616 As also We Ali Baſſa of Buda, Vijſer to the most powerful Sultan Achmat, Thyahla Mutafaraga, and Gasper Gratiari, Ambassadors to the Turkish Emperor, with the Imperial Majesty of the Roman Emperor, having full Power and Authority to conclude this Treaty, have signed it with our Hands, and sealed it with our own seals; whereof there were three Copies delivered to either party. Given at Vienna the first of March, 1616.

This new Declaration of the Ottoman Emperor, upon the first Articles concluded at Situa Torok, shows plainly how much the Turks are of late days retired from their former barbarous rudeness, having made themselves capable of great Affairs. And their frequent meetings betwixt the Emperor of the Romans, and the Sultan, by their Ambassadors, as a holy watering of the Olive Tree of Peace, seems to make it to flourish, as the sweet favour may pierce further, and make us hope that God will make use of this peaceful Union, to prepare unto himself some means to a new Harvest, or a healthful Conquest of Souls wandering amidst the falshoods of the Alchocoran.

Alexandrina, Wife to Prince Corekie, having been taken at that unfortunate overthrow of the Polonian Princes at Moldavie, by Skander Baſſa and Prince Corekie; she was carried away (as you have formerly heard) by a Tartarian Captain, and led Captive unknown to Bialagrat, where she received many Indignities, being with Child; yea during the time of her lying in, which was five or six Months after her taking: all which time she bethought her self of a means to halter her own Delivery, and withal, to free a Polonian Soldier called Jagues, who had carried Arms under Prince Corekie. This man, although he knew the Princess well, and might by her discovery have purchased his own Liberty, yet he would not do it; wherefore the Princess having tried his Fidelity, taught him a means how to work his own Liberty, and hers in the end, by his Care and Diligence. The Tartarian being one day absent from his Lodging, Alexandrina took occasion to talk with Jagues the Polonian; telling him, That having found him faithful unto her, she would direct him a course whereby he might redeem himself from Captivity; so as he would principally observe what she did prescribe. Jagues having promised to execute whatsoever she should command, he crjny him, yea, with the hazard of his Life; she then said unto him: You know the Tartarian Captain that he had a suit unto him, that was, that the Polonian Woman, which was also his Prisoner, was his near Kinswoman, intreating him that in respect of his good Office he had done to his Brother, he would give her and her little Infant better, and that as soon as he were returned into his Country, he would take a course for her ransom, and it might be would bring it himself. The Polonian, having acquainted the Lady with what had past, and delivered her Jewel faithfully unto her, having received her Letters to Prince Corekie, she went to find him out, he took his leave. This Polonian travelling towards his Country, met with one of the same Nation, who having been taken Prisoner with Prince Alexander, made an escape; these two discoursing freely of their Adventures, Jagues inquired carefully what was become of the Princess which had been taken Prisoner to Corekie by Skander Baſſa, and especially of Corekie; and hearing that he was in the Prisons of the Black Sea, he inquired by what means he might speak with this Prince, or at least how he might convey some Letters unto him; to whom he answered, that unto him, You must also demand of the sick Man a Horse, and some Money, with this pass to go into your Country, to the end thou mayest go speedily to my dear Husband, wherefore thou shalt hear of him, and to deliver him my Letters, and bring me an answer: if it be possible. The Polonian having sworn to perform whatsoever the Lady commanded, he being at Liberty; the Princess delivered him the Stone, he was striving to restore it unto her again, as soon as he had done his cure, if it were not taken from him by Violence.

The Polonian attended with impatience until the Tartarian did talk unto him of his Brothers Infirmary; who finding him one day much afflicted, took occasion to tell him, that he knew a certain means how to cure his Brother, without any Pain, or taking any thing inwardly; I believe nothing, reply'd the Tartarian; for all the Physicians in the Country could not do it; but if he could effect his saying, he promised to let him be at Liberty without ransom, and to give him wherewithal to conduct him into his Country: It is the recompence, said the Prisoner, I mean to demand, and that you swear unto me by your great God, not to fail of your promise when I have performed mine, and not to retain, nor suffer any one to take from me the thing I shall use in the cure. The Tartarian having solemnly sworn, and laid his hand upon his Heart, the Polonian took a time to make preparation for his cure. The Tartarian, although he distrustful his new Physician, yet he acquainted his Brother with the Project, who, being desirous to recover his Senses, intreated his Brother not to neglect the offer, promising to save him harmless, both in regard of the ransom, which he expected from the Polonian, and for that he should give him. The day appointed being come, the Tartarian prest the Prisoner to perform his Promise; to whom the sick man also promised a Horse and fifty Chequines to return into his Country, taking the same Oath which his Brother had formerly done. All things being ready, he applied his physical Stone, binding it fast to one of his Eyes for the space of seven hours, after which, being taken away he saw clearly, and in like manner he recovered his other Eye, and afterwards his hearing by the like Application: whereat the Tartarians much rejoiced; giving unto the Polonian what he had promised, and procuring him pass-ports from the Tartarian without which he could hardly get out of the Country.

The Polonian before his departure told the Tartarian Captain that he had a suit unto him, that was, that the Polonian Woman, which was also his Prisoner, was his near Kinswoman, intreating him that in respect of his good Office he had done to his Brother, he would give her and her little Infant better, and that as soon as he were returned into his Country, he would take a course for her ransom, and it might be would bring it himself. The Polonian, having acquainted the Lady with what had past, and delivered her Jewel faithfully unto her, having received her Letters to Prince Corekie, she went to find him out, he took his leave. This Polonian travelling towards his Country, met with one of the same Nation, who having been taken Prisoner with Prince Alexander, made an escape; these two discoursing freely of their Adventures, Jagues inquired carefully what was become of the Princess which had been taken Prisoner to Corekie by Skander Baſſa, and especially of Corekie; and hearing that he was in the Prisons of the Black Sea, he inquired by what means he might speak with this Prince, or at least how he might convey some Letters unto him; to whom he answered, that it was very difficult, for that he was faithfully guarded. But he understood that the French Ambassador had sometimes leave to send to visit him, whereof he might inform himself more particularly. After this, Jaghes intreated his Countrymen to deliver certain Letters which the Prince had written unto her Kinsfolk, the which he promised to perform faithfully, and so they parted. Jaghes coming to Constantinople, he grew acquainted with one of the French Ambassadors Men, who was sometimes employed to visit the Prince, and to carry him Money and other Necessaries; by whose means he got access unto the Prince, and delivered his Letters, the which he received with much Joy, hearing of his Wives Health. Eight days after, the Polonian coming to visit the Prince, he received from him an answer to his Wives, and so took his leave; he after many troubles, some Encounters, returned to Bialigrot, where, finding the Lady all alone (the Tartarian and his Servants being gone a hunting) he gave an account unto her of his Negotiation, and delivered his Letters, whereat she was much joyed, hearing that he was alive, though infinitely grieved for his Captivity, understanding that the Grand Seigneur had refused to put him to ransom. After their Discourse, the Prince advertised her faithful Agent, That since his departure, the Tartar had grown jealous of her Quality, and had enquired of her what her Husband, her Kinsfolks, and their Estates were; to whom she had answered, that her Husband was a Captain who had been taken Prisoner with Prince Alexander, and carried with him into Turkey; and as for her other Kinsfolks they were all Soldiers, which had been ruined during the Troubles of Moldavia: desiring the Polonian to remember it well, lest they should be found to differ when they should come to treat of her Ransom. The Tartarian returning soon after to his Houle, he found Jaghes the Polonian there, whom he entertained very kindly, both in reward of the good Offices he had done to his Brother, and for the hope he had of his Prisoners ransom, remembering that Jaghes had told him that he was his Kinswoman, and had told him that he would bring it. After some little Discourse, Jaghes asked him, What ransom he would require for his Polonian Prisoner: To whom the Tartarian answered, That he would have fix thousand Chequines for her and her Son, unless he would give him the Stone with which he had cured his Brother; to whom the Polonian replied, That as for the Stone it was in his Power, having refused it to a Nobleman whom he had followed when he was taken Prisoner. And as for the ransom which he demanded for his Prisoner and her Child, it was more than the all her Kindred were worth, the being Wife to a Captain who had been taken Prisoner at the defeat of Alexander, and for want of means was fill detained. The Tartarian interrupted him, saying, That he understood there was of noble extraction, and that he had rich Kinsfolks, who would not suffer her to spend her Life in Captivity. I confess, said the Polonian, that she is issued from Noble Parents, but they are ruined during the Troubles of Moldavia; adding withal, that he would not have returned if he had thought he would have demanded above a thousand Chequines, the which he offered him, intreating him to accept it, in regard he was his Kinswoman, and for the good Office he had done for his Brother. You have been satisfied, replied the Tartarian, and have no cause to complain: Notwithstanding, after some contending, by the mediation of the Captains Brother, who had been so well cured, the Ladies ransom was let at three thousand Chequines, whereof her faithful Agent gave perfect Intelligence to Prince Charles, Brother to prince Coreskie, who lent this sum with all possible speed; and so the Prince and his little Infant were redeemed from Captivity, and were led into Polonia by their faithful Solicitor: From whence the advertised the Prince, by Letters, of her delivery. This relation was written by a Frenchman, who, by his report, was present in all the Troubles of Moldavia; but as touching her delivery by means of the Cure, I cannot warrant it, but leave it to the censure of Physicians and Naturalists, who can best judge of the Virtues of Stones, Herbs, and Plants; but it is certain that she was imprisoned and ransomed as an unknown Person.

In the year 1617, there came to Paris a Chiaus, a Spanish Renegade, called Sahyan, sent from Constantinople with Letters from the Emperour Achmat to the King, for the delivery of eight and twenty Slaves, who had redeemed their Liberty for Money in divers Ports of Italy, and in their return to Constantinople had been taken by the Ships of Mercellia; the King caused them to be let at Liberty. But the Chiaus had also charge to intreat his Majesty to cause Justice to be done unto the Moors Gramadines, expelled out of Spain, and wronged in their Goods and Persons, upon their Passage into France; wherein he had what contentment he could expect of Justice. Notwithstanding he did witness openly his amazement at their long delays in the dispatch of Suits; saying plainly, That France, which had the Reputation throughout the World, to maintain every mans right inviolably, did no Justice, but after long and tedious Pursuits; and that the Execution of decrees, was many times longer than the Suit it self. Whereas the Turks Justice (said he) was speedily administered to every Man; and within eight days they saw an end of the greatest and most important Suits. This Chiaus was favourably entertained, and defraied with Train for the space of six or seven Months at the Kings Charge.

As the Turks Estate hath not grown great but by Combinations, so it is ordinarily full of Troubles; whereby it seems that the Preservation thereof depends in making War upon others, or to support it, when as neighbour Princes seek to recover that which they had unjustly wrested from them by the Ottoman Power. This great Estate entertained this year four great Armies, two at Land, the one against the Persians, his ancient Enemy, the other (consisting in a manner all of Tartarians) against the King of Poland, as supporting the part of the Vayvod of Moldavia against the Turk, who had settled another in that Province: And two naval Armies, the one in the Black Sea against the Cossacks or Ruffians, who made daily Incursions into the Osman Country, when wholly given to Arms, which go to Sea in small Boats, able to carry but five or six Men, made of the Bodies of hollow Trees; but they are in a manner invincible with these kind of Boats; for when as the disadvantage of a Combat forces them to found a retreat, they retire near unto the Land, and in such Places whereas the Turkish Gallies cannot approach; and so they easily prevent a total overthrow. Finally, in case of Necessity they carry their Vessels with them. For in the end of the last year, finding the passage of the Black Sea (stopped at the mouth of the River of Danub by the Turkish Gallies, they put their Boats into Carts, and taking the way by the Mountains, they brought them easily into the Sea. The Turks fourth Army in the white Sea, as they call it, employed either to conduct the Caravan, which brings the Tribute from Egypt to Constantinople, or in search of the Gallies of Malta and Florence, which scoure those Seas continually to annoy the Turk. The Army against the Persian is led by Haly Bassa, Successor to Alibemur Bassa, who had been sent into Persia after that he had lost threethousand men in a set Battle, after which, being sent for to come unto Constantinople, fearing that the Sultan would take revenge of so great a loss upon his life, he retired to the Sophy, where he now remains.

The Turks being much annoyed both at Sea and Land by the Uloques, made great Complaint Merchants whom they took, to confels by Torments, being greatly terrified at their Thiefs, and complaining much that they could not pass by Sea without danger of Servitude or Death: adding withal, that these Pyrates having gotten a way into Turkey by the Venetians Territories, they were by them made Slaves, and slain in their own Countries: and although they went not from their Houles, nor undertook any Voyages, yet they were fill in alarm, and subject unto ruin: That the first ill Resistance which was made, gave great cause of jealousy, that there was some secret Intelligence between the Subjects of the Seigniorie of Venice and the Uloques; and that they divided the Spoil betwixt them: finally, That in what sort soever the matter palt, they held them importunate to all men, but especially to themselves. The Turks threatened to take their just Revenge; the which being impossible to effect in upon the Estate of Venice for the infolency of the Uloques, which after they had bred a cruel War betwixt that State and the Arch-duke Ferdinand of Rome, now Emperour, who seemed to support them, thereby to engage the State in a War with the Turk. But for that the Success thereof doth not belong to our History, we will leave it to them that have written it at large.

On the fifteenth of November this year, Sultan Achmat Chah, having lived thirty years, and governed that great Empire of Turkey fifteen, died. When he came to the Empire he was but fifteen years old. He was of a good Constitution, well complexioned, and somewhat inclined to be fat, strong, and active, which appeared by his Exercise in casting of a Horse-mans Mace of nine or ten pounds weight, wherein he exceeded any one of his Court; in memory whereof there are two Pillars set up in one of the suburbs of the Seraglio at Constantinople, with an Inscription, as marks of his Dexterity. He was by nature ambitious and proud, which some hold qualities befitting his great Estate. He was not so cruel as many of his Predecessors: but he was much given to Sensuality and Pleasure; for the which he entertained three thousand Concubines and Virgins in a Seraglio, being the fairest Daughters of the Christians. His Mother was a Christian of Armenia, or of Cypria; and therefore it is thought he was somewhat favourable to Christians. He was much delighted in Hawking and Hunting; and namely for Hawking he kept in Greece and Natalia 40000 Faulconers, who attended his coming, and kept his Hawks in their several places of Charge, and had good yearly Penfions. Neither were his Huntsmen much fewer in number, or of less Charge. As the Turkish Emperours are bound, by the Law of their Religion, once every day to practise some manual Trade, so Mahomet, his Father, gave himself to the making of Arrows, and Achmat to the fashioning horn Rings, such as the Turks wear when they draw their Bows. This they do in the morning: after they are ready and have said their Prayers, then they call for their Exercise, but it is only for form, for they scarce make an Arrow or a Ring in a whole year.

THE REIGN OF MUSTAPHA,

The First of that Name, Ninth Emperour of the Turks.

Makes men on earth to any goodness given.
Nor longer than the thunders, any fear
That any heav'n holds any Thunderer.
So Mustafa, while heav'n restrain'd his state,
And held him fetter'd in his brothers' hate,
To virtuous actions did his studies drive,
Was courteous, pious, and contemplative.
But when his brother could no longer live,
And liberty did to him power give;
Then pride and tyrannie his horses wore,
And drive him dilaies past heav'n's love or fear, Greatness, on Goodness loves to slide, not stand.
And Lewis, fortune's ice, vertues firm land.
Honour had rather be with danger driven,
Than stay with vertue on the hand of Heaven.*

1617
MUSTAFA advanced to the Empire.
Deposed again.

OSMAN, the eldest Son of Achmat, being not above twelve years old, Mustapha, Brother to Achmat, being five and twenty, was drawn out of a Cell where he lived as it were religiously and in Contemplation, and proclaimed Sultan Mustapha Chan. They write of him, that he grew cruel, causing young Osman to be kept under turc Guards, putting to death his Brethren: He also did many indignities unto the Christian Ambassadors; and to confirm him in his Throne, he gave great Sums of Money to the Janizaries and Spahies; and sent a Messenger to Vienna to the Emperour, to assure him, that he would maintain inviolably whatsoever had been concluded betwixt him and his deceased Brother Achmat. But, growing odious by reason of his Tyranny, the Grand Visier came out of Perfia with an Army and deposed him, forcing him to return to his Cell, setting Prince Osman at liberty, and seating him in the Imperial Throne. But, for that it may seem strange, that Mustapha should be preserved alive during the Reign of his Brother Achmat, (contrary to the custom of the Ottoman Emperours, who do usually kill all their Brethren at their first coming to the Crown, thinking thereby the better to assure their Estates) it shall be fit to make mention thereof. Mahomet, the third of that name, dying in the year 1602, and leaving Achmat and Mustapha, his Sons by the Sultana Flatra, a Lady of Cyprus, some say of Bosnia, Achmat, the eldest, was sent for speedily out of Magnesia, by the Baffaes, to take possession of his Father's Crown, being the first Emperour of that Name. And, for that the custom of the Turkish Emperours was (as we have said) to have neither Brother nor Nephew alive, unless they could save themselves by flight; yet the Visier Baffaes, and other Officers of the Court, concluded in Council, that it was not fit that Mustapha Brother to Achmat should dye; grounding their opinion upon a good reason of State, for that their Emperour being but fifteen years old, they feared (that dying in his Nonage, without children able to govern) the Empire might fall into Combustion, and ruine it self by reason of Civil Wars. Whereupon they decreed, that Mustapha's Life should be preserved; but with that caution and restriction, that he should remain still a Prisoner in some Chambers of the Emperour's Seraglio at Constantinople.

During Achmat's minority, and before he had Children, there was no cruel Decree made against Mustapha, but he only continued in his Contemplation without any liberty: But when as the Emperour saw himself fortified with life, and remembering the cruel Custom of his Predecessors, he many times propounded the putting of his Brother to death to his Council; the which may seem very strange it took not effect, having been often concluded. Among others, it is written, that his Death was concluded one Evening, and that it should have been put in Execution the next day: But Achmat was so frighted in the Night with Apparitions and fearful Dreams, as day being come, he said, Seeing that the only Resolution to put his Brother to death had so terrified him, he did believe that his Torments would much increase if he should put it in Execution; and therefore he commanded his Brother should live, more in regard of the Terror of his Mind than for any brotherly Affection. Another time, Sultan Achmat being in one of the Windows of his Seraglio, he beheld his Brother Mustapha, who by his permission was walking in the Gardens with his Guard: Some one of his Baffaes or other Officer that was near unto him, and willing to flatter his Humor, told him, that it was a matter of dangerous Consequence to suffer him to have so great Liberty. Achmat (moved with jealousy and distrust) grew into rage at his Words, whereupon he suddenly took his Bow and Arrow, (being a very expert Archer, as all the Turkish Nation generally are) and aimed at his Brother to kill him; but at that very instant he felt to great a pain in his Arm and Shoulder, as not able to let loose his Arrow, nor to perform what he had intended, he said with a loud Voice, That Mahomet would not have Mustapha to dye. This Prince had three Chambers in the Seraglio, where he remained a Prisoner fifteen years, and spent his time in a Contemplative kind of Life, after the manner of the Musulmans; his whole delight was to read the Arabian Books of their Doctors in divers Sciences. The Grand Seigneur gave him leave sometimes to take the Air of his Gardens with his Guard, and called him to consult with him of Affairs of Estate, taking his Advice many times, knowing him to be of a sound Judgment.

After a long imprisonment, and a daily apprehension of death, the Emperour Achmat falling grievously sick in November, as you have heard, his Baffaes and other Counsellors about him (seeing the danger he was in) perswaded him to take some good course for the succession of his Empire. He had Children by the Sultana, but they too young as they were not capable to govern the Empire. Moreover, this Sultana was dead, and the Children left Friends, and none to speak for them. But on the other side, the Sultana Flatra, Mother to the Emperour Mustapha, was yet living, who thought, that if the Baffaes should 1617 should undertake to govern the State during the minority of the Emperor's Children, her Honour would be much eclipsed: wherefore she favoured Mustapha, and persuaded the dying Emperor to make him his Successor. On the fifteenth of November, Achmet, seeing his End grow near, he called for his Brother, and told him, That feeling Death approached, he desired to provide for the Preservation of the Empire, and therefore had made choice of him to succeed him, intreating him to take the Government upon him presently after his death. Mustapha was much amazed at his Speech, and answered him with Words full of Fear and Humility. That he might not accept of the Honour which he did him, seeing that the Empire did rightly belong unto his eldest Son. Achmet disabled his Son for to great a Government, both for his Age and Capacity; being necessary for the maintenance of so great a Monarchy, that he (who was of ripe years and deep judgment) should take upon him the managing thereof, recommending the Children he had by the Sultana, unto him; intreating him to use them in the same manner that he had used him; leaving the other Children which he had by Concubines, being his Slaves, to his Discretion. Soon after these Words, Achmet died, and Mustapha was generally acknowledged for Successor to the Turkish Empire; who at the first was amazed, as he thought he had been in a Dream, to see himself advanced to so great a Power and Sovereignty, from a slight Prison, and a daily apprehension of Death. At his first coming to the Empire, he caused the Prerogative Ambassador to be set at liberty, whom his Brother Achmet had caused to be restrained, contrary to the publick Faith; for that News came unto the Court of some Combustions raised by the Perlians. After which he sent speedily to the Bassa of Buda in Hungary, commanding him to entertain the Treaty of Peace, made by his Predecessor with the Emperor, inviolably. Yet notwithstanding he carried himself, during the small time of his Reign, intently and cruelly; for, violating the Laws of Nations, he had ill intreated the Baron of Mole or Sancy, Ambassador to the most Christian King, setting Guards upon him as a Prisoner, having caused his People to be put in Prison, and tortured after their manner. The reason of this Indignity which Mustapha did unto the French Ambassador, and to his People, grew upon an occasion which will require an ample Discourse, for the better understanding of that which hath gone before. After the Overthrow and taking of the Princes of Moldavia, Prince Coresky, as you have heard, was brought by Sleider Bassa to Constantinople, whereat the Grand Seigneur was wonderfully well pleased, for that he was held (even by his Enemies) for one of the most valiant and redoubted Princes of Christendoms; wherefore he was sent away Prisoner, and confined to the Towers of the black Sea, the which are distant five miles from Constantinople; a place appointed for the guard of Prisoners of great Quality and Importance, such as he was. He was shut up with a French Captain called Rigant, in a little Chamber which was on the top of one of those Towers, in which Chamber there was a Window capable for a Man to pass through, and yet it had no bars, for that the height of the place freed it from all suspicion. This Prince was much solicited by the Turk to become a Renegade, as the Princes Alexander and Bogdan, his Brothers-in-law, had done; but he resisted it with a generous Resolution, resolving rather to die in that tedious Captivity, than to commit to base an Act against God and his Conscience: The being being made known unto the King of Polonia, it moved him to compassion, and made him write to the French Ambassador, and to intreat him to be a means that this Prince might be put to Ransom, and freed from Captivity, at what price soever; the which the Ambassador durst not undertake, although he desired it much, for that he had no Charge from the King his Master. The Emperor's Ambassador did what possibly he could, knowing how much the Liberty of this Prince might be available to Christendome: for which Considerations, the Turk would not yield in any sort to fulfil him to be released; so as the Friends of this Captive Prince were out of hope ever to see him at liberty. But most commonly in such Extremities the Almighty works by the secret Instruments of his divine Providence, and gives assistance unto them that fear him, when all humane help and hope fails, as you may understand in the sequel of this History: whence grew the Ambassador's Affront which he received.

About the same time, there had been a Lady taken out of Podolia, with a fair young Daughter of hers and a Maid-Servant, by the Tartars, who sold them unto a Turk, and he brought them unto Constantinople to make his Profit. This Lady, who was a Christian, hearing nothing from her Husband for the space of nine months, went, accompanied with her Daughter, to the French Ambassador's House, which was at Pera, to crave his Aid and Assistance; where the Secretary (who was called Martine) moved with Compassion and Love, promised unto them all Service, and afterwards assured the Mother, That if he would promise he should marry her Daughter, he would endeavour to redeem them from Captivity: whereunto the Ladies yielded, and they passed their Promise in Writing to the Secretary, whereupon he payed two thousand and five hundred Crowns for their Ransom, and sent them home into their Country. Being returned, the Lady made her Husband and the rest of her Friends acquainted how they had been freed from Captivity, and of the Contract of Marriage which was past between her Daughter and the French Ambassador's Secretary; but the Father did altogether dislike of this Marriage, for that Martine, he said, was no Gentleman, and had not an Estate to entertain his Daughter according to her Quality. The Mother advertised Martine soon after of the Father's Refusal, protesting unto him, That she alone was the hinderance; and as for the Money which he had disbursed for their Ransom, they would send it unto him, if he pleased, to Constantinople, with Interest. Martine was much discontented, and divers Letters and Expostulations past betwixt them, but he could not obtain the Execution of his desire; till at length, whereupon he grew full of Grief and Melancholy, and thereupon went to visit Prince Coresky who was in the Black Tower, to make his Complaint unto him, and to take his Advice what course were best for him to follow. He made his Excuse that he had been sent by his Master to carry the Prince some Money, as he had done at other times; who making the Prince acquainted with his Discontent (for that he knew these Podolians, and had formerly allowed of the Suit which he had made to this Virgin) he comforted him, saying, That if he might by any means get out of Prison, he would willingly supply the Defects which they objected against him, and would maintain him against all all that should oppose themselves against his accomplishing of his Desires. This made Martine study by what means he might free the Prince, to the end he might bind him to favour him when he was at liberty, and Love, which is many times the Author of many goodly Inventions, suggested one unto him which was very subtle and difficult to execute; which was, to send unto Prince Coresky a bottom of Packthread in a little Pye, which he sent him with ostentation, advertising him by a Letter, that upon a certain night conduced betwixt them, he should put down the Packthread at his Chamber-Window, whereunto a Ladder of Cords should be tied, by the which he might descend from the Tower: the which was afterwards punctually effected, not by Martine himself, but by a Greek Priest, who lived in Constantinople, to whom he had imparted his Enterprize, and had engaged him upon hope of great reward from the Prince. In the mean time, Martine, doubting that he should be suspected to practise this Escape, resolved to be gone, and took leave of the Ambassador, whom he gave to understand, that he had some special urgent Affairs which did press his speedy Return into France; and therefore he left the Execution of his Design to the Greek Priest, who failed not at the time appointed to do as the Secretary had directed him. The Prince having drawn up this Ladder of Ropes with the help of his Packthread, and being come to the foot of the Tower, with his Chamber-Fellow, he found the Greek Priest attending for them, who told him, that he had charge from Martine to conduct them to a certain Cave, which was in a great Rock a League from thence, where they must remain all the days, and what in the Evening he would not fail come unto them, to bring them Habits like unto his own, that being so disguised, he might conduct them to his Lodging in Constantinople, and there conceal them as long as they should think fit. This Device pleased them well, and so they went all three unto the said Cave, whereas the two Cameradoes hid themselves, and the Priest returned to his House.

Prince Coresky escapes out of Prison.

At the break of day, it being the three and twentieth of November 1617, some of the Guards entering the Prisoners Chamber, saw that they were escaped, and found the Ladder of Ropes which they had used tied to the Window; whereat they were much amazed, knowing well that they should smart for it: notwithstanding, he who had charge of the Prisoners, sent speedily to Constantinople, to give notice of their Escapes. As soon as this was known, they sent Posts speedily to all parts, to make inquiry of these Fugitives, especially at the ports and passages, giving them special charge to observe all men that passed, if there were not one who had the little finger of his right hand shrunk up, as Prince Coresky had by a Wound which he had received. Within few days after, the Turk fell upon the Servants of the Baron of Sancy or Mole, Ambassador for the French, torturing two of them after their manner, which is to lay the Party upon a Table on his Belly, and to give him three or four hundred blows with a staff upon the soles of their Feet, the calves of their Legs, and their Buttocks, yet could they not make them say any thing that might charge the Master, as the Turkish Tormentors did hope. Not content herewith, they did as much to a poor Turk, who was a Weaver by his Trade, and dwelt near unto the 1618 Ambassador, thinking to force him by this cruel torture to depose falsely, that he had seen the Secretary Martine going and coming to his Master's Lodging, untill the time of the Prisoner's Escape: but God would not suffer the Weaver to depose any thing but the Truth, notwithstanding all the miserable and cruel Torments which he had suffered. The which is worthy the Observation, for that the Turks do generally hate Christians mortally, and do greatly rejoice at their Disasters. As for the Prisoners of the Towers, some of them were employed, and some were sold, or beaten to pieces in great Mortars of Iron, wherein they do usually pound their Rice to reduce it to Meal.

Three days after, the Chiaus Bassa had charge to seize upon the Person of the French Ambassador, the which he performed very severely and uncivilly, without any respect unto his quality. Having taken him, the said Chiaus led him unto the Viceroy's House, where, having been examined upon many Circumstances touching the Escape of Prince Coresky, he left him as a Prisoner in the hands of the said Chiaus, where he continued for the space of three days; during the which time the said Ambassador desiring to write to some of his Friends, and also to speak with the Mufti, which is the Turks High-priest, to acquaint him with his just grievances, he could not obtain leave, nor give thanks unto his Countrymen, nor his Joy returning two thousand Coozens unto his Majesty: True it is, that this Present made the Chiaus tell the Ambassador, that if he would obtain any favour from the Mufti, he must procure it by Money; according to which Advice, he gave three or four thousand Crowns, whereupon the Mufti became tractable, according to the Grand Seigneur Mustapha with the Ambassador's just Complaints, and of what Importance his Detention was, seeing there was nothing found to charge him, that he had favoured the Escape of Prince Coresky, as it was suspected; and that his Secretary, who had practised it for his own private profit, had left his Master above ten or twelve days before the said Escape, with an intent, as he said, to return into France. Finally, That all the World would tax him to have violated the Law of Nations, and that no Christian Prince, nor other, would heretofore put any confidence in him; and it was to be feared, that they would all join together, and make War against him; and in truth the Ambassadors, both the King of England's and the Low Countries, were much discontented at this unworthy usage of the French, protesting openly, That if he were not speedily set at liberty, they would retire themselves into their Countries. All which Considerations, represented by the Mufti, moved the Grand Seigneur to consent, that he should be set at liberty, and to be sent back to his House without any farther Displeasure. But all this could not free his Household Servants from their Imprisonment, but he was forced to pay two or three and twenty thousand Crowns for their Redemptions, for else they should have been so tormented, as their Lives had been in danger; for so they were threatened. Soon after, the Grand Viceroy hearing of the tyrannous Government of Sultan Mustapha, returned from Perlia with his whole Army towards Constantinople, where he forced him to leave the Empire, and to retire to his Cell, having reigned but two months and some odd days.

But to return to Prince Correkte, whom we left with Captain Rigout in the Lodging of the Greek Priest at Constantinople, whereas they lay hidden for the space of two Months, untill that their good Host got leave from the Patriarch of Alexandria, as well for himself, as for two others (who he said were of his Society) to go and confine themselves in the Desarts of the Archipelagus, with many Hermits which lived there after the manner of the ancient Anchorites. Having gotten this leave and passport, they embarked, being disguised like Priests, and arrived at Eschus, where they found an English Ship ready to set sail for Messina in Cicily, from whence he went by Land to Naples, where he made himself known to the King of Poland's Ambassador, who was wonderful glad of his Liberty, leading him to the Duke of Osuna, then Viceroy of Naples, who furnished him with all things necessary, and a good Convey to go to Rome, where the Pope received singular content to see him, and to hear of his strange Adventures. From thence he past to Vicenna, where the Emperour entertained him according to his merits: after which, he retired to his own house, full of Honour, gotten by his Valour and Constancy in his Afflictions. Our Ambassador that was lately in Constantinople saith, he escaped by the black Sea, and so into Polonia.

The French King sends to Constantinople.

Prince Osman being sit at Liberty by the Grand Visier, he caused him to be proclaimed Sultan, and seated in the Imperial Throne of the Othomans, with the general Applause of all the Baffaers and Army. The French Ambassador being by the same means freed from his Guard, advertised the King his Master, how barbarously he had been entreated by Muslapha, entreating his Majesty to revoke him from that charge. Whereupon the King sent two Gentlemen to Constantinople to the new Emperour Osman, to demand reparation of the Indignity done unto his Ambassador and Secretary; and to let him understand, that he could not send any other Ambassador to his Court to condole the Death of Sultan Achmat his Father, nor congratulate his coming to the East, until that he had received satisfaction from him befitting his Dignity, and the wrongs he had received in his Ambassador. The Grand Visier and the Muphy hearing this Embassy, and considering of the Actions which had passed, advised the Emperour Osman to send an Ambassador to the most Christian King, to confirm their League, and to testify both by Word and Letters how much he was displeased for his Discontent.

The Turk

Ambassador into France.

The Grand Seigneur, by the Advice of his Visier and others, sent Uri Chiaus into France, to confirm the Articles of Peace betwixt the French and the Turks. At his first Audience he presented a Letter unto his Majesty with this Subscription.

To the most glorious and puissant Prince of the belief of Jesus, Arbitrator of all the Differences which happen among the Christian Nations, and of all the most noble, and the most ancient, the Emperour of France, to whom we will the end of his Days to be happy, and his Desires accomplished.

His Letter to the French
King.

Know, that I send unto you the Capitulations and Treaties of Peace which are betwixt our Majesties; giving you to understand, that there is not any thing firm or stable in this World, neither King nor Beggar, although they live long; that which pleaseth God cannot fail. If all Mens desires should succeed, without doubt all men would go to Heaven. Man whatsoever he doth, or in what Dignity soever he be, shall not remain in this frail Life; wise men know it, and it is apparent to the learned. By that which we have said, we desire to let you know, that he who was in Health, hath encountered Death, and is gone to a goodlier Place, to Paradise, my Father Sultan Achmat Chan; the God which hath no resemblance, have mercy on him. No man shall remain in this lying World: And in Paradise are the Approaches to the Almighty God, where there is no Death. Finally he is gone.

Since the beginning of the Othomans, until this present, the Empire of my Fathers and their Countries from Father and Son, from Hand to Hand, and from Father to Son, the Inheritance coming to unto us; Our Uncle Sultan Muslapha Chan, for that he was older than our self, was preferred before us to the Throne of the Othomans, and was some days in peaceable possession of the Empire, yielding Justice equally to all men both great and small. But as he was shut up many years in secret Places, praying unto God continually; so of himself he hath relinquished the Dignity of the Emperour, and contemned it. The Empire then belonging to those of our high Lineage, and for that by right it should come unto me, the Almighty God by his infinite Bounty and Mercy hath restored it into my Hands, my Visiers, Baffies, Lieutenants, the Musli, and other great Personages, and they that are in any respect with me; and finally, all my Subjects and Vassals, by a general consent have acknowledged me for Emperour, in the happy year 1027, about the first day of the Moon of January, in a good hour. Wherefore I am seated in the great Throne of the Othomans, like unto that of Solomon, a powerful and able Emperour, and in all our Countries and Cities; All the Muslimans being assembled together in their Churches to preach, the greatness of my Name hath been proclaimed, and through all the Limits of mine Empire they have graven it in their Stamps, to coin pieces of Gold and Silver. Finally, wheresoever there are any Muslimans, and in what Places there are Men, my Name shines like Gold. Hereafter Justice nor Impiety shall have no Place, but Justice shall be done equally. Now we are in Joy, and for that our natural Disposition is good, and the ancient Friendship betwixt us is perfect, I therefore thought good to advertise you of all that hath passed here, and to send you our Letters of Imperial Alliance by Ureiu Chiaus, who is my antient Servant, having had the managing of my Treasury, whereof he hath given me good account, being arrived at your Court, carrying my said Letter, he deserves to be received with Honour; insuring and protesting again unto you, to observe in all points the full Capitulation made betwixt my Predecessors and your Great Grandfathers, and for our part, you may be assured, that the Faith promised shall be maintained as it hath been heretofore by our Predecessors. And from the day I entered into my Throne, I have made my full known to all my Viceroyes, and other Officers which do my Justice, and generally to all those of my Obedience; intreating you to give the like Commitment to your Governours of Provinces, and other Officers of Justice, as in like manner to all your Subjects. And as your Grandfathers have taken the Faith of our High Family, so it may please you to continue with me, and we desire that on both sides it may be good and firm. Know then that for my part it shall be observed, so as of your side, there be nothing done contrary to the promised Faith.

And if before we came unto the Imperial Throne, your Ambassadors, which did your Affairs, received accepted any dislike, and hath not received the Honour and Friendship accustomed, in my time he shall be the more honoured and respected, as the chiefest Ambassadors have been: I have commanded, that he shall be greatly favoured, and our Respect shall be unto him as Queens, that is to say, Gold, and doubt nothing of it: for I do certify you.

The French King having received by this Action a full satisfaction for the Indignity done unto his Ambassadors, soon after he called the Baron of Wids, or Sancy, home into France, sending the Earl of Sizi to succeed him as Ambassador at Constantinople.

The War continuing still betwixt the Turks and the Persians, the Grand Visier was sent to invade Perfia with a great Army; where, after many Exploits of War, News came to Constantinople, That the Visier had gotten a great advantage upon the Sophy of Perfia in a Battle which had been fought, wherein there had been a hundred thousand men slain. And although the Turks lost the greatest number, yet they remained Masters of the Field, and spoiled the Persians Camp, who was retired or fled: for that the manner of the Sophy is, to fight with the Turks in retiring or giving way a little; and with this manner of fighting they have always made Head against the Turks. After this Overthrow, the Visier advanced with his Army, and entered far into Perfia, which made many doubt that his Return would prove difficult; yet soon after there came Letters to Constantinople, importing, That the Turks being in Perfia in great distress for Victuals, the Sophy had sent an Ambassador to the Visier to demand Peace, promising hereafter to satisfy the Tributes of Silk which he ought yearly unto the Turk; and that the Visier (in regard of the necessity of his Army) had accepted his Offer, and granted him Peace, the which Sultan Osmán did afterwards ratify. After the conclusion whereof, the Sophy sent many Camels laden with Victuals unto the Turks Army, which was in great distress and want.

During the Turks War in Perfia, upon the Anniversary day of Sultan Achmat, there appeared in the Night a Comet over the City of Constantinople, in form like unto a crooked Sword, or Turks Scimitar; and it was so great as it extended from the Meridian near unto our Zenith, unto the Horizon: the point began to shew it self an hour after midnight, and then appeared little and somewhat whitish, and gave but a glimpse; after an hour it was more apparent, and of a deeper colour, and the more it did rise, the redder it was, and like unto blood; but at the break of day it vanished by little and little in the light; and it was so big when the point approached near unto the Zenith, as the light was hidden under the Horizon: The Mathematicians did observe, that it followed the motions of the Heavens; it did always rise in one place, and the bending of the said Sword was toward Crates, more Southerly than it. It did appear directly in the East a quarter towards the South, the point coming directly towards Constantinople, and the Blade extending it self to the said East a quarter to the South, which is justly the part where Perfia is situated. The Edge looked directly towards Constantinople, and which made men discourse diversely, and many were amazed, fearing that it did signify the loss and defeat of their Army in Perfia, whose Return they feared much.

Orti or Hussein Chiaus, having finished his Embassy in France, came into England with the like Charge, and had Audience from his Majesty at White-hall, Sir Thomas Glover being Interpreter; from whom I received a true discourse of his whole Speech, as followeth.

THAT most true, incomprehensible, and most high God, increase and multiply your Majesty's Years in all Happiness and Felicity: Amen, oh thou Lord of the World.

The most invincible, most mighty, and most happy Sultan Ali Osman, of the Othoman Empire Monarch, sendeth unto your excellent Majesty a hundred thousand Salutations and Greetings, evermore praying the most high God for your Majesty's Happiness, sendeth unto your Highness, with all possible Honour and Renown, this his Imperial and most noble Letter, and wisheth hope, that the sacred bond of Peace, which hath been hitherto inviolably on your Majesty's parts kept and observed, your Majesty will be well pleased fill on your part, with daily increase more and more of Friendship, earnestly to continue therein. And his Imperial Majesty, on his behalf, is also resolved in like manner evermore punctually to keep and observe the same.

Also the most mighty Emperor's Tutor, and his chief Vicer Basil, hath addressed to the dust of your noble Feet, this his most honourable Letter, with a thousand Commendations, praying everlastingly that mighty God for your Majesty's long Life and Happiness.

Also your Majesties Ambassador at Constantinople, your Slave Paul Pinder, bowing his Forehead to the dust of your Majesty's Feet, and most humbly kissing your Highness blessed Feet, hath directed unto your Majesty this his submissive Letter.

This that now followeth is the said Ambassador's Speech to his Majesty at the taking of his Leave at White-hall.

MOST happy Emperor, As I have with mine own Hands, bowing my self to the dust of your Princely Feet, apprehended unto your excellent Majesty the most mighty and high Sultan Osmán, my Lord and Master, his Imperial Letter; so likewise, I most humbly beseech your Majesty, that you will be pleased, in conformity thereof, to vouchsafe your princely Answer by your noble Letter, and to deliver the same into the hands of me your Slave; and be ever Partaker of all Blessings and Happinings.

A Copy of the Letter of Sultan Osmán, the Othoman Emperor, written to the King's Majesty, and presented by Hussein Chiaus.

ALTHOUGH in this transitory World, if the King or the Beggar should enjoy the longest term of Life that might be, and obtain all that his heart could wish, yet it is most certain, that in the end he must depart, and be transported to the World Eternal; and it is well known unto the wise, that it is impossible for man to abide for ever in this World. The occasion of this

Prologue is, that the immortal, omnipotent, and only God, hath, by his divine Will and Pleasure, called unto himself our Father, of blessed Memory, Sultan Achmat Chan, who in life was happy, and in death laudable, and departing out of this momentary World to be nearer the merciful Creator, being changed into perfect Glory and eternal Bliss, hath his habitation on high, and his rest in Paradyse. This Paternal Empire and Monarchical Kingdom, hath almost until this present blessed time been always hereditary, from Grandfather to Father, from Father to Son, and so curiously on that manner: but, having regard unto the Age and Years of our great and noble Uncle Sultan Muflapha, he was preferred and honoured to sit on the Othoman Throne, and being settled for some time, took care for the Affairs of the Empire, and for all that might concern the People both in general and particular. But he, having been many years reposed in Solitariness, and given up to Devotion and Divine Obedience, being as it were separated with the cares of the Empire, of his own accord withdrew himself from the Government, for that the Diadem and Scepter of the Empire of the seven Climates, was the true Right and Inheritance of our most excellent Majesty, of the which (with the meeting and consent of all the Vysiers, and other Deputies of State, of the Primate of the Musfulman Law, and of the other honourable Doctors, of the Soldiers, and of all Subjects both publick and private) the Almighty God hath made us his high Present and worthy Gift unto us.

And in the happy day in the beginning of the Moon Rebei the-eleventh of this present Year 1027, an expected time, and in an acceptable hour, was our blessed and happy fitting excellency upon the most fortunate Othoman Throne, the Seat and Wisdom of Solomon. In the Pulpits of all the Mosques, the Congregations of the faithful, and Devotion of the Musfulmen, throughout all our Dominions, is read to our Imperial Name the * Hudud: And in the Mosques (where innumerable Sums of money are raised, as well upon the Silver as the Gold) our happy Name and Stamp is signed. And our most powerful Commandments are obeyed in all the Parts and Dominions of the World: and the brightness of the Light of the Sun of Justice and Equity, hath caused the darkness of Injuries and Molestations to vanish away.

Now seeing it hath been an ancient Custom of our famous Predecessors to give notice of the same unto such

Princes as in sincere Friendship, and do continue it with the House of great Majesty and our Imperial Court; We also have written this our princely Letters, and appointed for their Rearr the choice among his Equals Hussein Chiaus (whose Power is great) one of the honoured and respected Servants of our magnificent Port, the refuge of the World, to the end that such News might cause great joy of our most honourable Assumption. And we do hope, that when they shall come to your hands (in conformity of the well grounded friendship upon the sure League, Articles, and Writings which hath been established of old with our most Royal Race and permanent Empire) you will manifestly rejoice Joy and Gladness, and certify as much to the Rulers and Governors of the Dominions and Countries under you, that they may know, that the Articles of Peace and League, and the points of the Oath which are firm and to be desired on both parts, from the time of our Grandfather and Predecessor of Royal Stock, now in Paradyse (whose Souls God voucheth) undoubtedly, during the time of our Reag, shall be observed with all respect. And let there not be the least imagination of any want of due observance of the signs of Friendship on our part, or by any manner of means on your part, for the violating the Foundation of the Peace and League.

The Copy of a Letter written by Halil Bası, chief Vicer, and General in the Expedition against the Persian, at his Return from the Wars to the City of Seut, in April 1618, unto Sir Paul Pinder, Knight, then Ambassador for the King's Majesty at Constantinople.

The Humble Visier Halil Bası,

TO the courteous Lord of the Nation of the Messiah, both great and honourable among the people of Jesus, and the true Determiner of Christian Affairs, our good Friend Paul Pinder, the English Ambassador, whose latter days be with all felicity: To whose noble presence (after our many kind Salutations, tending to all good Affection and magnification of Joy, worthy and becoming our Friendship) our loving Advice is this, That if you desire to hear of our Estate and Being, you shall understand, that after we departed from the happy Port with the Army for the Wars of Asia, we arrived and wintered in Meleopotamia, and removing thence in the Spring with all the Musfulman Host (always victorious) we went to Van, from whence place, when we came to Tauris, the Musfulman Army went on always sacking and destroying all those Places and Towns of the Persians which we met nigh by the way in those parts, where were burnt, pillaged, and ruined, some thousands of Villages, and tormenting all those people that came to hand. And when we were come near to Tauris, the General of the Persian Forces (of perverse Religion) called Caroghhan Han (the accused) retired himself into the said Tauris, where, bearing up his Drums in every quarter, he made a show that he had a will to fight: so we sent a little before us some Tatars and others of our army to threaten some Tatars and others of the Enemy, who meeting with ten or eight hundred Persians of note, put them to the Sword, very few escaping, and that with very great difficulty and hazard: by which the said General finding himself unable to resist the power and fury of the Musfulman Host, or to stay any longer in the said place, the very same day that we arrived there, the said General, having spoiled all the City, fled away, so we took the place, razed it, and burned all the Buildings, Towers, Gardens, and whatsoever else we found in it. And thus the great City Tauris, by Divine Favour and Grace, became ours. Then forthwith we sent after the Enemy, the Tatars with some Beglerbegs, who overtaking them gave them Battle: and albeit some of ours did fall, yet they which fell on the Enemies side were innumerable. And so going forward 1618 towards Erdvill (their obscure Residence) about ten days Journey of the Country, we went burning and spoiling it, and killing all the Persians that we met, that indeed there was so much glory and honour you, as that all the ancient men of the Country do affirm, there was never seen like it, inasmuch, that from the Confines of Erdvill, twenty days Journey of the Country was on that manner by us destroyed. Thus afterward the King called to empty the said place of Erdvill, and fled into a place called Hunchal, and caused his army to go to the top of a high Mountain, from whence, having sent three or four times men of quality into us, seeking and intreating for peace, with promise to give yearly to our Emperor an hundred Sows of Silk, and all such places as are upon the Confines eaten in the time of Sultan Solyman, except Der Ne and Der Turk, whereupon we were contented with the peace, and his Ambassador so upon the way coming toward us, And so we returning the same way again (always spoiling) we came to Erzurum. And this our present Letter is written unto you for the Relief and Preservation of your Friendship: and even as your Army hath ever been hitherto future and firm, so likewise, by the Grace of God, all the things shall be able to resist the Turk; all which tended to the prejudice and ruin of the House of Austria. The Prince of Transylvania having taken divers Towns in Hungary, belonging to the Emperor as King of Hungary, and entered Austria in hostile manner in favour of the Bohemians; knowing that he had thereby much incensed the Emperor, and the whole House of Austria, and that if he should prevail over the Bohemians, the whole burthen of the War would lie upon him, he therefore in the end of this year sent an Ambassador with Presents to Constantinople, to crave assurance of the Grand Seignior's Aid and Support (upon whose Favour he had always depended.) In case the Emperor should invade Transylvania where, being countenanced by many of the chief Bishops, he had assurance of Sultan Osman's Support and Protection, the which he confirmed by a solemn Oath under his hand, as followeth.

The Great Turk's Oath to Bethlem Gabor, Prince of Transylvania.

Sultan Osman,

By the Grace of God unconquerable Turkish Emperor, I swear, I swear by the Highest, Almighty, and Almighty Gods Eldovils, by this Kingdom, by the substance of the Heavens, the Sun, the Moon, the Stars, by the Earth, and by all under the Earth, by the Brains and all the hairy Scalp of my Mother, by my Head, and all the strength of my Soul and Body, by the holy great Mahomet, and by my Circumcision, That I, as thy Brother and Son Bethlem Gabor, succeeding King of Hungary, in no manner of way, in thy great and weighty Affairs, will not be to the Overthrow of my Kingdom, to be brought to nothing, until there shall be no more left but my self, or four or five Turks at the most, yet will I be still ob-doubted nor of the Power of those Kings, and that the Electors would send Supplies unto the Emperor; yet he hoped that before they came, all should be ended, and their Dinners should be provided.

Soon after the Prince of Transylvania came to Presburg with his Army a Town of note in Hungary, whereas their Kings are usually crowned. The News thereof coming to Vienna, they sent 4000 Souldiers with three pieces of Ordnance down the River of Danube, who entered the Suburbs on the 13th of October, the Night was very stormy and rainy, and the Transilvians taking this Opportunity, charged them, and flew the greatest part, their Commander flying away with some few. The Suburbs being taken, Bethlem Gabor sent to the Palatine, to know whether he would yield the Town and Castle without force, giving him some time to resolve; who, after Consultation with some Noble-men, they relented to yield, and so the Town was delivered into his hands. After which he sent part of his Army under good Commanders into Austria, to the Gates of Vienna, where they committed great spoil, the particular relation whereof I leave to the History of the Emperor's Lives, to which it doth properly belong.

In November, Bethlem Gabor, Prince of Transylvania, and the Estates of Hungary, sent Ambassadors to Prague, where they propounded divers Articles unto the Countess, and amongst others, That they should joyntly send Ambassadors to the Grand Seignior, and that the Prince of Transylvania should negotiate the Business. And for that the Kingdom of Hungary was much exasperated, whatsoever be taken in Stiria, Carinthia, and Carizola, should be united unto it, to the end it might be the more able to resist the Turk; all which tended to the prejudice and ruin of the House of Austria. The Prince of Transylvania having taken divers Towns in Hungary, belonging to the Emperor as King of Hungary, and entered Austria in hostile manner in favour of the Bohemians; knowing that he had thereby much incensed the Emperor, and the whole House of Austria, and that if he should prevail over the Bohemians, the whole burthen of the War would lie upon him, he therefore in the end of this year sent an Ambassador with Presents to Constantinople, to crave assurance of the Grand Seignior's Aid and Support (upon whose Favour he had always depended.) In case the Emperor should invade Transylvania where, being countenanced by many of the chief Bishops, he had assurance of Sultan Osman's Support and Protection, the which he confirmed by a solemn Oath under his hand, as followeth.

get to defend thee, and all those that do any ways appear unto thee. And if thou shalt have need of me, I will be always ready to go with thee. And in case if any person shall in any wise be frustrated, then let my people fall upon my Head and destroy me and Gods Justice fall upon my Head and destroy me and my Posterity, and wipe away whatsoever belongeth unto me; and gather it together into a Rock of Stone, or substance of Earth, and that the Earth may cleave in sunder, and swallow me up Body and Soul.

Dated at Constantinople the fifth of January, 1619.

Bethlem Gabor, being assured by this Oath of Protection made by the Grand Seignior, in the beginning of the year 1620, he called an Assembly of the Estates of Hungary at Presburg, whither Ambassadors were sent from the King of Bohemia, and the States of that Country, with the incorporated Provinces, where a perpetual League was concluded betwixt them, and afterwards concluded at Prague; where, among other Articles, it was concluded, that forasmuch as Necessity did chiefly require, that a Peace should be concluded and inviolably kept with the Turk, therefore a new Ambassie should be sent to the Grand Seignior from all the confederate Kingdoms and Provinces; and that Bethlem Gabor should take upon him the chief care of that business; but yet in such sort, as the Bohemians and incorporated Provinces should send their Ambassadors with the Hungarians, and bear their shares of all that should be disbursed; as well for the Pretensions, as for the Ambassadors Charges.

In June following, Bethlem Gabor went to an Assembly of the Estates of Hungary at Neuburg, where he propounded divers heads unto the States: That he desired nothing more than to restore the Kingdom of Hungary, so miserably afflicted to Liberty; and that they might enjoy their Religion and Privileges: That he had spared no cost for the lawful defence of the Country; and for a Testimony that he desired Peace, he had refused the Crown which the Estates offered him at Presburg: That the ground of Peace was to maintain the League which they had begun with the Bohemians: That he had always desired Peace with the help of other Princes, so as it were sincere and without Fraud or Deceit, for the obtaining whereof he had assisted his Confederates mutually assisted: That he knew for certain the Emperor desired not Peace, but War, having suffered the Cossaks to enter into Hungary; and to spoil many Places with Fire and Sword; and denied passage for the Ambassadors of Bohemia and Austria; for this cause they were now to treat of Peace, but of War, and to consider how it might be begun and maintained; for the keeping of Money, which is the sinews of War; for the furnishing of their Forts upon the Frontiers, and for the speedy sending of Ambassadors to the Turkish Emperor, lest being engaged in an intestine War, there might be some attempts made upon the bordering Forts. Having delivered his Mind unto the Estates, there came divers Ambassadors thither from Bohemia, Austria, Silesia, and Lusitania, Venice, Poland, and Turkey: The Venetian Ambassador was content their Commonwealth should enter into the League, and the Turk made offer to conclude a perpetual League with them.

On the five and twentieth day of August, Bethlem Gabor, Prince of Transylvania, was proclaimed King of Hungary by the Palatine, at the instance of the Turkish Ambassador, and with the consent and applause of most part of the Estates of the Country: After which, he levied a great Army of thirty (some say fifty) thousand Horse and Foot, and made many Ensigns with divers Emblems and Devices; which being known, the Protestants of Vienna, with the Content of the Emperor, wrote unto him, humbly entreating him to spare the City and Country, for their innocent Wives and Childrens sakes; but in the mean time all the Citizens were commanded to make Provision of Victuals for six Months.

There came News to Constantinople of a strange Apparition or Vision, whereas Mahomet their great Prophet was buried, to visit whose Tomb the Turks use to go in Pilgrimage, they must first go to Mecha, which is some few days Journey off, and there they take a Ticket from the Grand Seigniors Berberbeg, else they are not allowed to go to Medina. This Vision continued three Weekstogether, which terrified the whole Country, for that no Man could discover the truth thereof. About the twentieth of September, there fell so great a Tempest, and so fearful a Thunder about Midnight, as the Heavens were darkened, and those that were awake, almost distracted; but the Vapours being dispersed, and the Element clear, the People might read in Arabian Characters these words in the Firmament. O why wilt you believe in Lies! Between two and three in the Morning, there was seen a Woman in white, comming about with the Sun, having a cheerful Countenance, and holding in her Hand a Book; coming from the North-west, opposite against her were Armies of Turks, Persians, Arabians, and other Mahometans, ranged in order of Battel, and ready to charge her; but she kept her standing, and only opened the Book, at the sight whereof their Armies fled, and presently all the Lamps about Mahomet's Tomb went out; for as soon as ever the Vision vanished (which was commonly an hour before Sun rising) a murmuring Wind was heard, whereunto they imputed the extinguishing of the Lamps. The ancient Pilgrims of Mahomet's Race, who after they have visited this Place, never use to cut their Hair, were much amazed, for that they could not conceive the meaning of this Vision; only one of the Devotes (which is a strict religious order amongst the Turks, like unto the Capuchins among the Papists, and live in contemplation) stepped up very boldly, and made Speech unto the Company, which incensed them much against him, so as this poor Priest for his plain dealing lost his Life, as you shall hear.

The sum of his Speech was this: "That the World had never but three true Religions, every one of which had a Prophet; first, God chose the Jews, and did Wonders for them in Egypt, and brought them forth by their Prophet Moses, who prescribed them a Law; wherein he would have maintained them, if they had not been obstinate and rebellious, and fallen to Idolatry; whereupon he gave them over, and scattered them upon the face of the Earth. Then presently after he raised a new Prophet, who taught the Christian Religion. This good man the Jews condemned and crucified for a seducer of the People, nor moved with the Piety of his Life, his great Miracles, nor his Doctrine. Yet after his Death, the preaching of a few Fifthemen, did to move the Hearts of Men, as the greatest Monarchs of the World bowed to his very Title, and yielded to the command of his Miracles. But it seems they grew as corrupt as

The Wars growing hot in Bohemia against the Protestants, and the Emperor railing what Forces he could to suppress them, the Directors or Governors of the Countess of Austria, sent to Bethlem Gabor, Prince of Transylvania, to acquaint him with the state of their Affairs. To whom he made answer, That his Country standing even in the very jaws of the Turks, whose Councils were never quiet, but ever working like to the Waves of the vast Ocean, and always watchful to subvert all that stood in their way, he was not able to do more than to defend his own Country; all which tended to the prejudice and ruin of the House of Austria. The Prince of Transylvania having taken divers Towns in Hungary, belonging to the Emperor as King of Hungary, and entered Austria in hostile manner in favour of the Bohemians; knowing that he had thereby much incensed the Emperor, and the whole House of Austria, and that if he should prevail over the Bohemians, the whole burthen of the War would lie upon him, he therefore in the end of this year sent an Ambassador with Presents to Constantinople, to crave assurance of the Grand Seignior's Aid and Support (upon whose Favour he had always depended.) "the Jews, their Church being dismembered with the distinction of the East and West, committing idolatry again by setting up of Images, with many other idle Ceremonies, beside the corruption of their Lives, so as God was weary of them two, and not only for dividing sons among them, but forsook them, dispossessing them of their chiefest Cities, Hierusalem and Constantinople; yet God is still the Governor of the World, and provides himself of another Prophet and People, raising our great Mahomet, and giving way to our Nation, so as no doubt we shall be happy for ever, if we can serve this God aright, and take Example by the fall of others. But, alas! I tremble to speak it, we have erred in every point, and wishfully broken our first Institutions, so as God hath manifested his Wrath by many evident signs and tokens, keeping our Prophet from us, who prefigured a time to return with all happiness to his People, so as there are now forty years past by our account. Wherefore this strange and fearful Vision is a Predication of some great Troubles and Alterations. For, either the opening of this Book in the Womans hand, doth foretell our falling away from the first intent of our Law, where, at these armed Men departed, as confounded with the guilt of their own Consciences; or else it signifies some other Book in which we have not yet read, and against which no power shall prevail; so as I fear our Religion will be proved corrupt, and our Prophet an Impostor, and then this Christ whom they talk of, shall shine like the Sun, and sit up his Name everlastingly. Hitherto the Company was silent, but hearing him speak so boldly, they charged him with Blasphemy; and knowing their Law, which makes all Blasphemy capital, they presently condemned him, and having the Beglerbegs consent and Warrant, they put him to death.

The Doctor put to death for his Speech.

As their Rage against him was violent, for their Execution was extraordinary, for they neither cut off his Head nor strangled him, as they usually do to Malefactors, but they tortured him by degrees; first, stripping him first naked, they gave him an hundred blows on the soles of his Feet with a flat Cudgel, until the Blood issued forth, the poor Priest crying continually on the Woman that opened the Book. After which they took a Bulls Pizzle, and beat all his body until the Sinews crack'd, and in the end they laid him upon a Wheel, and with an Indian Sword made of sinews, they brake his Bones to pieces, the poor Man crying to the last gasp, O thou Woman with the Book, save me, and so he dyed: At which time there was a fearful Tempest. The Beglerbeg sent certain Spahies to the Port of Sidon to embark for Constantinople, to the end, they might advertise the Emperor of these Tidings.

Sultan Osman, from the first entrance into his Reign, was freed from all Cares of foreign War, or intestine Combinations, for he had that happiness, (being himself very young, and not able to Govern to potent an Estate) by the Council and Affiance of Hadli Bassa, his Grand Vizzer, he had forced the King of Persia to demand a Peace, and to pay the Tribute which had been formerly promised. His Rebels in Asia were all pacified, and the Truce with the Emperor, which had been somewhat interrupted by misinterpretation, or the practice of bad Ministers) was newly confirmed: a little before his coming to the Crown, only Moldavia had been the Theatre of War for some years, where his Father had exercised his Arms, and employed his Forces, to advance whom he pleased to be Vayvod of that Countrey, against another party that was supported by the Polesians, as you have formerly heard. Michna, Prince of Valachia, being made Vayvod of Moldavia by Achmet, and the Polesian party wholly overthrown in the Year 1616, he enjoyed it not long; but whether he dyed of a natural Death, or fell into disgrace with the Grand Signior, I do not read; yet I find, that after him there was another Vayvod or Prince of Moldavia, who is yet living, but in disgrace with the Sultan, his Name is Calpura Grastiani; and to the end you may understand, that the Turks never respect the Birth and Quality of any Man in their Advancements, I will relate what this Man was from the mouth of him that knew him very well.

This Calpura was born at Graz, (a Town of great strength belonging unto the Arch-dukes of Austria, by the which a Branch of the House is distinguished from the rest, and whereof the Emperor now reigning is the head) but being a Man of small Fortune, and little experience in his own Countrey, he went to Constantinople, and put himself in Service with Sir Thomas Glover, before that he was Ambassador for his Majesty to the Grand Signior, under whom he learned both to write and read the Turkish Tongue. After which he came with him into England, and there by his recommendation was employed to Constantinople for the redeeming of young Sir Thomas Sherley, who was then a Prisoner among the Turks. Having performed his Charge orderly, and being come to France with the young Knight, hearing that Sir Thomas Glover was sent Ambassador to the Grand Signior, he left Sir Thomas Sherley, and went to Constantinople to his old Master, where he was employed yearly to buy or exchange Christians for Turks, carrying the Christians into Italy, and so returning Turks for them. About the end of Achmet's Reign, arriving at Constantinople with a Ship full of Turks, which he had exchanged, he acquainted the Bassa Vizzer with the good Service he had done unto the Grand Signior; who, demanding of what Countrey he was, and his Breeding, asked him if he would undertake a Service which should be for his Advancement, which was to go unto the Emperor to reconcile all Difficulties concerning the Peace, wherein he carried himself so discreetly, as Commissioners were appointed, who concluded all Difficulties, as you have heard. But before his return home, the Grand Signior was dead; yet he pressed the Bassa for the performance of his Promise, desiring him, that he might be made Vayvod of Moldavia, which the Bassa effected; but the Presents he gave advanced him more than his Merits. Since he grew into fame and disgrace; so as the Grand Signior, making choice of another Vayvod, gave Charge to certain Capigies, to go into Moldavia to strangle Calpura, and that they should take four hundred Turks upon the Frontiers to assist them: But Calpura having good Spies at Constantinople, who advertised him of their Design, resolved to prevent them; wherefore, taking some Troops with him, he met them upon the way, and cut them all in pieces; then returning to Yae, he slew one thousand Turks. After which he fled into Poland with two thousand Horse; from whence they write, that he hath made divers Incursions into Moldavia, and committed great Spoils upon the Turks, being assisted by the Cossacks, and and keeps possession of the Countrey, although there be another Vayvod made by the Turk.

Sultan Osman seems to be much incensed against the Polesians, as well for this support, as for former quarrels, making it his colour for the levying of the greatest Army that hath been seen since that Seliman went unto the Siege of Agria, consisting, as it is said, of three hundred thousand Men, having drawn down all his Forces out of Asia, God knows where he will employ it, but it is much to be feared, that he will make use of this division betwixt Christian Princes, who should unite their Wills and Forces, to oppose them against the common Enemy of Christendom, who watcheth only to get an Advantage, little regarding his Word and Promise.

The Turk, having so employment for his Forces by Land, sent three score Gallies to Sea, to make some Enterprize upon the Christians. They came into the Mediterranean Sea, and having coasted the Island of Sicily, they sent twenty Gallies to land in the Kingdom of Naples, where they surprised the Town of Manfredonia, and spoiled it, carrying away fourteen or fifteen hundred Captives, and so retired again to Sea. The rest of their Fleet lay about Fellina in the Gulf, which made the Spaniards jealous that the Venetian had been acquainted with this Enterprize. And since there is News, That the Gallions and Gallions of Algiers, have taken Juifs, a small Island of four miles compass, near unto Majorca: It is a Place of great Importance, for that it hath a Haven able to contain much Shipping; for the Guard whereof the King of Spain entertains a great Garrison, and it did much annoy them of Algiers. They took the Town; but it is not yet certain whether they have taken the Castle.

This is all I could learn of the Turks Affairs since the Year one thousand six hundred and nine until this present. The Reader may observe, that since the Reign of Ottoman their first Emperor, this great Empire of the Turks is proudly built upon the four Monarchies of the world; that is to say, of the Affrican, Persian, Greek, and Roman. For they enjoy Babylon, and all Chaldeas, with the Countrey of the Medes: We have seen them in Tauris, the Capital City of Persia, Greece is subject to the yoke of their Command; Constantinople, sometimes called New Rome, by the transport of the Imperial Seat, is now made their Throne; and so many Provinces and Realms which in former times depended upon the Roman Empire, do now acknowledge their power; they are Masters of the Realms of Egypt and Cyprus, the Islands of Rhodes, Melitene, Negropont, Chio, and many others acknowledge them; the Empire of Trebizond is theirs; the Realm of Colchos, now called Mingrelia, pays them Tribute; they of Tunis and Algier in Africa obey them; Dalmatia, the Thyrans, Thracians, the Countries of Transylvania, Valachia, and Moldavia do them Homage; and we see them Command even in the chief Towns of the Realms of Hungary: But all this Power of the Ottomans had never been so great nor so fearful, but by the discord, division, and bad intelligence betwixt Christian Princes, as you may read in the Course of this History, as well in Greece, at Constantinople, as in other parts of Europe, whereas these Princes, contending one with another, have furnished matter and means to the Turk to disposess them of the chief pieces of their Monarchies. They measure the continuance of their Empire by the discord betwixt the Princes of the Belief of the Name of Isims, and they confest truly, that this Division is the only cause of their Greatness, the which hath made them believe, that among Christians there was a bad Angel, enemy to peace, which they call the strong or powerful Spirit, which, kindling the fire of Revenge and Ambition in the Hearts of great Men, draws from their Affections the good of their Belief, to entertain them in perpetual Discord; during the which, they promise unto themselves a firm and an assured Reign. So the Mufti, and the Talifmans praying on Friday in their Mosques, demand of their Prophet the Circumstance of this bad Intelligence betwixt the Christian Princes, to the end they may enjoy the Empire which they have unjustly usurped. Yet their Prophecies do not promise them a perpetual Possession; behold one in their own Tongue, which hath always made them fear the union of Christians.

A Turkish Prophecy.

That is to say:

Our Emperor shall come, he shall possess the Realm of an Infidel Prince, he shall take the Red Apple, and make it subject to his Power; if, at the seventh Year of his Command the Christians Sword doth not advance, he shall Rule unto the twelfth Year, he shall build Houses, Plant Vines, compass in Gardens with Hedges, and beget Children; but after the twelfth Year that he hath held the Red Apple, the Christians Sword shall appear and put the Turk to flight.

By the Infidel Prince, they understand a Christian Prince, (for so they call them) and the Red Apple an Imperial Town, strong fision of importance; in the which, and elsewhere, where the Turks shall build Houses, this is to say, convert Holy Temples to the Use of the Mahometan Impiry; for by this Word to build, they that have Commented upon this Prophecie understand, Ultraport of the Houses of God: Plant Vines, by these Words they signify the Extent of the Turkish Empire, and the feeding of their Colonies, as we see in Hungary and Transylvania: Compassing in Gardens, that is to say, they shall fortify the Towns which they have taken from their Enemies: Beget Children, extend the Mahometan Religion, far in the Christians Countries. But after the twelfth Year, &c. which in a certain time best known to God, his Divine Majesty opening the Eyes of his Disciples upon the Christians, will unite the Wills of their Princes, kindling their Affections with a holy zeal, and blessing their Arms, will make them victorious over the Turk, whom he will banish out of the East, and chase into Scythia from whence they came to be a scourge unto Christendom. These are my Wishes, wherein I hope all good Christians do concur.

The Beginning of the Turkish EMPIRE.

HAVING run over the Occurrences which have happened in the Turkish Empire for the space of eleven years, I must, according to Master Knolles his Method, conclude the Work with a description of the Grand Seignior's Palace, of his Government, Officers, Riches, Force, and Religion.

The Turks, (a People of Scythia) having like a violent Deluge overthrown a great part of the East, and taken divers Provinces, being expelled from Hierusalem by Gudfrey of Bouillon, and the Christians, their remainder retired to Nicaea, where they lived without any head or sovereign Commander, until that Ottoman, about the Year of our Redeemer one thousand three hundred, by Practice, made himself sole and absolute Monarch. His Son conquering divers Provinces, removed his Imperial Seat to Prusja, now called Burlia, the chief Abode of the Kings of Bythia. Amurath the Fifth (being drawn in by the Emperor of Constantinople to succour him, and allured with the Wealth of Europe) turned his Arms against him, taking divers Provinces and Towns from him, amongst others, Adrianople, which he made the Seat and residence of the Turkish Emperours, in the Year one thousand three hundred sixty three. But Mahomet the Second, having taken the City of Constantinople, and expelled the Emperor, in the Year one thousand four hundred fifty three, he made it the Royal Seat of the Ottomans, for which he had great reason, being one of the fairest and sweetest Seats of the World.

Decription of Constantinople.

Constantinople hath in Circuit, by the opinion of some Writers, fifteen or sixteen miles, and is called by the Turks themselves Stamboul, or Stambolda, the Sea beating upon it upon the North and South sides: Towards the East it is divided from Asia by a large Channel, which runneth from the one Sea to the other, and is about seven miles in length. The City is built upon the declining of a Hill, in which there are many rare singularities, which I omit, being described elsewhere. There are in this City seven little Hills, upon the which are built seven principal Mosques or Churches, by several Emperours, whereof, the fairest and most stately is that of Sultan Seliman. Upon the North side of the City standeth the Grand Seignior's Palace or Seraglio, commonly called by the Name of the Port: The which hath on the one side thereof the Sea, and on the other side of it the Haven, the other two being towards the City, being about three miles in compass, some write of four. It is walled about, and within it are many Gardens, Orchards, Meadows, and Woods. Being entered into the first Port (which hath double Gates of Iron) into a large Court, on the left hand there stands a building like unto a Turkish Mosque, which now the Grand Seignior useth for a Store-house, wherein are great store of Arms, which are for the defence of his Seraglio. And on the other side of this Court are several Gardens walled in, from which they pass to another Court with a Gate like unto the former, where are Targuets and Chimneys hanging, and many Porters attending, as at the former. After this, they pass into another large Court, which is planted with Cypress Trees, and full of Grass, where Deer feed; but round about it is a Cloister, which is in length about six hundred and fourscore Foot, and above five hundred in breadth, paved with Stone, and covered with Lead, it being supported with one hundred and forty Pillars of white and gray Marble, standing upon Bases of Copper, with Capitals of the same; upon the North side whereof stands the Divan, whereas the Viceroy Basha and the other Bashes sit in Council, and hear Causes of Importance, whereof we will speak hereafter. In this Seraglio the Grand Seignior hath many Chambers, who are richly appointed, wherein he remains; and there he hath six young Men, which attend his Person and the Service of his Chamber, whereof two wait daily, and at Night they watch when he sleeps, the one of them at his Head, the other at his Feet, with two Torches burning in their Hands. In the Morning (as Saravino writes) when the Grand Seignior arises himself, they put into one of his Pockets a thousand Aspers, and into the other Pocket twenty Ducks of Gold, the which, if he give not away that Day, is their Fee at Night, neither (as they say) doth he ever put on the same Clothes: and whensoever he goes to Hunting, or to any other Exercise, (besides the Money which he hath with him) his Cashnadar Basha, or chief Treasurer, still follows him with great store of Money to give away. The Office of these six young Men, (who are changed as it pleaseth the Grand Seignior) is difficult; for the one carries his Shoes, the second his Bow and Arrows, the third his Velt, the fourth a Vessel with Water, the fifth carries a Seat, and the sixth, called Oda Basha, is head of the Chamber.

He hath daily a great number of Persons resident in his Palace, employed in their several Charges, some in one place, some in another, under their several Commanders. But among all the great Men in his Court, these are of chiefest Eminency and Note.

First, the Capt Aga, that is to say, the mouth of the Grand Seignior, by whom the Sultan speaketh to such as have any great suit unto him, for no Ambassadors is admitted unto him, but at his first arrival, when he delivers his Letters of credit and his Presents, and when he hath any business to treat of, he repairs to the Viceroy Basha or his Aga.

The second is Cashnadar Basha, the chief Treasurer of the Household, or Superintendent of the Treasure.

The third, Chilgeri Basha, chief Cup-bearer. The fourth is Seraglio Aga, Steward or Master of the Household.

The fifth is Chiller Aga, or Saravdar Basha, Oversee of his Seraglio of Concubines, who is always an Eunuch as the rest be.

The sixth and last is Boslangi Basha, chief Gardiner, and Oversee of all his Gardens, Captain of his Jamogians, and Steerer of his Barge whensoever he goeth by Water. He hath a Protogero or Lieutenant, and many Gardiners under him, which are called Boslangi, who, when they come out of the Seraglio, become Janizaries, Solacchi, or Capigi, according to their Qualities.

The Sultan's Seraglio of Women.

These six Officers of the Sultans House above mentioned have no authority out of his Palace, yet the greatest Bashes stand in awe of them, and fear them, for that they have free access unto the Sultan, and have daily opportunity to incense him against them; for by their secret Suggestion and false Informations, many of the greatest Bashes are many times suddenly and unexpectantly cut off in the height of all their pomp and glory.

He hath many Mutes or dumb Men attending about him, whereof eight be his daily Companions and Play-fellows in the Seraglio, in whose company he takes great delight: besides many others to the number of forty, which attend upon him as Pages. They are all boys deaf and dumb, and yet by long Practice they grow so perfect, as they will understand any thing that shall be acted upon them by Signs and Gestures; and will themselves by the gesture of their Eyes, Bodies, Hands, and Feet, deliver matters of great difficulty, to the great admiration of strangers.

The Grand Seignior hath within his Palace a Seraglio of young Men, to the number of five hundred, from eight years of Age to twenty; these are the well-favoured and best proportioned of all the Tribute Children which he draweth from Grecia and Nathia, and they are chosen out of his Seraglios at Pera, Adrianople, and other Places, and brought to this to be bred up, where they are instructed in divers Arts, according to their Disposition, but especially to Read and Write, and in the Doctrine of their Law; and to Ride, there being a great number of Horses kept within this Seraglio, for their Exercise, and for the Eunuchs. They never go out of the Seraglio till the Sultan thinks them to be of fit Age to undergo some Charge, and then he makes them Spacogliani, or Silichtari, and to some he gives greater Places, according to their Valour, or the favour they have gotten with him.

He hath in like manner about fourscore Muzaferechi, that is to say, Lance-bearers to the Grand Seignior, which carry his Lance whensoever he goeth to field, and acknowledge no other Commander, and in time, by his Favour or their Merits, are made Captains.

He hath always above one thousand Eunuchs entertained in several Places, whereof some of them are in very great credit with him, and can prevail much; they are called Hududri, many of them are employed to attend his Concubines and Virgins in his Seraglio. They are not only deprived of their Genitors, but in their Youth they have their whole Privities smoothed off by their Bellies, and in their Turbants they bear short Quills of silver, through which they make Water. This inhumane Custom was first invented by Sultan Seliman, who seeing a Geling make offer to cover a Mare, grew so suspicious that they were able to do some small thing, notwithstanding the loss of their Genitors.

The Grand Senior hath a Seraglio for his Women without his Palace, in the which there are always four or five hundred young Virgins, the fairest of the Christians Children, which he gathereth up out of Grecia for Tribute. The Sultan repairs sometimes thither to make choice of such as he shall like best for his Pleasure; whereof they are advertised the day before by the Eunuchs, that they may prepare themselves in their best Habits to give him content. Being all in a Room, and standing upon either side, the Sultan enters, attended by an Eunuch or two, and views them; to her that he likes he casts a Handkercher, (whereof he hath many hanging at his Girdle) and in this manner it may be he makes choice of half a dozen, the which his Eunuchs observing, they put them presently into a Coach, and are carried into another little Seraglio within his Palace. In this Seraglio they have good Entertainment, and are apparelled in Silk twice a Year, and are taught to make divers Works by ancient Matrons, and are attended on by the younger sort. They have many Eunuchs with their Aga Captain, and they have one hundred Capigies and Janizaries, which keep their Guards. When as the number of these Virgin slaves decreaseth, and they have not wherewithal to supply them with their Tributary Children, they send to the Market in Constantinople, where they lay there are daily ten thousand Slaves of all Ages and Sexes to be sold; and there they buy the fairest they can get, but they will not have them above eight Years old, lest they should be corrupted before they come into the Turks Seraglio.

As for the other Seraglio within the Sultan's Palace, there remains the Sultanas with their Children, and such other Concubines as he hath made choice of for his Delight. He never marries, but when any one is brought unto him, he gives her an attire for her Head, of Gold, and ten thousand Aspers, causing her to live in a Chamber apart, increasing her daily Maintenance. The first that bears him a Child, is called Sulana, and is mistress of all the rest, and most favoured by him, as the chiefest of all his Women, the rest, as they are favoured by the Prince, are brought unto him to have his Pleasure, and then returned back again; if they chance to be with Child, they are put into the number of the Sultanas, and are much respected by him. Such as the Prince hath had the use of, but no Children by them, are given in marriage to his Slaves, who are advanced to Dignities, and made Governors of Countries.

He has three hundred Solacchi, which march continually about his Person, and make as it were his Guard, being under the command of the Aga of Janizaries; they are richly attired, having Lawn Garments hanging down behind their Knees, and over it a quilted Waistcoat with half sleeves of Taffety, Damask, or Satten, and on their Heads, Caps and Feathers, like unto the Captain of the Janizaries, and they attend on him with Bows and Arrows. He hath also fill about him when he Rides abroad forty Peichi, that is to say, Foot-men or Polls, which run wonderful swiftly, and are still at hand to attend his Commandments, where he shall please to employ them; they wear long Coats of Cloth of Gold, with a broad Girdle of the same, and Caps like unto Womens Thimbles, with a Horn of Silver and gilt standing up before. There are about four thousand Capigies or Porters which continually attend his Palace and Seraglioes, they are attired like unto the Janizaries, and have over them three Capigi Bashes. These Men at many times employed to execute the Grand Seignior's Commandments, when he will have any great Mans Head, or his Throat cut, as we have seen of late years in Gambela Basha, and in Majlis Basha, who was Grand Viceroy to Adem.

The Turks Government.

The Grand Scignior's Government is so absolute, as they all term themselves his Slaves, and no Man, great or low, can afford to offend himself of his Estate, no nor of his Life, but by the Great Turks special Favour. He commits the managing of his Estate to such as have abjured the Christian Religion, and have been brought by way of Tything in their Infancies from Greece and Naxos, and afterwards, for their Merits, are advanced to great Dignities, as Baffas, Beglerbegs, and such other. The Prince hath a Court or Council, which they call Divano, and this is held within the Seraglio four days in the Week; that is to say, Saturday, Sunday, Monday, and Tuesday, where they treat matters of State and afterwards of the Affairs of private Men. To this Council are admitted the Grand Vifier, eight or nine Baffas, who are also called Vifiers, and are continually resident at Constantinople, (for there are many more which are employed abroad in the Conduct of Armies or Government of Countries,) the Beglerbegs and others. At the rising of the Court or Council, the Grand Vifier informs the Sultan of all the Proceedings in particular; wherein he dares not differ, for that the Prince hath a Window joining to the Divano, where he may hear and see any thing and not be seen. He seldom imposes what they have resolved, unless it be to moderate some rigorous Sentence, or to give answer to some Ambassadors, and what he himself concludes is irrevocable.

Their Suits are very short, for they have no Advocates to breed delays, as they have in Christendom; yet commonly he that bribes most speaks best; for the Turks are the most covetous and corrupt Nation in the World, neither will they do any man a kindness without a Fee; and yet they are not sure to enjoy any thing they get no longer than it shall please the Prince. They punish Crimes with great severity, and speedily, the Fact being proved, which doth to terrify them, as by the report of such as have converted long there, you shall find fee a Murder or a Theft committed by any Turk; and if any four Fact be committed, it is most commonly done by Grecians.

The chief of the Grand Scignior's Council, is the Grand Vifier, who wears the Princes Signet, and is as it were the Lieutenant-General of the whole Monarchy; he hath authority over the other Baffas, and they are bound to yield him an account of their employments. He is still about the Prince's Person, and is not sent abroad for any Employment, unless it be for an important War, as they have done of late years against the Perfians. When the Vifier is sent abroad, he makes choice of one of the Baffas to be his Lieutenant, and to execute his Authority, and he is called Chimacham. Mechmet Baffa, was at that present chief Vifier.

Next unto the Baffa (which is as much as to say, great Lord) follow the Beglerbegs, and have their places in Court next unto them. They are Men of great Authority, and have the command of great Kingdoms and Armies, under whose Obedience are divers Sanzacks, which are sent as Governors into Provinces, during the Princes Pleasure. These are Men of great Experience, and have command over the Spahi and Timariots, the chief Forces on Horse-back, whom they continually to exercise their Arms. There is one Beglerbeg of Greece, which hath all the Countries in Europe in the Turks Dominions under his Charge, and this is the first of all the Beglerbegs, who hath under him above thirty Sanzacks. There are six other Beglerbegs in Asia, whereof the first is of Naxos, or Alia the less. He hath the Government of Pontus, Bythinia, and other Kingdoms, and hath under him twelve Sanzacks. The Beglerbeg of Caramania with seven Sanzacks. The Beglerbeg of Aladul, under whose Command are seven Sanzacks. The Beglerbeg of Amazania and Tocato, having four Sanzacks. There is also one in Mysopotamia, and under his command twelve Sanzacks or Governors of Provinces. There is likewise a Beglerbeg of Danacia, Soria, and Judea, who hath under him twelve Sanzacks. And there is one of Caire, who commands over sixteen Sanzacks, his Charge extends to the Arabians, but they are not to Obey him as the Turks other Countries.

As for the Turks Forces, they consist of Horse-men, Foot-men, and Fleets at Sea. His Horsemen consist of Spahi, Timari, Spachoglans, Silikari and Ologi, who have Assignations of Lands, for the Entertainment of joy any Possessions, but it is in proportion to a certain number of Souls, and proportionable to the Revenues of the Land; as the Governour or Baffa is always bound to be called. Of these Timariots they are able to raise about an hundred and fifty thousand men.

His Horfe, always ready at the first call, for which the Prince disburseth not a penny, for, in regard of the Land which is allotted them, they are bound to maintain themselves, their Horfe and Arms in the War. Wherever he divides it among his Soldiers; assigning four thousand Alpers yearly (which is little above ten pound sterling) to every one for himself and his Horfe, and so proportionably if he have more Land. These Horfe-men are much perished with Arms when they go to War; for they have a Jack, a Spear with a little white Banner, a Caliver hanging under his left Arm, a Cornet, a Bow and Arrows at his Girdle, and a Batture at his Saddle bow. And of these kind of Horfe-men, he finds an infinite number in his other Countries. This Turkish Cavalry work two great Effects, for they serve as a support to his Estate, to undertake any Enterprize. Besides these, he entertains many Horfe-men about his Person, whereof some are Spahi, and others are Christian Slaves bred up young in the Princes Seraglio, who by their Merits attain to that Degree, and afterwards to greater Dignities. They are always attending about the Princes Person wherever he goes, being commonly thirteen hundred.

The Carapies are held for the flower of all his Horfe-men, being in number about eight hundred, who march still about the Princes Person during the Wars. The Spachoglani which is as much as to say, young Men on Horse-back, are above three thousand, who have yearly pensions in Money, which they are bound to receive yearly at Constantinople, or else they are held as dead Men. In the War, they march on the right Hand of the Grand Scignior, and are known from the Spahies by the Banners of their Lances, which have two points points and of divers colours, the others being pointed and all white, but they are armed alike. They are Men at Arms of a good fashion, and are commonly advanced by the Sultan to higher Places. They have a Captain or Aga of great Esteem, with a Lieutenant, and every twenty have a Boluch Baffa. The Sahibkari are also Horfe-men, and lodge upon the left Hand of the Princes Person, number about three thousand; Their Breeding is like unto the Spahi, and there is no difference betwixt them but in their March, the one having the right Hand, and the other the left, which is the more honourable among the Turks.

There is yet another sort of Horfe-men, which they call Olupagi, being about two thousand in number, and they march on the right and left Hand of the Prince. These several Troops are as it were a Nursery for all the chief Officers of that Empire; out of which they do commonly chuse their great Commanders. Besides, they have their mercenary Soldiers, called Acemchi, which come to serve the Turk from Tartaria, Valachia, and Moldavia.

As for his foot Forces, they consist chiefly in Janizaries, into which number they have not used to enroll many of Alia, whom they have held faint-hearted, but those of Europe, who have always had great Reputation to be Valiant. Their manner to entertain this Discipline, is, to send every three years into all the Provinces of Europe, from whence they bring ten or twelve thousand Christian Children as a Tribute, making choice of such as have any hint of Magnanimity, Agility, or Courage, which are sent for a Soldier. These Children being brought to the Court, are visited, some of them are sent into Naxos, Caramania, and other Provinces, to dig and weed the Ground, where they forget their Parents, Country, and Faith, and learn the Language and Vices of them with whom they converse, and so become Mahometans. They continue in those places three or four years, without any charge to the Prince, being entertained by them for whom they Labour; after which time they are called home, and put into the Sultan's Seraglios at Pera, Adrianople, and other Places. But they that have the best Faces, and are most active, are reserved for their Princes Service.

These Children being brought into the Princes Seraglios, are of two sorts; the one are called Amanglani, that is to say, simple Boys; they are instructed by severe Masters in divers manual and painful Exercises, as Shoemakers, Gardeners, and such like base Trades. Their Feeding and Apparel is very mean; and for the most part they live in narrow spacious Rooms, like unto Religious Men, having a Light continually burning, and Guards about them. These have liberty to go abroad, who after the Age of twenty years, are dismissed: whereof some are sent into the Sultan's Gardens, which are many and great; others are employed as Car-men to carry Wood, Hay, Water, and other Provision for the Palace, and some are sent to the Kitchens and Stables; yet when Places fall, they are preferred to be Janizaries, and have competent Pensions to maintain them during their lives. The least hath five Alpers a day, and there's none have above eight, and the Scribes and Lawyers are attired in long blew Gowns, girt with a broad Girdle, and on their Head they have long yellow Caps without brims, and sharp like unto Sugar-loaves; and of these thousand which serve to supply his Armies.

The other sort of Youths, which are bred in the Turks Seraglios or Nurseries, are called Ich-Oglani, that is to say, Chamber-Pages, being the choice of all the Christians Children for Proportion and Favour, and these Ich-Oglani are better bred up than the Amanglani, and come to better education, of whom we have formerly made mention; for the meanest Places these young Men attain unto at the first is to be Spahies, or to attend upon the Grand Scignior, as his Chamberlains and Pages. And many of them having extraordinary Pains are suddenly advanced to Places of great Dignity, and the Prince hath ever five thousand, who until they come unto the Age of twenty years are never suffered to go out of their Seraglio, nor to see any Person but such as intrust them and attend upon them.

The Janizaries (who are the Grand Scignior's chief strength) are raised out of Christians Children, bred up in these Nurseries, as we have said, where they are taught to shoot with their Bows and Arrows, to use the Harquebuse, and all other Weapons fit for Service; and are at length enrolled among the Janizaries, and are held the most valiant and resolute Soldiers among all the Turks. There are commonly received into the Janizaries and thereabout twenty four thousand of these Janizaries whereas the Grand Scignior is there, (for in his whole Estate he hath a far greater number) under their Aga or Captain General, which is a Place of great credit, but not like unto any of their Baffas; the Great Turk fearing to joy lower and Authority together. Being once Janizaries, they are either sent to the Wars, or put in Garrison, or else they remain at the Sultan's Court, (which they call Port) where they have certain spacious Places for their Dwelling, like to religious Houses, where they live under their Commanders, and the younger serve the ancient with great respect. All the Janizaries of one Squadron eat together at one Table, and sleep in certain long Halls, and if any one chance to be absent all Night, he shall (the next Night) be beaten with a Cudgel, which he takes so patiently, as he kisseth his Hand hath thus corroded him. They are much respected and feared of all men, and are diversely employed in the City as to the Peace and good Orders kept, to look to the prices of things, to arrest Malefactors, and to guard the Gates. If they buy any thing they will have it at their own rate; they cannot be judged but by their Aga or Captain. There is seldom any one punished to death by the course of Justice, without danger of a Mutiny; and therefore they execute them very secretly. They have many means to get money; for some attend upon Ambassadors, and keep their Houses; others go with Travellers, to guard them safely through the Turks Estate. They have a great power in the Princes Election; so as to win their love, every new Emperor at his first coming to the Crown gives them a Donative, and increaseth their Pay, presuming upon their Valour and Multitude. They many times commit strange Infolencies upon any Discontent; as in firing of Houses, beating of Baffas, and sometimes bearding the Sultan himself, as you may read in this History.

1620 Christians, unless it be with an Oath of marriage. A Turk having had the Use of a Christian Woman, they are both condemned to dye, unless she will abjure her Faith; the like is observed betwixt a Christian and a Turkish Woman, if they have been found together. Divorce is allowed among them in case of Barrenness and Incontinency.

There are four orders of Religious Men among the Turks, which differ in their Living, Habit, and Ceremonies. These be the Terlaques, Dervais, Kalenders, and Hugueniates, and these last are very vicious, and wicked Imposters, deceiving of the common People. The Dervais is a strict Order, living in Contemplation, much like unto the Cappuchins among the Romish Papists. The Turks forbear to blaspheme either God, Christ, or Mahomet, or any other Saint whatsoever, and they punish blasphemy severely. They converse with Christians, and Eat and Traffick with them freely; yea sometimes they marry their Daughters, and suffer them to live after their own Religion. But they hate the Jews, and despise them as the basest people in the world. They have an assured Confidence, that he that shall duly observe the Laws of Mahomet, shall have eternal Life, and a Paradise full of Delights; and contrariwise they that shall break the Laws of their Alcoran are threatened with Hell and eternal Death; yet they have an Opinion, that he that believes in the Alcoran when he dyes, shall be undoubtedly saved.

To conclude this Relation with some few lines of their Humours and Dispositions; they write of them, that they are gross witted, idle, and unfit for Labour. They are exceeding covetous and corrupt, above all other Nations; for Justice is sold to him that offers most. They are humble among themselves, and obey their Superiours with great silence. They are proud and insupportable to Strangers, thinking none fit to be compared with them. They are given to Gluttony and Drunkenness, and will spend whole days together in Feasting, and will drink with excess, if it be in private, for that it is forbidden by their Law. They are vain-glorious, proud, and deceitful, never keeping their words, but when it may be to their profit. They are much inclined to Vengery, and are for the most part all Sodomites. They are very superstitious, giving credit to Dreams and Divinations; and they hold, that every mans Destiny is written in his Forehead, which cannot be altered or avoided.

Thus I have continued this History for eleven Years, having informed my self out of the best Authors and Intelligences I could find that concern this subject; I should have been glad that some which have resided at Constantinople most part of this time, would have assisted me with their Observations, which should have been for the general good of our Nation; but I hope notwithstanding the Reader shall find content and satisfaction.

The cause of the War between the King of Poland and the Grand Seignior.

BEfore we come to speak of the great Preparations made by the Grand Seignior in the Year 1621, to invade the Kingdom of Poland, and those by that King to resist him; I hold it needful briefly to set down the Causes and Reasons of the ensuing War.

The Chrim Tartar, confining upon the Dukedom of Russia, and Borders of Poland, made many Incursions, and did great spoil upon the Cossacks within that Province of Russia, and other parts belonging to the Kingdom of Poland, and carrying away People of all Ages and Sexes, made sale of them within the Turkish Empire. Now Jean beagh Ghiray-Han, Prince of the Tartars, being wholly dependent on the Ottoman Emperours, his Majesty of Poland sent many several Ambassadors to complain at that Port; That notwithstanding the ancient League between him and the Ottoman Family, the Tartars greatly spoiled his Countries; which was both unjust and unreasonable. Howsoever the Complaints were many and great, yet the King of Poland's Ministers found no redress for those their alleged Wrongs; but were answered, That the Tartars were absolute Lords over themselves, and that they pretended to have an annual Tribute of forty thousand Dollars from the King of Poland; which being denied them, they had reason so to do; and that the Grand Seignior could only intreat, but not command them to surcease. The Tartars seeing the Polack thus slighted at the Port, grew more insolent and outrageous; wherewith the Turks were well content, for the great benefit they received by slaves which were continually brought to be sold in their Dominions, finding for the most part, that those men had able Bodies, and fit to be applied to the Oar. It is true, that the Chrim-Tartars in ancient time, being so near Neighbours, were wont to receive such a sum from the Crown of Poland, for which they were obliged to serve in every occasion of War. But of later years that payment discontinued, because they rather received hurt, than any assistance of that vagabond and predatory People.

When the Cossacks saw, that after so many Complaints they could not live in quiet, nor procure Restitution of their Wrongs, nor take their Revenge upon the Tartar (being a fleeing and fugitive People, who had no certain place of abode) they resolved to fall into the Dominions of the Grand Seignior, who seemed, if not to protect, yet to connive at Injuries they received from these their Neighbours. The Cossacks then that inhabited upon the Banks of the River Borjshenes (which emptieth it self into the Black Sea) were conjectured to be fittest for the Execution of this Revenge; and therefore they prepared a great number of well armed Barques, and falling down the said River, did very great damage to the Turk, by robbing, burning, and spoiling divers Towns and Villages bordering upon the Black Sea. This News being brought to Constantinople, the Grand Seignior took it in great scorn, that such a base and rude People should come and affront him so near his Doors. Therefore he caused some Gallies to be armed forth with speed to suppress them; but his Forces were four or five times valiantly repulsed, and still the Cossack went safely home with his Prey. Now the tide of Affairs was turned, and this great Emperour, who was formerly petitioned by the Polack, is now become a Suitor to him himself, and finds his Ministers measured by the answer the Grand Seignior had given concerning the Wrongs done by the Tartars: That though the Cossacks adhere to the Crown of Poland, yet they are free People of themselves; but when the Tartar shall cease from his Hostility, it is like enough the Pole will intreat the Cossack to do the same; and that is all the Authority he can exercise over them.

Affairs standing thus, no accommodation for Wrongs on either side could be made; and the Grand Seignior, although he was but now fifteen years of age, yet was he strong, vigorous, and of a high Spirit, and more than desirous of a War, but especially with the King of Poland, from whom he looked for better Satisfaction. This desire was nourished in him by the Counsels of Ab Basia, Great Vizier, and notwithstanding it was utterly disliked by all the rest of the Ministers of State, and Officers of War in that Empire. A War was nevertheless thereupon proclaimed throughout all the Turks Dominions, which did in general displease the common Soldier also.

The Grand Seignior, the four and twentieth of April, commanded payment to be made to all the Souldiery, and the day following cauled all his Tents and Pavilions, with those of his Vissiers and other Officers, to be solemnly pitched without the City, with those of all Trades that were to attend his Royal Camp.

The Grand Seignior having now gathered of Foot and Horse three hundred thousand (though reported to be six hundred thousand) set forward, together with his Court and Train, out of Constantinople, the Nine and twentieth of April, with three hundred Field-pieces, beside an hundred double Cannon sent into the Frontiers by Sea, leaving Adhem Bassa and the Beglad Bassa Governors of the City till his return.

The beginning of the War with the King of Poland.

When he was arrived at the Confines of Poland, he first attempted the Fortress of Coyan in the Province of Moldavia, lately given by Gabriel to Gratiant to the Polacks. The which being strong of Situation, and well furnished for defence, the Turks, finding it difficult to carry in few days, left it besieged, and passing the River of Borjshine, found there the Chancellor of Poland intrench'd upon the borders, in a strong Place, and of good advantage, kept with forty thousand Polacks and Cossacks, and eight thousand High Dutch sent by the Emperor in Aid of the King of Poland. The Prince was incamped at Caminina, and strongly intrenched with sixty thousand Souldiers; the King abiding in Cracovia with the Nobility and his Court. The Grand Seignior, facing the Trenches upon Borjshine, with the multitude of his Army inclosed them round, and shut up all the Passages; sending presently the Prince of the Tartars, Ischah-Giray-Han, with thirty thousand light-horse to make Incursions within the heart of Poland; who did great spoil, and brought away Captives twenty five thousand Souls of all sorts; which damage did not so much proceed from the Will of the Prince, as from a Captain of his, a Nobleman of Tartary, called Kante-Emir-Emir, in great Favour at that time with the Emperor; for it was thought that between the King of Poland and the Prince of Tartary, there was some secret Intelligence by the virtue of Money.

During the space of four and thirty days that the Grand Seignior held these Trenches besieged, almost every other day he gave them terrible assaults, but was always forced to retire with loss. The Polacks in bravery making some sallies and encounters, were also glad to recover their strength; only once they so far advanced in the Evening with their Host upon the quarter of the Janizaries, that they made a great slaughter, and almost put the whole Camp into disorder; and as the Turks themselves did confess, if this fall had been given in the Night, it had hazarded the Confusion of the whole Army; All which being seen by the Grand Seignior, and little hope of advancing further, for divers reasons he was enforced to treat a cessation of Arms with the Chancellor. The first was, That considering he had spent so much time without any advantage, and the Winter approaching, whereby his Army suffered great Extremities of Cold and other Miseries, by reason of terrible Rains which had carried away divers Tents, Houses, and other Carrels, and some part of his Cannons. Secondly the provision of fodder was become so dear, that divers forsook their Horses for want of means to feed them; besides the great Mortality of Men, of Fluxes, Fevers, and Colds, and the Horses of Asia not used to such a Climate, that many Men of Quality that came out with ten and twelve, were compelled to return on foot. Thirdly, the Army, either for Wantreins, or for discontent received from the Emperor himself, for his narrowness and Avarice shewed to the Souldier, contrary to the glorious Example of his Ancestors in like Enterprises, not only refused to fight, but were little less than mutinied. Fourthly, this attempt from the beginning, proceeding merely from the ubiquity of the Grand Seignior, contrary to the Council of all wise Vissiers, who desired generally a Peace; as they Solicited, and by the Mediation of Kadula Prince of Valachia, both parts were easily induced to Treaty, and the Chancellor was drawn to send a Secretary to the Grand Seignior; where it was agreed, as follows.

First, That the Emperor should raise his Army, and retire from the Confines of Poland; and the Tartars, as the occasioners of this War, should send an Emir to reside as a pledge from ensuing Incursions. The Chancellor promising in the Name of the King of Poland, to keep another in the Court of the Prince of Tartary, with Condition to pay yearly as afore-said forty thousand Florins as an antient pension of the Tartars as a donation from the King of Poland; promising moreover, for the better Confirmation of the future Peace, to maintain a Resident in the Port of the Ottoman Court, and upon the arrival of every such Ambassador to send a Present conformable to the Legations of other Christian Princes. And, as the Grand Seignior was obliged for the Tartars, that they should forbear all Invasions upon the Polacks; so the Polacks should bind themselves in behalf of the Cossacks, that they should commit no Robberies in the Dominion of the Grand Seignior. And further covenanted in the Name of the Polish Merchants for the Privilege of free Traffique, to make a present of an hundred thousand Florins to the Plate, Sables, and Bulgary Hides; always intended with this reservation, that this Treaty should not prejudice or bind, until the Grand Seignior did send a Chiaus to the King of Poland with these Overtures, that he might have time to assemble his Parliament, and there resolve to put his Ambassador with ample Authority to treat and conclude a final Peace in the Port. Whereupon the Grand Seignior, being satisfied with these Conditions, did dispatch presently his Nuntio into Poland, and suddenly, to the great content of all his Army, he raised his Camp and returned to Adrianople.

By relation of divers present in that War, it was reported, That there died in the Turks Camp, by the Sword, Famine, Sicknes, and Cold, about eighty thousand Men, and above an hundred thousand Horses; and the remain at their return appearing in naked, sickly, and poor, made evident demonstration of the great loss and misery sustained. The Polacks in their Trenches lost above twenty thousand by the famine suffered in their besieging; so that if the Winter, and other wars had not contraind the Grand Seignior to rise with some pretence of Honour, and that he had laid a few days longer, they had been enforced to render on perils; which is evident, in that they were glad and prompt to accept of any agreement, although as yet there was nothing fully concluded.

The Grand Seignior, being informed that the Emperor of Germany had sent Aid of eight thousand Dutch to the King of Poland, and enraged that he had thus far advanced in his attempts; pretending that the Emperor by giving Succours had broken the Peace; to vent his Choler, contrary to the advice of his Council, presently upon his arising from the Confines of Poland, in his Camp proclaimed War against Germany for the next Spring; commanding upon great Penalty, all his Souldiers and Slaves to be ready for the Invasion. Which gave great discontent to the Army, inasmuch as they did almost publicly profess, they neither could nor would follow him. And conforconformable to this his rash Resolution, he gave order to Kante-Emir-Emir, a Tartarian Captain, then Bassa of Silistra, to winter with twenty thousand of his Souldiers in the Country. Presently he sent out Cesar Galla, the Emperor's Angl-bassidour, wastid at Buda, the Grand Seignior pretending, that the said Cesar Galla had promised upon his Life, That the Emperor would give no Aid to the King of Poland. Not considering, that he himself, contrary to the Peace, the Summer before had furnished Pate, a Town of Hungary, and had sent his Majesty's Souldiers to follow the Prince of Transylvania, as Volunteers against the Emperor.

The King of Poland, hearing of this Resolution against the Emperor, called the Chiaus, sent about the Treaty, before him, and told him, That if the Grand Seignior should proceed to make War upon the Emperor for his occasion, that he could conclude no Peace with him, being obliged to take part with the Emperor, as his dear Brother and Confederate. Which Message the Chiaus sent to the Grand Seignior, when he was yet at Adrianople, where he either purposed to winter to assault the Emperor, or to quicken the Polacks to a conclusion of Peace; told in his sudden Presence, by the perswasions of the Vissiers and Musli, he changed his Resolution, and took his way to Constantinople, where he entered the last of December.

Now it being given out, that the Emir of Sidon in Sirie was in Rebellion, and that he had possessed himself of the City and Castle of Tripoli, the Grand Seignior pretended to go in Person to gainst him, and gave out 60000 Chequines to prepare his Carriages and Pavilions; and took order to provide his Palace in Aleppo, determining to pass that way to amule and raise superstition in the minds of the People, and likewise commanded the Army of Asia to be in readiness by the end of the Month of April; and gave out Commission for Victuals, Munition, and other Necessaries. The Musli, Hoja, and other the Vissiers (who knew not the mystery) misliking this Council, with great Instances and Reasons dissuaded him, as being a Course very dangerous to his Estate. First, That his Majesty should go in Person, leaving all Greece desolate, and commit the Care and Government of his Imperial Seat to a poor Chimacham or Lieutenant; it not being probable that the Emir of Sidon would stay to oppose himself against the force of his Royal Army, but rather make an escape, and retire himself into some part of Chilendun; and that a General by Land, and the Captain Baffa, Admiral of the Sea, with his Fleet of Gallies, would suffice to punish and destroy him. Besides, if his Majesty undertook the Journey in Person, it was necessary that all his Souldiers should attend him, which were a Charge superfluous and above the Enterprize, and not impossible for them being so harassed and distressed in the late Invasion of Poland (who did even publicly murmur that they would not go.) For which reasons the King seemed to change his Resolution, and was content to make a General by Land with the Army of Asia; to which charge was named the Bassa of Cairo. The next day after the Grand Seignior's coming to the Arsenal, he called the Vissier Baffa, the Admiral, and the great Treasurer before him; where it was concluded to make ready at least an hundred Gallies: for the preparation whereof fifty thousand Chequines were then delivered to the Vissier, and he was to furnish the rest of the whole charge with expedition, of his own purse, and to take it up upon the King's Assignations. Whereupon, the Grand Seignior with great content did vest them as a mark of favour, and gave present Commission to the Admiral to be ready to depart by the midst of April following; and for his better strength, he gave a command to send for Aids to Tunis and Algier: which was thought requisite, because it was reported, that the Prince Philipbert of Savoy, then Viceroy of Sicily, had in readines sixty Gallies and six Gallions at Messina, which force was doubted would be employed to give Succour to the Emir of Sidon, or to revenge the attempt and late Lack of Manfredonia, so that they were with all expedition rigging and preparing the Armado in the Arsenal; and for protection and prevention of the working of this Armado twelve small Gallies, and the ordinary Fleet of Frigates, to keep the black Sea from the incursion of the Cossacks. And though it was given out, that this Army was only prepared against the Emir, yet many that understood the secrets of that Empire, knowing it to be too great, did believe it should be first to prevent a general revolt, which was then murmured and suspected in Asia.

About this time, contrary to the counsel and will of all his Ministers, the Grand Seignior married the Grand-child of a Sultana, Wife to Pertau Bassa, only for her Beauty, without any Pomp, which was ill interpreted in that Court; his Ancestors of late years not usually taking Wives, especially of a Turkish race, for respect of Kindred: This and other inconstancies, with extreme Avarice, made him odious with the Souldier; and his daily haunting the Streets on foot, sometimes disguised, with a Page or two, prying into houses and Taverns, like a pesty Officer, increased his contempt even in the City.

Secret Order was given about the same time to Dia-Mahomet, the Bassa of Canita, and to Gela-Emir, a Tartarian, to unite themselves with Behloul Gabor against the Emperor of Germany: But the Bassa of Buda did advertise the Grand Seignior by that Behloul Gabor had concluded Peace with the Emperor; which news did greatly displease him, being ardent in the desire of War.

The Peace between the Grand Seignior and the King of Poland was not yet fully concluded; but Ambassadors were weekly expected at the Port from Poland and other Places, to hasten a full consummation thereof. Amongst which, Sir Thomas Roe, Knight, Ambassador in ordinary from his Majesty of Great Britain to the Grand Seignior, arrived there the first of January, and had his first audience of him speedily, when he made this Speech unto him in English, which immediately followed.

Most High and Mighty Emperor, his sacred Majesty the King of Great Britain, France and Ireland, my most gracious Lord and Sovereign, according to the ancient League of Friendship and Amity, of long time begun and continued between the most noble Ancestors of your Majesty, and his Royal Person confirmed by his sundry Ambassadors and Letters, both to your renowned Father, and your Imperial Majesty, being fully determined on his part, to maintain, and inviolably to hold a fair and good Peace and Correspondency with your Majesty: both commanded and sent me with his Letters of Credence and friendly Present, to reside as his Ambassador in your Royal Courts. Not doubting but your Imperial Majesty will accept them, and receive me, his unworthy Servant, with your most Honour and Favour; and that you will give Credit unto me in divers matters of importance which your Majesty hath commanded me to deliver in his Name, comprehended in five Articles written in this Memorial. And that you will be pleased to do therein according to the Royal Friendship of his Majesty, and your Princely Wisdom and Justice.

The Letter of Credence sent by Sir Thomas Roe.

His Majesty Lies Letter to Sir Grand Seignior.

JAMES by the Grace of God King of Great Britain, France, and Ireland, Defender of the Christian Faith, against all those that falsly profess the Name of Jesus, &c. To the most High and Mighty Prince, Sultan Olman Han, chief Lord and Commander of the Ottoman Kingdom and Empire of the Eaſt, fendeth Health and Greeting.

WE doubt not but you received our Letters four years by this, to his Majesty John Chapman, whereby we signified unto you our Royal Pleasure to recall and discharge our Ambassador Sir John Aysc from his Employment and Refidency in your Court, whom we desired you in your Princely Favour to dismiss for our especial Service, and to receive the bearer of our said Letters as Agent, to remain in your Protection, for the better support and maintenance of our Subjects, which do trade and abide in your Dominions, and for the advancement and continuance of the mutual Commerce and Friendship, which hath been a long time contracted between your Predecessors and ours, until the arrival of our Servant Sir Thomas Roe; of whom arisen we made choice to find your Port as Ambassador, as well to propound unto you divers things necessary for the general Peace, as to reside in your Court for our particular Service. Notwithstanding, left the said Letters should not come safely to your Royal Hands, we have thought fit again to make known our purpose of recalling our former Ambassador Sir John Aysc, and to discharge and dismiss him from your Port, and to receive and admit in his room our truly and well beloved Servant Sir Thomas Roe, one of our Privy Chamber, whom we have now expressly sent, and whom we authorize under our great Seal of England, as our Ambassador to reside at your Port, and to negotiate in our Name, and in the behalf of our Subjects, abiding within your Kingdoms, of whose Fidelity and Devotion, as we are well assured, so we doubt not but he will give you good content in his Demeanour and Negotiation with you. We have also thought fit to put you in mind of those common Rovers upon the Seas, who are Enemies to the Laws of Nations, and destroyers of the quiet and peaceable Merchant, by whom Amity and Friendship is maintained between Kings and Princes: That you would please to exercise your Great and Mighty Power to chastise and destroy them, as Traitors to your Honour, and infringers of the sacred and publick Peace. In full assurance that you will extend the same good respect unto us, as your Royal Ancestors have done unto our most renowned Predecessors, whereby that ancient League and Commerce may be inviolably maintained between both our Kingdoms, which on our part we shall be very loth to infringe or dissolve. We do by these our Letters recommend unto your princely Favour, this our said truly Servant and Ambassador, to reside and remain in your Port, on our behalf to treat with you in all Affairs for the publick Weal of our Dominions, and for the general Peace of us both, and our allies and Friends, as also for the support and aid of all our Subjects, which do live and trade within your Estates and Countries, to whose good Disposition we recommend their Affairs, and by whose Industry and Mediation we conceive our People may be relieved in their just and reasonable demands, to the perfect maintenance and assurance of that mutual Commerce which hath so long time been continued between our Royal Progenitors. And as we have great cause to profess our gratefull acknowledgement for many years which our former Ambassadors and all other our Subjects have, and do receive from your Royal Hands, so in our Princely love we do intreat you to take knowledge of, and to command redress for divers Oppressions and Wrongs done unto some of our said Subjects Persons and Goods, that live under the assurance of your Friendship with us, which we have formerly signified to our Residents at your Port; but as we verily believe they have never come unto your Ears, that are open to the just Complaints of all Strangers; whereof we have now given charge to our Servant and Ambassador to acquaint you with more at large, unto whom we desire you to give Protection and Credit in whatsoever he shall move and propound, for the establishing, confirmation, and enlargement, in all Occasions, of those Liberties and Privileges which our Subjects have anciently enjoyed by the Benignity of your self, and of your Royal Ancestors. And in all other things and occasions, wherein he hath or shall receive our Commands, as if our self did communicate them with you, which we doubt not shall redound to the great Glory and Honour of both our Empires. And so we wish you Health and true Felicity. Dated at our Royal City of London, the sixth day of September, Anno Dom. 1621, and of our Reign of Great Britain, France, and Ireland, the nineteenth.

Articles propounded by the Ambassador to the Grand Seignior.

First, his Sacred Majesty of Great Britain, according to the most noble and renowned League of Amity between your Majesties and your Crowns and Dominions, hath commanded me to renew the ancient Capitulations and Privileges granted by your Imperial Majesty and your Royal Ancestors, and therein to move your Majesty, that you will be pleased to enlarge and extend your Favour to our Nation that live under your Protection, and to give Remedy to divers Injuries done unto them by the Customes of this Royal Port, Aleppo, Smirna, Sio, Parras, and other Places, contrary to the Justice and Honour of your Majesty; and that you will be pleased to give order for several Commands to these Places, in all our just Occasions; that both the Fame of your Justice may be renowned, and the Friendship of your Majesties confirmed, and the Correspondence and Commerce between your Dominions established and increased.

Secondly, his Majesty hath commanded me to offer himself as a Mediator of Peace, to accommodate the late breach with the Kingdom of Poland, the King of Poland having sent his Ambassador express unto England to desire Aid, he hath thought it more agreeable to his Honour, and to the ancient League of Friendship, to use his Credit with your Majesty to procure the general quiet and peace of the Princes of Christendom, desiring your Majesty to consider his Interest in the publick cause, and not to despise the Forces of so many as may partake in the quarrel; which if your Majesty shall hearken unto, the rather for his sake, as your Royal Ancestors hath done in the like Occasion, his Majesty will accept it as a respect of your Love, which will assure and increase the Commerce and Friendship of your Dominions; in which his Majesty hath given me more particular and full Instructions to treat and mediate in this Business.

Thirdly, his Majesty hath commanded me to move your Imperial Majesty for the release of divers of the Pasha Nobles, now your Captives; acknowledging one Southwell Gentleman, a Subject of his Majesty, my Royal Matter.

Fourthly, his Majesty desires, that you will take some order with the Pyrats of Tunis and Algier, who shelter themselves under your Royal Protection, (to the great Dishonour of your Majesty) and do many Robberies upon the Subjects of Kings and Princes in Amity and League with your Empire, and take even the Ships sent unto your Royal Port; admonishing your Majesty to consider, that if they be suffered to continue, they will occasion the dissolution of all Commerce and Trade; being common Enemies to all honest Merchants, by whom the Friendship of these Kingdoms are maintained and increased. And that if your Imperial Majesty please not to exercise your Royal Power and Authority to bridle or destroy them; that then you will not take it in ill part, that his Majesty, with other Princes his Allies, shall make an Army to punish both them and all others that receive and cherish them, which hath hitherto been forborn in respect only of your Majesty, and that the Towns whereto they harbor themselves are, or ought to be under your Imperial Command.

Fifthly, his Majesty hath commanded me to require Justice and Reddition of a great sum of Money taken from Arthur Garway, here imprisoned by force and Injury in the time of Achmet Basſa; whereof his Majesties former Ambassadors have complained to Sultan Achmet, your Majesties renowned Father; and to Mehemet Basſa Viſier, to Huſſen Basſa, to the Hoſe of the King, and to the Muſi; wherein your Majesties most noble Father gave Command for our Satisfaction. All the said great Officers having heard the cause, upon Examination giving their Testimonies of the great wrong done unto him; Mehemet Basſa also writing a Letter, by the order of your Majesties Royal Father, promising Justice and Reddition of all, which his Majesty hath yet expected, and again demand. And having so often written in this cause, his Majesty will not believe, but that in Justice and Honour this Royal Court would do right; imputing the Fault to his own Ministers and Ambassadors, that they never complained to your Imperial Majesty, according to his Highness Command. Also his Majesty hath commanded me to require and desire your Majesty to give him your Royal Answer in all these Particulars, by your Letters in Writing, as shall be fit for your own Honour, and conformable to the ancient League of Amity and Friendship between your Royal Majesties.

His Majesties Ambassador not many days after sent to the Viſier, who had promised him an answer unto these Articles; who returned him this the following.

To the First, he said, That the Emperour his Master had given him order to renew the Capitulations, and to make any such Additions as should be requisite, agreeable to their Law, and conformable to the ancient League; and that therein his Majesties Ambassador should find no Difficulty; for they honoured his Majesty, and were resolved to give him assurance of their will to maintain a true Friendship; and therefore desired the Ambassador to draw and prepare the Capitulations, and send them to him and the Chancellor, who would consider them, and bring such as were fit to be granted, the Ambassador should have speedy order.

To the second, the Viſier answered with great Subtlety & Skill, justifying the occasion of the War, and imputing the Fault to the Colloſs, maintained by the Pole to rob even at the Port of Constantinople; therefore, that the Emperour could not in Honour but chasten and destroy them, having first by message demanded Justice against them; and now his Master being engaged with great charge, and in his Honour he could make no Peace with them who had beguiled him; pretending that they had no other intention but the War, because, having raised his Camp, and dissolved his Army, the Polacks now scorned him, and kept no Faith, neither sending Ambassador nor Messenger, no not any Letter since their return; and that his Majesty of Great Britain did not value the Honour of the Grand Seignior in this motion.

To the Third he replied, That the motion for the Prisoners was unreasonable, because in order it should follow the general Treaty, and making Peace; which, if fulfilled, his Majesty of Great Britain should find, for his sake, and all those mentioned in the Memorial should be free, except only the Prince Coreskie, who had been the cause of many Troubles, and had made escape from Prison formerly.

To the Fourth, he made Protestation in the name of Arthur Garway, here imprisoned, saying, that his Majesties Ambassadors should have what Commands, what Message he would desire in company of any Englishman.

To the Fifth he replied, It was an old obsolete Quarrel, and that the Ambassador did him Injury to press him, when in the time of three former Viſiers, his Predecessors could obtain no Relief; therefore he would not look back upon the Actions of other Men, nor rake among the Bones of the dead; but he desired the Ambassador should rest satisfied, that while He had the Honour to govern, there should no wrong be done unto the English Nation, and that he would bear all Complaints, as a man should need to look back upon his Actions.

This perfunctory Answer, did not much satisfy his Majesties Ambassador, but that he desired some other of Effect, being loth to accept of Generalities, and therefore required a direct reply for his own discharge; which was promised after much pressing, by the Viſier who had first undertaken the same.

The long stay of the Duke of Sbaraske (chosen extraordinary Ambassador by the King of Poland, to consummate the Peace between him and the Grand Seignior) did much trouble the Emperour's Court; and especially the Viſier, who procured the Cessation of Arms, but that a Letter was writ by the King of Poland, which did a little prolong their hopes. In the mean time, the Emperour divulged a pretence to visit Mecca, the Tomb of Mahomet his great Prophet; contrary to the Counsel and influence of all his Viſiers that knew not the secret, and even to the hazard of a general revolt; for they were jealous, that under colour of that Voyage, he had some other design; and it was feared, the Duke would not proceed to follow him at random, nor treat with his Deputies left at the Port: For the Polacks seemed in performing and assuring the Peace, a little too glorious make another; and having a while attended, they relolved to enter the Palace, (but first took a general Call not to sack the Imperial Throne, which they called their House and their Honour) and there seeking for the King, not able to find him, they extorted by confusion the Calafagias, and flew him; and then they demanded for Mustapha, Uncle to Ofman, by him formerly deposed, a Man esteemed rather Holy (that is Frantick) than Wise, and indeed fitter for a Cell than a Scepter. They sought him, and the first Tumult had put Mustapha into a Vault with two Negro Women, without bread or drink; in which estate these new Electors found him, almost naked, and half pined. At first fight he thought they had been the messengers of Death; but that fear passed over, and his first request was a Cup of Water. Whom they took up, and instantly proclaimed him their Emperour; which he was loth to accept, in a manner ashamed to be raised to that Dignity. How unstable are the Estates of the greatest Princes! for he that was but even now in the Jaws of Death, naked, starved, and dying for Thirst, is become a great Monarch, and may drink Gold, or innocent Blood.

They as yet not knowing what was become of Ofman, and loth to trust Mustapha in the Palace, carried him in Triumph to the old Seraglio, and there left him; departing to the lack of the Vissers House, and so in the Evening to their Rendezvous, where they kept both good guard, and in good order in the City, from Fires and other Infolencies. Sultan Ofman, amazed with their News, so soon as they had left the Court, came out, and called to Council in the Night Husein Bassa, late Vissier in the Polyth War, and the Aga of the Janizaries, both faithful to him, and demanded their advice; first he desired to the old Seraglio, to pacifie the Women there to strangle Mustapha; but some of them taking his part, a new uprose began in the House between that Sex; and the Soldiers that kept watch hearing the noise, entered in and refused him, and from thence removed him to the Chambers of the Janizaries, where they guarded him for that Night in an ill lodging. All this while Ofman consults what course to take. These two his friends, and some others, tell him that the case was desperate, and could not be cured but by a desperate Remedy; and therefore they agreed, that the Aga should go and persuade with the Mufts; and that the King in the Morning should suddenly present himself to the Soldiers at their own Door, and make experience what his Presence, his Submission, and his Benevolence promised, could work, to move them to Loyalty or Compassion. Which Counsel early in the Morning they put in practise. The King, accompanied with the Mufts (who never consented to his deposing, though he favoured the Soldiers against the Vissier) with Husein Bassa, and about twelve Horsemen, went directly to the Janizaries Colledge, where Mustapha was kept, and there in Tears made them an Oration; offering great Recompence, repenting of his Error, and finally invoked them by the Merits of his Father and all his Ancestors, to have some pity upon their true Master. The Multitude (tame prone in misericordiam, quam immodica severitas fuerat; sometimes as prone to pity as they were before to hatred) now knew not what to do; a silent murmur now ran among them, and they were half converted; but the Aga of the Janizaries thinking to merit of the King, and beginning to plead unfeignably for him, with some harsh words of upbraiding (in natura maris omni statu venti turbida; as the Nature of the Sea is to swell with every blast of Wind) anew moved their Fury, so that they cried out: Trafaton, and fell upon him and Husein Bassa and cut them in pieces, every man taking a part of their Flesh to satiate their Revenge. The Multitude speak, but was withdrawn by some, for respect to his Place, and with Difficulty was conveyed away. Now the poor Ofman saw his Friends slain, and knew not which way to convert himself; but binding up his Eyes with a Napkin, carried him first before Mustapha, and then himself as the Disturber of the Peace of the Empire; and demanded sentence against him (Mors vultu sui quique flagitium alij obijctum.) The forsaken Prince pleaded for Life, and the new King knew not how to condemn, but nodded and agreed to all that was propounded. At last they consulted with themselves, and put him upon an Horse (an insolent Spahi changing Turbans with him) and sent him away Prisoner to the seven Towers, under good Guard (in his Passage begging a draught of Water at a Fountain) and then returned to their new Master, and placed him in the Seraglio and Imperial Throne; where he had need to have good Broaths and Nourishment to restore his decayed Body.

The Soldiers now thought all was done, and (only lacking the Houles of Husein Bassa and some others their conceived Enemies) returned in quiet to their several Lodgings, and had no further Malice. But the new Vissier Davit Bassa, made by Mustapha, knew well, if Ofman lived, that this storm might pass over, and he would as easily, and by the same means return to his estate, as he fell from it (vultus in nos est cuiusque novi motus cupidum.) Therefore he consulted with some few interested in Mustapha's Preference, and thereby by obnoxious to Ofman's to search how many of the Royal Blood were left alive, and relolved if there remained two, to make an end of Ofman. Two of his Brothers were found, the one about twelve, * the other about seven years of Age; * Morat. and thereupon the Vissier went himself to the Prison with a pack of Hangmen, and gave order to strangle the unfortunate Prince; who now having had no rest in two Nights, and thinking himself secure for a season, was newly fallen asleep, but awaked by the coming of these Messengers, asked, What News? saying he did not like their sudden Intrusion. They at first told amazed, and the King made to defend himself; But a strong Knave struck him on the Head with a Battle-axe, and the rest leaping upon him, strangled him with much ado. Thus one of the greatest Monarchs in the World was first affronted by mutined Troops, his own Slaves, almost unarm'd, and few in number, no man taking up a Sword as defend him; and they who began this madness, not meaning to hurt him, by the increase of their own Fury, which had no reason, deposited him against their own purpose, and at last expell'd his Life, against their Will, to the Councils of other men whom they equally hated. And now they mourned for their dead King as freely as they rag'd unreasonably; knowing they had stained their Honour, being the first of their Emperours they ever betrayed, and that they had let far upon that in all likelyhood they must change for disability, Nunquam tult documenta fere majora quam fragili loco flarent superbi.

This was the last Act of the Life of Sultan Ofman; but his Intent and great Designs, which drew upon him this fatal blow, will not be unworthy the Communication; the Practices, Resolutions, Secrets, and Councils, of all Actions, being the Soul of History, and res gesta but the bare

The Grand Seignior Designs to conquer Europe.

Carkasi; and, as many Ages have not produced so strange an Example of the incertainty of humane Greatness, so in the disposition thereof, and in the ways leading thereunto, there was seen evidently the wonderful Providence of God, in confounding the Councils of the worldly wise, who had laid a Foundation of new greatness, whereby this Prince aspired the universal Monarchy. And lastly, the World may see upon how weak Foundations this Monarchy was at first builded, how easily it was now shaken and corrupted; how their Kings are subject to the Rage of a few Slaves, how Anarchy has increased it an easier prey to any able hand that would attempt it. From the Invasion of Poland all these changes took their beginning. Sultan Ofman, advanced to the Throne in his Youth, full of heat and Blood, being of a great and haughty Spirit, very courageous, strong of Body, and a mortal hater of Christians, envious of the Glory of his Ancestors, and ambitious to raise his Name above any of theirs, had projected in himself the Conquest of the remains of the bordering Europe. But to so great Designs, he had one Vice that refuted all hope of Prosperity, which was, extreme Avarice; unnatural to Youth, and a symptom of the decrepit Age of Monarchy. Ubi viros bene corruptos, et contra veterum disciplinam & iustitiam majorem apud quos virtute quam pecunia res militaris melius fecit. His first Enterprise was that of Poland, moved by the incursions of the Cossacks; which then he undertook of his own Head, without the Council of any of his Vissers, (who, in a Tyranny grown to the height by East and Wealth, are ever in a lazy and disdainful liking of all the Soldiers, who (contrary to their Institution, being married, and Fathers of Families, entered into Trade, receiving nothing in War more than in Peace, besides Danger and Travel) are not easily drawn from their own Chimnies. This Action he thought to ease, as he had disposed of his Conquest, and divided the live Lyons Skin. But being met upon the Borders with a poor Army in Comparison, he was first arrested at Chodyn, a little Fortrefs, which he was loth to leave behind him untaken; and then seeking to advance into the plain Country, by forcing the Trenches of the Chancellor of Poland against him, he could never procure his Janizaries to fight, though engaging his Person once or twice beyond the regard of his Quality, and his own Troops ready to mutiny against him, and to forsake him, he was at last enforced to raise shamefully his Camp, and to accept of any Treaty to save his outward Honour. In this attempt he lost above an 100000 horses for want of Fodder, and eighty thousand men for want of fighting; for they would rather dye running, or pillaging, or eating, than in the face of the Enemy. For this disgrace he conceived lo inward and rooted an indignation against the Janizaries, and so justly, that he had lately slain himself, and claimed he was no King that was subject to his own Slaves, upon whom he spent great Treasures, and yet they would neither fight in Wars, nor obey in Peace, without exacting new Bounties and Privileges. Delair Bassa, a man of great Wit and Courage, lately called from the Eastern Parts, where he had lately governed with honour, who came in, though late, yet in a very brave and warlike Equipage, above all other his Captains, was suddenly made great Vissier, the former, Husein Bassa, being in the same disgrace common with the Soldier, though not in the same fault. This man was never bred at Court, but had lived many years in action, and so had never faction nor dependence at the Port, but stood upon himself and his own merit; and being now unexpectedly advanced to this high Dignity, he wrought upon the Kings discontent, and nourished it in and conclusion brake with him, That it was true he was no Emperour, nor could be safely alive, while the Janizaries had the Power which they lately usurped; informing him, That they were corrupted from their ancient Institution, and were lazy Cowards, given over to Ease and lust: Et animi per libidines corrupti nihil honestum meret. But if his Majesty would pull up his Spirits, and follow his Advice, he would provide him a new Solidiety about Damascus, Coords, of Men ever bred in the Irons of warlike hardiness and War, of great Courage and Experience, and that of them he should erect a new Militia, that should wholly depend on him, entreating only 40000 in pay, which should always be his Guard; and that in the Distribution of every Province, he should constitute, that the Beglerbeg in his Government should train some of the Inhabitants, who in in occasions of making a great Army, should be in readines, and thereby he should spare infinite Treasures spent upon these drones that eat up his Estate; and with Men of new Spirits and Hopes, he should be enabled to do greater matters than any of his Ancestors; but withal, he desired the King to communicate to him some of his Power, to trust his Life upon another's secret. Delair Bassa never revealing himself to any but the King, who extremely pleased with this advice, that flattered his own humour, consented, and remitted all to the Vissiers direction, who was a true Soldier, and a very wise man, able by his Credit in Asia to perform all he had undertaken, and exceeding belov'd in those parts, very rich, and had kept Damascus, whereof he was Governor, for himself in a late Rebellion. Upon this Conclusion between them, it was first agreed, That the King should pretend to go in Person either to visit Mocha, or against the Emir de Sidon, who was moved to take Arms really to assist in his Conquest; but they used it to colour the departure of the Emperour, which, when it was well weighed, was found, that then the Army of the Janizaries must be kept together, which could not agree with their ends. Hereupon the Journey of the Pilgrimage was divulged, That the King might under the Shadow of a holy Devotion go out with a small Train, and disperse those who were suspected to him. And for this Preparation was made, but somewhat too grossly; by melting of all the Plate, Saddles, furniture of Houles, Lamps of Churches, and whatsoever could more easily be conveyed away in Metal, with all the Jewels and Treasures. This gave the first suspicion, which was confirmed by divers unadvised words let fall from the King; of disdain against the Cowardice of the Janizaries, and that he would shortly find himself Soldiers that should whip them; and lastly, dismissing all his Household, except some few elect; the discontented for observed this and betrayed him. Delair Bassa kept his own secret, and the next time prepared by his Friends in Asia ten thousand men; about Damascus ten thousand, from the Coords, besides those in readines of the Emir de Sidon; and all upon pretence of defending the Borders of Perfia, who might make some advantage of the changes in those parts; and gave order, That all they should meet the King at Damascus, where he would presently cut off his Guard, and slay there until he had regulated his new Army and Discipline, and then to return triumphant to Constantinople, and utterly root out the order of Janizaries, Spahies, and Timariots, and to exaucatorate all their Captains and Officers, to give a new Government, and to change the Name of the City. And these things succeeding, he then relolved with his new Souldiers to attempt the recovery of his Honour in Christendom; in the mean time to hold a dissembled Friendship there in all parts. Certainly this was a brave and well-grounded design, and of great consequence for renewing of that decayed Empire, languishing under the Infidelities of lazy Slaves, if God had not destroyed it; it being very true, That the Turkish Emperour stands at the Devotion of his own Troops for Peace or War, Life or Death, and is in effect nothing but the Steward or Treasurer of the Janizaries. If this project had taken effect, what Janizaries it might have produced by a Civil War, is not easy to judge. For doubtless the Souldiery would have let up another King, and maintained him as well as they could; and the European part had been in danger to have been torn away by the division. Besides, Delaur Bassa having the King and the Treasury in his Possession, and his own credit so great, and his Inclination velite imperare, so willing to bear rule, once discovered, it might well be thought that he had some ends of his own to that part of this mighty Estate; if on the other side the Visier had proved true and faithful, the reformation and new erection of the Discipline of War, and the increase of Treasure consequent to the diminution of the old Militia, would have been fearful to all Christendoms; but ubi est sapiens? ubi disquisitor seculi? ubi? Perdam sapientiam sapientum, & vanam redam intelligentiam, intelligentem. It is a great question whether then was the wiser will, That these Counsels had succeeded, or not; for either division and subversion, or a new prosperity and enlargement of their Dominion had necessarily followed.

Some Observations upon this Occasion will not be impertinent to those that desire to know as well the Disposition and use, as the things themselves. First, in the purpose of the Souldier, not at all to violate or hurt the King, much less to depole and murder him; but only to take away those about him whom they thought assistants in this project; yet the fury once on foot, they proceeded by insensible steps to the uttermost of outrage, against many Innocents in that Business, though otherwise obnoxious, and against the Throne and Life of their own Emperour, Ubi furor ingrat, innocentes ac nocuos juxta cadere; where Rage and Fury hath got the upper hand, there the innocent and nocent fare alike. Secondly, in the degrees that yet the King had not fallen thus low, if it had been not lost that awe and reverence which always attendeth upon Majesty, if he kept up, by unbecomly Offices done by him in the Streets and Taverns, apprehending many Souldiers for petty faults, like a Constable; making his Person common, cheap, and despised among them; which was wont only to be seen and feared, as somewhat above humane greatness. And this he did also in hatred and disdain of those that had in the War forsaken him. And now in this last act, if his own obliquity had not plunged him into Destruction, but that he had softened them by a reasonable yielding to time, he had prevailed only by time. Thirdly, in the order, that these Mutiniers having no Head or Direction, kept that relement, that they took Oath in their Fury, in hot blood, in the Kings yard, not to dishonour, spoil, nor sack the Imperial Throne; neither committed nor suffered any infidelity or violence in the City to the Neutrals, but rather proclaimed Peace and Justice. Fourthly, in the Consequents, that at the third day end all was quiet, and all Men in their Trade, as if no such thing had happened; only the Janizaries suffered no Divan nor Council until they had received a donative as Guerdon of their Iniquity. In which also the infinite waste of Treasure is worthy the Consideration, which was exceedingly exhausted by three changes in four years, and by the late Wars in Persia and Poland; for every Janizary in the City, absent or present (whole list was about forty thousand) received twenty five Chequeins of Gold; besides the Spahies, Janogians, and other Orders, at every alteration; which amounts in all near to two Millions. And now those Fellows that had tasted the sweet of prosperous Mutinies (haud ignari summa sceleris incipi cum periculis praeiis premiis) took such a Head, as could not fairly be suffered on, nor securely be taken off. Fifthly, of certain Prefages that fore-run, for Osman dreamed in the Night, That he thought he rid a Camel, and being moomed, he could not force him to go by fair means nor stripes; and that then he defending in a Rage, the Body of the Beast vanished, and left the Bridle and Head in the Kings Hand. Who next day, troubled at this Fancy, sent to a learned Man, familiar with him, for the Interpretation. He excused himself, as unfit to give Opinion in a matter of that Consequence; but perwaded Osman to enquire of the Mufi. He also craved pardon; but withal said, there was none so fit to interpret it as Mustapha the Kings Uncle, who was esteemed a holy man, that had Visions and Angel-like Speculations, (in plain terms, between a Mad-man and a Fool.) The King repaired to Mustapha, who briefly told him, The Camel signified his Empire, his riding, able in Government; his disfection, his Disposition; the vanishing of the Body, the revolve of his Subjects; the Head remaining in his Hand, only a bare Title; and that he should shortly die within few Months, and lose his Kingdom, but the empy Name of Emperour should accompany him to his Grave.

A second of like consequence in the Visier Delaur Bassa, from whom his Majesties Ambassador having received particular Friendship, about six days before this uprose, he went to the Kings house, having no other business but to perwade him to slay the King from his intended Pilgrimage, the Ambassador gave him many Reasons in the present Estate of their own Affairs; especially, the Treaty of Poland yet depending. To which the Bassa replied very gravely. Then the Ambassador urged the fear of some Tumult, collected from the licentious Speeches rumoured in the Town: And he was bold to demand, sincerely, and friendly, That if any such thing should happen, the fault would be imputed to the Bassa, as being of authority to perwade the King; whom his Quality and Youth would excuse, but all the Fury would be discharged upon the greatest Minister; desiring him to consider the event, at least to take his Reflection in the best part.

The old Remard flayed a while from reply; at last smiling to himself that he should be perwaded against that which was his own Council, he gave a final answer, That there was no Remedy, he durst not hazard himself to oppose the Kings Resolutions: but assured him he would for order the matter, as this Journey should not proceed so far as was expected. The Ambassador concluded for himself, desiring then that he would leave him a particular recommendation to the Chimacham or Deputy as his Friend. To which he suddenly replied, Trouble not your self, nor fear, I will never remove so far, but that I will leave one of my Legs in the City to serve you. Which the poor man fulfilled, for being murdered within few days after, one of his Legs whole and entire was hanged in the Hippodrome, the most publick place of the City.

The reading of History, to know what is done and past, having in it no Recompence but Delight, unless it look forward to Use and Action, either either to correct Errors, or by that light to gather advantage in future, it will not be an unprobable digression to observe what was like to succeed these monstrous Alterations. It was feared by contemplative men, that the Souldiers in Asia, who had lost their hope, would rather attempt some revenge for the Death of the King, who was their Martyr; or that some great Bassa, far removed from Court, might apprehend this occasion, not to obey an Usurper, set up by Treason; and under that colour to hide their own Ambition; or lastly, that the whole State would fall into Combustion, and intestine War. This they themselves foresaw, and it came to pass, as will appear within few Months. Mustapha (the Duke of Arcireum) declared himself revenger of his Princes Blood, and troubled, and almost hazarded the whole Empire. The Persian apprehended the Opportunity, and recovered the Province and City of Babylon: and the same Souldiers that had betrayed their Prince, were never quiet until they had made some satisfaction, by restoring his Brother and right Heir; only it pleased not God to open the Eyes of Christian Princes to the Inconvenience of their own ancient Quarrels, while the distractions of this mighty Empire did invite to conquer it, and to divide it as a profuted Prey.

On Saturday Evening, the first of June following, the Capi-aga or Major Domo of the Seraglio, having received a secret order to remove the Brethren of Osman from their Lodgings, and in the Night to strangle them; as he was performing his Command, aided with a few of his Carabazes to carry away the Princes, they cried out; the Pages running to the roile, and encouraged by the Capi-aga, who had some Suspicion, now almost every Order having risen against their own Head. That Night they sent secretly to the Janizaries and Spahies, to inform them what they had done; and in the Morning early hanged his Body in the Hippodrome for a publick spectacle. The Souldiers returned in fury to the Court, in favour of the Pages, and demanded Justice against those that had conferred to this wicked order, which had made an end of all the Ottoman race; only this Mustapha being left alive, who was so holy a Saint, that he would not People the World with Sinners, nor endure any Woman near him. The innocent King protested he knew nothing of this purpose; and if such command were procured, it was gotten by subornation; and he was easily believed. But his Mother, another Livia, and the new Visier, Daoud Bassa, who had her Daughter to Wife, were vehemently suspected. It was a day of Divan or Council; but the Souldiers would suffer none, until they had an account of this Treason. The Visier denied all; the Mother was a Woman, and hidden in the Houle; yet it is very likely, they both were guilty, to uphold and secure their own Authority; it being rumoured, that the Visier determined to place subditiouly in the room of the Elder Prince, his own Son, and very like him, and so to govern Mustapha for a time, and by his remove to establish himself and his race forever. But now somewhat must be done to appease the People; therefore Daoud Bassa, degraded from his Office, and one Husein Bassa, newly arrived from the Government of Cassia, advanced to his place, with promise of further Examination. But the fury once over, there was no great search nor discovery made, for perhaps the Sultans Chequeins quieted the matter. The new Visier was a man without Friends, yet very rich, of a stubborn and obdinate Nature, reported just in his ways, but peremptory and inflexible (Audax ferax, ac prout animus intendit, prout aut induritus eadem vi) one from whom all men might expect much good, or much ill; he began his Government roughly, and undertook to punish Infidelities early, and prolested a Reformation, or to be a Sacrifice: A man fit for those times that were desperate; for the world was, that he must at last endure their Fury. In the mean time he procured a little awe, and restored the face of Justice; yet it was thought it could not last long, the Ghost of Osman would not be at rest until there were some Parentalia made unto him. The Nature of the Visier was unsupportable, but if he prevailed, and were once settled, he resolved anew to change the King, and lay an Obligation upon the Brethren of Osman; for he did never think himself secure under a man governed by an insolent Woman, dominandi avida, desirous to rule. And what assistance could he have in that Prince, in whom there was neither Judgment nor Hatred, but as it was insinuated; And though the particulars could not be foreseen, nor where the sore would break out, yet the whole Body was sick, their King being mentis imbecilis, an Idiot; and the next in expectation a Child unfit for Action, and all the great Men and Souldiers decay'd, mutined, and corrupted.

In the mean time, the Duke of Sbarsky came near unto the Borders of the Turkish Empire, and ignorant of those great changes which had happened, sent a Servant with a Letter to the Paia Visier Delaur Bassa, with whom only the Paia had treaty. The contents were, That the King of Poland had sent him to conclude a Peace, upon such Conditions as were agreed upon by the Visier, and the Commissioners of Poland, signed on both parts; but that it was reported upon the Death of the Grand Seigneur, that the new Government was varied from some of them; and that he had no other Instructions to treat anew; but if he would give his word to the English Ambassador, that there was no alteration in the intents of Peace, he was ready to set forward on his Journey. This Letter received by the new Visier, was Greek to him, who was lately come from Castro, and understood no article nor piece of the business; which was so secretly carried by Delaur Bassa, that Sultan Osman and he being dead, there was no man had so much as a Copy, or knew the substance of that agreement; so that the Visier giving good Words, altho' to confess his Ignorance, promised all things but knew not what to write in particular answer, and therefore was at a stand. The Messenger nevertheless impudently a dispatch, the which he had in general terms, and so returned again to the Duke his Master upon the Confines.

With this Nuntio, the Duke wrote to Sir Thomas Roe; and being very doubtful to intangle himself in this unsettled Government, desired him both to counsel him, and to tell the Visier, that he would not advance unless he might receive such assurance of safety and publick Faith, as that he might engage his credit to him; hoping thereby to have both assistance and witness in all his proceeding. Which gave the Visier occasion to intreat the English Ambassador, both to promise for the good usage of the Duke, and to hasten him, and also to inform himself by him of the substance of the Treaty of Chosyn; which being by him undertaken, it turned to the great advantage of both, especially of the Peace it fell.

The seventeenth of June in the Morning, the Prince Corekie, one of the Lords of Poland, taken Prisoner in the late War, recommended by his Majesty of Great Britain, who had formerly made

The Paia Ambassador approach upon the Confines, and writeth to the dead Visier.

The English Ambassador Advice to Delaur Bassa.

Observations upon this Occasion.

frangé in Prison.

an escape from the Turks Captivity, was frangled in the Prison, after two years of duurance. This put all into mutmur, and deep consideration, for what polittick end this should be done, even when they themselves desired a Peace with the Poles, and yet did that which might utterly break the same; but it seemed they were at that time either carried with a brutish Fury, or that the Prince was betrayed from home, by intimation that his remnant Nature would never suffer the Peace long to continue between the Crown of Poland and the Grand Seignor.

The Visier
uncompreh to let up Morat the Brother of Ojman, and to depole Mustapha.

The Visier (who caused this Polack Prince to be frangled) upon some intreat towards the Aga or chief Captain of the Janizaries, took this occasion to cast the fault on him, and to cashier him; and sent him to the Islands to be frangled; and gave order to murder some other Baffaes and Officers, and that way being made to depole the Emperor Mustapha, to let up Morat a Child, and Brother of Ojman, many being of his party. Whereupon the Soldiers rose all in Arms at the Scraglio, taking the alarm at the meddling with their Aga, rescued their Captain, and the rest, and demanded the Head of the Visier; whereupon he fled, and order was given to kill him where he could first be found. The Soldiers also required the Life of Morat, Aga Customer, and divers others; but for fear of other Complices, they durst reach no further into the Conspiracy; only the Visiers House was sacked, and infinite Treasures taken, so that the Soldier was quiet for a day or two by making a new Visier, Mustapha Baffa; who was of a soft Nature, Child, scarce durst do Justice for fear of offending any Man. Now a new Faction was made between Mustapha and Morat; and it was expected hourly when there should be some great slaughter or massacre in the City; for of Necessity one side must fall.

There was then no security for any Man; when the King and Visiers, and all Officers held their Lives and Dignities at the courtesy of the mutined Soldier, who had tasted the sweet of Rebellion, and cast off all Awe and Reverence, and could not easily be reduced to order, without much blood and hazard of the whole. Therefore the wiser men retired from Office and Employment, and the inefficient did cause their own daily change and ruine. The Soldier adhered to the King of their own creation, and he was in effect their Creature, for they did wholly govern him. But the Lawyers and Church-men made secret conventions, and still practised some great alteration, and feared not to lay openly, that foundation of their State was dissolved, the King unlawful, and all that had adhered unto him lapsed into Heretic, having depised the Institutions of Mahomet. They wrought by wife Counsels, and held a large Correspondency with those of their own Coat, and spread their Confederacy to all parts of the Empire, to procure a Faction, and kindle a greater Fire than that of the Soldiers; for at Bagdat the Captain of the Janizaries rose and slew the Baffa, burnt the Mufti and all his Kin, and gave his Daughter in marriage to one Aflan Beg, a pretender to the ancient Inheritance of a bordering Province, to canonize that part. All Asia was in doubt to whom to obey; and Cairo was eaten up with Oppression; and that which was most dangerous, they had no fence of the sickness in the Court, to cure it, nor any of them so wise as to dissemble it.

The two and twentieth of August, the extraordinary Ambassador of Berthelm Gabor Prince of Transilvania arrived at Constantinople, who, according to other Instructions, had order to excuse his Master, and to declare the Reasons why he had made Peace with the Emperor without the knowledge of the Port: which were, That the War had continued three years in the Kingdom of Hungary, and had so confounded and defoliated the Country, that it was impossible for him to stay longer in the Field, and to maintain an Army, for the great Famine and scarcity of all things which the Souldiery suffered, and could from no place be supplied; so that if he had not accepted of Peace offered, he had been enforced to quit the Country of Necessity, and by his seeming flight have left the Enemy Victor. Therefore he was constrained to win time, and return into Transilvania, to refresh his men of War, and to reinforce them; as also his own pressing Affairs calling him back, his Brother, whom he had left Governour in his absence, having advised him, That the King of Poland, by the Infliction of the Emperor, by Intelligence with some of the principal Lords, did practise a revolt, and promised Aid to make a new Prince that should wholly depend upon the Empire and Poland. Lastly, seeing the Grand Seignor had suddenly concluded a Peace with the Poles, he feared he should be left alone to the burden of the War, in which the King of Poland, being at ease, might assist the Emperor, which he was not able to sustain. Therefore he was content to take the Opportunity to accept of that, at the instance of the Emperor, which he should have been forced to do by Necessity.

Yet afterward, although he made this Apology for his Master, for concluding a Peace, he assured the Port, that his Master came not long to keep the same; informing them, that the Emperor had made a League (being at that time quiet in Germany) to invade the Ottoman Empire; persuading the Port to grant a Commission with full Power and Authority to him and the Baffa of Buda (who had been twenty years in that charge, and knew all the Borders) if they saw it fit, to prevent the Enemy, and to invade the Empire or the Kingdom of Poland. This demand was made by Gabor, to insinuate with the State of Turky, and to get a Power dormant in his Hands, to advance into Hungary, if he saw advantage, or to oblige the Emperor; and to assure his Peace, by having means not to care if it were broken. But the Grand Seignor finding himself, by reason of civil Diffractions at home, unfit for a War abroad, and that they saw Berthelm Gabor had no other thing in recommendation than his own Designs and Fortune, his Ambassadors Propositions began to be altogether slighted and neglected.

The Duke of Sbarasky, who came to conclude the Peace between his Master the King of Poland, and the Grand Seignor, after long stay upon the Confines, did at length arrive at the Port; but they made him stay five Weeks before he could have audience, forcing him to give a Pledge contrary to his Instructions. Notwithstanding he could not get them to enter into a Treaty, finding nothing but falshood and uncertainty among them, no Promise nor Faith kept, no Prisoners delivered, nor indeed any thing at all performed; for now that they had him within their Liberties, they hoped to work their own ends, and to weary him out, who had twelve hundred of his ordinary train. They threatened to keep him, and to denounce a War against his Master; yet, by the mediation of the English Ambassador, the Ministers of the Port and he were peeced again, and the Peace concluded; as shall be hereafter set down at large.

After many Difficulties to obtain admittance to the presence of the Grand Seignor, caused by the frowardness of the old Eunuch Georgi Mehemet Baffa, then Great Visier, who, discovering that the Duke would complain against Tomha Vayvod of Valachia, and his Creature, endeavoured by all fraud, cunning, threatening, and falshood delays, to divert him from that purpose; being told that the Actions of him whom he had followed and maintained in many Tyrannies, especially in the occasion of the late War, should be examined or layed open to Justice. But when he saw that nothing could prevail, but that he must hazard a direct breach by the discontent of the Duke; and that the People began to murmur, and the English Ambassador to protect him, he was admitted, and nobly received, according to the pompous custom of that Court; and with his Letter of Credence he spake these following Words.

The Oration of the Duke of Sbarasky to the Grand Seignor.

SIGISMUND, by the Grace of God, King of Poland, Sueden, Gothia, Vandalia, Great Duke of Lithuania, and of many other Provinces Prince and Lord: To your most Renowned Majesty, most Mighty Emperor of Asia and Europe, and King of many Kingdoms and Provinces, ever most happy, witheth Health; and by me his Great Ambassador salutes you with all convenient Reverence and Honour; desiring to your Majesty from the most high God, the fulness of all Prosperity, Happinefs, long Life, Triumph above your Ancestors, Princes worthy of all Memory.

HIS High Majesty of Poland, considering the depth and height of the decrees of the Great God, marvelling with all the World, and praising his High Name; that comfort and joy himself, being more than certain, that, that eternal Power which hath preserved your Majesty from all evil destinies of Men, and from the Bowels of the Earth, and hath placed you in the shining Throne, hath not done it but for the publick good; and like a wise Gardiner, who hath weeded out all venomous and noysome Plants, that be hath placed your Majesty in their room, as a noble and sweet smelling Flower, full of Virtue, Clemency, and Peace, desired of all the World. His Majesty, my Lord and Sovereign, hath always wished, that not only the Actions of later years, but of many ages past, might have been forgotten; and that that Friendship and Peace begun with the Renowned Ottoman Kings two hundred and more years since, might have been without interruption continued. But seeing that the Great God hath been pleased to chastise the People of both parts, by the means of wicked men, that he not be accepted for good which cometh from his divine Will; therefore, blinding our Mind whatsoever is past, do now return to desire the continuance of the first antient Peace, and doth offer himself to your high Majesty to keep it irrevocably, as it was maintained in the time of Sultan Amurath of happy Memory. In witness of which his Sincerity, he hath not apprehended the Opportunity of a breach begun by the Persians, who expiration of the Truce with the Emperor of Germany, nor the many Revolts and Troubles in Asia, nor hearkened to the Infliction of many Christian Princes, his Friends and Allies, nor to the Tartar discontent; but rather, having refused all other ways, hath with the Blood of his own Subjects, and the charge of his Turfe, regained from the Rebel Valachia, Moldavia, and a part of Transilvania, and rendered those Provinces into the Hands of your Majesty's Father, who suffered no man at any time to disturb on that side the Friends of your Empire; giving Intelligence, like a good Friend and a Neighbour to your Ancestors, of all your Enemies Designs and Machinations, and in as much as was possible endeavoured to preserve a good Peace and Friendship; which he offered to your most serene Majesty, submitting himself to the Capitulations treated at Chorony, and those of your most happy Father and Brother; praying your Majesty that they may be confirmed and maintained. And not doubting but your Majesty will refrain the Tatars, as he will do the Cossacks; and that you will suffer no occasion of kindling new Fires, he beseecheth your Majesty to do what Justice you think meet upon Cantemir and Tomha, who, contrary to the agreements and publick Faith, have made spoil and new Incurfions into Poland, even since my departure from thence; and with many Deceits and false Advices have directed to disturb the happy beginnings of Accommodation. And seeing that by the ancient Capitulations made with the most warlike Sultan Solyman, and his Successors, the Father and Brother of your Majesty, the Princes of Moldavia, the Baffaes of Silistria, and the Beghs of Ackitman ought to keep the Passages of the Rivers to restrain the Tatars; and that those now in Possession of those Governments are already known, and grown bold in their rapine and spoil, that they may be dismissed, and their Provinces given to some others more inclined to Peace. For Cantemir, it is a true rule observed, that one Tartar can hardly govern another, where both live upon spoils, and how easily upon any occasion new Troubles are apprehended by the most ancient Enemies, I leave to your Highness; Withall, in which your Majesty is so assured, that he doubteth not, that for the publick good, and for the Complaints and Tears of both Subjects, you will also vouchsafe to accept the request of your Friend, and a King your Neighbour. And if all the World, and the People thereof rejoice and praise God for the Friendship and Peace between your Majesty and the King, my Master began and concluded, he hopes that the poor and miserable Prisoner shall participate of your Clemency, that they may join in the general care to pray to the eternal God for increase of your Greatness. The King my Master doth therefore desire your Majesty to grant Liberty to those who are in your Captivity, as he bindeth himself to let free all such of your Majesties Subjects as are now his Prisoners; and I do promise on the behalf of my Master, that he shall be a Friend to your Friends, and an Enemy to your Enemies. In conclusion, he deserveth all Happinefs and Prosperity to your Majesty from a clear Heart; in sign and testimony whereof, and of the Friendship begun on his part, he honoureth you with a Present, which you may be pleased to receive with your accustomed benignity; and hunting your Ears to such Informers, Enemies of Peace, as are found at your Port, that you will receive him for a Friend and Neighbour of the most Royal and Antient Kings of your most Princely Family.

The Soldiers continued still in their mutinous Disposition, even in Constantinople, the Head City of the Turkish Empire, and grew to that height of Insolency, that going in Troops to the Court, they demanded all Offices of gain; to be Stewards to the Reverendies of the Churches, which are great to take the Farms of Customs; and there committed many other Outrages which were unbecomable. The Visiers durst deny them nothing; they

The Prince of Transilvania his Ambassador arrived at the Port.

After

1622 they drunk Wine in the Streets without Prohibition, contrary to their Law; and stood in Companies in the open day exacting Money of all Christians to pay for their Wine; and being denied it, stabbed and murdered without any Punishment; and when complaint was made to the Visier or Magistrate, they answered, None durst meddle with them, who had murdered their own King; and the Bassas themselves defied the Complainers patience, and that they would wear a part with the general sufferance.

About the same time, the Janizaries in the Gallies kept before Smirna, commanded by the Captain Hadi Bassa, assaulted, against his Will, the Houses of all the Christian Consuls there. The English, with all those of the other Nations, were forced to run naked from their Lodgings; and to swim to the Admirals Gallies to save their Lives; they rancked the lower parts of the House, and carried away to the value of two thousand Dollars; the French sustained more loss; and the Venetians at least ten thousand, and one of the Subjects of that State cut in pieces. The General had much ado to appease them by Entreats or Perfwasions, or to save the lives of all; inasmuch as they misfealed and threatened him, because he would not consent to their madness. In conclusion, he was fain presently to put to Sea, or else they had smothered the Trade at that Place.

In Afia there was then three open Rebelions, one at Babylon, another at Arzerum, upon the borders of Perfia near Tauris, and the third in Mesopotamia. The Visiers at the Port disembled all this, and durst take no knowledge thereof, nor so much as to send a command thither, for fear of blowing the Fire, which would have put all into Combustion; whereupon they held a secret Council, and consented to remove themselves, to prove if they could recover the desperate Estate of that Empire, and took Resolution to make Hadi Bassa (the best Souldier and most beloved) great Visier; and in his room Daoud Bassa Captain of the Sea; and the present Visier, Chimechan or Lieutenant at the Port; and in the Spring following, they resolved to send the Visier into Afia, with all the force they could make; to which end they sent into Grace, to warn all the Souldiers to be ready at Adramyde, not daring to make a rendezvous at the Port, for fear of new Trouble; and so to pass the Hellespont, wide of the City, to appease (if they could) those Revolts, and by that way to draw the Mutiniers from the Court into Action, and to reduce them unto Obedience. And notwithstanding that there was no other symptom or predition but such as threatened the ruine of that Empire, yet were they never more diligent nor more fearing not to distrust themselves, their only security being, that they had no Enemy but themselves.

The Treasury was far exhausted, the Revenue abated by the Oppression of every Bassa in his Government; the Souldier increased both in pay and number; and so impatient of delay, that at every quarter, (besides borrowing and taking up of the Farms of the Customs before-hand) there were so many intolerable Exactions to raise Money, that the appearance of domestick quiet could not long endure between two extremes; for means could not be found, and the Janizaries would not be contented nor deferred; and this was their general Estate at that time.

While the Polish Ambassador was treating the Peace at the Port, whereof there was no great doubt, because neither side was fit for War, there arrived an Ambassador from the Great Duke of Muscovia, which gave some Interruption therein, precluding the Grand Seignior to continue the War for seven years against Poland, according to the promise of Sultan Ofman; offering that his Master should enter into Poland with an Army, and that they would divide the Country between them; but his Proposition was rejected, because they had sufficient Trial of his Master's cunning proceedings in the last War. For the Muscovite, having made Peace with Poland (before the Invasion of Ofman) for fourteen years, and being invited by him to break it and to invade that Country, upon promise that he would continue the War for seven years, and make no agreement without their comprehension; first answered, That he could not break the Peace; thinking that the other was but a flash of a young Prince; but so soon as he saw the Turks in the Field and Borders of Poland, then he began to hope he might make advantage; and therefore promised Sultan Ofman, on the Conditions mentioned, to enter into the Quarrel. And to that end dispatched an Ambassador to Poland, with Instructions to demand three things. First, that the Prince of Poland should renounce the Title of Elect Duke of Muscovia. The second, That the Poles should restore a Territory in the Border of Lithuania, taken in the last War. Lastly, that the Peace should be perpetual, threatening, that if they refused those Conditions, he would enter into the Country with an Army, and get what he could. This Ambassador being arrived in the Confines, heard News that the Poles had repulsed the Turk at Chodyn, that he was retired, and a Peace treated; whereupon he feigned himself sick, and sent back a Post with this Advice and his old Instructions, desiring in this alteration some new order from home. The Governor of the Town where he lay, suspecting somewhat, intercepted the Messenger and his Packet, and sent it presently to the King. The man returned to his Master the Ambassador, as robbed; and was again dispatched the second time, and sent back with another Stile, to wit, with Letters of Congratulation, Joy, and Offers of all help and continuance of the Peace; with these the Ambassador went forward to the Court; and having audience, the King answered him, That if his Message were sincere, it had been very acceptable; but he knew it to be a forged Treason, and no Faith intended from the Muscovite, and therefore commanded him to depart.

The Ambassador protested, vowed, and used all means to assure the Integrity of his Message; until he was confronted by the Chancellor, with his own Letter and his Masters Instructions. Hereupon was this other dispatched to the Port to hinder the Peace, and to offer all their help to continue an Invasion. In the mean time the Muscovite neglected no means to secure himself, and by renewing two Ambassadors, obtained a Peace with Poland, which was then again confirmed. To which the Poles were the willing to agree, not knowing what effect the Negotiations of the Duke of Sherasky might produce at the Port. And now the Muscovite was forced to dissemble again with the Turk, and make his preparation to depart.

The Great Visier Georgi, envying the Authority of Daoud Bassa, the beloved Son of the Queen Mother, and Brother-in-Law to the Emperor Mustapha (which had formerly been deposed) who had been both the Instrument and the Counsellor to murder Sultan Ofman, fearing that he should understand govern in his Reign, especially because he countenanced in opposition the Duke of Sherasky's business, he therefore pretended to put him to Death; but not daring to do it by his own Authority, and in vain to procure it from the

1622 the Court, he stirred up the Spahies to demand Justice of him for the Death of the last King. This looked further than the first affront; for the subtil Visier, who was faithful to his true Lord, and knowing the rage of an ungoverned Multitude, aimed at a by-revenge upon others, whom he hoped would be involved and accused, of the Murder; and the Souldier soon raised and mutined in the Seraglio, they demanded him. Daoud fled, but now that the business was on foot, if he were not found the Visier himself was in danger; and the poor man was taken and brought to the Divan, and there being called to the publick Justice, he must excuse himself upon some greater Person; wherein the Emperor and his Mother ran a new hazard, which was the secret end. Therefore both of them took care, and left him to the Law; and without any Trial he was brought before the Souldiers, stripped, his Turban taken off, and on his Knees ready to receive the stroke of Death; but suddenly the Janizaries came to his rescue, and carried him away to their Chambers. The Spahies, who began this Action, took it in ill part, and followed with great outcries, That they would have him die; the others demanded that he might be held in publick Justice. Thus those two mutual Factions were ready to come to blows. Daoud Bassa, now in some hope of Life, bribed the Janizaries, and that day distributed forty thousand Chequins of Gold, and they promised to protect him. Who did not now think but he was taken away for safety; But the Spahies followed their first Resolution; and to appease the fear of that Diffelition, it was agreed he should die. They that meant to save him, could not, but preserved him for a greater example of Justice. They would not now let him lose his Head in the Court, for that Death was too honourable for him that had murdered his Prince. Then the Janizaries put him secretly into the same Coach wherein he had sent Sultan Ofman to Execution; twice in the way, being dry with Sorrow, he drank at the faine Fountains where his last Master begged drink, and he was conveyed into the same Chamber where he had murdered him. The Executioners beginning to tie him, himself shewed the very cover where he had committed that foul fact, and desired that there he might (if possible) expiate it; and so he was at last miserably strangled. Thus he had his Reward, and God was just also even for the wicked.

About the twentieth of February, the Peace (after many rubs) between the Grand Seignior and the King of Poland, by the Mediation of the English Ambassador (who was chosen by the Grand Seignior as Arbitrator of all differences) after many meetings with Diac Mahomet Bassa, Commissioner for the Treaty, was concluded; the Duke having first been forced to send this following Remonstrance for his Expedition, which much moved the Visier, and quickened the Conclusion.

The Duke of Sherasky's Remonstrance to the Great Visier.

YOur Excellency may be pleased to remember the happy and honourable Treaty made before Chodyn; in which a Peace was concluded between the Ottoman Empire and the Kingdom of Poland, signed by Commissioners on both parts; wherein (with reference to other ancient Treaties) it was agreed, That a great Ambassador should come to the Imperial Port, as well to confirm and swear the Peace, as to set in order some other incident Circumstances, as then not fully taken into Consideration. Since which, the King and Republick of Poland, having elected me for that Employment, his Majesty and my self have received many Letters from Delauri, Daoud, Huzcin, and Mustapha, Bassas, all great Vissiers; not only promising a speedy end and dispatch of the Conclusion of Peace, which on both parts is so much desired, but also the release of our Captives, and all other respects of Love and Friendship, according to the antient Honour of the Imperial Port, desiring me upon that assurance to proceed with Alacrity and Expedition. And further, it having pleased his Majesty of Great Britain (a Friend to both) to mediate in this pious Office, by his Ambassador rejoind, and sent to that end; who hath given me by his Letters great encouragement and hopes of a real and true proceeding in this business, agreeable to divers Promises made unto him, which be accordingly hath informed his own Master; I was very glad of this honourable function, and hoped to have found as ready performance as is by his Majesty and all the World expected.

To this end I am come to the Port, with full Power and Instructions from his Majesty and the Republick of Poland, to conclude and finish a full and perpetual Peace, with all sincerity and heartiness; and in his Majesties Name to swear the same, offering to be Friend to the Friends, and Enemy to the Enemies of this Imperial Port reciprocally, and to be ready to treat and accommodate all or any other Circumstances incident to a business of so great Consequence.

Since my arrival, notwithstanding that I have produced both the mentioned Treaty at Chodyn, and Letters how little I have advanced in the main Affairs, and the doubtful Consequences of a long protraction, I desire you to consider, having as yet proceeded no further in substance, than the delivery of my Letters and Presents, and to that end, that there may never be imputed to the King and Republick of Poland any slackness in present, or any breach in future, out of a sincere and good desire to establish this Treaty pure and firm, and to open a clear and true Peace. I am enforced to make this true Declaration; and desire your Excellency to weigh maturely the motives following.

I do not repine at mine own stay at this Imperial Port, where I receive all Honour; I do not doubt of the sincere and faithful meaning of the Empire to conclude the Peace; but the deferring hereof may, against our Wills, breed three Inconveniences.

First, your Excellency hath known, that the Conflicts are a People not easily to be restrained, if they be once at Liberty, and that they live upon their Arms. They have ready eight hundred Boats to make an Invasion into the Black Sea. In the Winter they cannot move; they attend only the advice of the Conclusion of Peace; therefore now is the season to finish and publish it, for if by long delays it shall be deferred unto the Spring, and that Yearly or their own desire let them free, your Excellency hath known in Wisdom how difficult it is to reduce into order a People of that Condition, which for our parts, we are now able and ready to prevent; the State having ordained to satisfy them, and to buy their Boats upon the first intimation of a Conclusion.

Secondly, it is the order of our Nation every Spring to call a Parliament for the relement of all publick Affairs, of which assembly I am a Member; if I shall be slain here, and not able to render a reason thereof, it will breed great Suspition and disturbance in the general Reputation; you may consider, that in all parts there are some unquiet Men, Friends of Sedition and War, and many that make advantage of others Troubles, who may do ill Offices, such as the innocent may be sorry for but cannot help.

Thirdly, the Eyes of all Princes are set upon the Honour and Faith kept on both parts in this Treaty, and accordingly will govern their own Occasions.

For these Reasons I do in his Majesty's Name desire your Excellency to give me a dispatch, such as may bring Joy and Content to all, by avoiding the Miseries of War; and in such time, that the Snows and Difficulties of Winter that we not up; but that I may return as well to satisfy his Majesty and the Republic in our general Assembly, as to retain those, who may be cause of much trouble, without our Consents.

There is no Difficulty that I understand. I am content to accept the ancient and honourable Treaties made with the famous Emperor Solymann and his Successors, and now lately at Chotyn; if there be any other difference, I have Power, and am ready to accommodate it.

My desire then only is, That a present End and Conclusion be made of a Peace, firm, and perpetual, and that the Emperor will be pleased, according to many promises, to deliver and let free the Captives taken in the last Wars; as I do in his Majesty's Name give my Word that all others taken on our parts shall have Liberty and Passport to return. And if there have been any Difficulty made by occasion of my pressure for the rejection of Tomha, and Cante-Emir-Emirze, I do make this true Protestation, That as it is the Request of his Majesty, my King, in Friendship, so there is no other end nor cause of that desire, but only to remove all occasion of offence and breach with this Imperial Port, which both Ill Neighbours are ever ready to minister; But if that be any great Inconvenience to this Imperial Port, I only then seek, that better order may be taken with them for the future, that they may live quietly without offence of the public Peace.

I desire your Excellency to weigh and consider these my Reasons and Protestations, which proceed only from a good and sincere Heart, to promote and maintain an inviolable and good Friendship with this Imperial Port.

Within two days after, the Duke of Sharskie took his leave of the Emperor, to the great Joy of himself and his Train, who thereby saw themselves delivered out of Captivity. The three great and noble Prisoners were set free, and did make a public acknowledgement of his Majesty of Great Britain's Favour, to whom both the Ambassador and they attributed the best part of their good Success, and gave particular Thanks by Letter.

Articles Contrasted between the Grand Seigneur and the King of Poland.

HIS Majesty of Poland, having sent into our happy Port his well deserving and famous great Ambassador, the most Illustrious Duke of Sharskie, to offer us sincere Peace, loyal Friendship, and good Correspondence, and to seek that the ancient Peace and Friendship should be of us anew confirmed, and the old Capitulations renewed, and that for the time to come there might be established an eternal Peace and Friendship: His Kingly instance hath been most pleasing to us, and we have ordained, That all the ancient Treaties shall be renewed, and at the present have given this our Capitulation with the following Articles.

First, That never upon our part, nor of any of our Officers, Begs, Cadets, Officers, nor Soldiers, any harm shall be done to the Provinces, Cities, Castles, Towns, Villages, and other Places pertaining to the King and State of Poland. And likewise upon the part of his Majesty of Poland, that by his Princes, Ministers, or Cjacks, nor any other his Subjects, there shall be no wrong done in any part of our Empire, City, Castle, Town, or Village, but that both parties shall always remain Friends to Friends, and Enemies to Enemies.

II. And seeing that the Tartars of Dobritza, Bialogrod, Keil, Onz, and Silistra, and the People of Moldavia, do enter, invade, and damage the State of Poland; We command, that for the time to come, our Beglerbegs of Silistra, and all other Beglerbegs of Bender, shall take care to keep all those Passages and Rivers, to the end that hereafter the said Nations shall have no passage by those ways to damage the State of Poland; and whosoever it shall be known that the said Ministers have used Negligence in keeping those Passages, according to the Treaty with Sultan Solymann, of happy Memory, that such Ministers be degraded and severely punished.

III. The Payoad of Moldavia likewise shall never grant any Passage to the said Nations; and whosoever it shall be known that the said Payoad hath transgressed in this our Will, he shall be degraded and severely punished.

IV. And whosoever the said Tartars and others, contrary to this our Will, shall make any Invasion or Spoil in the State of Poland, all our Ministers and Governors shall apprehend and severely punish them; and as it is set down in the Agreements with Sultan Solymann, all the Slaves and Prisoners which shall by such Malefactors be brought into our Dominions, shall be set at Liberty, and their Goods restored to them again, and the Malefactors punished for having transgressed our Imperial Capitulations.

V. And if any of our Subjects shall buy any Person or Polish Goods, unjustly taken by such Malefactors, and it shall be made known unto us by the King of Poland; the buyers, for having bought unlawful Goods, their Estate shall be confiscated, and they themselves severely punished.

VI. The Prince Chrim Tartar shall be obedient to us, and all the Tartarian Nation under his Command, Kalgha Sultan, and other Emirs and Princes of his Blood, from henceforth shall never enter into, nor invade any part of the State of Poland, nor ever do any Damage, either by the way of Moldavia, the open Field or Desert, nor shall ever enter into or invade any part or jurisdiction of the same. And at all times that his Majesty of Poland shall give notice, That the said Prince, or others above mentioned, have broken this our Will and Capitulations, and entered and damaged the State, for their Disobedience, the said Prince, as well as the others, shall be by us punished and chastised; and we command, that never any one, in any part of our Dominion, shall sell either People or Goods robbed from the State of Poland; and finding that there be any one that hath dared to buy Men or Goods, robbed from them, such shall be immediately punished with confiscation. And as before mentioned, the Beglerbegs of Silistra, with all Diligence shall keep the Straights of Otuc, and never suffer the said People to pass; and if it shall be known they have transgressed, they shall be punished with loss of their Charge and Office.

VII. And whosoever the said Prince Chrim Tartar, or his Kalka, Emirze, or others, shall by our order be called and commanded in their proper Persons to go to any part of the War in our Service, if by chance they should pass by the Confinues of Poland, as it is set down in the Capitulations of my Father of happy Memory, They shall not enter into any Village, Borough, Castle, or City of Polonia, or do any kind of damage to the People thereof; and finding that they have given any molestation or hurt, they shall be corrected, as is afore said.

VIII. And in Conformity of my Fathers said Capitulation, every time that his Majesty of Poland shall invade invade and call the said Prince Chrim Tartar in his Occasion, of War, whilst he gives him his annual stipend, the said Prince with all his Forces and Army, shall go help and assist his Majesty in every such Occasion, and have all Friendship and Sincerity; to which effect we have given order, that our Imperial Letters be written to the said Prince, in this particular, who shall observe all according to our Will and Pleasure.

IX. And for the better establishing of this our Peace and Amity according to the ancient Capitulations and Obedience, his Majesty of Poland promise to send his Great Ambassador to the said Prince of Tartars, and (beginning from this present, the 24th of the Month of June) to pay yearly to the said Prince his accustomed stipend in this form following. Every year his Majesty shall send the said stipend into the Castle of Chotyn in Moldavia, and the Payoad thereof shall certify the said Prince Chrim, who shall presently send his Ambassador to receive the same, by the hands of the said Prince Chrim, who shall observe this form, and shall be always obedient to this our Imperial Will.

X. And in case that his Majesty of Poland should fail any year to send the said stipend, the Prince Tartar shall not suddenly rise with his Army and invade Poland; but, according to the agreements of Sultan Solymann, continuing still in his Obedience, he shall certify us, and we will procure and recover his right.

XI. His Majesty of Poland shall promise, that from henceforward the officers shall not enter nor come into any part of our Empire by the Rivers of Otuc or any other, nor make any Spoil therein; and if the said Officers do enter into any part of our Dominions and do any hurt, we certify his Majesty by our Imperial Letters, he promises to correct them severely, and to put to death the Malefactors for breaking the Capitulations, and violating the Peace and Amity.

XII. And all our Subjects which shall be made Slaves, and imprisoned by the said Officers, shall be immediately set at Liberty; and the Ministers of his Majesty shall always be diligent to punish the Transgressors, and wholly restore those Persons and Goods which they shall have taken from our said Subjects, and that never any Subject of the King of Poland shall buy any stolen Goods; and if any have presumed and bought, that he be severely punished; and in general all that which we have promised concerning the Tartars and Moldavians, so his Majesty shall always promise to us for the Castles and other his Subjects.

XIII. After the Conclusion of this Peace, if upon the Confinues or open Fields, Fishers or Hunters on either part meeting together, shall happen to fall out, or be at difference by their own Occasion, it shall be no disturbance to this our Peace and Amity.

XIV. Always, according to the ancient Agreements, the Princes or Payoads of Moldavia, shall then to his Majesty of Poland all due Reverence and respect, good Amity and Neighbourhood; and seeing that the said Payoads have ever been as it were Instruments of Perfection, or of the breach of the Peace; therefore we command, that for the time to come, neither the said Payoads, nor other of our Beglerbegs or Ministers, shall build to those Confinues any new Castle, Fort, or Bridge; and that in those Castles or Forts those Frontiers which are already built, there shall never any other Garrisons be kept but Moldavians; and according to the ancient Capitulations, the Tartars shall not inhabit, dwell, or till within those Confinues, of said Nations.

XV. And to the end this Peace and Amity may be always kept between us, we swear by the Name of God, and affirm by this our Imperial Article, that all the Ambassadors, great or inferior, which shall be sent from us to his Majesty, or those great or less which shall be sent from his Majesty to us, shall always be safe and secure, as well in their coming as their return; and that there shall never be made of any other passport, but that they shall be of us by all ways honoured and well received;

XVI. Concerning Merchants, Passengers, and other Poland Negotiators they shall be come safely and securely by Sea and Land into all the parts of our Empire; and for Customs, Tolls, and other Duties of their Merchandise, and in case of Debt, Credit, Suretyship, and such other like Accidents concerning the course of Justice and Law, we command that it shall be always observed according to the Agreements with our Father of happy Memory, Sultan Achmat. Which Articles are in this present accept and confirm, ratify, and command that they be of all our Subjects for ever punctually obeyed and observed.

XVII. Furthermore we promise, and in the Name of God swear, to observe and maintain for ever all those Conventions and Articles agreed upon and written in our Capitulations, by our Great Grandfather, Grandfather, and Father, and never to disannul any of them.

XVIII. And whereas to their greater desire of Sincerity concerning this Peace, his Majesty of Poland hath fought of us by his great Ambassador, that the Subjects of Poland may safely and securely come by the River of Turla with divers Merchandise, and sell, buy, and traffic in Ackirman, which traffic being used, will be of great benefit to both Estates. We ordain and command from henceforward, that the said Nation may come and negotiate safely and securely in the said Ackirman. And to the end that this business be established and concluded in a good manner, we will give order to our Ambassador, whom we intend to send shortly to his Majesty for the ratification thereof.

XIX. Which present Articles, Capitulations, Peace, Amity, League, and Correspondence, by the Grace of God we promise undoubtedly to maintain so long as we live in this World; and do hereby conclude between us and our Posterity, the King and State of Polonia, an everlasting Peace; Sealing it and confirming it with these Words, Friends to Friends, and Enemies to Enemies.

Notwithstanding all this, after the Duke was departed one days Journey, where he stayed to receive the Treaty signed, they altered some of the Articles to their own advantage, without his Knowledge. Which when he heard, he complained anew by his Letters to the Port of the abuse offered unto him, and made haste rather to escape than return. But the Cossacks at the same time being stirred about the Black Sea, the Viceroy and State (having nothing more in care than to shut up that back port, whereby they suffered much loss and Dishonour, and could not reverse it upon a fugitive People: which divided their Naval Army, being forced to send a portion of Gallies to defend the Trade, the best part of relief of the City of Constantinople coming from thole Coasts) resolved to give content to the Poles, and to assure the Peace; that they might with more Security attend their Affairs in Poland and Hungary; which Action was favoured vehemently by the present Viceroy. To which end, he sent answer into Poland, with Promises of Faith, and Reparation for the Injuries committed by the Tartars; laying the fault of miswriting the Treaty upon the Chancellor, which though they amended not, yet they did explain and interpret; and for better establishment and security on their behalfs of the Peace, they resolved to depose John-Beg, Prince of Tartars, and sent Mechmet Gherry, his Cousin German, and first of the Blood, late Prisoner in the Rhodes, to take Possession of his Dominion; who undertook to quiet and restrain that People; which he caused to be signified to Poland, that the King might see these alterations were only for the full security of the Peace on their side; that the Pole might take the like course with the Cossacks, who were not as yet reclaimed.

The Soldiers still continue in their Fury.

The Soldiers continued still in their height of Fury and Madnes, and those that were to go up on the Gallies for the defence of the Black Sea, and other Designs, being ready to depart, robbed, slew, brake Houses in the Face of the Magistrate in the open day: What was it not lawful for them to do that had slain their King, and made and destroyed the great Ministers at their Will and Pleasure, as their Stewards and Servants: and God did so blind them, that they should not see, that they digged up their own roots, and were made by God the blind instruments of their own Ruine. The Mint also was removed into the Seraglio, where was brought forth all the Saddles, Bridles, Stirrups, that had any Gold or Silver upon them, with all old Plate, to make Money to patch up a quiet, and to satisfy and content the Soldiers, and all little enough for the present to save the City from a total lack.

The Ambassadors of the Prince of Transilvania depart from the Port.

The Ambassadors of the Prince of Transilvania, having changed their stile of excommunicating the Peace with the Emperour by the change of the Visier, and finding the Opportunity of a Friend now in place to aid their Prince, they negotiated a new matter, affuring the Port, that by the troubles of Germany a fair occasion was given to recover Hungary, and to set the Crown upon their Masters Head; and that therefore if the Grand Seigneur would be pleased to grant unto their Prince the aid of the Græcian Army, that he would make another attempt to weaken the greatest Enemy of that Empire, which they easily obtaining (the ignorance and avarice of the Turk opening a way to credulity which was the constant advantage of Gabor, who could conquer both their Understandings and Forces to his own ends) being in all fully satisfied, they departed the twentieth of April. Which Resolution of the Port was much wondered at by all wise men, who knew how unfit the Turk was at that present for a War. The Prince was then at Cassovia, expecting the issue of his Ambassage, and in hope of Turkish Aid; which being granted and gathered upon his frontier, his whole Army was not very great, nor had he any Cannon to march withal to besiege any place; his chiefest trust consisting in his Intelligence in Hungary, where he expected a general revolt, and that all the Garrisons would open to him, or at least some diversion in Silezia (which he was promised) facilitate his ways; and he was not in despair, that upon the first appearance of an Army, Moravia, by the favour of the Count of Tournay, and his Friends, would follow the same Example; and this was the design which his Ambassadors had so long solicited at the Port, and dissembled at their first coming. Now there was nothing expected but a War; but not long after there arrived a new Ambassador from the Prince, without any mention of the Affairs of those parts; which made all men inquisitive, thinking he was either come to haften the Succours, or to change something in the manner and other Circumstances depending theron; but it was found that the States of Transilvania had assembled at Alba Julia, and were very loth to entertain a War, or to break with the Emperour; and therefore dispe-

ed two Commissioners towards him, who were well received and treated at Vienna; and from the Emperour was sent to Transilvania the Bishop of Nitria. Whereupon a new Peace was treated, and this Ambassador sent to procure the recall of the former Commands given to the Basso to move with their Armies. Whereby it was suspected he never had any purpose to make a War, but only to balance by the continuance thereof his Fears and last Agreements with the Emperour.

All Men prophesied (by reason of daily Disorders) the fall of the Ottoman Empire. But now the Basso of Arzerum, who was joynd with divers others, and had made a great Army, was in his march toward Angria, the direct way to Constantinople (Babylon yet resting in Rebellion) with a pretence of Reformation; who took nothing by force but the Treasure of the Empire. He held general Council in his Camp, and sent to the Port to require the Presence of the Musli, Cadets, Bassas, and ancient Beghs, to take knowledge and to punish the Traitors that murdered the late King, and to settle a new one lawfully that should be able to govern; to reduce the mutinied City-Souldier to Obedience and Discipline, and to place about the Emperour some Great Visier, chosen by the State, able to direct and apply Remedies to the Difficulties then grown to a Chrysis complaining, that every three or four Months, by the change of the Visier, the Provinces were destroyed, (for they placed and displaced the Governours according to their own Factions) and so contrary orders were sent abroad daily, inasmuch as no man knew who was King or Visier, nor whom they should obey. These were his Pretences, and if the present State would not consent to this Assembly, he then resolved to come to the Port, and settle all things at his Pleasure by the Sword. The great Officers in possession of the Empire and Government, loth to be called to an account by the Souldier, took a worse Resolution. To make a War; and made choice of Cigala Basso for General; which he refused upon the same pretence, that in his absence alterations would be so frequent, and that he should not please, or at least uncertainly, and according to Interpretation. Therefore he would have an absolute Dictatorship for the time, equal to that of a great Visier, or else he would not stir. This was granted him, and money given out, and order to pass the Water speedily; inrolling for his Army fifteen thousand Janizaries, and thirty thousand Spahies. But those did demur, and alleged it was a War against their own Brethren, and sought any Excuses rather than to come to blows. But the secret was, it was then Ramadan, or their Holy Lent, at the end of which they were to receive their Pay; and therefore they would not move, but pretended Religion. Next day after their Feast, when they should march, they flew themselves in their Colours, (having first held many Consultations) and would not march at all, unless the Emperour or Great Visier would go in Person. So every day brought forth new subject of Trouble, and the Empire to a great deal of hazard and danger.

BRIEF DISCOURSE OF THE GREATNESS OF THE TURKISH EMPIRE:

As also wherein the greatest Strength thereof consisteth; and of what Power the bordering Princes, as well Mabometans as Christians, are in Comparifon of it.

By RICHARD KNOLLES.

THE History of the Turks (being indeed nothing else but the true Record of the wofull Ruines of the greater part of the Christian Common-weal) thus, as before passed through, and at length brought to an end; and their Empire (of all others now upon Earth far the greatest) as a proud Champion still standing up as it were in defiance of the whole World; I thought it good for the Conclusion of this my Labour, to propose unto the view of the zealous Christian, the Greatness thereof; and so near as I could to set down the Bounds and Limits within the which it is (by the goodness of God) as yet contained, together with the Strength and Power thereof, as also in what regard it hath the Neighbor Princes bordering or confining upon it, with some other Particularities tending unto the same purpose. All or most part thereof, although it be by the confiderate well to be gathered out of the whole course of the History before going, yet shall it more plainly here together in the full thereof of appear, than by the long and particular consideration of the rising and increase thereof be perceived; nor much unlike the overgrown Tree, at the greatness whereof every man wondereth, no man in the mean time either perceiving or marking how by little and little in tract of time it grew up to that bigness, as now to overtop all the rest of the Wood. The Imperial Seat of this so great and dreadful an Empire, is the most famous City of Constantinople, sometime the Glory of the Greek of Constantinople, sometime the Glory of the Ottoman Emperours, acknowledging no man like unto himself, triumphed over many Nations; a City fatally fallen to command, and by the great Conqueror Tamurlane, of all others thought to be the best seated for the Empire of the World. In which City (taken from the Christians by Mahomet, the second, by the Turks (named the Great, and the Greek Empire by him subdued) as the Ottoman Emperours have ever since seated themselves, to have they wonderfully, even to the astonishment of the World, out of the Ruines of that so glorious a State, increased both their Strength and Empire, almost altogether fixed even in the self same Kingdoms, Countries, and Regions, as was sometimes that; though not as yet (God be thanked) able to attain to the uttermost bounds that the Empire sometimes had, especially in Europe; albeit that it hath oftentimes in pride thereof most mightily swollen, and in some few places thereof somewhat also exceeded the same. Amongst the rest of the Ottoman Emperours, this great Monarch of whom we speak (namely Achmet the first, which now reigneth in that most stately and Imperial City) hath at this present under his Command and Empire, the chief and most fruitful parts of the three first known parts of the World; only America remaining free from him, not more happy with the rich Mines thereof, than in that it is so far from out of his reach. For in Europe he hath all the Sea-Coast from the Confines of Epidaurus (the uttermost bound of his Empire in Europe Westward) unto the mouth of the River Tanais, now called Don, with whatsoever lieth betwixt Buda in Hungary, and the Imperial City of Constantinople; in which space is comprehended the better part of Hungary, all Bosnia, Servia, Bulgaria, with a great part of Dalmatia, Epirus, Macedonia, Græcia, Peloponnesus, Thracia, the Archipelago, with the rich Islands contained therein. In Africa he possesseth all the Sea-Coast from Velex (or as some call it Belis) De Gomer, or more truly to say, from the River Mulua (the bounder of the Kingdom of Fes) even unto the Arabian Gulf, or Red Sea, Eastward; except some few Places upon the Rivage of the Sea, holden by the King of Spain; viz. Morocco, Melilla, Oran, and Pennon; and from Alexandria Northward unto the City of Africa, called of old Siene, Southward; in which space are contained the famous Kingdoms of Tremisen, Algiers, Tunes, and Egypt, with divers other great Cities and Provinces. In Asia all is his from the Streights of Hellaspontus Westward, unto the great City of Tauris Eastward; and from Derbet, near unto the Caspian Sea Northward, unto Adena upon the Gulf of Arabia Southward. The greatness of this his Empire may be better be conceived by the greatness of some parts thereof; the Mere of Mauritania, which is all as the Turkish Emperours command, being in compass a thousand miles; and the Exasine or Black-Sea in circuit two thousand and seven hundred; and the Mediterranean Coast, which is subject unto him, containing in compass about eight thousand miles. But to speak of his whole Territory together; he goeth in his own Dominion from Tauris to Buda, about three thousand two hundred miles. The like distance is from Derbet unto Adena. The like distance from the Persian Gulf unto Tromajona in Barbary, are accounted little less than four thousand miles. He hath also in the Sea the most noble Islands of Cyprus, Euboea, Rhodus, Samos, Chios, Lesbos, and others of the Archipelago. In this so large and spacious an Empire are contained many great and large Countries, sometime most famous Kingdoms, abounding with all manner of worldly Blessings and Natures store: For what Kingdom or Country is more fruitful than Egypt, Syria, and a great part of Asia? What Country more wealthy or more plentiful of all good things, than was sometime Hungary, Græcia and Thracia? In which Countries he hath also many rich and famous Cities, but especially four, which be greatest for Wealth and Trade; namely, Constantinople, Caire, Aleppo, and Tauris. Constantinople, for multitude of People, exceedeth all the Cities of Europe; wherein are decreed to be above seven hundred thousand Men; which if it be so, it is as much equal to two such Cities as Paris in France. Aleppo is the greatest City of Syria, and, as it were the centre wherunto all the Merchandise of Asia repair. Tauris, of late the Royal Seat of the Persian Kings, and one of the greatest Cities of that Kingdom, from whom it was in this our Age taken by Amurath the Third, hath in it above two hundred thousand Men. Caire, amongst all the Cities of Affrica is the chief, leaving all others far behind it, (although that some make the City of Cano equal unto it in greatness) being as it were the Store-house, not of Egypt only, and of a great part of Affrica, but of India also; the Riches whereof being brought by the Red-Sea to Sues, and from thence upon Camels to Caire, and so down the River Nilus to Alexandria, are thence dispersed into these Western Parts; albeit, that this rich Trade hath of late time been much impaired, and so like more to be, the Christians (especially the Portugals) trafficking into the East-Indies, and by the vast Ocean transporting the rich Commodities of those Eastern Countries into the West, to the great hindrance of the Grand Signior's Customs in Caire.

The Osman Government in this his so great an Empire, is altogether like the Government of the Master over his Slave, and indeed is but a Tyranny; for the Great Signior is to absolute a Lord of all things within the compass of his Empire, that all his Subjects and People, be they never so great, do call themselves his Slaves and not his Subjects; neither hath any man power over himself, much less is he Lord of the House wherein he dwelleth, or of the Land which he tilleth, except some few Families in Constantinople, to whom some few such things were by way of reward, and upon special favour given by Mahomet the Second, at such time as he was the same. Neither is any man in that Empire so great, or yet so far in favour with the Great Signior, as that he can assure himself of his Life, much less of his present Fortune or State, longer than it pleaseth the Sultan. In which so absolute Sovereignty (by any free born People not to be endured) the Tyrant preferreth himself by most special means; first, by taking off all Arms from his natural Subjects; and then by putting the same and all things else concerning the State and Government thereof into the Hands of the Apostate, or Renegade Christians, whom for the most part every third, fourth, or fifth Year, (or oftener, if his need require) he taketh in their Child-hood, from their miserable Parents, as his Tenth or Tribute Children; whereby he gaineth two great Commodities: First, For that in so doing he spoileth the Province he most feareth, of the flower, sinews, and strength of the People, choice besides still made of the strongest Youth, and fittest for War; then for that with these, as with his own Creatures, he armeth himself, and by them assur'd his State; for they, in their Childhood, taken from their Parents Laps, and delivered in Charge to one or other appointed for that purpose, quickly, and before they are aware, become Mahometans; and so to no more acknowledging Father or Mother, depend wholly on the Great Signior; who, to make use of them, both feeds them and fosters them, and whose hands only they look for all things, and whom alone they thank for all. Of which Fry, to taken from their Christian Parents, (the only Seminary of his Wars) some become Horse-men, some Foot-men, and so in time the greatest Commanders of his State and Empire, next unto himself; the natural Turks, in the mean time, giving themselves wholly unto the Trade of Merchandise, and other their Mechanical Occupations; or else to the feeding of Cattel, their most ancient and natural Vocation, not intermeddling at all with matters of Government or State. So that if unto these his Soldiers, all of the Christian Race, you joyn also his Fleet and Money, you have as it were the whole strength of his Empire; for in these four, his Horse-men, his Foot-men, his Fleet and Money, especially consisteth his great Force and Power: wherof to speak more particularly, and first concerning his Money. It is commonly thought, that his ordinary Revenue exceedeth not eight millions of Gold; and albeit, that it might seem, that he might of so large an Empire receive a far greater Revenue, yet doth he not, for that both he and his Men of War (in whole power all things are) have their greatest and almost only care upon Arms, fitter by nature to waste away desolatory Countries, than to preserve and enrich them; inasmuch that for the preservation of their Armies, and furtherance of their Expeditions, (every year to do) they most grievously spoil even their own People and Provinces whereby they pass, scarce leaving them Necessaries wherewith to live; so that the Subjects, despairing to enjoy the Fruits of the Earth, much less the Riches which by their Industry and Labour they might get unto themselves, do now no farther endeavour themselves either to industry or Traffick than they needs must, yet than very necessity it self informeth them. For to what end availeth it to low that another man must reap? or to reap that which another man is ready to devour? Whereupon it cometh, that in the Territories of the Osman Country, say, even in the most fruitful Countries of Macedonia and Greece, are seen great Forests, all every where waste, few Cities well peopled, and the greatest part of those Countries lying desolate and desart, that of Hubbundry (in all well-ordered Common-wealths the Prince's greatest force) decaying, the Earth neither yieldeth her Increase unto the painful Husbandman, neither he matter unto the Artificer, neither the Artificer Wares to furnish the Merchant with, all together with the Plough running into ruin and decay. As for the Trade of Merchandise, it is almost all in the hands of the Perss, or the Christians of Europe, viz. the Ragufians, Venetians, Genovais, French, or English; the natural Turks having therein the least to do, holding in that their so large an Empire no other famous Cities for Trade, more than the four above named, viz. Constantinople, Tauris, Aleppo, and Caire; wherunto may be added, Cassa, and Thesalonica in Europe; Damascus, Tripoli, and Aden in Asia; Alexandria and Algiers in Affrica. In these Countries here in this West part of Europe, of the abundance of People oftentimes ariseth Death; but in many parts of the Turks Dominions, for want of Men to manure the Ground; most part of the poor Country People, drawn from their own dwellings, being enforced with Victuals and other Necessaries to follow their great Armies in their long Expeditions, of whom scarce one of ten ever return home to their dwellings again, there by the way perishing, if not by the Enemies Sword, yet by the wants, the intemperateness of the Air, or immoderate pains taking. But to come nearer unto our purpose; Although the great Turks ordinary Revenues be no greater than is aforesaid, yet are his extraordinary elcheats to be greatly accounted of, especially his Confiscations, Forfeitures, Fines, Amerciaments (which are right many) his Tributes, Customs, Tyths and Tents of all Preys taken by Sea or Land, with divers other such like, far exceeding his standing and ordinary Revenue; his Balfas and other his great Officers like ravening Harpies as it were sucking out the Blood of his poor Subjects, and heaping up inestimable Treasures, which for the most part fall again into the Grand Signior's Coffers. Ibrahim Visier Bassa (who lived not long since) is supposed to have brought with him from Caire to the value of six millions; and Mahomet, another of the Victors, was thought to have had a far greater sum. His Prebends also amount unto a great matter for no Ambaffador can come before him without great Gifts, no man is to hope for any commodious Office or Preferment without Money, no man may with Empty Hands come to the Presence of him to get a Prince, either from the Province he had the charge of, or from any great Expedition he was sent upon; neither unto so great and mighty a Prince are there a far greater sum. The Vayvods of Moldavia, Valachia, and Transilvania, before their late revolt, by Gifts preferred themselves in their Principalties, being almost daily changing, especially in Valachia and Moldavia; for those Honours were by the Grand Signior still given to them that would give most; who, to perform what they had offered, miserably oppressed the People, and brought their Provinces into great Poverty. In brief an eating time it is for the great Tyrant to find Occasion for him as his Pleasure to take away any Mans Life, together with his Wealth, be it never so great; so that he cannot well be said to lack Money so long as any of his Subjects have it. Nevertheless, the late Persian War he emptied the most covetous Sultan Amurath's Coffers, and exhausted his Treasures, that all over his Empire the value of his Gold was beyond all credit enhanced, inasmuch that a Chequene was twice so much worth as before; besides that, the Metal whereof his Gold and Silver was made was so embased, that it gave occasion unto the Janizaries to set fire upon the City of Constantinople, to the great Terror, not of the vulgar sort only, but of the Grand Signior himself also. And in the City of Aleppo only were in the Name of the Great Sultan sixty thousand Chequenes taken up in preft of the Merchants there, which, how well they were repayed, we leave for them to report.

Now albeit that the Turks Revenues be not so great as the largeness of his Empire and the fruitfulness of his Countries might seem to afford, all the Soil being his own; yet hath he in his own Dominion a Commodity of far greater value and use than are the Revenues themselves; which is, the Multitude of the Timariots or Pensioners, which are all Horsemen, so called of Timar, that is, a stipend which they have of the Great Signior, viz. the possession of certain Villages and Towns, which they hold during their Life, and for which they stand bound to every threecore Duckets they have of yearly Revenue to maintain one Horseman, either with Bow and Arrows, or else with Targuet and Lance; and that as well in time of Peace as War; for the Osman Emperours take unto themselves all such Lands as they by the Sword win from their Enemies, as well Mahometans as Christians, all which they divide into Timars, or as we call them Commendams, which they give unto their Soldiers of good desert for term of Life, upon Condition that they shall (as is aforesaid) according to the proportion thereof keep certain Men and Horses fit for service always ready whensoever they shall be called upon; wherewith consisteth the greatness of the Turks, and the surest means for the Preservation of their Empire. For if by this means the care of manuring the Ground were not committed unto the Soldiers, for the profit they hope thereof, but left in the hands of the plain painful Husbandman, all would in time be waste, an Empire lie waste and desolate; the Turks themselves commonly saying, That whosoever the Grand Signior's Horse leteeth his Foot, the Gra's will grow no more there; meaning the Destruction that their great Armies bring in all Places where they come. The Institution of these Timariots, as the taking up of the *Azamoglan*s, (for so they call those Children which are taken up from their Christian Parents to be brought up for Janizaries) are the two chief Pillars of the Turks Empire, and the strength of their Wars; both which seem to be devised unto the imitation of the Romans, as are divers things more in the Turkish Government; for the Roman Emperours used their own Subjects in their Wars, and of them consigned the Tributary Army, which never departed from the Emperours side, but were still to guard his Person, as do the Janizaries the Great Turk. And in the Roman Empire Lands were given unto Soldiers of good desert, for them to take the profit of during their Lives, in reward of their good Service and Valour, which were called Beneficia, and they which had them, Beneficiarii, or as we term them Benefices, and benefited Men. Alexander Severus granted unto such Soldiers Hereditas that might enjoy those Lands and Commendams, upon condition also, That they themselves should serve as had their Fathers, otherwise not. Constantine the Great also gave unto his Captains that had well deserved of him, certain Lands for them to live upon during the term of their Life. The like Fees in France, which they called Fenda, were of Temporaries made Perpetuities by these their late Kings. These Timariot Horsemen in the Turkish Empire, serve to two great and most notable purposes; wherof the first is, That by them the Grand Signior, as with a Bribe, keepeth the rest of his Subjects in every part of his great Empire in awe, so that they cannot so soon move, but that they shall have these their Timariots as Faulcons in their Necks; for to that purpose they are dispersed all over his Dominion and Empire.

ords. For the more manifesting of which their Government, as also that they which come hereafter may be comparing of that which is here written with the state that then shall be, see how much this great Empire in the mean time increaseth or diminisheth, I have thought good here briefly to set down all the said Beglerbegs, with briefly to set down all the said Beglerbegs, with their Sanzacks and Timariots, and as near as I could (either by reading, or the credible relation of others well travelled in those Countries) together, and as it were at one flew, set forth the whole Strength and Power of this so mighty an Empire, as also in what Countries and Provinces the same is especially placed.

The Beglerbegs or Great Commanders of the Turks Empire in Europe.

The first and chiefest of all the Beglerbegs in the Turks Empire, is the Beglerbeg of Romania, or Gracia, called of the Turks Rum-lu (as we say the Roman Country) the principal residence of whose Beglerbegship is at Sophia, a City of Bulgaria, so appointed for the commodious situation thereof, for the better command of the rest of the Provinces of Europe; howbeit that he for the most part, or rather altogether abideth at the Court, which the other Beglerbegs cannot do; for they are bound not to depart from the Government of their Provinces; in which charge they ordinarily continue but three years only, the great Sultan still changing and altering them at his Pleasure. This Beglerbeg hath under his own Ensign and Command forty thousand Timariots always ready at his call, under the conduct of these one and twenty Sanzacks following; namely the

1 Bagdat, or new Babylon, where he resideth, not far from the Ruines of old Babylon, who hath under him forty thousand Timariots.

2 Balfara, not far from Bagdat, upon the Perfas Gulf, who hath under his Rule or Government fifteen thousand Timariots.

3 Laxa, towards Ormus, and near unto the Perfas, hath under his Regiment ten thousand Timariots.

4 Gemen and Aden, two famous Cities in Arabia Felix, upon the Coast of the Red-Sea, who hath under him thirty thousand Timariots.

5 Chebezer, or Zebet, upon the Coast of the Arabian Gulf, near unto the Kingdom of the great Ethiopian King Prejant, commonly (but corruptly) called Presbiter John.

6 Cyrrus, who lieth at Nicofia or Pamassia, commanding over all that great Island, sometime of it self a Kingdom.

7 Scheberecal in Assyria, bordering upon the Perfas, who hath under his Government ten thousand Timariots.

8 Wan, a City in the Confines of the greater Armenia toward Media, who hath under him twelve thousand Timariots.

9 Arzerum, or Erzerum, in the Borders of Armenia towards Capadocia, about four days Journey from Trapezond, who commandeth over twenty thousand Timariots.

10 Teftis, near unto the Georgians, erected by Mutapha Bafa, General of Amurat the third's Army against the Perfas, in the year 1578.

11 Siruan, or Media, erected by the same Mutapha, and at the same time, commandeth over all that great Country, sometime a famous Kingdom.

12 Temir-Capi, or Derbent, near unto the Calpian Sea, taken by Ofman Bafa the same year 1578; who, having slain Schebenet Chan, his Father-in-Law, reduced that Country into the form of a Beglerbegship.

13 Cars, a City of Armenia the greater, distant from Arzerum four days Journey, by Mutapha Bafa made a Beglerbegship in the year 1578.

14 Tchildir or Taidler, in the Confines of the Georgians, erected by the same General Mutapha, in the same year 1579.

15 Fafsa, or Ibafis, in Mengrelia, near unto the Georgians, erected by Ulucales the Turks Admiral, the same year 1579.

16 Sochum, in the Borders of the Georgians, erected by the great Bafa Sinan, in the year 1580.

17 Batin, there erected also by the same Sinan Bafa.

2 Sunachia, in the Country of Media, erected by Ofman Bafa in the year 1583.

3 Tauris, a most famous City of Armenia the greater, sometime the Regal Seat of the Perfas Kings, but of late taken from them by Ofman Bafa, and converted into a Beglerbegship in the same year 1583.

But these late erected Honours, namely the Beglerbegships of Teftis, Siruan, Temir-Capi, Cars, Tchildir, Fafsa, and the rest, gained by Amurat from the Perfas and the Georgians, although they contain a great Territory, are not of themselves any of them worthy of those proud Titles, or yet able to maintain the same (Siruan, Reivan, and Tauris only excepted) but were by the great Bafas, Mutapha, Sinan, Ferat, and Ofman, Amurath's Lieutenants, first their own great Honour, and the encouraging of them which were to defend those their new Conquests, erected; being indeed nothing either in Power or Strength comparable with the other more ancient Beglerbegs either in Europe or Asia. But having thus passed through the great Kingdoms and Provinces by the Turks holden in Europe and Asia, with their proud Honours therein, let us go forward toward the South, to see what great Kingdoms and Territories they at this present hold in Africa also.

The Beglerbegs or Great Commanders of the Turks Empire in Africa.

| 1 Misfir , who still making his abode at the great City of Caire , hath under his command all the Kingdom of Aegypt , with sixteen Sanzacks, and an hundred thousand Timariots.          |  |
| 2 Cefair , in ancient time called Jahia Cafaria , but now commonly Algiers , where the Beglerbeg still resideth, commandeth over all that Kingdom, wherein are forty thousand Timariots. |  |
| 3 Tunis , where he still remaining as a Viceroy, commandeth all that great and large Kingdom.  |  |
| 4 Tripolis , the Seat of his Beglerbegship, by Sinan Bafa taken from the Knights of Malta in the year 1551.  |  |

There are beside these, two other Kingdoms in Africa inrolled in the Turks Records as their own, although they be not as yet by them brought into the form of Beglerbegships, namely the Kingdoms of Fes and Morocco, but are as yet holden by them as their Tributaries and Vassals.

But, having thus as it were taken view of the Greatness and Forces of this so mighty a Monarchs Empire by Land, and so in some sort bounded it out, let us consider also his Power by Sea. With the great Ocean he much medleth not, more than a little in the Gulfs of Perfa and Arabia, most of his Territories lying upon the Mediterranean and Euxine Seas, or else more inwardly into the heart of Asia near to no Sea. Now for these Seas, no Prince in the World hath greater or better means to fortify his Fleets than he; for the overgrown Woods of Epirus and Cilicia, and more than they, those of Nicomedia and Trapezond, are so great and thick, and so full of tall Trees fit for the building of Ships and Gallies of all sorts,

as is almost incredible. Neither wanteth he flore of Shipwrights and Carpenters for the framing of that fo great flore of Timber, large pay drawing even the Christian skilful Carpenters and Workmen into his Arsenals at Constantinople, Synope, Callipolis, and others. For proof whereof it is worth the noting, that Seymus the second, in our fresh remembrance, the next year after that notable overthrow by him received at the Echinades (commonly called the battle of Lepanto) rigged up a Fleet, wherewith Uluces his Admiral was not afraid to face the whole Power of the confederate Christian Princes at Cerigo. Neither hath the Turk ever wanted good flore of expert Seamen, after the manner of those Seas; for beside those he hath in flore at Callipolis and Synope, out of his Gallies, which he hath always in readiness at Leibos, Chios, Rhodus, Cyprus, and Alexandria, and from the Pirats which he continually receiveth into the Ports of Tunis, Bugia, Tripoli, and Algiers, he can and doth from them when need is, chuse Captains, Mariners, and Rowers sufficient for the manning and flooring of his Fleet. What he is able to do in those Seas was well seen in our time, by those Fleets which he had at Malta, Cyprus, the Echinades, and Cadix. He hath beside of all necessary and warlike Provision abundant flore, and of great Ordinance to furnish himself withal both by Sea and Land an infinite quantity. Out of Thangay he hath carried away above 5000 great pieces, out of Cyprus 500, and few less from Guleta, not to speak what he hath more got from the Christians in divers other places also. What flore he hath of Shot and Powder he shewed at Malta, where he discharged above 60000 great floot, at Favangia, where he bestowed 18000; and at Guleta, where, in the space of nine and thirty days, by the fury of his great Ordinance overthrew the Fortifications which the Christians had been forty years in building. So that, to return again to our purpose, the Great Turk will provide of Men, Money, Shipping, and great Ordinance, and having done so great Matters at Sea, as is before rehearsed, is not in realon otherwise to be accounted of than as of a most mighty and puissant Prince as well by Sea as Land; which to be lo, the Greatness of his Deniz Beglerbegs, or great Admiral (commonly called Capitan Bassa, of whom we have not yet spoken) well declareth. This great Man having charge of all the Grand Seigniors Strength at Sea, is alway one of the Vicer Basses, not bound still to follow the Court, as the other Vicers be, but always, or for the most part reliant at Constantinople or Callipolis, to be the nearer unto his charge. He that now hath this honourable Place, is called of the Turks Cigale Bassa, descended of an honourable Family of that Name in Genoa; who commonly residing at Constantinople or Callipolis, hath under him fourteen Sanzacks, all of them great Commanders, and Men of great Place; namely the

The Greatness, Wealth, and Strength of this fo mighty an Empire, as well by Sea as Land, thus in some sort declared, let us now see upon what Princes it also consisteth, and of what Power every one of them is in comparison of that fo great and overgrown a State. The Turks toward the East border upon the Persians, according to a right line drawn by Imagination from Tauris to Bahar; upon the Portugals at the Persian Gulf, and to there likewise toward the South; at the Red-Sea, upon the great Ethiopian King Preja; South, in Affric upon the Kingdom of Morocco; and in Europe, upon the Kingdom of Naples, with some part of the Venetian Seigniorie; toward the North upon the Polonians, and the Territories of the House of Austria. Now to begin with the Persian; the great Turk no doubt is in Field too strong for him, as by proof hath been oftentimes seen; for Mahomet the Great in plain Battle overcame the valiant Uzun Casfanes; Solyman the first, Hyfmael and Tamas, the two great and famous Persian Kings; and now of late in our time, Amurat the Thrid by his Lieutenant hath taken from the Persians all Media, with the greater Armenia, both sometimes famous Kingdoms, together with the Regal City of Tauris. That the Turk fo prevailth, is by reason of his Foot-men, which the Persian wanteth; and of his great Ordinance, wherewith the Persians by Valour of their Horsemen have become in open Field foiled the Turk, yet have they still lost some part of their Country; Solyman taking from them Mopotamia, and Amurat, Media and Armenia. Neither do the Persians alone feel that harm, and lose their own, but undid their Confederates also; Solyman the first spoiling the Mamelukes of Egypt and Syria, and utterly rooting them from off the face of the Earth; and Amurat, by his Lieutenant Gougiar, both of them the Persian Kings Friends and Confederates. None is not the Turk fo much too strong at Land for the Persian, but that he is as much too weak at Sea for the Portugals; in those Seas I mean where their Forces have more than once to the Turks cost met together in the East-Indies; the Portugals having in those rich but remote Countries many fure Harbours and Ports, yea, fair Countries and Territories abounding with Victuals and all Provision necessary for Shipping, with some also of those great Eastern Princes their Allies and Confederates; whereas the Turk on the other side hath nothing in the Persian Gulf strong, beside Bahar the Sea Coast of Arabia, which might stand him in best stead, having no more but four Towns, and those but weak and of small worth. So that there, as also in the Red Sea, it is a matter of exceeding charge and difficulty for him to let out any great Fleet into those Seas, for that those Countries are utterly destitute of Wood fit to make Ships. For which cause, those times that he prepared his Fleets into the Red Sea (to have cut off the Portugals trade into the East-Indies) being not able to perform the same in the Persian Gulf, he was inforced to bring the Timber for the building of his Gallies out of the Ports of Bithinia and Chicia (out of another World as it were) up the Nile into Caire, and from thence upon Camels by Land to Suez, where he hath his Arsenal, a thing almost incredible. And yet having done what he could, he never gained any thing but loss and Dishonour; as in the year 1578 at the City of Dium; and in the year 1552, at the Island of Armuz; and after that at Mombaza, where four of the Turks Gallies, with one Galliot, which by the favour of the King of Mombaza had thought to have staid in those Seas, were by the Portugals taken; who fill have a special regard and care that the Turks settle not themselves in those Seas; but as soon as they perceive them to prepare any Fleet, they forthwith let up on them, and to extend oftentimes without assistance enter into the Red Sea. Proffer John, of whom although men speak much, yet is he nothing in strength to be compared unto the Turk, but far inferior unto him both for Commanders and Soldiers, as also for Weapons and Munition; for that great Prince hath a great Kingdom without Fortification, and a multitude of Soldiers without Arms; as appeared by the overthrow of Barnagallo his Lieutenant towards the Red Sea; who, having left that Sea coast unto the Turks, was brought to that extremity, that to have Peace with them, he yielded to pay unto them a yearly Tribute of a thousand ounces of Gold. In Affric the Turk hath more Territories than hath the King of Morocco, otherwise called the Xerife; for he possesseth all that there lyeth betwixt the Red Sea and the Kingdom of Fex; but the Xerife hath the better part, the richer, stronger, and more united; yet dare neither of them well make War upon the other, for the nearness of the King of Spain, Enemy unto them both. Now then there remaineth the rest of the Christian Princes bordering upon the Turk; and first the King of Polonia. What their two Princes can do the one against the other, hath been seen in some former Expeditions, wherein the Polonian had fill the worse; yet it should seem, that of later time the Turk hath not been greatly desirous to move the Polonian too far, for that being provoked by divers occasions, (namely in the Kings of Spain and France), in the year 1604, John the Vayvod of Valachia had with the Turks, many Polonian Horse-men served the said Vayvod, though not indeed sent from the King; and in the time of Signifund, the Polonian Cossacks have with divers Incursions not a little troubled them; beside the late motions of John Smolchick, the great Chancellor and General of the Polonian Forces, for the slaying of the Tartars by the Turks sent for, he hath been content to comport the same, and not with his wonted pride fought to be revenged thereof, as he hath for far less upon some other Princes. And on the other side, the Polonians, since the unfortunate Expedition of King Ladislaus, never took upon them any Wars against the Turks, neither gave such Aid as they should unto the Valachians their Confederates, but suffered to be taken from themselves whatsoever they had toward the Euxine or Black-Sea; a thing imputed rather unto the want of Courage in their Kings, than to the Nobility of that Kingdom. Signifund the first, being by Pope Leo the Tenth, invited to the Wars against the Turks, answered them in these few words: Set you the Christian Princes at unity amongst themselves, and I for my part will not be wanting. Signifund the second fo abhorred the Wars, that he not only declined the Turks, but, provoked by the Muscovites, never thought to revenge the same. King Stephen, (by the commendation of Amurat chosen King of Polonia) an indifferent enemy both of his Enemies Forces and his own, thought it a most dangerous thing to joyn Battle with the Turk, and yet in private talk with his Friend, would oftentimes say, That with thirty thousand Foot joyned unto his Polonian Horse-men, he durst well to undertake an Expedition against the Turk; which he was supplied oftentimes to have thought upon. The Emperor, with the rest of the Princes of the House of Austria, are by a longer tract of ground joyned unto this great Empire of the Turks, than any one other

The Emperor, with the rest of the Princes of the House of Austria, together with the Aid of the German, have much ado to defend themselves against the Turk.

The Venetians by Policy rather than by force, maintain their State against the Turk.

The King of Spain, of all other Princes that border upon the Turk, best able to wage War with him.

Prince of the World, and bellow in Fortifications and the maintenance of their Garrisons, (wherein they have continually above twenty thousand Horse and Foot) the greatest part of their Revenues, even in the time of Peace, much more in those times when they have yet left, or to enlarge their long Wars; and with the German Forces joyned unto their own, are more careful how to defend themselves, than to enlarge their Empire. The Emperor Ferdinand, with greater force than Uluces, undertook the unfortunate Expeditions of Suda and Pelagja; which fo evil fell out, not for that his Forces were not sufficient or strong enough, but for that they wanted Agility and Dexterity. The truth is, that his Armies were strong enough, and sufficientlly furnished with all things necessary, but consisted for the most part of Germans and Bohemians, flow and heavy People, unfit to encounter with the Turks, a more ready and nimble kind of Soldiers. The Venetians also controntier the Turks by many hundred miles, both by Sea and Land, and defend themselves rather by peaceable Policy than force of Arms; notably fortifying their Strong-holds upon their Frontiers, declining by all means the Dangers and Charges of War, by Ambushages and rich Presents, leaving nothing unattempted, (their Liberty and State preferred) rather than to fall to Wars. To say the truth of them, although they had both Court and Warlike provision sufficient, yet want they Men and Victuals answerable to fo great a War against fo puissant an Enemy. There remaineth only the King of Spain, of all other the great Princes either Christians or Mahometans bordering upon him the best able to deal with him; his yearly Revenues far exceeding those of the Turks, as that they are also probably thought to countervail the great estate of his Timariots, and his great Dominions in Spain, Portugal, Naples, Sicily, Milan, Sardinia, and the Low Countries, (if they were with him at unity) able to afford unto him fo great and powerful a Strength both by Sea and Land, as might make him dreadful even unto the Great Turk when he swellth in his greatness; but considering how his Forces are distracted for the maintenance of his Wars at once in divers places, as also for the necessary defence and keeping of his so large and dispersed Territories, not all the best of themselves affected of himself strong enough against the united Forces of the Great Turk, whenever they shall chance to be employed upon him. So that by this we have already said, is easy to be gathered, how much the Turk is too strong for any one of the neighbour Princes, either Mahometans or Christians, bordering upon him, and therefore to be of them the more feared. Yet, left some mistaking me, might think, What, is then the Turk invincible? Far be that thought from me, to think any Enemy of Christ Jesu (be his Arm never so strong) to be able to withstand his Power, either quite to devour his little Flock, rage he never so much about it. As for the Turk, the Why the most dangerous and profficed Enemy of the Turk is not to be Christian Common-weal, be his strength fo great, though in yea, and haply greater too than is before declared, (the greatness of his Dominion and Empire considered) yet is he not to be thought therefore either so invincible, or his Power fo great, as it in shew seemeth for to be; his Timariot Horse-men (his greatest strength) dispersed over his whole Empire, being never possibly the one half of them by him to be gathered into the body of one Army; neither if they were lo, possible in such a multitude long to be kept together, living upon no pay of his, but upon such Store and Provision onely as they bring with them from their Timari, never sufficient to maintain them long. Besides that, the policy of his State hardly or never suffereth him to draw above a third part of his Timar out of his Countries where they dwell, for fear lest the rest of the People, by them till kept under, should in their absence take up Arms against him in defence of themselves and their ancient Liberty; whereafter, the greatest part of those poor oppressed Souls, as well Mahometans as Christians in every Province of his Empire, awaiting the opportunity, most desirously longeth. So that more than two parts of them being always to be left at home for necessary defence of the spacious borders of his so large an Empire, as also for the keeping in Obedience of so many discontented Nations; it is a great matter, if he, even in his greatest Wars, draw together of these kind of Souldiers the full number of an hundred and fifty thousand strong, making up the rest of his huge Multitude with his Acarzai, living of no pay of his, but upon the spoil of the Enemy onely, the fifth part whereof they pay unto him also. All which put together, what manner of men they be, and of what Valour, not onely the small Armies of the Christians, under the leading of their worthy Chieftains, Huniades, Scanderbeg, King Matthias, and others, have to their immortal Glory in former times made good proof; but even in this our Age, and that as were but the other day, the Transilvanian Prince, with divers other Captains and Commanders yet living, have done the like also, as well witnesseth the late Battle of Agria, wherein the Christians, in number not half so many as the Turks, by plain Valour drave the Great Sultan Mahomet himself (with Ibrahim Basha his Lieutenant General) out of the Field, and had of him had the most notable Victory that ever was got against that Enemy, had they not by too much carelessness, and untimely desire of spoil, themselves shamefully interrupted the same. But thus to let his Horse-men pass; the chief strength of his Foot-men are his Janizaries, never in number exceeding twelve or fourteen thousand, yet seldom times half so many even in his greatest Armies, except he himself be there in Person present in the midst of them; who, beside the small number of them, in the time of these their late voluptuous and effeminate Emperours, corrupted with the Pleasures of Constantinople, and for want of their wonted Discipline, have, together with their ancient Obedience and Patience, lost also a great part of their former Reputation and Valour; all the rest of his Foot-men filling up the Body of his populous Army, being his Alapi, rather Pioneers than Souldiers, men of small Worth, and so accounted of both by the Turks and their Enemies also. So that all things well considered, his best Souldiers being the least part of his greatest Armies, and they also far unlike their Predecessors, the stern followers of the former Ottoman Kings and Emperours, but Men now given to Pleasure and Delight, it is not otherwise to be thought, but that he bringeth into the Field far more Men than good Souldiers, more bravery than true Valour, more shew than Worth, his Multitude being his chiefest strength, his supposed greatness the Terror of his Neighbour Princes, and both together the very Majesty of his Empire. Which, although it be indeed very strong, for the reasons before acknowledged, yet is it by many probably thought to be now upon the declining hand, their late Emperours in their own Persons far degenerating from their Warlike Progenitors, their Souldiers generally giving themselves to unwonted Pleasures, their ancient Discipline of War neglected, their Superstition not with so much zeal as of old regarded, and Rebellions in divers parts of his Empire of late strangely raised, and mightily supported; all the signs of a declining State. Which, were they not at all to be seen, as indeed they be very pregnant; yet the Greatness of this Empire being such, as that it laboureth with nothing more than the weightiness of it self, it must needs (after the manner of worldly things) of it self fall, and again come to nought, no man knowing when or how so great a Work should be brought to pass, but he in whole deep Counsels all these great Revolutions of Empires and Kingdoms are from Eternity shut up; who at his Pleasure shall in due time, by such means as he seeth best, accomplish the same, to the unspeakable comfort of his poor afflicted flock, in one place or other, still in danger to be by this roaring Lyon devoured. Which work of so great wonder, He for his Son our Saviour Christ's sake, the glory of his Name, and comfort of many thousand oppressed Christians, fed with the Bread of carelessness amidst the Furnace of Tribulation, in mercy hasten, that we with them, and they with us, all as Members of one Body, may continually sing, Unto him be all Honour and Praise, World without end.
